from depletion then. The ghost of the panic was driven from this chamber in May, 1834, by the report of MR. TANEY, showing that all the sources of the national revenue were in their usual rich and bountiful condition, and that there was no danger of bankruptcy. The speech and statement, so brief and perspicuous, just delivered by the Senator from New York, [MR. WRIGHT,] will perform the same office upon the distribution spirit, by showing that the appropriations of the session will require nearly as much money as the public Treasury will be found to contain. The present exaggerations about the surplus will have their day, as the panic about an empty Treasury had its day; and time, which corrects all things, will show the enormity of these errors which excite the public mind, and stimulate the public appetite, for a division of forty, fifty, and sixty millions of surplus treasure.

I have several objections, said MR. B., to this measure; and the first is, that two distinct subjects are conjoined in the same bill. One part of the bill is to regulate the keeping of the public money in the local banks; the other part, under the disguise of a deposite, is to make a distribution of the public money among the several States. The law of Parliament (and that law is founded in equity and wisdom) forbids the junction of different subjects in the same bill; it requires them to be disjoined, and each subject put into a bill by itself, whenever the diversity and incongruity is detected. The incongruity in this bill is easily detected, and was early objected to. It was objected to on the second reading, a vote taken, and a decision had, according to what was right and proper. That vote was in favor of disjunction. The two subjects were disjoined, and a committee was directed to put them into separate bills. This was in the afternoon, too late for the accomplishment of the order that evening; a night intervened; new lights broke upon the minds of Senators; the vote of disjunction was reversed; and the divorced subjects were solemnly reunited. What was done by a majority of three in the evening, was reversed by a majority of one in the morning.

That these subjects are of different natures, admit of different decisions, and may be acted upon at different times, is perfectly clear from a view of their provisions. One is a general and permanent law—the other a special and temporary arrangement. One requires immediate action—the other ought not to be acted upon until all the appropriations are made. One is to take effect instantly—the other not till next year. One is what it professes to be, a regulation of the deposits—the other is what it does not profess to be, a distribution of the revenue. Either may pass, and have a perfect operation, without the aid of the other. Either may be rejected, and no detriment ensue to the other. One may be postponed to the next session without inconvenience to any interest, and with positive advantage to the action of Congress upon it—the other cannot be postponed without offence to the public mind, injury to the public service, and dereliction of our legislative duty. Against the conjunction of subjects so dissimilar conscience revolts, correct feeling rebels, and parliamentary law has planted its cannon. It is in vain to call it a deposite with the States. The abuse, perversion, misapplication, and violation of language, in calling that which is a distribution to the States a deposite with the States, can neither alter the thing nor conceal its design; and the attempt to coerce support, deter opposition, or involve in odium, by joining a measure of questionable propriety with one of acknowledged expediency, might be lost upon some, if not on all.

I have some objections to the deposite bill proper, as it now stands; but they are objections of detail, and such as would admit of remedy, and might have been easily obviated, had it not been for the impatience of the majority to pass the bill as it is. One of these objections is to the clause which confers authority on the Secretary of the Treasury to establish branches of the State banks, under the name of agencies, in the States which have no banks; that is to say, in the State of Missouri; it being well known to every body that Missouri is the only State in the Union which finds itself in the category which the conferring of the authority implies. To the investiture of this authority in any officer, or the exercise of such authority by any Congress, I wholly object; and that for numerous and cogent reasons. Congress has no authority to establish banks within the States; much less to intrude upon a State the branch of a bank from another State. It is an interference with the domestic policy of a State to do so, and compelling her to have a bank against her will. It is a deprivation to the State of one of her sovereign powers; for, by virtue of her right to regulate her internal affairs, she can exclude all moneyed and banking agencies from her borders, by her own legislation, as many States have done; but in this case her legislation would not be sovereign, like that of other States upon the same point, but would be subordinate to the decision of the federal Judiciary; for, the agency being established under a law of Congress, it would bring the action of the State law, and the decision of the State courts, under the controlling sceptre of the federal judges. It is an apparent surrender of the constitutional objection to a Bank of the United States; for if it is admitted that State banks are indispensably necessary to the Federal Government, then it follows that the Federal Government may provide for its own necessities, without being dependant on the States. The Secretary is not limited in the choice of the banks whose agencies he may establish in Missouri; and some Secretary, not the present one, might refresh whigism in the State by sending us a limb from the Pennsylvania United States Bank, or a scion from some one of the litter, founded on paper and property, now in the process of renewed incorporation in this opulent and bank-bearing District.

The consent of the State is not required to the admission of this agency, although at the very last session of her Legislature, as at preceding sessions, she refused to charter a bank for herself. Finally, this provision goes to legalize the establishment of an agency of an Ohio bank in the town of St. Louis, now in operation there as a bank of discount and deposit and of circulation; when the utmost argument in favor of the federal necessities would not extend beyond a bank of deposit only. That agency was established in St. Louis without my knowledge or consent, and without the consent of the State Legislature. The right of the Legislature to expel it would be complete if this law was not passed; if it passes, then the statute of the State will be liable to the same revision and reversal which took place on the Virginia statute in the case of Cohen and the lottery tickets. Having mentioned the agency at St. Louis, I deem it right to add that the officers who have charge of it have shown every disposition to deserve the good will of the inhabitants, and to promote the policy of the Government in the diffusion of gold.

The other part of the deposit bill proper to which I object, is the want of a clause requiring the deposit banks to keep on hand a certain amount of specie, bearing some reasonable, average, fixed proportion to their immediate liabilities. The bill was drawn with such a clause; but it was the will of the majority to strike it out, and to substitute the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being for the proposed legal enactment. The proportion of specie on hand, in the several deposit banks, is now to be whatever may be satisfactory to the officer at the head of the Treasury.

To this I object; because, without reference to the opinions of any Secretary, I hold it to be a case in which the inflexible rule of law, and not the variable dictate of individual discretion, should prevail. It concerns the currency of the country, and law should govern the currency. It is a case in which discretion is subordinate to systems, as well as to personal temperament. A hard-money Secretary would require a heavy proportion of specie; a paper-system Secretary would be content with a very light proportion. Besides, some of the deposit banks need regulation upon this point at present. Some of them are far in arrear of what would be deemed a safe proportion of specie, and threatening the Treasury with another edition of "unavailable funds." As a whole, they are far behind the point of specie responsibility at which the Bank of the United States stood at the time of the removal of the deposits, though some are up to that mark, or above it; but, as a whole, (and it is in that point of view that the public is concerned,) they are far behind it. On the first day of October, 1833, when the deposits were removed, the immediate liabilities of the United States Bank, in public and private deposits, and in its circulation, were $37,105,465, and the specie on hand was $10,663,441; being at the rate of more than one to four.

At the close of the last month, which is the date of the latest returns of the deposit banks, their immediate liabilities in the same items—public and private deposits, and circulation—was $84,401,880, and the gold and silver on hand was $10,202,245; being at the rate of less than one to eight. This, certainly, is a progress in the wrong direction for us, who have undertaken to strengthen the gold and silver foundations of the currency. It is travelling on the wrong end of the road, and that rather fast. The rejection from the bill of the clause which was intended to hold the deposit banks up to the possession of a certain fixed proportion of specie, looks like an abandonment of our hard-money professions, and a relapsing tendency into the wide and bottomless ocean of paper. It is certainly a great decline from the doctrines of President Jackson's message of December last—those doctrines which were then hailed with approbation by an immense majority of the American people, and received as landmarks in the whole democratic camp, and in which the President expressly treated the regulation of the deposits as the regulation of the currency, and looked to the increased circulation of gold and silver, and the suppression of all bank notes under twenty dollars, as two of the great results which were to flow from the connexion of the federal Treasury with the local banks, and the consequent influence of the Government over the currency. Hear his words:

"Connected with the condition of the finances, and the flourishing state of the country in all its branches of industry, it is pleasing to witness the advantages which have already been derived from the recent laws regulating the value of the gold coinage. These advantages will be more apparent in the course of the next year when the branch mints authorized to be established in North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, shall have gone into operation. Aided, as it is hoped they will be, by further reforms in the banking systems of the States, and by judicious regulations on the part of Congress, in relation to the custody of the public moneys, it may be confidently anticipated that the use of gold and silver as a circulating medium will become general in the ordinary transactions connected with the labor of the country. The great desideratum in modern times is an efficient check upon the power of banks, preventing that excessive issue of paper whence arise those fluctuations in the standard of value which render uncertain the rewards of labor." * * * "It has been seen that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills, and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium." * * * *

"The collection and custody being a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligation of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform of the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the country. The attainment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country, which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the great tax which our paper system has so long collected from the earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate those habits of economy and simplicity which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted."

The rejection of the clause referred to, continued Mr. B., has lost the advantages so confidently looked to by the President in this wise and patriotic message. Nothing is done in this deposit bill to fulfil his enlightened and noble views; nothing to enlarge and extend the specie basis; nothing to promote the diffusion of gold; nothing to effect the suppression of notes under twenty dollars; nothing to check the paper system; nothing to regulate the currency; on the contrary, we have a virtual abandonment of all control over the moneyed system, and a virtual surrender of the constitution, and the constitutional duty of Congress over the currency, to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the private and interested arrangements of the deposit banks.

I now come, Mr. President, (continued Mr. B.,) to the second subject in the bill—the distribution feature—and to which the objections are, not of detail, but of principle; but which objections are so strong in the mind of myself and some friends, that, far from shrinking from the contest, and sneaking away in our little minority of six, where we were left last evening, we come forward with unabated resolution to renew our opposition, and to signalize our dissent, and anxious to have it known that we contended to the last against the seductions of a measure, specious to the view, and tempting to the taste, but fraught with mischief and fearful consequences to the character of this Government, and to the stability and harmony of this confederacy. These objections lie to the 13th section of the bill, which are in these words:

"SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States, on the 1st day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such persons as the several States may authorize to receive it, on receiving certificates of deposit, signed by the competent authorities of such State, each for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, which shall set forth and express the obligation of the State to pay the amount thereof to the United States, or their assigns; and which said certificates it shall be competent for the Secretary of the Treasury, in the name and behalf of the United States, to sell and assign whenever it shall be necessary for want of other money in the Treasury to meet appropriations made by Congress; all sales and assignments, however, to be ratable, and in just and equal proportions, among all the States, according to the amounts received by them, respectively; and all such certificates of deposit shall be subject to and shall bear an interest of five per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, from the time of such sale and assignment, and shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the States issuing the same."

Stripping this enactment of statutory verbiage, and collecting the provisions of the section into a single view, and they seem to be these: 1. The public moneys, above a specified sum, are to be deposited with the States in a specified ratio; 2. The States are to give certificates of deposit, payable to the United States; but no time, or contingency, is fixed for the payment; 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is to sell and assign the certificates, limited to a ratable proportion of each, when necessary to meet appropriations made by Congress; 4. The certificates so assigned are to bear an interest of 5 per cent., payable half yearly; 5. To bear no interest before assignment; 6. The principal to be payable at the pleasure of the State.

This, Mr. President, is the enactment; and what is such an enactment? Sir, I will tell you what it is. It is, in name, a deposit; in form, a loan; in essence and design, a distribution. Names cannot alter things; and it is as idle to call a gift a deposit, as it would be to call a stab of the dagger a kiss of the lips. It is a distribution of the revenues, under the name of a deposit, and under the form of a loan. It is known to be so, and is intended to be so; and all this verbiage about a deposit is nothing but the device and contrivance of those who have been for years endeavoring to distribute the revenues, sometimes by the land bill, sometimes by direct propositions, and sometimes by proposed amendments to the constitution. Finding all these modes of accomplishing the object met and frustrated by the constitution, they fall upon this invention of a deposit, and exult in the success of an old scheme under a new name. That it is no deposit, but a free gift, and a regular distribution, is clear and demonstrable, not only from the avowed principles, declared intentions, and systematic purposes, of those who conduct the bill, but also from the means devised to effect their object. Names are nothing. The thing done gives character to the transaction; and the imposition of an erroneous name cannot change that character. This is no deposit. It has no feature, no attribute, no characteristic, no quality, of a deposit. A deposit is a trust, requiring the consent of two parties, leaving to one the rights of ownership, and imposing on the other the duties of trustee. The depositor retains the right of property, and reserves the privilege of resumption; the depositary is bound to restore. But here right of property is parted with; the privilege of resumption is surrendered; the obligation to render back is not imposed. On the contrary, our money is put where we cannot reach it. Our Treasury warrant cannot pursue it. The States are to keep the money, free of interest, until it is needed to meet appropriations; and then the Secretary of the Treasury is—to do what? call upon the State? No! but to sell and assign the certificate; and the State is to pay the assignee an interest half yearly, and the principal when it pleases. Now, these appropriations will never be made. The members of Congress are not yet born—the race of representatives is not yet known—who will vote appropriations for national objects, to be paid out of their own State treasuries. Sooner will the tariff be revived, or the price of public land be raised. Sooner will the assignability of the certificate be repealed by law. The contingency will never arrive on which the Secretary is to assign; so the deposit will stand as a loan forever, without interest. At the end of some years the nominal transaction will be rescinded; the certificates will all be cancelled by one general, unanimous, harmonious, vote in Congress. The disguise of a deposit, like the mask after a play, will be thrown aside; and the delivery of the money will turn out to be, what it is now intended to be, a gift from the beginning. This will be the end of the first chapter. And now, how unbecoming in the Senate to practise this indirection, and to do by a false name what cannot be done by its true one. The constitution, by the acknowledgment of many who conduct this bill, will not admit of a distribution of the revenues. Not further back than the last session, and again at the commencement of the present session, a proposition was made to amend the constitution to permit this identical distribution to be made. That proposition is now upon our calendar, for the action of Congress. All at once it is discovered that a change of names will do as well as a change of the constitution. Strike out the word “distribute,” and insert the word “deposit;” and, incontinently, the impediment is removed; the constitutional difficulty is surmounted; the division of the money can be made. This, at least, is quick work. It looks magical, though not the exploit of the magician. It commits nobody, though not the invention of the non-committal school. After all, it must be admitted to be a very commendable mode of amending the constitution, and such a one as the framers of that instrument never happened to think of. Is this fancy, or is it fact? Are we legislating, or amusing ourselves with phantasmagoria? Can we forget that we now have upon the calendar a proposition to amend the constitution, to effect this very distribution, and that the only difference between that resolution and this 13th section, is in substituting the word “deposit” for the word “distribute?” Here it is:

RESOLUTION proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, providing for a distribution of the surplus revenues among the several States and Territories, until the year eighteen hundred and forty-three.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution, that the money remaining in the Treasury at the end of each year till the first of January, eighteen hundred and forty-three, after deducting therefrom the sum of ——— dollars, shall be annually distributed among the several States and Territories, including the District of Columbia; and that, for this purpose, the sum to be annually distributed shall be divided into a number of shares, equal to the number of Senators and Representatives in Congress for the time being, with the addition of two for each Territory, and two for the District of Columbia; and there shall be allotted to each State a number of shares equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which it is at the time entitled in Congress; and to the Territories, including the District of Columbia, two shares each.*

Having shown this pretended deposit to be a distribution in disguise, and to be a mere evasion of the constitution, Mr. B. proceeded to examine its effects; and to trace its ruinous consequences upon the Federal Government and the States. It is brought forward as a temporary measure, as a single operation, as a thing to be done but once; but what career, either for good or for evil, ever stopped with the first step? It is the first step which costs the difficulty; that taken, the second becomes easy, and repetition habitual. Let this distribution, in this disguise, take effect, and future distributions will be common and regular. Every presidential election will bring them, and larger, each time, as the consular elections in Rome, commencing with distributions of grain from the public granaries, went on to the exhibitions of games and shows, the remission of debts, largesses in money, lands, and provisions, until the rival candidates openly bid against each other, and the diadem of empire was put up at auction, and knocked down to the last and highest bidder. The purity of elections may not yet be affected in our young and vigorous country; but how long will it be before voters will look to the candidates for the magnitude of their distributions, instead of looking to them for the qualifications which the presidential office requires?

The bad consequences of this distribution of money to the States are palpable and frightful. It is complicating the federal and State systems, and multiplying their points of contact and hazards of collision. Take it as ostensibly presented, that of a deposit, or loan; to be repaid at some future time; then it is establishing the relation of debtor and creditor between them; a relation critical between friends, embarrassing between a State and its citizens, and eminently dangerous between confederate States and their common head. It is a relation always deprecated in our federal system. The land credit system was abolished by Congress fifteen years ago, to get rid of the relation of debtor and creditor between the Federal Government and the citizens of the States; and seven or eight millions of debt, principal and interest, was then surrendered. The collection of a large debt from numerous individual debtors, was found to be almost impossible. How much worse if the State itself becomes the debtor! and more, if all the States become indebted together! Any attempt to collect the debt would be attended, first, with ill blood; then with cancellation. It must be the representatives of the States who are to enforce the collection of the debt. They would not do. They would stand together against the creditor. No member of Congress could vote to tax his State to raise money for the general purposes of the confederacy. No one could vote an appropriation which was to become a charge on his own State treasury. Taxation would first be resorted to, and the tariff and the public lands would become the fountain of supply to the Federal Government. Taken as a real transaction—as a deposit with the States, or a loan to the States—as this measure professes to be, and it is fraught with consequences adverse to the harmony of the federal system, and fraught with new burdens upon the customs and upon the lands; taken as a fiction to avoid the constitution, as a John Doe and Richard Roe invention to convey a gift under the name of a deposit, and to effect a distribution under the disguise of a loan, and it is an artifice which makes derision of the constitution, lets down the Senate from its lofty station, and provides a facile way for doing any thing that any Congress may choose to do in all time to come. It is only to depose one word and instal another—it is merely to change a name—and the frowning constitution immediately smiles on the late forbidden attempt.

To the Federal Government the consequences of these distributions must be deplorable and destructive. It must be remitted to the helpless condition of the old confederacy, depending for its supplies upon the voluntary contributions of the States. Worse than depending upon the voluntary contributions, it will be left to the gratuitous leavings, to the eleemosynary crumbs, which remain upon the table after the feast of the States is over. God grant they may not prove to be the feasts of the Lapithæ and Centaurs! But the States will be served first; and what remains may go to the objects of common defence and national concern for which the confederacy was framed, and for which the power of raising money was confided to Congress. The distribution bills will be passed first, and the appropriation bills afterwards; and every appropriation will be cut down to the lowest point, and kept off to the last moment. To stave off as long as possible, to reduce as low as possible, to defeat whenever possible, will be the tactics of federal legislation; and when at last some object of national expenditure has miraculously run the gauntlet of all these assaults, and escaped the perils of these multiplied dangers, behold the enemy still ahead, and the recapture which awaits the devoted appropriation, in the shape of an unexpended balance, on the first day of January then next ensuing. Thus it is already: distribution has occupied us all the session. A proposition to amend the constitution, to enable us to make the division, was brought in in the first month of the session. The land bill followed, and engrossed months, to the exclusion of national defence. Then came the deposit scheme, which absorbs the remainder of the session. For nearly seven months we have been occupied with distribution, and the Senate has actually passed two bills to effect the same object, and to divide the same identical money. Two bills to divide money, while one bill cannot be got through for the great objects of national defence named in the constitution. We are now near the end of the seventh month of the session. The day named by the Senate for the termination of the session is long passed by; the day fixed by the two Houses is close at hand. The year is half gone, and the season for labor largely lost; yet what is the state of the general, national, and most essential appropriations? Not a shilling is yet voted for fortifications; not a shilling for the ordnance; nothing for filling the empty ranks of the skeleton army; nothing for the new Indian treaties; nothing for the continuation of the Cumberland road; nothing for rebuilding the burnt down Treasury; nothing for the custom-house in New Orleans; nothing for extinguishing the rights of private corporators in the Louisville canal, and making that great thoroughfare free to the commerce of the West; nothing for the western armory, and arsenals in the States which have none; nothing for the extension of the circuit court system to the new States of the West and Southwest; nothing for improving the mint machinery; nothing for keeping the mints regularly supplied with metals for coining; nothing for the new marine hospitals; nothing for the expenses of the visitors now gone to the Military Academy; nothing for the chain of posts and the military road along the western and north-western frontier. All these, and a long list of other objects, remain without a cent to this day; and those who have kept them off now coolly turn upon us, and say the money cannot be expended if appropriated, and that, on the first of January, it must fall into the surplus fund to be divided. Of the bills passed, many of the most essential character have been delayed for months, to the great injury of individuals and of the public service. Clerks and salaried officers have been borrowing money at usury to support their families, while we, wholly absorbed with dividing surpluses, were withholding from them their stipulated wages. Laborers at Harper's Ferry armory have been without money to go to market for their families, and some have lived three weeks without meat, because we must attend to the distribution bills before we can attend to the pay bills. Disbursing officers have raised money on their own account, to supply the want of appropriations. Even the annual Indian annuity bill has but just got through; the Indians even—the poor Indians, as they were wont to be called—even they have had to wait, in want and misery, for the annual stipends solemnly guarantied by treaties. All this has already taken place under the deplorable influence of the distribution spirit; but this is not all that has taken place. Something more ominous yet has occurred; something which announces a fundamental change in the policy of the Senate, and the approaching abandonment of the great objects for which the confederacy was framed. We all recollect, and the country also will recollect, the two months in the fore part of this session spent in crimination and recrimination for the loss of the fortification bill of the last year. We all recollect, and if we did not, the published speeches would remind us, how emulously we vied with each other in patriotic protestations, in repudiating blame for the loss of that bill, and in favor of national defence. We all remember, and if we did not, the journal will testify for us, how unanimously we adopted a resolution to devote the revenue and the stock from the Bank of the United States, and all that the object required, to the sacred task of preparing, in time of peace, for a state of war; and how we called upon the President to order reports to be made to us from the War and Navy Departments, to apprise us of all that was wanting. This was in February; the answers came in March, and showed us that more would be wanting than all the surpluses would ever supply. Instantly, upon the view of these reports, the tone of the Senate changed: and these objects of national defence, which had so late received the homage of their applause, and the pledge of their support, became useless, ridiculous, extravagant, visionary projects! They were no longer worth attention, and to attack and decry them has now become the fashion. Not a cent is yet appropriated; and by this new-fangled conception of a distribution bill—this lease, entry, and ouster concern—whatever is appropriated is to be recaptured on the first day of January next. Here is the resolution which we adopted in February, which will show how the question of national defence stood then; the votes and speeches for a month past will show how it stands now:

“Resolved, That so much of the revenue of the United States and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, as may be necessary for the purpose, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country.

“Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed—

“1. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontiers of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortifications.

“2. The probable amount that would be necessary to construct an adequate number of armories and arsenals in the United States, and to supply the States with field artillery (especially brass field-pieces) for their militia, and with side-arms and pistols for their cavalry.

“3. The probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand.

“4. The probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and to the welfare of the Union."

The progress which the distribution spirit has made in advancing beyond its own pretensions, is a striking feature in the history of the case, and ominous of what may be expected from its future exactions. Originally the proposition was to divide the surplus. It was the surplus, and nothing but the surplus, which was to be taken; that bonafide and inevitable surplus which remained after all the defences were provided for, and all needed appropriations fully made. Now the defences are postponed and decried; the needful appropriations are rejected, stinted, and deferred, till they cannot be used; and, instead of the surplus, it is the integral revenue, it is the money in the Treasury, it is the money appropriated by law, which is to be seized upon and divided out. It is the unexpended balances which are now the object of all desire and the prize of meditated distribution. The word surplus is not in the bill! that word, which has figured in so many speeches, which has been the subject of so much speculation, which has been the cause of so much delusion in the public mind, and of so much excited hope; that word is not in the bill! It is carefully, studiously, systematically excluded, and a form of expression is adopted to cover all the money in the Treasury, a small sum excepted, although appropriated by law to the most sacred and necessary objects. A recapture of the appropriated money is intended; and thus the very identical money which we appropriate at this session is to be seized upon on the first day of January, torn away from the objects to which it was dedicated, and absorbed in the fund for general distribution. And why? because the cormorant appetite of distribution grows as it feeds, and becomes more ravenous as it gorges. It set out for the surplus; now it takes the unexpended balances, save five millions; next year it will take all. But it is sufficient to contemplate the thing as it is; it is sufficient to contemplate this bill as seizing upon the unexpended balances on the first day of January, regardless of the objects to which they are appropriated; and to witness its effect upon the laws, the policy, and the existence of the Federal Government.

In the first place, the appropriation laws are nullified, to the extent of one half at least; for we all know that the appropriations of a session, and especially the long session, and above all the present session, when appropriations are systematically staved off to prevent them from being used—we all know that, under these circumstances, about one half the money appropriated by law remains unexpended at the end of the year, and is intended to be used during the ensuing year. We all know that the fiscal year of the United States does not end in December, but in September; we know that the work and the service is to go on, and the money to be paid as it becomes due, without regard to the change of the calendar years. Two years is the limitation for an appropriation to run; and this principle, reasonable in itself, is consecrated by law for forty years. Sir, we have law upon this subject; law founded in reason, adapted to the usages of work and service, made by our ancestors, and now standing in full force upon our statute book. I allude to the law of March 3d, 1795, approved by President Washington; and by which the appropriations which were not exhausted upon their object within two calendar years, after the year in which they are made, should then be considered as a surplus, and be carried to a fund denominated the surplus fund; and thence become applicable to new and national objects. Here are the provisions of the act:

"That in regard to any sum which shall have remained unexpended, upon any appropriation other than for the public debt, &c., or for a purpose in respect to which a longer duration is specially assigned by law, for more than two years after the expiration of the calendar year in which the act of appropriation shall have been passed, such appropriation shall be deemed to have ceased and been determined; and the sum so unexpended shall be carried to an account on the books of the Treasury, to be denominated the surplus fund. But no appropriation shall be deemed to have so ceased and determined until after the year 1795, unless it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the object thereof hath been fully satisfied, in which case it shall be lawful for him to cause to be carried the unexpended residue thereof to the said account of the surplus fund."

This is the law, made by wise men, founded in reason, justice, and propriety. This is the law by virtue of which the appropriations made at this session would continue for two calendar years after the 1st day of January next; yet this wise and ancient law is to be subverted, overthrown, nullified. Instead of two years from the first of January next, it is at midnight on the 31st of December next that the unexpended balances, without regard to the objects to which they are applicable, are to be seized, sequestered, confiscated, plundered from the Federal Government, and given to the States. The leaving of five millions is nothing; the unexpended balances will be double or treble that amount. The taking any part is asserting the right, and making the precedent for taking the whole. Even these five millions, they are left from policy, and because it is not discreet to go the whole at once. Even on this remnant the friends of distribution divide in opinion on this floor, some saying two millions, [Mr. WEBSTER,] some saying five, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and this last sum is evidently left from policy.

Such, then, is the progress of the distribution spirit; a cormorant appetite, growing as it feeds, ravaging as it gorges; seizing the appropriated moneys, and leaving the Federal Government to starve upon crumbs, and to die of inanition. But this appetite is not the sole cause for this seizure. There is another reason for it, connected with the movements in this chamber, and founded in the deep-seated law of self-preservation. For six months the public mind has been stimulated with the story of sixty millions of surplus money in the Treasury; and two months ago, we, the grave Senate of the United States, carried the rash joke of that illusory asseveration so far as to pass a bill to commence the distribution of that vast sum. It was the land bill which was to do it, commencing its swelling dividends on the 1st day of July, dealing them out every ninety days, and completing the splendid distribution of prizes, in the sixty-four million lottery, in eighteen months from the commencement of the drawing. It was two months ago that we passed this bill; and all attempts then made to convince the people that they were deluded, were vain and useless. Sixty-four millions they were promised, sixty-four millions they were to have, sixty-four millions they began to want; and slates and pencils were just as busy then in figuring out the dividends of the sixty-four millions, to begin on the 1st of July, as they now are in figuring out the dividends under the forty, fifty, and sixty millions, which are to begin on the 1st of January next. And now behold the end of the first chapter. The 1st of July is come, but the sixty-four millions are not in the Treasury! It is not there; and any attempt to commence the distribution of that sum, according to the terms of the land bill, would bankrupt the Treasury, stop the Government, and cause Congress to be called together, to levy taxes or make loans. So much for the land bill, which two months ago received all the praises which are now bestowed upon the deposit bill. So the drawing had to be postponed, the performance had to be adjourned, and the 1st of January was substituted for the 1st of July. This gives six months to go upon, and defers the catastrophe of the mountain in labor until the presidential election is over. Still the 1st of January must come; and the ridicule would be too great, if there was nothing, or next to nothing, to divide. And nothing, or next to nothing, there would be, if the appropriations were fairly made, and made in time, and if nothing but a surplus was left to divide. There would be no more in the deposite banks, in that event, than has usually been in the Bank of the United States—say ten, or twelve, or fourteen, or sixteen millions; and from which, in the hands of a single bank, none of those dangers to the country were then seen which are now discovered in like sums in three dozen unconnected and independent banks. Even after all the delays and reductions in the appropriations, the surplus will now be but a trifle—such a trifle as must expose to ridicule, or something worse, all those who have tantalized the public with the expectation of forty, fifty, or sixty millions to divide. To avoid this fate, and to make up something for distribution, then, the unexpended balances have been fallen upon; the law of 1795 is nullified; the fiscal year is changed; the policy of the Government subverted; reason, justice, propriety outraged; all contracts, labor, service, salaries cut off, interrupted, or reduced; appropriations recaptured, and the Government paralyzed. Sir, the people are deceived. They are made to believe that a surplus only, an unavoidable surplus, is to be divided, when the fact is that appropriated moneys are to be seized.

Sir, I am opposed to the whole policy of this measure. I am opposed to it as going to sap the foundations of the Federal Government, and to undo the constitution, and that by evasion, in the very point for which the constitution was made. What is that point? A Treasury! a Treasury! a Treasury of its own, unconnected with, and independent of, the States. It was for this that wise and patriotic men wrote, and spoke, and prayed, for the fourteen years that intervened from the declaration of independence, in 1776, to the formation of the constitution in 1789. It was for this that so many appeals were made, so many efforts exerted, so many fruitless attempts so long repeated, to obtain from the States the power of raising revenue from imports. It was for this that the convention of 1787 met, and but for this they never would have met. The formation of a federal Treasury, unconnected with the States, and independent of the States, was the cause of the meeting of that convention; it was the great object of its labors; it was the point to which all its exertions tended, and it was the point at which failure would have been the failure of the whole object of the meeting; of the whole frame of the General Government, and of the whole design of the constitution. With infinite labor, pains, and difficulty, they succeeded in erecting the edifice of the federal Treasury; we, not builders, but destroyers, "architects of ruin," undo in a night what they accomplished in many years. We expunge the federal Treasury; we throw the Federal Government back upon the States for supplies; we unhinge and undo the constitution; and we effect our purpose by an artifice which derides, mocks, ridicules that sacred instrument, and opens the way to its perpetual evasion by every paltry performer that is able to dethrone one word, and exalt another in its place. With such objections to the thing itself, and to the manner of doing it, it would seem to be supererogatory to go into other objections; but there are other objections to the measure worthy of being mentioned in themselves, and still more as showing the true character of this measure, that of a distribution under the name of a deposite.

The assignability of these certificates is one of these objections. They are to be assigned, when necessary, to meet appropriations made by Congress, and then to bear five per cent. interest, payable half yearly. As a reality, it is injurious, and may be offensive to the States. No one likes to have his note assigned, especially when the assignment raises an interest where there was none before, and which interest is higher than others would require. The States of this Union can borrow money for less than five per cent. They can borrow it for four, payable yearly, in England and Holland certainly, and probably in France. They can borrow the gold, bring it home, clear two per cent. upon the importation in the present state of the exchanges, and keep it as long as they please—twenty, thirty, forty years. Surely, if States wish to borrow money, England and Holland are the places to obtain it; and a direct movement is the way to get it. As a reality, then, this deposite loan is a burden and a hardship; but it is no reality; it is no real transaction; but a fiction, a contrivance, a subterfuge, an evasion to elude the constitution. The certificates are never to be assigned. The contingency on which the assignment is to be made will never arrive. No appropriation requiring it to be done will ever be made. That appropriation would have to be made by Congress; the members of Congress represent the States, not the Federal Government; and their first care will be to defend their own constituents. They will not vote money to become a charge upon their own State treasuries, to be raised by a tax on the lands, houses, slaves, horses, and cattle, of their own constituents. Either they will not make the appropriation at all, or they will first cancel the assignability of the certificate, and have recourse to an increased tariff, and to higher prices on the public lands.

I object to the time at which this distribution is to be made. It is not the time at which such a thing should be done, if done at all. There is no necessity for acting now, if ever, and we are on the eve of a presidential election. It is an evil example, which may be approved to dreadful effect at future elections. In times less pure, less virtuous, less patriotic than the present, the presidential chair, like consular robes, may be sought through the instrumentality of largesses poured from the public Treasury, in emulous profusion, by the rival hands of desperate competitors. Let it never be forgotten that the contests for office, which ended in auctioneering the diadem of empire in Rome, commenced with the apparently innocent custom of dividing out corn from the public granaries.

I object to the time for another reason. There is no necessity to act at all upon this subject, at this session of Congress. The distribution is not to take effect until after we are in session again, and when the true state of the Treasury shall be known. Its true state cannot be known now; but enough is known to make it questionable whether there will be any surplus, requiring a specific disposition, over and beyond the wants of the country. Many appropriations are yet behind; two Indian wars are yet to be finished; when the wars are over, the vanquished Indians are to be removed to the West; and when there, either the Federal Government or the States must raise a force to protect the people from them. Twenty-five thousand Creeks, seven thousand Seminoles, eighteen thousand Cherokees, and others, making a totality of seventy-two thousand, are to be removed; and the expenses of removal, and the year's subsistence afterwards, is close upon seventy dollars per head. It is a problem whether there will be any surplus worth disposing of. The surplus party themselves admit there will be a disappointment unless they go beyond the surplus, and seize the appropriated moneys. The Senator from New York [Mr. Wright] has made an exposition, as candid and perspicuous as it is patriotic and unanswerable, showing that there will be an excess of appropriations over the money in the Treasury on the day that we adjourn, and that we shall have to depend upon the accruing revenue of the remainder of the year to meet the demands which we authorize. This is the state of the surplus question: problematical, debatable; the weight of the evidence and the strength of the argument entirely against it; time enough to ascertain the truth, and yet a determination to reject all evidence, refuse all time, rush on to the object, and divide the money, cost what it may to the constitution, the Government, the good of the States, and the purity of elections. The catastrophe of the land bill project ought certainly to be a warning to us. Two months ago it was pushed through, as the only means of saving the country, as the blessed act which was to save the republic. It was to commence on the first day of July its magnificent operation of distributing sixty-four millions; now it lies a corpse in the House of Representatives, a monument of haste and folly, its very authors endeavoring to supersede it by another measure, because it could not take effect without ruining the country, and, what is equally important to them, ruining themselves.

Admitting that the year produces more revenue than is wanting, is it wise, is it statesmanlike, is it consonant with our experience, to take fright at the event, and throw the money away? Did we not have forty millions of income in the year 1817? and did we not have an empty Treasury in 1819? Instead of taking fright and throwing the money away, the statesman should look into the cause of things; he should take for his motto the prayer of Virgil: Cognoscere causa rerum. Let me know the cause of things, and, learning this cause, act accordingly. If the redundant supply is accidental and transient, it will quickly correct itself; if founded in laws, alter them. This is the part not merely of wisdom, but of common sense. It was the conduct of 1817, when the excessive supply was seen to be the effect of transient causes—termination of the war and efflorescence of the paper system—and left to correct itself, which it did in two years. It should be the conduct now, when the excessive income is seen to be the effect of the laws and the paper system combined, and when legislation or regulation is necessary to correct it. Reduction of the tariff; reduction of the price of land to actual settlers; rejection of bank paper from universal receivability for public dues; these are the remedies. After all, the whole evil may be found in a single cause, and the whole remedy may be seen in a single measure. The public lands are exchangeable for paper. Seven hundred and fifty machines are at work striking off paper; that paper is performing the grand rounds, from the banks to the public lands, and from the lands to the banks. Every body, especially a public man, may take as much as his trunks can carry. The public domain is changing into paper; the public Treasury is filling up with paper; the new States are deluged with paper; the currency is ruining with paper; farmers, settlers, cultivators, are outbid, deprived of their selected homes, or made to pay double for them, by public men loaded, not like Philip's ass, with bags of gold, but like bank advocates, with bales of paper. Sir, the evil is in the unbridled state of the paper system, and in the unchecked receivability of paper for federal dues. Here is the evil. Banks are our masters; not one, but seven hundred and fifty! and this splendid federal Congress, like a chained and chastised slave, lies helpless and powerless at their feet.

Thus far, Mr. President, I have contemplated this measure in its effects upon the Federal Government; now let us turn our eyes to the States, and see what is to be its effect upon them. In the very outset, it is to them the golden apple which the Goddess of Discord rolled over the festive board; contend for it, and fraud and cunning award the prize. Elections in every county, legislation upon every subject, fall within its vortex. Projects of all kinds spring up: the people get nothing. Associated wealth, joint stock companies, chartered monopolies, paper barons, South Sea bubbles, and Mississippi schemes, take it all. The counties will in vain ask for their share: if they get it, the townships will in vain solicit their proportion from the county. If perchance the township obtained its ratable share, then some projector of that township would get all to himself. "The large fish eat the small ones." On the contrary, if the whole sum is fairly divided among the whole population, and every head of a family gets what he is entitled to, what is it then but the spectacle of a people pensioned by the Federal Government, fed from the public Treasury, like degenerate Romans, or receiving annuities like mendicant Indians? Sir, there is no right way to do this thing. It is a connexion against nature between the States and the Federal Government; and, like all unnatural connexions, must end in misery and mischief to both parties.

A word to the small States. They have come into this measure upon the tempting advantage of double shares, a share for their Senators as well as for their Representatives! That is some advantage for them; but do they see they have no security for it in future divisions? It is the rule of division put into the proposed amendment of the constitution by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN;] there it would have been safe. If the constitution had been amended, as proposed, they would have had their security; but it has not been amended, but evaded. A word is changed; the constitution is dodged; and the small States lie at the mercy of the large ones in all future distributions. Not only in the rule of distribution, which will soon be changed; first, to bear on all the small States by taking away the divisions for Senators; and next, to bear on all the slave States by counting only the white population. Not only in changing the rule will the small States be injured, but by another and more vexatious process; it will be in the appropriations. The large States make the appropriations, and will take care of themselves. Twice they will take the lion's share; once by appropriations, when their strength will enable them to take what they please; again, by distribution, when their numbers will give them nearly all the remainder.

A word to the States in which revenue is to be raised. We have no revenue but from land and imports. The new States contain the land, the planting States to the South furnish the exports which bring home the imports which furnish the duties. The West and South, then, are to bear the burdens of a revenue which others are to share more largely than themselves. To keep up and to increase that revenue will be the care of the majority. Farewell now to all prospect of reduction in the price of public lands; farewell to pre-emptions—to occupant rights—to grants to States and colleges—to all equitable settlement of French and Spanish concessions. Farewell to all that! Hail to the new tariff! to that tariff which the elections of Jackson and Van Buren laid low in 1832; and which in 1840, and under the maternal incubation of this misnamed deposit bill, will spring forth from the thigh of its father, like the fabulous offspring of Jupiter, full grown and armed, helmet on the brow and lance in the hand.

Sir, I can see nothing but evil, turn on which side I may, from this fatal scheme of dividing money; not surplus money, but appropriated funds; not by an amendment, but by a derisive evasion of the constitution. Where is it to end? History shows us that those who begin revolutions never end them; that those who commence innovations never limit them. Here is a great innovation, constituting in reality—not in figure of speech, but in reality—a revolution in the form of our Government. We set out to divide the surplus; we are now dividing the appropriated funds. To prevent all appropriations except to the powerful States, will be the next step; and the small States, in self-defence, must oppose all appropriations, and go for a division of the whole. They will have to stand together in the Senate, and oppose all appropriations. It will not do for the large States to take all the appropriations first, and the bulk of the distribution afterwards; and there will be no way to prevent it but to refuse all appropriations, divide out the money among the States, and let each State lay it out for itself. A new surplus party will supersede the present surplus party, as successive factions supersede each other in chaotic revolutions. They will make Congress the quæstor of provinces, to collect money for the States to administer. This will be their argument; the States know best what they need, and can lay out the money to the best advantage, and to suit themselves. One State will want roads and no canals, another canals and no roads; one will want forts, another troops; one wants ships, another steam-cars; one wants high schools, another low schools; one is for the useful arts, another is for the fine arts, for lyceums, atheneums, museums, arts, statuary, painting, music; and the paper State will want all for banks. Thus will things go on, and Congress will have no appropriation to make, except to the President, and his head clerks, and their under clerks. Even our own pay, like it was under the confederation, may be remitted to our own States. The eight dollars a day may be voted to them, and supported by the argument that they can get better men for four dollars a day, and so save half the money, and have their work better done. Such is the progress in this road to ruin. Sir, I say of this measure, as I said of its progenitor, the land bill: if I could be willing to let evil pass, that good might come of it, I should be willing to let this bill pass. A recoil, a reaction, a revulsion, must take place. This confederacy cannot go to ruin. This Union has a place in the hearts of the people which will save it from nullification in disguise, as well as from nullification in arms. One word of myself. It is now ten years since schemes of distribution were broached upon this floor. They began with a Senator from New Jersey, now Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. DICKERSON.] They were denounced by many for their unconstitutionality, their corrupting tendencies, and their fatal effects upon the Federal and State Governments. I took my position then, have stood upon it during all the modifications of the original scheme, and continue standing upon it now. My answer then was, pay the public debt, and reduce the taxes; my answer now is, provide for the public defences, reduce the taxes, and bridle the paper system. On this ground I have stood—on this I stand; and never did I feel more satisfaction and more exultation in my vote, when triumphant in numbers, than I now do in a minority of six.

When Mr. BENTON had concluded—

Mr. RIVES rose and spoke with great energy in favor of the bill; expressed his approbation of the removal of the deposits, as restoring them to the power of Congress; and vindicated the portion of the bill relating to the deposit banks as almost wholly free from objection. He approved the portion of the bill in regard to the State deposits, which he maintained were neither a loan nor a distribution. He expressed his utter repugnance at the large expenditures proposed by Mr. WRIGHT; and maintained that economy is absolutely indispensable to a free Government. He also replied to various objections which had been made to the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE rose and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

Mr. President, it is no affectation in me, when I say it was not my intention to trouble the Senate with a single word on this all-important subject. After various propositions had been submitted by different gentlemen, and partially discussed, the whole matter was committed, by the order of the Senate, to a select committee of nine, composed of some of the ablest and most distinguished members of this body, with my honorable colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] as chairman. This committee, with much labor and ability, digested a bill, which embraced the propositions submitted to them, and presented it to the Senate in a form which they supposed would meet its approbation. Much interesting debate took place upon its different provisions. With the exception of an amendment, which I offered to the bill, and which I shall advert to in the course of my remarks, I contented myself with being a silent listener to the views of others, rather than occupy the time of the Senate with any views of my own. I was content to rest the correctness of my course upon the vote which I intended to give, and did give, in favor of the engrossment of the bill. That vote was given after the maturest reflection and most anxious deliberation. My honorable colleague and other Senators rested their votes upon reasons which were by them fully assigned, whilst I was willing to rest mine upon what appeared to me to be the intrinsic merits of the bill, without regard to the reasons of my own mind, which led to the result of my action. Such was the state of the case, when the question was yesterday taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, which was carried in the affirmative by the extraordinary and almost unanimous vote of forty to six. In this stage of a bill, discussion is ordinarily closed. When we adjourned last evening, I supposed it had closed in this case; but, on the bill being called up this morning for a third reading, my honorable colleague, as it was perfectly proper for him to do, although out of the usual course, renewed the debate on its merits, and entered upon a justification of his vote of yesterday against the engrossment of the bill. As he and myself differed in our votes on that occasion, and as he has to-day assigned additional reasons for his course, I feel myself called upon, not without great reluctance, to assign some for my own; a reluctance, in the first place, in feeling constrained to differ from him on any subject, and, in the next place, in feeling obliged to break the silence which I usually maintain on this floor, from a deep conviction that, except on special occasions, it is better to be a listener than a talker here.

On many of the important subjects which have been before the Senate, and in the discussion of which I have not participated, my views have been so fully and ably expressed by my honorable colleague, in giving utterance to his own, that I have contented myself with a silent vote. I have sometimes even yielded my own to his better judgment. If, in this silence, I have done any injustice to myself, I hope I have done no injustice to my constituents. Differing on this subject, as we now do, I trust the Senate will indulge me, although at this late hour, in making such remarks as seem to be called for by the peculiarity of my position and the importance of the occasion. These remarks may be crude and undigested, and I must, for that cause, claim its indulgence; for, although I have bestowed much reflection on this subject, in order to satisfy my own mind for the vote I was to give, still I came here to-day entirely unprepared, and without the remotest expectation of being called on, by any state of things, to assign my reasons for that vote.

Mr. President, my honorable colleague has intimated that he shall soon return to his constituents, by reason of the expiration of his present term; and if, in the vote he has given, they shall deem themselves aggrieved, they will have the opportunity to redress those grievances by filling his place with a better man. Sir, my friend is well advised of the true character of his and of my constituents. The purity of motive by which he is always governed, the honesty of purpose by which he is always actuated, is a sure guarantee of their approbation, whether, in their judgment, he has committed an error on this or any other occasion. I do not say that he has committed one; the error may be on my side; but, whether it be on the one side or the other, I feel that we may both look with perfect confidence to their indulgence, when we are left without their instructions to act according to the best lights before us.

Sir, this is a bill to regulate the deposits of the public money. After the creation of the late Bank of the United States, the public money was deposited in its vaults. In the fall of 1833, in anticipation of the expiration of its charter, and from the deep conviction that it would not be renewed, it became necessary to provide for the safe-keeping of the public money, by finding other places of deposit. The Secretary of the Treasury, acting in accordance with the views of the President, removed the deposits from the Bank of the United States, and placed them in several of the State banks. Of the propriety as well as the constitutionality of this measure, I have heretofore given my views at large. This is not the proper time, nor the occasion, for renewing the discussion of that all-absorbing and agitating question. It has become matter of history, and any thing we could now say would not probably alter the opinions of any one in regard to that measure, whether it was for good, or whether it was for evil. I have seen nothing since it took place to alter my thorough conviction of its expediency at the time; neither do I believe I shall see any thing hereafter to change the opinions I then entertained, provided our measures in future in relation to the public money are characterized by that prudence and wisdom which have so signally characterized the other leading measures of this administration. The removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States was made the occasion, without cause, in my judgment, to impair the public confidence, and to convulse the whole monetary system of the country. Much of unjust reproach was cast upon the President for having seized, as it was termed, upon the whole public treasure of the Government, taken it under his own control, and placed it in the vaults of irresponsible State incorporations, and without the reach and custody of the law. Although the President, by using the State banks for this purpose, had done no more than preceding administrations had done, previous to the creation of the Bank of the United States, still no one was more anxious than the President himself to have those deposits in the State banks not only regulated by, but, in the strictest sense, in the custody of, the law. He has evinced his strong anxiety on this subject by repeated and earnest recommendations to Congress. The subject has been before both Houses for three successive sessions, and, thus far, without being able to agree upon any propositions which were satisfactory to both. The effort thus to regulate the public deposits by law has again been renewed at the present session, and the bill under consideration is the result of that effort. This bill contains the principal provisions of the bill which has been introduced for the two last sessions, and which was prepared under the supervision, and with the sanction, of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, as it is presumed, with the approbation of the President.

At the present session, every member seems to have responded in good faith, by his desire to carry out the earnest recommendation of the President on this all-engrossing topic. Every one seems to have felt the importance of quieting the public mind on this subject, and of restoring public confidence in our monetary system, by such legal regulations of the deposit banks as should not only render them safe depositories, but should give to the whole community entire confidence in their safety. That the deposit banks are perfectly safe, for the amount of the public money which they possess, I have not a particle of doubt. That those in my own State are so, I could vouch for, from my own personal knowledge of their concerns. But it is one thing to be safe, and another thing to have the confidence of the whole country in that safety. The present bill is intended to accomplish both those objects. This is the principal feature of the bill. This is what the President has often recommended us to do. This is what we have often expressed our own desire to do. This is what the whole commercial community expect us to do; and this, too, let me add, is what the great and paramount interests of the whole country require at our hands. Shall that recommendation be disregarded? Shall that desire be stifled? Shall that expectation be disappointed? Shall that requirement be denied? I answer, no; emphatically, no. Shall we, by rejecting this bill, belie all our former professions? Are we willing to subject ourselves to the imputation of defeating a measure which has been so loudly demanded by the public voice, and which has been so imperiously required by the public interest; and that, too, after it has been so often urged upon us by the administration which we support? Can we make the people of this country believe in our sincerity, when we fail to carry through a measure recommended to us by every consideration of duty and of policy, as well as by the President himself? I put it to my political friends, that, as a party, we claim a majority in each House, and on this subject have no obstacles thrown in our way by our political opponents. Sir, it cannot, it must not be. What answer can we make to the oft-repeated charge, that the President and his supporters wish to keep the control of the funds of the nation, in order to control the politics of the people? We all know, we all feel, that the charge is as unjust as it is base. Shall we, then, by any act of ours, give countenance to it? Or shall we repel it in the only way in which it can be repelled, by prompt, decisive, and manly action on this subject? I cannot hesitate as to my course. Between the alternative of adopting or rejecting this proposition, I feel that there is no choice left to me. From the time the question first arose in regard to the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, I have, on all occasions, expressed my readiness to regulate them, by law, in the banks of the several States. I cannot shrink from the performance of that duty. If others can see their way clear, in leaving this vast, this enormous, amount of public money in a great variety of State banks, without legal regulation, let them take the responsibility of it. I wash my hands clean of any such omission.

Sir, in what I have said I have had reference to the amount of public money now in the deposit banks. I have not taken into the account the swollen, the overflowing current, which is constantly pouring in upon us. Those banks are already full to distension, and can receive no more, either with advantage to themselves or to the Government. The gentle streams of expenditure issuing from them are like rills compared with this mighty dashing mountain torrent of revenue rushing into them. What, then, sir, shall we do? What, I emphatically ask, does our duty require us to do? Shall we force into these reservoirs more than they have capacity to contain, and faster than they can permit it to escape? Shall we, by a kind of hydraulic pressure, force them till their embankments give way? And when we see desolation spread around them by reason of the breach, what consolation will it be to those who may have suffered to tell them that we were deceived in the strength of their embankments, and in their capacity to receive and contain all that was poured in upon them? It will not only be no consolation to them, but no justification to us. We shall be without excuse or apology. We have it in our power now to provide against any disastrous results, and we shall be held accountable then, if such provisions be not made.

What, then, is the remedy? This bill provides it. For, although the regulation of the deposit banks is the principal object of it, still it incidentally provides for a disposition of the surplus revenue. Our duty, in regard to the former, I have already shown; our obligation, in regard to the latter, I will proceed to show. But, before we examine the best mode of disposing of a surplus, let us inquire whether any surplus will exist. For some gentlemen, in their over-zeal on this subject, have wrought themselves up to the expression of a belief against the existence of any surplus, the existence of which seemed to be a fact all along conceded by every one. It is but very recently that any one has presumed to express a doubt in regard to it. From the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, down to a recent period in this discussion, the most zealous opponents of this bill seemed to recognise a probable surplus, and, following the example of the Secretary, were devising ways and means of getting rid of it. So confident was the Secretary on this subject, and so conscious was he of the impropriety of leaving it in the deposit banks, that he deemed it of sufficient importance to recommend a mode for a different disposition of it. My honorable colleague, acting on the same principle, and with similar views, brought before the Senate the proposition of the Secretary, and submitted it for consideration. I shall have occasion to advert to the principle of this proposition in the course of my remarks, and now merely allude to the proposition itself to show that, on all hands, a surplus has been anticipated. The bill proposes to operate upon the surplus which may be in the Treasury, beyond a certain amount, on the first day of January next. My honorable colleague has submitted a statement in figures, by which he attempts to show that the appropriations already made, and probably to be made, far exceed any amount now in the Treasury. There is nothing new in this. It is always so. The receipts into the Treasury of the current year are always calculated upon to meet appropriations made by Congress, and of which more than one half, in amount, remains in the Treasury as unexpended balances at the close of the year; so that his statement furnishes no satisfactory evidence as to the amount of surplus on the first day of January next. He merely shows what may probably be appropriated, but not drawn out of the Treasury, and omits to show what may probably be received into it. Sir, it would have been much more satisfactory to me if my friend, skilled in figures, as we all know him to be, had given us an estimate of receipts as well as disbursements. Stopping short where he did, is calculated to produce a wrong impression on minds not accustomed to grasp and dwell on the vast expenditures, and still vaster receipts, of a Government like ours. It is an old and very familiar maxim, that figures cannot lie; but when they are paraded in this manner, and exhibit the debit without the credit side of the account, they may very easily give to the uninitiated erroneous ideas of the state of the Treasury at a particular period. I do not intend to impeach the truth of the maxim that figures cannot lie; but I mean to say that unless they are put in the right place, and enough of them, they are the greatest liars in the world. I am apprehensive that the gentleman's figures will suffer in reputation, from the fact that there are not enough of them to present the true state of the account. Now, sir, I do not intend to trouble the Senate with a detailed statement of Treasury estimates, for I did not come here expecting to be called on for any such purpose. Those estimates have been made by many, very many, during this discussion. I will not detain the Senate by repeating them; but I will take the result of the lowest amongst them all, and by that, including the stock in the Bank of the United States, there will be in the Treasury, on the first day of January next, from twenty-five to thirty millions of dollars.

Sir, if any of the estimates of receipts come within millions of the truth, there must be a large, a very large, surplus in the Treasury at that time. Our appropriations, since the late war, exclusive of the payment of the national debt, have ranged from ten to sixteen millions of dollars per annum. We have, at this time, appropriations of an extraordinary character, which will swell the amount to a much larger sum. The sum of thirty-five millions has been deemed, by almost every one, sufficiently ample to cover them. These extraordinary appropriations will not be required the next year, and therefore the future receipts of the Treasury will not be applied to them a second time. My colleague admits that the unexpended balances at the end of the year usually amount to one half of the appropriations; and where the appropriations are unusually large, those balances are increased in a still greater ratio. If the appropriations be $35,000,000, then we may safely assume the unexpended balances to be $20,000,000. But my honorable colleague, in order to make out his balance against the Treasury at this time, swells our appropriations for the present year to the enormous amount of from fifty-four to fifty-five millions of dollars. I confess I was astonished and amazed at the result. Would such an expenditure have been thought of, but for this plethora of the Treasury?

Sir, when our means are ample, I am willing to go all reasonable lengths in any appropriations for the common defence of the country. I have, thus far, gone in my votes as far as any one. There is a propriety in making liberal appropriations for national objects, when our means are abundant. I will continue to vote on the same scale of liberality; but I cannot consent to make appropriations for the mere purpose of getting rid of a troublesome and embarrassing surplus. The habit of extravagance, which will thus be acquired, will be a far greater evil than any disposition of the surplus which has been or can be proposed. But if my honorable colleague's estimate of appropriations should be correct, then I say that the unexpended balances on the first of January next would alone be more than $25,000,000—a sum equal, or nearly equal, to any estimate of the surplus in the Treasury at that time! Sir, we are told by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] that he will hereafter hold us to our estimates. I am willing, sir, to be put upon the record, and will not deny my prediction of twenty-five or thirty millions of surplus on the first day of January next. Let this be placed alongside of his prediction of none, and I am content. But, say gentlemen, this unexpected surplus has arisen from the enormous amount of the sales of the public lands, which cannot be expected to be realized hereafter. Sir, I do not believe in such a sudden reduction for the present year. I think I can discern the elements and the operations by which the amount of sales is to be measurably kept up. This is not all speculation, as some gentlemen seem to suppose. The rise and value of property throughout the country is not a mere bubble. The sale of western lands is not all a bubble. If gentlemen's imaginations lag behind the reality, let them not urge their own tardiness as the rate of velocity by which the movements of others are to be governed. Let them not apply their fanciful theories, by which all these things are to be accounted for and explained. Property has risen throughout the world. It is one of the results of a long, and continued, and almost universal peace; where the physical energies of a whole population have been applied to objects of productive industry, instead of being wasted in destructive and sanguinary wars. Let them not compare our present condition with that at the close of the late war, which exhibited a factitious state of things. The application of more than $120,000,000 to the arts of war, instead of the arts of peace, gave an unnatural impulse to every thing. Property was raised above its real value, and, of course, fell when the cause which gave the impulse ceased to operate. Not so at the present time. Property has intrinsic value, generally speaking, equal to its market value; and it arises from the application of productive labor to the improved cultivation of the soil. This labor is made capable of being applied, by means of our canals and railroads, and all kinds of internal improvements. In regard to the State of New York, (I speak not without experience,) I have witnessed the rise and progress of her greatness. Her system of internal improvements was the commencement of a new era. The opening of the Erie canal wrought a complete revolution in the internal concerns of the State. There are those now living who well recollect the time when western New York was almost a wilderness; when the now beautiful city of Utica was a frontier settlement; and when Fort Stanwix was the ultima thule of the State. But, sir, the revolution produced by the Erie canal was for the benefit and advancement of the whole State. It wrought changes in the mode of cultivation; and whilst the counties on the Hudson river increased tenfold, those in western New York increased a hundredfold. Who can longer wonder at the rise of property, when he sees such an increase of the products of the soil? It is within my day when the county of Dutchess sent seven members to the Assembly; whereas now she sends but three, notwithstanding a continued and increasing population, whilst some of the western counties, which were then scarcely known on the map, now outstrip her in population and representation. It is but two or three years since, when the amount of tolls on the Erie canal exceeded a million of dollars, and only one seventeenth part of the products which paid those tolls came from west of Buffalo. What but the rapid sale and settlement of our western lands could have produced such results? And if such were the astonishing effects within the borders of New York, what must they be in the far West, where emigration and population are increasing in a more than geometrical ratio? This brief statement of a few of the statistics of New York furnishes some idea of the almost inconceivable settlement and improvement of the whole region of the West. It is stated that thousands upon thousands of emigrants have already arrived this season at the single port of New York; and we are informed that from 2,000 to 2,500 daily leave the port of Buffalo, that Queen of the West. What does all of this indicate? These emigrants are not all paupers; thus suddenly thrown upon our shores. It is true there are some of this description. But the great body of them are those who have fled from the cares, the troubles, the oppressions, of the old world, to seek a home and an asylum in this land of liberty and of law. Most of them, too, have more or less means—means which, though small in the land from whence they came, are, nevertheless, sufficiently ample to make an investment, and to lay the foundation of a home and a fortune for themselves and their children in our western wilds. It is this flood-tide of emigration that is settling, and improving, and opening, this new world of the West; this tide setting in from Europe is swollen and accelerated by the immense tributary streams of emigration from New England and New York. Enterprise, intelligence, capital, and wealth, float upon its broad and resistless current, till they are scattered and spread over the vast fields of their destination. It is true, that with all this there are great speculations in the public lands; but these speculations are generally the results of a keen-eyed sagacity, of a far-reaching forecast, and of anticipated benefits, which are generally realized within the time which has been prescribed for their accomplishment. These are some of the elements that enter into the estimates for the sale and settlement of the public lands; these are some of the causes which contribute to the rapid advancement of our territorial population, until, like the aurora borealis, we see State after State shooting up into the firmament of the Union; stripe after stripe, and star after star, are thus added to that banner which so triumphantly waves "o'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave."

Again, the products from the labor of this increased and increasing population are borne on a reflux tide, and emptied into the lap of the great commercial emporium of the western world. The city of New York presents one of the happiest illustrations of the effects produced by our system of internal improvements, and of internal commerce. The assessed value of her real and personal estate, and her population at different periods since the close of the late war with Great Britain, are an unerring index to the rapid and progressive improvement of the West, and the far West, which contribute so essentially to her greatness.* Here, too, in the sudden advance of her real estate, the croakers of the present day will think they discover the work of speculation; and that this apparent prosperity must give way to some violent reaction. Sir, I am not in the habit of making predictions, but I will venture one in the present case, and that is, that, without some great and unexpected calamity, the man is not now living who will ever see real estate in the city of New York cheaper than it is at the present time. The statistics of New York are applicable to every commercial city of the Union, in proportion to the foreign and internal commerce which they enjoy, and the elements which enter into her greatness are those which contribute to the general prosperity of the whole country. But, sir, some of our political economists are frightened at this prosperity. They think they see in it the seeds of our sudden decline. They have measured us by the old standards of Europe, and cannot encompass our rapid and astonishing growth. In truth, we have astounded the European world—their statesmen and their philosophers have been baffled in all their calculations and investigations in relation to us. They have found that the rules which they have been accustomed to apply to the nations of the old world seemed to have no immediate application to us. A people of yesterday, and already the most prosperous on earth; our free institutions command the admiration of the world; our civil and religious liberty offer an asylum to the oppressed of all nations. And still, in the midst of this prosperity, in the full enjoyment of all these blessings, we find at home, as well as abroad, those who cannot discover the cause which makes us, above all others, a happy, great, and prosperous people. Sir, it is contained in two words: it is our CREDIT SYSTEM. But for this, our canals and our railroads, our great works of internal improvement of every kind, could never have been made. The Erie canal, the wonder of the age, must have remained a mere project in the imagination of its projectors. That stupendous work, which has added millions upon millions to the value of property within the extended sphere of its influence, must have remained unexecuted but for the credit system. But for this system, those great works throughout the Union, by which we have conquered time and space, could never have been accomplished. It is by this means that the giant arms of this young and growing republic have piled prosperity upon prosperity, mountains high, as the giants of old piled Ossa upon Pelion; not, like them, with a view to scale the heavens, but that she might place on its lofty summit the light of liberty, to shed its lustre and its benign influence throughout the world. Sir, that lustre has been shed, that influence has been felt, and is now being felt, in different portions of the globe. Under its magic touch thrones have trembled, dynasties have been overturned, and crowns have fallen. The credit system is the distinguishing feature between despotism and liberty; it is the offspring of free institutions; it is found to exist, and its influence is felt, in proportion to the freedom enjoyed by any people. By freedom I do not mean unregulated, unrestrained, natural liberty; but that freedom which is founded on just and equitable laws; where the rights of personal security, of private property, and religious toleration, are guarantied to every individual; where there is a general diffusion of knowledge, and the existence of public and private morality. These are the elements, and they together form the basis of public confidence on which the credit system rests. This is the invention of modern times.

In the old Governments of Europe, where liberty never found a resting place, credit was unknown. To the United States has been left the honor of maturing and perfecting this system. To the United States, also, is the honor due of having first applied the system of steam navigation. The effects on the general prosperity of the nation have been as sensibly felt in the one case as in the other; and he who should at this day recommend an entire abandonment of our credit system for a sole and exclusive metallic currency, would be deemed no less visionary than he who should attempt to substitute a Pennsylvania wagon for a locomotive or a canal packet, or should endeavor to stem the resistless current of the Mississippi in a flat boat, instead of those splendid palaces which now move majestically on its waters. Shall we, then, Mr. President, check this tide of prosperity, by the introduction of new and untried schemes? Shall we not be content with the necessities, the comforts, the conveniences, and the luxuries of life, which are so widely diffused throughout this whole country? Shall we attempt to overthrow, subvert, and destroy, a system which has produced all these blessings; which has brought happiness and plenty to the door of every man; and that, too, for the purpose of adopting some of the exploded doctrines of the political economists of Europe? Sir, you might as well attempt to apply the common law of England, which was born and nurtured on the Thames, to the father of waters in this western world, and to our mighty inland seas, compared with which the boasted streams and lakes of Europe dwindle into rills and ponds beside them; yes, these vast inland seas, into which, in the language of a distinguished Senator of my own State, you might cast the whole land of the common law, without producing a ripple. Sir, I believe I speak the almost unanimous sentiment of my political friends in this Senate, when I say they intend no such thing. I believe I speak the sentiment of the democratic party throughout the Union, when I say, I believe they neither expect nor desire any such thing. What, then, do they expect and desire? I answer, no more nor less than what every real friend to his country is willing to adopt, namely, a preservation, and, at the same time, a regulation of the credit system. In all such measures of reform I will go as far as he who goes farthest. Preserve and regulate, but not destroy, is my motto. Enlarge your specie basis; introduce, as far as practicable, a gold currency, by the prohibition of small notes; provide means for coining at the mint; take all proper measures to prevent excessive issues of bank paper, and the unnecessary increase of bank incorporations; repeal your restraining laws, so as to permit the free employment and investment of foreign capital. Whatever danger there may be, is to be found in the abuse of the system, and not in its existence. Guard against these abuses, and correct them when discovered. An entire abandonment of the credit system, and a return to a sole and exclusive metallic currency, if it were practicable, would produce desolation and destruction from one extremity of the Union to the other. Such notions ought not, cannot, must not, prevail.

Mr. President, I hope I shall be pardoned for this digression from the main subject of discussion. My apology will be found in the course and character of this debate. The question again recurs, what disposition shall be made of the surplus revenue? That there will be a surplus, seems to have been conceded or taken for granted on all hands, except by the Senator from Missouri. It was anticipated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he recommended a mode of disposing of it. What was that proposition? Why, sir, in substance, that the Secretary should go into the market, by himself or agent, and invest it in the State stocks. This proposition was introduced by my honorable colleague; and if a surplus was not anticipated, why introduce a proposition to dispose of that which it was supposed would have no existence? The proposition received but little favor in the Senate. I will not attempt to recapitulate the objections which were made to it. Some of them struck me as more imaginary than real. I did not appreciate them as other gentlemen did. In the vote which was taken upon my honorable colleague's proposition, we found ourselves in a lean minority of four. Being satisfied that something ought to be done, I determined to unite in a proposition which should be more generally satisfactory to my political friends. The one reported by the select committee was "That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, in proportion to their respective amounts of population, as ascertained by the last census, according to the provision of the second section of the first article of the constitution; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such persons as the several States may authorize to receive it, on receiving certificates of deposit, signed by the competent authorities of such State, each for such amount, and in such form, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, which shall set forth and express the obligation of the State to pay the amount thereof to the United States, or their assigns; and which said certificates it shall be competent for the Secretary of the Treasury, in the name and behalf of the United States, to sell and assign, whenever so directed by any act of Congress; all sales and assignments, however, to be ratable, and in just and equal proportions among all the States, according to the amounts received by them, respectively; and all such certificates of deposit shall be subject to, and shall bear an interest of five per centum per annum, payable half yearly, from the time of such sale and assignment, and shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the States issuing the same."

That part of it which required an act of Congress before the Secretary could sell and assign the certificates was deemed objectionable. The object was to keep the money so far under the control of the Secretary as to enable him to use the means when necessary. I accordingly offered an amendment, which was adopted, by which the Secretary was authorized, on behalf of the United States, to sell and transfer the certificates whenever it should be necessary, for want of other money in the Treasury to meet appropriations made by Congress. This amendment removed the principal objections to the bill. It placed the avails of the money in the power of the Secretary, whenever it should be required to meet such appropriations. If there should be means sufficient in the Treasury to meet them, then of course the money would not be wanted. It would never be called for until there was a deficiency of means.

Let us now inquire, Mr. President, whether this proposition, so amended, is one which ought to be adopted. The idea of returning to the States any surplus revenue which has been collected from the people, by indirect taxation, is neither unheard of nor novel. We have high authority as to the expediency of the measure; and if the proposition under consideration, which is a mere deposit, and not a distribution, involves no constitutional difficulty, then we have the same authority in favor of its adoption. This authority is one which no friend of the administration will lightly disregard. President Jackson, in his message of December, 1829, has the following language:

"After the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be required for its current service. As, then, the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress, and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connexion with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government, it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us, then, endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution, while by others it has been viewed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

"To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation; and should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations."

From this it would seem that a surplus was anticipated after the extinction of the public debt, and that it would continue to a remote period, beyond the current expenses of the Government. The importance of internal improvements was duly appreciated; but, inasmuch as the appropriation of money for that purpose by Congress was necessarily unequal, and inasmuch as some entertained doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress thus to appropriate it, the President very properly expressed the opinion "that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation; and should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it." The President seemed fully to appreciate the expediency of the measure of apportionment of the surplus revenue among the States, but cautiously and properly reserved the constitutional question. After the delivery of this message, public attention was turned to the subject. Coming from so high a source, it received due consideration, and those who doubted its expediency, suggested their objections. Here the matter rested till the next session of Congress, when the President, in his annual message of December, 1830, again recurs to the subject. He adverts to the opinion expressed in his previous message, that there would be "a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be required for its current service;" and adds, "I have had no cause to change that opinion, but much to confirm it." He again repeats the recommendation of "the adoption of some plan for the distribution of the surplus funds which may, at any time, remain in the Treasury after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States in proportion to the number of their representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement." The President then proceeds to answer the objections which have been made to the recommendation contained in his former message, and repeated in this. Those objections are the same which have been urged against this bill, and he refutes them satisfactorily and triumphantly.

It is due to him that I should give his views in his own language. They are as follows:

"I have heretofore felt it my duty to recommend the adoption of some plan for the distribution of the surplus funds which may at any time remain in the Treasury, after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States, in proportion to the number of their representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement.

"Although this plan has met with favor in some portions of the Union, it has also elicited objections which merit deliberate consideration. A brief notice of these objections here, will not, therefore, I trust, be regarded as out of place.

"They rest, as far as they have come to my knowledge, on the following grounds: 1st, an objection to the ratio of distribution; 2d, an apprehension that the existence of such a regulation would produce improvident and oppressive taxation to raise the funds for distribution; 3d, that the mode proposed would lead to the construction of works of a local nature, to the exclusion of such as are general, and as would, consequently, be of a more useful character; and, last, that it would create a discreditable and injurious dependence on the part of the State Governments upon the Federal power. Of those who object to the ratio of representation as the basis of distribution, some insist that the importations of the respective States would constitute one that would be more equitable; and others, again, that the extent of their respective territories would furnish a standard which would be more expedient, and sufficiently equitable. The ratio of representation presented itself to my mind, and it still does, as one of obvious equity, because of its being the ratio of contribution, whether the funds to be distributed be derived from the customs or from direct taxation. It does not follow, however, that its adoption is indispensable to the establishment of the system proposed. There may be considerations appertaining to the subject which would render a departure, to some extent, from the rule of contribution proper. Nor is it absolutely necessary that the basis of distribution be confined to one ground. It may, if, in the judgment of those whose right it is to fix it, it be deemed politic and just to give it that character, have regard to several.

"In my first message I stated it to be my opinion that 'it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be required for its current service.' I have had no cause to change that opinion, but much to confirm it. Should these expectations be realized, a suitable fund would thus be produced for the plan under consideration to operate upon; and, if there be no such fund, its adoption will, in my opinion, work no injury to any interest; for I cannot assent to the justness of the apprehension that the establishment of the proposed system would tend to the encouragement of improvident legislation of the character supposed. Whatever the proper authority, in the exercise of constitutional power, shall at any time hereafter decide to be for the general good, will, in that as in other respects, deserve and receive the acquiescence and support of the whole country; and we have ample security that every abuse of power in that regard, by the agents of the people, will receive a speedy and effectual corrective at their hands. The views which I take of the future, founded on the obvious and increasing improvement of all classes of our fellow-citizens in intelligence and in public and private virtue, leave me without much apprehension on that head.

"I do not doubt that those who come after us will be as much alive as we are to the obligations upon all the trustees of political power to exempt those for whom they act from all unnecessary burdens; and as sensible of the great truth, that the resources of the nation, beyond those required for immediate and necessary purposes of Government, can nowhere be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people."

I am glad that my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] referred to this message as containing the grounds of his argument. I should have referred to it, if he had not; for this recommendation was strongly impressed on my mind, although I had not seen it from the time it was delivered till this day. But I was a member of the Senate of New York at that period, and well remember that the doctrines of this message formed the basis of our Governor's message on this subject. The reports of our committees on internal improvements, in both Houses, assumed the same ground. I believe the constitutional question was all along reserved; but, aside from that, no one at that time seemed to doubt the expediency or the policy of the measure. I have been subsequently led to doubt both the expediency and policy of a general system of distribution amongst the States of the surplus revenue of the Government. I have feared that it might create a too great dependence of the States on the General Government. I will not now say any thing of the constitutional question, farther than to express my opinion that Congress has no power to raise revenue for the purpose of distribution. But when we find a surplus on our hands, without any design from our legislation to produce it, it presents a different question. The time has now arrived, the contingencies have now happened, when the President anticipated such a surplus; the surplus is on hand, and it will continue to increase far beyond our appropriations. It is in vain to shut our eyes to the fact; we may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive others. This surplus cannot be disposed of by appropriations, unless of the most extravagant character. Will the people tolerate appropriations for the mere purpose of getting rid of a surplus? No, sir, I apprehend not. They will justify their representatives in making liberal appropriations for all objects of national defence. Extravagant expenditures, for the sole object of disposing of the surplus revenue, are, in my judgment, far more dangerous than any objections which I have heard urged against a distribution amongst the States. These expenditures beget the necessity of continuing them, and by and by we shall be obliged to raise the tariff, and increase the burdens of the people, for the purpose of carrying out the extravagances with which we improvidently commenced. Sir, the people of this country will never approve such a principle. What, then, shall be done? We have a large surplus on hand. It will be much larger on the 1st of January next. It is in vain to wish we had it not. It is in our hands, and we must dispose of it. No matter by what means we got it—no matter whether by indiscreet or improvident legislation. We have the surplus—call it accidental, or incidental, or unavoidable. The question is, What shall we do with it? Shall we throw it into the ocean? No. Shall we burn it up? No. What, then, shall we do with it? Shall we leave it to accumulate in the deposit banks? There are weighty objections against it. There is no reason for keeping in those banks any more than is required for the current disbursements of the Government. That will always be a large amount. Beyond that, it is neither profitable to the banks nor useful to the people. Most of the banks are limited in their discounts by their charters. The elements which enter into their discounts are, their capital, their circulation, and their deposits. In the city of New York their deposits are large and their circulation small. In fact, their circulation is a mere bagatelle. Well, sir, when their discounts run up to the limit prescribed by their charters, the surplus deposits are of no further use to them nor to the public. It is true, in the city of New York, they have been used so far as prudence and a due regard to the calls of the Government would permit.

The surplus, beyond what the deposit banks could use, and beyond what was required to meet the drafts of the Treasury, has been loaned, without interest, to other banks, on which they have discounted; and the community have thus had the benefit. After the late calamitous fire in the city of New York, I have no doubt the banks have discounted on these funds, and thereby essentially relieved the commercial interests of the city. The idea that these funds, to the amount of millions, have been hoarded up by the banks, is as improbable as it is untrue. They have been used, so far as prudence would permit; but still their benefits in this way are very unequally distributed amongst the whole people. If the money has been collected, by indirect taxation, from the people, it is right that they should participate, in the same ratio, in its benefits. This cannot be done through the deposit banks. I see no mode left so just and proper, and so unexceptionable, as the one prescribed in this bill, namely, a deposit with the States. If there were any thing objectionable in a distribution, as recommended by the President, there would not be, as it appears to me, in a deposit with the States. The President, in all his messages, has been perfectly consistent. He has never recommended a general system of distribution. He has merely pointed out a mode of disposing of any surplus which might be unavoidably on hand beyond the wants of the Government, after the extinction of the national debt. He has always contended against the policy of raising revenue for the purpose of distribution, but has, at different times, suggested the expediency of such a disposition of any surplus which might be in the Treasury, without any design on the part of the Government to produce it for such a purpose. This distinction has been kept up all along by the President, in all his messages in which he has had occasion to touch the subject. It is a distinction by which he has stood justified, and will stand justified, before the people, as long as he maintains that consistency, that upright, honest course, which has thus far characterized all his public acts, and which, I trust, will characterize them in future. His doctrines, thus far, on this subject, have been approved; and the distinction to which I have alluded, and which can be traced through all his messages, is one sound in itself, and one perfectly understood by the people of the United States. In his veto message on the land bill, in 1832, I find the same distinction; and here, too, it is proper to add that he suggested doubts, as he had done before, of its constitutionality; but the distinction between returning to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue, paid in by them, and creating a surplus for the purpose of distribution among the States, is clearly taken and kept up, in perfect accordance with what he had said on former occasions. I most heartily approve of the doctrines contained in that message. I am fully sensible of the dangers to be apprehended from a general distribution system in regard to a surplus created for the purpose of such distribution. The President's reasoning on that subject is perfectly conclusive to my mind. Amongst other things, he says:

"It has been supposed that, with all the reductions in our revenue which could be speedily effected by Congress, without injury to the substantial interests of the country, there might be, for some years to come, a surplus of moneys in the Treasury, and that there was, in principle, no objection to returning them to the people by whom they were paid. As the literal accomplishment of such an object is obviously impracticable, it was thought admissible, as the nearest approximation to it, to hand them over to the State Governments, the more immediate representatives of the people, to be by them applied to the benefit of those to whom they properly belonged. The principle and the object was to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue which might have been paid by them under a system which could not at once be abandoned; but even this resource, which at one time seemed to be almost the only alternative to save the General Government from grasping unlimited power over internal improvements, was suggested with doubts of its constitutionality.

"But this bill assumes a new principle. Its object is not to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue paid in by them, but to create a surplus for distribution among the States. It seizes the entire proceeds of one source of revenue, and sets them apart as a surplus, making it necessary to raise the moneys for supporting the Government, and meeting the general charges, from other sources. It even throws the entire land system upon the customs for its support, and makes the public lands a perpetual charge upon the Treasury. It does not return to the people moneys accidentally or unavoidably paid by them to the Government, by which they are not wanted; but compels the people to pay moneys into the Treasury for the mere purpose of creating a surplus for distribution to their State Governments."

"However willing I might be that any unavoidable surplus in the Treasury should be returned to the people through their State Governments, I cannot assent to the principle that a surplus may be created for the purpose of distribution. Viewing this bill as, in effect, assuming the right not only to create a surplus for that purpose, but to divide the contents of the Treasury among the States without limitation, from whatever source they may be derived, and asserting the power to raise and appropriate money for the support of every State Government and institution, as well as for making every local improvement, however trivial, I cannot give it my assent."

From all this it appears that the President is in favor of a disposition of an incidental or unavoidable surplus, provided, always, it can be constitutionally done. I will not stop to inquire whether such a distribution of such a surplus be constitutional or not. It is not necessary in reference to the proposition contained in this bill. This proposition is not a distribution by which the money becomes absolutely the property of the States, and which is never again to be returned, and which the States are under no obligation to return to the United States; but it is a mere deposit with the States of the surplus revenue, incidentally and unavoidably on hand, by which the States acquire no property in it. It remains the property of the United States just as fully and as perfectly as if it were in the immediate custody of the Secretary of the Treasury. The States become the mere depositories. Now, as to the constitutional power of Congress to direct the surplus revenue of the Government, incidentally and unavoidably in the Treasury, to be deposited whenever and wherever it pleases, I cannot for one moment entertain a particle of doubt. It is the duty of the administration of the Government, whenever they find such a fund on hand, to take care of it and preserve it—to keep it safely till it is wanted for the legitimate uses of the Government. Those uses are to be judged of by Congress, and its appropriations are indicative of what it deems proper objects to which it should be applied. Until it is wanted for such appropriations, it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the advice of the Executive, to keep it safely. Unless the places of deposit are prescribed by law, he takes upon himself the responsibility of selecting them; but if Congress sees fit to act, it may direct such places as, in its wisdom, shall seem most meet and proper. Now, sir, I hold that Congress can constitutionally direct the public money to be deposited wherever it pleases. It may direct it to be deposited in the Bank of England, in the State banks, in the mint of the United States, or in the treasuries of the several States. Congress, whenever it undertakes to direct on this subject, is the sole judge of the place of deposit. It would intend, unquestionably, to select such places as are perfectly safe; it would not discharge its duty to the people, whose representatives they are, and whose money it is, unless it selected places of deposit which were perfectly safe. Let me ask, Can there be any safer depositories than the States? I answer, No. The stability of this Government depends on the stability of the States; it cannot exist without them. They, therefore, afford the very best and highest security which we can have for the safe keeping as well as the safe return of the money which may be intrusted to them, respectively. It is no objection to the constitutional power of Congress thus to dispose of the public money, that it is deposited ratably with the States. So far as constitutional right is concerned, looking at this matter as a mere deposit, Congress could order it to be deposited in such proportions as it pleased; but the very object of thus depositing the surplus with the States is, that we thereby have the best security for its safe keeping, and the best guarantee for its sure return when required; and inasmuch as this incidental or unavoidable surplus, as the President terms it, has been collected by indirect taxation out of the people, it is but just and equitable that some rate should be adopted, in depositing it with the States, that shall give to them equal benefits, so far as incidental benefits are to be derived from becoming the depositories of it.

If we should adopt the same ratio that we would in an absolute distribution, provided we had the constitutional power to distribute it, it would be no argument against the constitutional power of Congress thus to deposit it. As to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, I cannot for one moment doubt; I will not suffer myself to doubt. No one I have heard has suggested any constitutional doubt, and no one, in my judgment, can place such an objection before the people in a way that they can comprehend it, or feel the force of it. From this view of the matter, I feel justified in saying that I am sustained in my support of the proposition contained in this bill, by the principles laid down in the several messages of the President to which I have referred; and backed by such authority, and from a deep settled conviction of the importance of the measure, I cannot hesitate as to the vote I shall give. If this plan be not adopted, I ask gentlemen by what mode will they dispose of this surplus? If there be any who do not believe there will be a surplus, (and this number must be very small,) to them I say, the plan proposed can do no harm in that event, because there will be nothing on which it can operate. If the sentiment were unanimous, or any thing like it, that there will be no surplus, I would not then adopt any measure in relation to it, when there was no probability of its being required. But this is a very different case. No rational man can doubt but that there will be a large surplus, unless our appropriations are made for the express purpose of getting rid of it; and, of course, in a very extravagant manner. I again ask, what shall we do with it? It is in vain to make objections to this proposition, unless gentlemen will condescend to point out some other mode of disposing of the public money. If none is suggested, and the present bill be not adopted, the money must remain in the deposit banks, without legal regulation, and subject to all the clamor which has been, and which will hereafter be, made against them. I here repeat, as I have before said, I have entire confidence in the deposit banks. But no one can hesitate to say, and it is no disparagement to any banks to say, that this vast and accumulating treasure is more secure in the treasuries of the several States. With the confidence which I place in the security of the deposit banks, it would not be surprising if I should be in favor of leaving it there; but that gentlemen who profess to look upon all banks with more or less distrust should be willing to leave it there, in stead of depositing it with the States, is to me a matter of astonishment.

Some gentlemen, when pressed upon this point, and asked, what will you do? are ready to say, leave it till the next session of Congress. Why leave it till the next session of Congress? I emphatically ask. If there is to be a large surplus in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, it is our duty to the banks themselves, as well as our duty to our country, to make early arrangements for its disposition. If it is to be deposited with the States, the banks ought to know it, that they may be prepared for it at the time fixed for that purpose. If it is to be left with them, and no change is hereafter to be made, they ought equally to know it; for their arrangements in relation to the management of their own means would depend more or less on the fact, whether they were to retain the means of the Government. So that, in any point of view, it is all-important that the question be now settled. Every important interest of the country requires it. If it be not now arranged, it will be productive of the most alarming consequences. If this money is thus suffered to accumulate in these banks, the people will never rest satisfied that it shall behoard up there; and it would in that case be of no use to the banks to have it. I take it for granted, then, it must be used. How far such a use of money, which has been collected from the people, would be deemed a just and equitable use of it in regard to the great body of them, I leave to the American people to judge. In the use of such means there is more or less favoritism; and the desire of the banks to make the most of it, especially if an interest is to be charged on it in their hands, would tend strongly towards those extravagant and wild speculations, about which gentlemen have so feelingly declaimed. If this money should be loaned out to the communities where these deposit banks are located, will it not be seen at once that the business of those places will be more or less extended, according to the means employed? Suppose, then, when these funds to such an enormous amount are thus loaned out, and the Government should want the money, can these banks respond, on notice given, to the call? If they can, it will be by reason of a sudden call on their debtors. What will be the consequence of such a call? We can readily foresee it. The whole money market will be disturbed. Like the sudden expansion and contraction of bank issues and bank discounts at all times, they would convulse the whole commercial community. Those convulsions are not confined to the communities in which they happen; their effects are felt every where. You cannot strike a blow at the city of New York, which will not be felt, not only through the whole State, but throughout the whole Union.

But it may be said, and I believe has been said, in the course of this debate, that this money will not be needed by the Government, and will not be called for from the banks. So much the worse. The longer such an immense sum is left to accumulate and to be used by them, the worse it is. But, Mr. President, public sentiment, which is generally right, demands that some other disposition be made of this surplus revenue. The people are jealous enough of banks at all times, but are peculiarly so of those, at this time, which hold such vast treasures which belong to them. Unless some other disposition be made of this surplus, suspicions will go abroad that the money is kept there for improper purposes, and from improper motives. We know there is no ground for such suspicion. But if it exist, whether true or false, the effect is the same. Its tendency is to agitate the public mind, and a consequent derangement of the moneyed concerns of the country. I can readily foresee that, if Congress adjourns without regulating the deposit banks by law, and without disposing of this surplus revenue, the whole country will be agitated by this all-important question, and we shall have to encounter another scene of panic and distress, and thereby derange the currency, and more or less affect every interest in the country. No matter whether there be any just ground for such agitation or not, such is the state of parties and of party feeling that we cannot hope to be rid of it, however much we may deprecate its existence. Sir, I live in a commercial community. I feel that I know something of its interests, and I am unwilling, for any consideration whatever, that this all-engrossing topic should any longer be made the sport of party, to the great detriment of the paramount interests of society. I am unwilling that such considerations shall, by designing politicians, be mingled in the approaching presidential contest, and that the commencement of the next session of Congress shall be the signal for increased and increasing excitement till it is closed. Sir, public confidence in our banks, as well as in our political institutions, becomes impaired by such constant assaults; and when that is impaired, every interest must suffer. I cannot, therefore, lend my aid to continue such a state of things. By depositing this money with the States, as is proposed by this bill, the public mind will be quieted; the banks will be freed from the suspicion, as well as the odium, which must attach to them under the state of things which I have attempted to describe; and, above all things, our pecuniary concerns will be separated from all political connexions or associations—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Sir, there is no constitutional objection to this bill. The most refined sophistry cannot show any. Gentlemen may attempt to confound it with a distribution. But it is no more nor less than a simple deposit of the public money with the States. It avoids the objections which would exist to a general system of distribution. That implies that a surplus shall be created for the purpose of distribution. This does not even distribute a surplus, accidentally and unavoidably on hand. It deposits it with the States. It still remains the property of the Government, and the Government can use the money whenever it is required for the public service. It creates no dependence, on the part of the States, on the General Government, as a distribution system might do. It merely provides for the present emergency. It disposes safely of a surplus, for which, at present, we have no use, and with which we know not what to do. If gentlemen would satisfy me of any other proper disposition of it, I would embrace any proposition that would seem to meet the exigency of the case. But I hear of none, except to spend it all by extravagant appropriations, or leave it to accumulate in the deposit banks. To both of these I have already indicated my objections. We are then brought back to the proposition contained in this bill; and I confess, after the maturest deliberation and reflection, I can not only see no objection to it, but I can conceive of no mode so proper. By this mode the States will receive their ratable proportions of the surplus, giving the security of the States themselves for the repayment, when it is needed by the General Government. This money is retained by the States, without interest, until the Secretary of the Treasury, for want of other means, sells the certificates of deposits, when they are made to bear an interest of five per cent. These certificates are redeemable at the pleasure of the States, and would always bring par in the market, and probably a premium. No arrangement which has been suggested, or, as I believe, can be suggested, is, in my judgment, equal to this. It is the best for both parties. It is best for the United States. It is best for the individual States. If they invest the money in internal improvements, or as a fund for education, it will be vastly better employed for the whole country than if it were left for the use of speculators in the deposit banks; and whenever it is wanted by the General Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, as its agent, has only to sell the certificates in market to get the money on them; and the States, on such sale, have merely to provide for the payment of interest at the rate of five per cent. They are not bound to raise the principal on any such call, because the certificates are made redeemable at their pleasure; and when they are sold, they become to the States the same as any other five per cent. stock which they may have issued. One advantage, and one great advantage, of this proposition is, that it requires no action on the part of Congress, nor on the part of the States, to bring this money back to the Treasury, whenever it is required for the wants of the Government. Congress judges in the first instance of those wants, and makes appropriations to meet them.

If, then, there is a lack of other means, the Secretary of the Treasury, without any further action on the part of Congress or the States, can avail himself of the fund thus deposited, by a sale and transfer of the certificates.

As long as this money remains the property of the General Government, the States will exercise a proper caution as to the use and application of it. There will be no profligate expenditures, merely because they have come into the possession of such an amount of funds. Most of the States would probably apply it to internal improvements, already authorized by their respective Legislatures, and perhaps already commenced. If it should be thus applied, there can be no better evidence of its proper application, because such works have been authorized and commenced without reference to any such means. I might instance the State of New York as in this situation now. The last Legislature directed new works of internal improvement to be commenced, and loaned her credit to the Hudson and Erie Railroad Company, to the amount, in the aggregate of $6,000,000. For this amount she must issue stocks, and raise the money as it is wanted, and bearing such interest as is directed by the act authorizing it. If she should receive, under this bill, $5,000,000, more or less, it would to that extent take the place of the stocks which are by her past legislation already directed to be issued. This money she would apply to those works of internal improvement, and would pay no interest on it till it should be wanted for the use of the United States; and whenever it should be so wanted, she would then pay an interest, the same as she would have paid from the beginning, on her own stocks, and provide for the principal whenever it suits her convenience, because the certificates of deposit are redeemable at her pleasure. If the money should not be called for, then she will retain it, without interest, still resting under the obligation to return it when required, and whenever it suits her convenience to redeem her certificates which may have been put into the market. What objection is there to her thus using this money? Has she not, like every State in the Union, contributed, by the indirect taxation of the people, to raise it? It is true it has not been raised with the design to accumulate a surplus; but being unavoidably and without design on hand, what valid objection can be urged to such an application of it? What application can be made that will so much benefit the whole country? The States can carry on their works of internal improvement much better and much more economically than the United States can, even if there were no constitutional objection to such a system on behalf of the General Government.

By the proposition in this bill we also avoid another objection which is sometimes urged against a system of distribution, by which the money is given to the States, namely, that we have no right in this way to carry on a system of internal improvements, by means of the agency of the States, which we cannot carry on directly. In other words, if Congress cannot appropriate and apply the money for such purposes, it cannot give it to the States for the same purposes. Under the present bill, the money is not given to the States. It is merely deposited with them for safe keeping. It remains the property of the United States, and to be applied by their agent, the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever it shall become necessary to meet appropriations made by Congress. There is also this additional advantage of this proposition, namely: whenever these certificates are sold, like all our State stocks, they would probably find their way to Europe, and would, to the amount sold, be the means of introducing foreign capital into the country. This is what is wanted. I will not dwell on the importance of foreign capital to a country, and particularly to this country. Our astonishing growth and prosperity are greatly owing to the introduction and use of foreign capital. Amidst all the turmoil and disturbances of the European world, there is no safer investment for capital from abroad than the public securities of this country, whether they be stocks of the United States or of the several States. Such, sir, are some of the advantages proposed by this bill; and in addition to all these, though last not least, its adoption will tend to quiet the public mind, to get rid of that feverish state of anxiety which has existed for some time past, which has kept our monetary system in constant agitation, which has disturbed the peace of the whole commercial community, and more or less deranged the affairs of the whole country.

Mr. President, if such be some of the advantages of this bill, (and I confess I have glanced at them but hastily,) what, let me ask, is the objection to its adoption? Why, sir, it is objected, in the first place, that the two propositions, namely, to regulate by law the deposite banks, and to dispose of the surplus revenue, ought not to have been in the same bill. Viewing these propositions as I do, I have not, on my own account, any objection to their being embraced in the same bill; but knowing that a few of my political friends entertained different views from me in regard to the latter one, I felt it due to them that they should have the opportunity of acting and voting separately on them. My honorable colleague, although he originally put the propositions together, accordingly moved to recommit the bill to a committee, with instructions to report two separate bills. After repeated trials, it was decided not to recommit. This I regret, because such a separation would have left each proposition to rest on its own merits, and every member of this body could, with perfect freedom, have voted for the one or the other, as he should deem best. But the two propositions have been kept together against my vote and against my wishes. The question now is, approving them both as I do, whether I shall vote against the whole bill because it contains a proposition which some other gentlemen do not approve. Sir, I cannot, under these circumstances, hesitate as to my course. I voted for the engrossment of the bill; I shall vote for it on its final passage. But my honorable colleague objects to the ratio introduced by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. Sir, I resisted that ratio to the utmost. I deemed the ratio in the bill as reported by the select committee, namely, in proportion to federal population, more equitable and just; but I cannot vote against the whole bill merely because it takes the representatives of the States in the two Houses of Congress as the basis of deposite, instead of the representation in the popular branch. And, even though the ratio were restored, as my honorable colleague desires it, we know perfectly well that the bill would not receive his vote. Having done all in my power to retain the ratio required by the interests of my own State, and which seemed to me both just and equitable, and having failed in that, I cannot, consistently with my sense of duty, vote against a bill which contains two such important provisions, even if I have some objections to that part which relates to the surplus revenue. I should feel that they ought to be very weighty and very strong to induce me to vote against the other part of the bill regulating the public depositories by law—a measure so frequently recommended by the President, and so imperiously demanded by the public voice.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Missouri objects to this bill that it does not except from this ratable deposite with the States the unexpended balances, as they are termed, of the appropriations made by Congress; that the bill recaptures them, to use his own emphatical language, and brings them back for the purpose of distribution, after they have been appropriated by Congress. Sir, a good argument is sometimes put down and a bad one built up by a sarcasm. This, I apprehend, must have been the object of the honorable Senator in thus speaking of the recapture of these unexpended balances.

Sir, what are the facts in regard to these balances? Congress makes appropriations to a large amount for the current year. A portion of the money, generally about one half, remains unexpended at the end of the year. Now, sir, when this money is wanted to meet such appropriations, the only inquiry is, whether the Secretary of the Treasury has the means for the purpose. No matter whether those means are in the Treasury, from past receipts, before the appropriations were made, or whether they have come there from receipts subsequent to their being made; the only inquiry should be, has the Secretary the means to meet them? This is the common practice. Appropriations are often made beyond the money in the Treasury at the time, and are expected to be met by the subsequent receipts. But the sarcastic remark of the honorable Senator from Missouri would seem to imply that specific money was set apart for specific appropriations; as if, the moment an appropriation was made, an ear-mark was placed upon the money in the Treasury sufficient to meet them; and then, that those identical pieces were called in whenever they were needed, as a Dutchess county farmer would select particular sheep from his whole flock by the ear-marks he had previously placed on them. Sir, this idea is altogether fanciful. There are no such specific sums set apart for specific appropriations. If this were so, what would be the result of the appropriations, if they should be made by the present Congress to the amount of some fifty-five millions of dollars, according to the statement exhibited by my honorable colleague? Why, sir, the unexpended balances alone of such appropriations, that would remain in the Treasury on the first of January next, would be thirty millions of dollars. Do gentlemen desire that any such amount, or any portion of it, should remain there, merely because it is an unexpended balance, and when the receipts of the current year will be more than sufficient to meet all the appropriations which will be made? It will be recollected that five millions of dollars are to be retained to meet any possible contingencies of the Treasury; and if, at any time, and from any unforeseen contingency, more should be wanted, the Secretary can at any moment cash the certificates of deposite in his hands, and thus avail himself of any amount he may require. There is no necessity, therefore, that these unexpended balances should be excepted out of the amount to be deposited; but there is every reason in the world why they should be included in it.

Again, sir, it is urged that this surplus, thus deposited with the States, will never be called for by the General Government, and that such calls would not be responded to by the States if they were made. Let us, for one moment, examine these objections. In the first place, the way in which the money would be called for would be through appropriations made by Congress; and in case there were not means in the Treasury to meet them, the Secretary would sell the certificates of deposite for the purpose of raising the means. The States would have nothing to do with the transaction. The Secretary would require no response from them. This objection might have had some plausibility if the bill had required that the certificates should be paid by the States, instead of being made transferable, and thereby enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to cash them in the market. But, even if such had been its provision, does any one believe that there is a solitary State in this Union which would violate its pledged faith to this or any other Government? No, sir, no one can seriously entertain such an opinion. I would vouch for all of them. Corruption has not so far fastened on the vitals of any of them, that they should so soon exhibit such evidences of premature decay. It is, however, said that Congress would omit to make appropriations, in order to prevent this money from being called for or required by the Secretary of the Treasury. What! Mr. President, Congress refuse to perform its duty to the country from the paltry consideration of keeping so much trash as might be grasped thus in the treasuries of the States! Who compose this body that would thus withhold the means for the common defence of the country? Let every member of either House put the question to himself, whether he would be governed by such motives. His answer will be, No, sir—no. For my own part I should despise myself, if such considerations could, for a single moment, influence me; and I believe that sentiment pervades the breast of every one who hears me. Where, then, is the danger of appropriations being withheld? I have heard it said that our constituents, the people, would direct or instruct us to vote against them, in order to prevent their portion of this surplus being withdrawn from their respective States. Sir, there is no such sordid and debasing spirit amongst the people of this country. They will go all necessary lengths to sustain the Government in any emergency, whether it be peace or whether it be war. It is their pride and their ambition to rally round the standard of their country, and to provide the requisite means for sustaining its institutions and its honor. So far from withholding its means from it, they would always be ready to contribute their own. Sir, I have studied the character of the American people to little purpose, if I could suppose them capable of being guilty of such meanness. No, sir, they are a noble, a generous, a chivalrous people. Whilst I trust they will always guard against unnecessary and extravagant expenditures, at the same time I feel assured that nothing will be withheld which is right and necessary for the proper administration of the Government. Is our own patriotism of so much higher order than theirs, that we are willing to say that we, their representatives, would not, of our own accord, withhold appropriations, but should be compelled to do it under their influence and instructions? Sir, I do not think so meanly of myself, nor of my constituents. I am unwilling to assume any such attitude in regard to them, and I trust they will not assume it in regard to me. I am unwilling, with a kind of Pharisaic, political righteousness, to say to my constituents I am holier than you. No, sir, rather than place myself in such a contrast with them, I would say, with the humble publican, God be merciful to me, a sinner.

This idea of withholding appropriations, either by representative or constituent, is ideal. It exists in the imagination. Equally fanciful is that notion which has been advanced, that our tariff of duties on foreign imports will be increased, for the purpose of creating a surplus for distribution. No gentleman will admit that he would be governed in his action here by such a motive. Nay, he would repel with indignation such a charge. I would repel it for my constituents as readily as I would repel it for myself. Sir, the difference between the proposition contained in the bill and an absolute system of distribution is as palpable as that between the night and the day. In the first case, we deposit with the States, for safe-keeping, an accidental and unavoidable surplus, to be used by the Government when required. In the other, we create a surplus for the purpose of being given to the States, and without any expectation or obligation on their part to return it. Sir, there is no danger of raising our duties on imports for such a purpose. The principle on which duties are levied, I believe, is well and universally understood at this day. Graduate your duties so as to raise no more revenue than is required for the economical wants of the Government, and, in thus graduating them, give incidental protection to such branches of industry as you think the interests of the country require to be protected. But, sir, if you want to ensure an increase of duties, let your expenditures be made extravagant, for the purpose of absorbing this immense surplus, and the duties must be increased to furnish means to carry out the extravagance thus commenced. I beg gentlemen to reflect on this subject. They seem to have looked only on one side of the question. Whilst they are attempting to avoid an imaginary evil, they are rushing into absolute danger. To them might well be applied the Roman maxim, Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdim.

Put it to the plain, practical, common sense of every man in this nation, and he will respond to you that he is governed by no such motives as those attributed to him. He will tell you that this surplus is in a situation to be productive of immense mischief, as it now is; he will tell you it ought to be deposited with the States, because it will there be safely kept and carefully used, for the benefit of the people, who contributed towards it; and that it will be forthcoming whenever the wants of the Government require it. If such would be the convictions of every honest man, how can you charge upon the great mass of the people of this country such base and sordid motives as a contrary position would imply? Sir, it cannot be; I feel that the spirit of the people is above it; I feel that I know the motives which govern my fellow-citizens in such matters. I have been brought up with them; I have always lived in the midst of them; and I am yet to learn that such are their principles of action. I am persuaded I speak the sentiments of the people of the State of New York on this subject. They cannot be seduced from their integrity by such means. They may be willing to keep the public money, as a safe depository of it, till it is needed for the public service; but they will not be humble suppliants here for your bounty; and they will not instruct their representatives to do that which they would not do themselves. There is no danger, therefore, in this measure. It is the only one which avoids all danger. If this be not adopted, there are but two other modes of disposing of the surplus left. The one is by extravagant appropriations, without reference to the real wants of the country, and which will require an increased tariff to carry them through. The other is, to leave them in the deposite banks, to become the prey of speculators, and the foot-ball of party. Sir, I cannot hesitate between them. And I am utterly at a loss to conceive how gentlemen, who are so naturally jealous of all banks, are willing to leave this immense power in their hands. When the United States Bank was deprived of its power by the removal of the deposites, it had, at that time, but about seven millions of the public money; whereas, by the lowest estimates, these deposite banks will have, on the first of January next, not less than thirty millions. Do not gentlemen perceive that they are putting into their hands a power far greater than they were willing to intrust to the Bank of the United States? Do they not also perceive that, by rejecting that portion of the bill which relates to the deposite banks, they are leaving this immense power in their hands without any regulation by law? Why is all this? Why, simply because they are apprehensive that, by depositing this surplus, ratably, among twenty-six States of this Union, it will tend to corrupt the people! They are willing to leave it in these banks, without legal restraints, subject to all the vicissitudes and dangers which the use and disposition of such an immense fund must always encounter; but they are unwilling to intrust it to the custody of the States, under the sanction of law, to be by them safely kept, and surely returned, whenever the wants of the Government require it. Sir, I think I speak the sentiments of the deposite banks when I say I do not believe they wish to keep it. They are not unaware of the tendency to speculation and overtrading which the use of such immense means has on the whole community; and when thus embarked, any sudden demand for and withdrawal of these means must produce consequences of the most destructive character. I can readily foresee that, even if this bill becomes a law, there will be more or less difficulty in the banks' contracting their loans, so as to be prepared to meet the drafts of the Treasury when this surplus shall be deposited with the States. The projectile force which has already been given to the community, by means of these funds, will continue to operate after the cause has ceased. But the period fixed in the bill for withdrawing them is so remote, that I apprehend no material difficulty in their being ready to carry out the arrangement.

Mr. President, the vote I am called upon to give on this bill I deem the most important I have ever given in my life. I have maturely considered it—it is the result of anxious reflection and deep conviction; and were I not supported by the very large majority of my political friends in this Senate, I might be led to distrust my own judgment; but with their support, my convictions are the stronger; and I can never persuade myself we are wrong. I think I see this matter as clear as the sun at noonday. My mind has a perfect conception of the evils to be encountered by the rejection of this bill, and of the benefits to be conferred by its adoption. There is no film upon the mental eye—my judgment tells me it is right—my conscience approves it. I have no inclination to indulge in prophetic vision; but I think I can discern in the long vista of the future the sad train of evils which must follow the adverse action of this day. I fancy I can see our currency deranged, our credit system overturned, and our country precipitated from that height of prosperity which she has so long enjoyed; but I will not appal you with an exhibition of those evils, which, like Banquo's ghosts, are lengthening out before us. The future historian, standing on the proud eminence which we now occupy, and looking into the dark abyss into which we may be plunged, will say, with Shakspeare's man on Dover Cliffs,

And dizzy 'tis, to cast one's eye so low!"

Sir, in giving my vote for this bill, if it is the last vote I ever give, I shall feel that I have faithfully and conscientiously discharged an important and responsible duty to myself and to the country.

When Mr. TALLMADGE had concluded—

Mr. WRIGHT made some remarks in explanation of several things that had fallen during the debate, and in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SHEPLEY said he had wished to state the reasons of his vote, but would take some other occasion, and hoped the question would be taken at once.

Mr. CLAY took the floor, and spoke at length in favor of the bill, and in general congratulation of the determination which seemed to pervade the Senate, without distinction of party, to check extravagant expenditures and provide for the safety of the public moneys.

Mr. NILES made a few remarks.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a hope that the harmony of the debate would not be disturbed. He thought there was no mischief in the measure, and it was a mere measure of precaution.

Mr. WEBSTER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Walker, Wright—6.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18.

TEXAS.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, and a number of memorials and petitions from various quarters, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas, made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, sundry memorials, and other proceedings of various meetings of the people, all recommending the recognition of the independence of Texas, has, according to order, had them under consideration, and now beg leave to submit to the Senate the following report and resolution:

The right of one independent Power to recognise the fact of the existence of a new Power, about to assume a position among the nations of the earth, is incontestable. It is founded upon another right—that which appertains to every sovereignty to take care of its own interests, by establishing and cultivating such commercial or other relations with the new Power as may be deemed expedient. Its exercise gives no just ground of umbrage or cause of war. The policy which has hitherto guided the Government of the United States in respect to new Powers has been to act on the fact of their existence, without regard to their origin, whether that has been by the subversion of a pre-existing Government, or by the violent or voluntary separation of one from another part of a common nation. In cases where an old established nation has thought proper to change the form of its Government, the United States, conforming to the rule which has ever governed their conduct, of strictly abstaining from all interference in the domestic concerns of other States, have not stopped to inquire whether the new Government has been rightfully adopted or not. It has been sufficient for them that it is in fact the Government of the country in practical operation. There is, however, a marked difference in the instances of an old nation which has altered the form of its Government, and a newly-organized Power, which has just sprung into existence. In the former case, (such, for example, as was that of France,) the nation had existed for ages as a separate and independent community. It is matter of history; and the recognition of its new Governments was not necessary to denote the existence of the nation; but, with respect to new Powers, the recognition of their Governments comprehends, first, an acknowledgment of their ability to exist as independent States, and, secondly, the capacity of their particular Governments to perform the duties and fulfil the obligations towards foreign Powers incident to their new condition. Hence, more caution and deliberation are necessary in considering and determining the question of the acknowledgment of a new Power than that of the new Government of an old Power.

The Government of the United States has taken no part in the contest which has unhappily existed between Texas and Mexico. It has avowed its intention, and taken measures to maintain a strict neutrality towards the belligerents. If individual citizens of the United States, impelled by sympathy for those who were believed to be struggling for liberty and independence against oppression and tyranny, have engaged in the contest, it has been without the authority of their Government. On the contrary, the laws which have been hitherto found necessary or expedient to prevent citizens of the United States from taking part in foreign wars have been directed to be enforced.

Sentiments of sympathy and devotion to civil liberty, which have always animated the people of the United States, have prompted the adoption of the resolutions and other manifestations of popular feeling which have been referred to the committee, recommending an acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. The committee shares fully in all these sentiments; but a wise and prudent Government should not act solely on the impulse of feeling, however natural and laudable it may be. It ought to avoid all precipitation, and not adopt so grave a measure as that of recognising the independence of a new Power, until it has satisfactory information, and has fully deliberated.

The committee has no information respecting the recent movements in Texas, except such as is derived from the public prints. According to that, the war broke out in Texas last autumn. Its professed object, like that of our revolutionary contest in the commencement, was not separation and independence, but a redress of grievances. In March last independence was proclaimed, and a constitution and form of Government were established. No means of ascertaining accurately the exact amount of the population of Texas are at the command of the committee. It has been estimated at some sixty or seventy thousand souls. Nor are the precise limits of the country which passes under the denomination of Texas known to the committee. They are probably not clearly defined, but they are supposed to be extensive, and sufficiently large, when peopled, to form a respectable Power.

If the population is small; if, when compared with that of the United Mexican States, amounting, probably, to not less than eight millions of souls, the contest has been unequal, it has, nevertheless, been maintained by Texas with uncommon resolution, undaunted valor, and eminent success. And the recent signal and splendid victory, in which that portion of the Mexican army which was commanded by General Santa Anna, the President of the Mexican Government, in person, was entirely overthrown, with unexampled slaughter, compared with the inconsiderable loss on the other side, put to flight and captured, including among the prisoners the President himself and his staff, may be considered as decisive of the independence of Texas. That memorable event will probably be followed by negotiations which may lead to the acknowledgment by Mexico of the independence of Texas and the settlement of its boundaries. And, under all circumstances, it might, perhaps, be more conformable with the amicable relations subsisting between the United States and the United Mexican States, that the latter should precede the former in the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. But if the war should be protracted, or if there should be unreasonable delay on the part of the Mexican Government, the Government of the United States ought not to await its action.

The recognition of Texas as an independent Power may be made by the United States in various ways: 1st, by treaty; 2d, by the passage of a law regulating commercial intercourse between the two Powers; 3d, by sending a diplomatic agent to Texas, with the usual credentials; or, lastly, by the Executive receiving and accrediting a diplomatic representative from Texas, which would be a recognition as far as the Executive only is competent to make it. In the first and third modes the concurrence of the Senate, in its executive character, would be necessary; and in the second, in its legislative character. The Senate alone, without the co-operation of some other branch of the Government, is not competent to recognise the existence of any Power.

The President of the United States, by the constitution, has the charge of their foreign intercourse. Regularly he ought to take the initiative in the acknowledgment of the independence of any new Power. But, in this case, he has not yet done it, for reasons which he, without doubt, deems sufficient. If, in any instance, the President should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of Congress, as was done in relation to the republics formed out of Spanish America. But the committee does not think that, on this occasion, any tardiness is justly imputable to the Executive. About three months only have elapsed since the establishment of an independent Government in Texas; and it is not unreasonable to wait a short time to see what its operation will be, and especially whether it will afford those guarantees which foreign Powers have a right to expect before they institute relations with it.

Taking this view of the whole matter, the committee conclude by recommending to the Senate the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power.

Mr. CLAY said that the committee, he was happy to inform the Senate, had been unanimous in their sanction of this report. He did not know that it was very important that the resolution should be acted on at this session. Yet, as there might be gentlemen who would desire to give their views on the subject, he would move that the report be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. PRESTON, in a tone which did not reach the reporter, expressed his acquiescence in the motion, and his wish that a resolution offered by him some days since, calling on the President for a communication on the subject of any correspondence between him and the Government or agents of Texas, on the subject of the condition, administration, &c., of Texas, be taken up. The Senate would then be able to decide whether any further action was necessary.

Mr. CLAY said he hoped the resolution would be taken up. It would be very desirable to have the information which it asked for, in order to determine if any stronger measure was necessary than that now reported.

The motion of Mr. CLAY was agreed to.

The Senate then took up for consideration several private bills; after which,

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent in secret session,

MONDAY, JUNE 20.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of RICHARD BAYARD, elected United States Senator, by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the honorable ARNOLD NAUDAIN.

Mr. BAYARD then appeared, and took the requisite oath and his seat.

BANKS IN FLORIDA.

incorporation of banks, did not require the interference of Congress, and into the number of banking institutions in Florida established within the last three years, reported that the committee had attended to this business, and had come to a decision that the state of the banking institutions does require the attention of Congress. He was, therefore, instructed to report a bill and joint resolution. It was certain that laws had been passed by the territorial Legislature which should be disapproved and annulled. There was no doubt that Congress had the power to disapprove or annul, although there might arise a question, in some cases, where the property to be acted on may have passed into the hands of a third person. Such had been the lax state of the legislation in Florida on this subject, that persons having capital had gone thither expecting that, by the passage of extraordinary laws with unusual privileges, they might use their capital with greater advantage. Mr. W. concluded with reporting—

An act to prohibit the passage of acts incorporating banks in Florida, without the sanction of Congress, and disapproving and annulling certain laws therein named;

A joint resolution disapproving of certain charters, &c.

The bill and joint resolution were read, and ordered to a second reading.

THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. GRUNDY moved the Senate to take up the bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department; and the motion being agreed to,

The question being on non-concurring with the committee in an amendment by which the 43d and 44th sections were inserted, it was agreed to.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved to strike out the 43d and 44th sections. [These are the sections which relate to the boxes in the post offices.]

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the motion by inserting in lieu of these sections the following substitute:

Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for each deputy postmaster in the United States to erect and maintain in his office boxes for the accommodation of such persons as may apply for them, on the following conditions, and no other, to wit:

First. In each village, town, city, or place, containing, by the census of 1830, less than ten thousand inhabitants, each deputy postmaster may rent such boxes at any sum not exceeding one dollar each a year.

Second. In each village, town, or city, containing more than ten thousand and less than twenty thousand inhabitants, by the said census, each deputy postmaster may rent such boxes for any sum not exceeding one dollar and fifty cents a year.

Third. In each village, town, or city, containing, by said census, more than twenty thousand inhabitants, such deputy postmaster may rent such boxes for any sum not exceeding two dollars a year.

Fourth. The expense of erecting such boxes shall be defrayed out of the revenue arising therefrom.

Fifth. The several deputy postmasters shall keep a true account of all the proceeds arising from the rent of such boxes, and make return thereof with the other accounts of his office.

Sixth. The several deputy postmasters, except in the cities of New York and New Orleans, may, in addition to the other allowances made to them by law for their services, detain for their own use the revenue arising from said boxes, provided such revenue, when added to the other emoluments, shall not exceed the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars in a year, in which case the balance shall be paid as other revenues to the General Post Office.

Seventh. The deputy postmasters may detain in their respective hands from the revenue of said boxes until that, with their other emoluments, amounts respectively to four thousand dollars.

Mr. GRUNDY (his motion to strike out having precedence) explained his wishes to be to make a distinction in value between the boxes in villages and in large towns and cities. He wanted information to enable him to perfect a graduation of value, and he thought it would be best to wait for inquiry to be made by the Postmaster General, and the result to be communicated, before any permanent system be adopted. He was glad that a bill had been agreed on, and he hoped it would be passed.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, expressed also his gratification that the bill had advanced so far, and he hoped it would be passed. But he thought that something more ought to be given concerning the postmasters than would be contained in the bill if these sections were stricken out. In that case the postmasters would be entitled to possess the perquisites which they have possessed hitherto. The amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] proposed, gives to the postmasters at New Orleans and New York $4,000 each, and to all others $3,500, as the maximum of salary and perquisites; and he thought this a good plan, and would vote for it, and against the motion to strike out.

Mr. PRESTON made some observations in favor of connecting the individual interest with the box system. If the postmaster were required to keep these boxes ex officio for the public convenience, he would become indifferent, and less disposed to accommodation. As the postmaster came more in contact with the public than any other officer, it was desirable that a good understanding should exist between them. He dwelt on the necessity of having a responsible officer, who possessed the good will of the citizens, to conduct the post office in every place; and went into a calculation of the area required for a specified number of boxes, to show how the concession of this convenience to the public increased the amount of the rent and the labors of the office.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the subject was not well understood. There had been no complaint on the subject of these boxes. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would be that in every village the postmaster may exact a tax of any amount not exceeding one dollar. In Philadelphia every one approved the present system; whoever wishes a box pays four dollars. The postmaster there has never rented more than 450 of them, and never received more in any one year than $1,350, making his total revenue from the office $3,500. The only objection advanced against the system is, that the postmasters at New York and New Orleans receive too much. This evil, if it exists, might be remedied without changing the system. The new scheme would derange, also, the condition of the Philadelphia post office. The postmaster could no longer be the insurer of the Department for the merchants. He was willing to say that no postmaster shall receive more than $4,000, as he thought the postmaster at New York received too much.

Mr. PORTER stated that the postmaster at New Orleans did not receive too much. He reminded the Senate that postmasters were responsible for the letters in their custody; and concluded with stating that he preferred the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, on account of its simple character, to that moved by the Senator from Massachusetts.

After a few words from Mr. GRUNDY,

Mr. DAVIS explained his proposition. He stated that in all cases where the population does not exceed 10,000, it is proposed to leave the boxes in the situation in which they had been placed by the House. If the population is from 10,000 to 20,000, the postmaster is authorized to charge $1 50. If the population exceeds 20,000, the price is to be fixed at $2. As regards New York and New Orleans, the proceeds of the office to the postmaster are not to exceed $4,000. He saw no danger of any diminution of convenience to the public from his proposed arrangement. He stated that there had been complaints of the present system, and that in New York, gentlemen residing out of the city were obliged to buy boxes, or were unable to obtain their letters as soon as those who possessed boxes. He said that a change was also required by the inordinate salaries given to some of the postmasters, which was far more than was paid to State officers of the first rank.

Other remarks were made by Mr. DAVIS, and the debate was continued by Mr. BUCHANAN. The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. GRUNDY to strike out, and was carried in the affirmative: Ayes 25.

Mr. DAVIS then moved to insert his substitute, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to amend, and was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Knight, Mangum, Moore, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—28.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved the following amendment:

"Be it enacted, That each postmaster and deputy postmaster shall make quarterly returns of the amount received by him for the rent of boxes; and if the same shall exceed the sum of two thousand dollars per annum, he shall account for and pay over the excess."

Mr. GRUNDY opposed the amendment. He thought the postage on letters at present too high, and wished the subject to stand over until the whole subject should be considered at the next session. He wished the amendment could be withdrawn.

Mr. BUCHANAN declined to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CLAY said this matter of perquisites was inconsistent with the genius of our Government. He knew these perquisites existed, but he had never dreamt that the Senate would have been seriously engaged in regulating these perquisites. They might as well undertake to regulate the perquisites of custom-house officers. If a postmaster receives 1,000 dollars salary, and by means of his exactions can make another 1,000, the law is now to be changed so as to give him authority to do so. He was glad to find that the attention of the popular branch had been called to the subject, and that they had arrested this official abuse in the beginning.

Mr. GRUNDY said that the boxes had been established at Boston about forty years ago. He wished the subject to remain over until the next session.

Mr. DAVIS said this was a beginning of legal enactments on the subject, and he should, therefore, vote against the amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. GRUNDY, and decided in the negative: Yeas 15, nays 29.

Mr. PORTER moved to amend the bill by introducing a provision that the Postmaster General shall keep all offers for contracts, &c., in a well-bound volume, &c., and reported to Congress and published.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended; the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The message of the President of the United States, returning the bill to fix the day for the annual meeting of Congress, &c., being the special order, was, on motion of Mr. CLAYTON, postponed till to-morrow, and made the special order for that day.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate took up the bill to increase the military peace establishment of the United States.

[The bill proposes to increase the rank and file of the army to 10,524; and also proposes a considerable increase to the general staff, an addition of three paymasters, and a small increase of the medical staff.]

Mr. BENTON explained and advocated the bill.

Mr. CLAY said he had supposed that as no augmentation of the army could be of any service for the present Indian wars, which must terminate long before the recruiting could be completed, and as they had passed a law already to raise ten thousand volunteers, and an additional regiment of dragoons, that this bill would not be pressed. Considering the militia as the proper constitutional force for repelling all insurrections and invasions, and considering that the additional regiment of dragoons was a sufficient increase of the military peace establishment, he would, to try the sense of the Senate, move to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. LINN spoke against the motion at some length. He showed the urgent necessity there was for increasing the military force for the protection of our Indian frontiers, and quoted the opinions of the Secretary of War, and of General Jesup, in support of his argument.

The present frontier population of Missouri were very different from those hardy and warlike adventurers who conquered the valley of the Mississippi. They were generally persons in easy circumstances, who had emigrated from the East for the purpose of acquiring land for their growing families, and were more fitted for the pursuits of peace and industry than the hardships and dangers of Indian warfare. It was all-important to such to be able to pursue their usual avocations without the constant dread of savage aggressions. There was no doubt but they could conquer the Indians, but it would be after many fair fields had been made desolate, and many a widow would be weeping over her fatherless children. It would be a humane policy towards the Indians themselves, as well as justice to the frontier States, to have such a force as would prevent the possibility of an Indian outbreak. Mr. L. spoke of the warlike character of the Indians, the feelings of hatred and revenge they must necessarily indulge against the whites; and the facilities they have for forming combinations, in consequence of so many of them having been thrown into situations inviting intercourse on the borders of the frontier States—all of which powerfully argued the necessity of having a sufficient force to overawe them.

Mr. BENTON also opposed the motion. The increase of the army was not asked for, he said, in consequence of the present Indian wars going on in the South. It was a permanent increase of the army, called for by the situation of the frontier States, on whose borders the Government had placed, without their consent, such vast numbers of well-armed and well-supplied Indians. The increase now asked for would not make the army as full as it was in 1815, when there was far less occasion for a military force than now. Mr. B. asked for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

A discussion here followed, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, PORTER, WRIGHT, BENTON, and PRESTON, took part, relative to the additional expense that would be incurred by the proposed increase of the rank and file of the army.

Mr. CRITTENDEN supported the motion to strike out the first section. He considered the increase of the army unnecessary to protect the frontiers against a broken, divided, and down-trodden race, so far subdued in spirit as to be removed from the homes of their childhood and the graves of their ancestors, without raising a hand. He denied that there was any probability of a combination of different tribes, they being more likely to quarrel with one another than with the whites. He thought too that an infantry force would not be available in Indian warfare, and that the two dragoon regiments now in the service were an ample protection. As to sudden outbreaks, he did not think, such was the Indian character, that all the force that could be raised would prevent them. He had all his life been well acquainted in Louisiana and Arkansas, and he had never heard of a white man being slain by an Indian there; and, with the exception of the Black Hawk war, there had been no bloodshed in Illinois and Indiana.

Mr. LINN replied to Mr. CRITTENDEN; and, after a further debate between Messrs. CALHOUN, PORTER, and CRITTENDEN, the question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and it was rejected: Yeas 6, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Prentiss, Southard—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Mangum, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to strike out the 7th and 8th sections of the bill, providing for an increase of the medical staff, and for the appointment of three additional paymasters, on the ground that bills for this purpose had already passed the Senate, and been sent to the other House.

Mr. BENTON said he would insert a proviso that these sections should not take effect, provided the bills referred to become a law.

Mr. CALHOUN then withdrew his motion.

Mr. PRESTON, after some remarks on the provisions of the bill increasing the general staff, moved to strike them out. He preferred waiting till the next session of Congress, before increasing these branches of the service, when a plan would be submitted by the Secretary of War, containing all the information for them to act with a full understanding of the subject.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out the sections giving the franking privilege to the bureaus of the War Department, and authorizing the President to equip one regiment of infantry as a regiment of riflemen, and to direct certain officers to perform the duties of superior officers who may be absent. Mr. N. believed that the President possessed these powers already.

This motion was also agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 26, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—8.

PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to postpone the orders to take up the bill to provide for the erection of a building for a Patent Office; which was agreed to.

Some debate took place on this bill, which proposes to expend $180,000 in the building of a Patent Office; but, before any question was taken,

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.

MICHIGAN.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported on the amendment made by the House of Representatives to the bill to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States in Michigan. The committee reported a disagreement with that amendment which fixes $1,500 as the compensation for the district judge of Michigan, and a recommendation that the salary be fixed at $1,800.

The motion to amend made by Mr. CLAYTON, in conformity with the instructions of the committee, was opposed by Mr. EWING; but, before any question was taken, in order to give time for further consideration,

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the bill and amendment were, for the present, laid on the table.

HUMPHREY MARSHALL.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to take up the report of the Committee on Pensions, adverse to the petition of Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky.

Mr. CRITTENDEN offered the following amendment: to strike out, after the word "Resolved," the words "that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted," and insert "that the petitioner is not entitled to pensions or allowances under both the acts of Congress of 7th June, 1832, and 5th July, 1832, but that there was no power in the accounting officers of the Treasury to detain the sums becoming due on pensions accruing to reimburse sums erroneously paid on the other."

A discussion ensued on this amendment, in which Messrs. CRITTENDEN, TOMLINSON, WHITE, and LINN, took part; when

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he must ask for a division of the question, as he could not vote for the first branch of the resolution, believing that the petitioner was entitled to both pensions.

A division was accordingly ordered; and the question being on the first branch of the amendment, it was carried by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Crittenden, Nicholas, Porter, Rives—6.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the amendment, and it was rejected: Yeas 15, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Robbins, Webster, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Wright—23.

The report of the committee was then concurred in.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

A bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States was read a third time, and passed:

[This bill, as it has been amended, provides that there shall be added to each company of artillery of the army one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, two corporals, and twenty-seven privates; and to each company of infantry one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one sergeant, two corporals, and thirty privates; and to each company of dragoons one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, and one saddler. The present regimental sergeants-major and quartermaster-sergeants, and first sergeant, to be discontinued, and in lieu thereof there shall be appointed, for each regiment, two sub-adjutants, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of cadets. The bill further authorizes the President to assign to any officer of the army, when necessary, the duties of paymaster; and provides that five additional surgeons and ten additional assistant surgeons to the army be appointed. The bill also authorizes the President, when deemed expedient, to cause one of the regiments of infantry to be armed and equipped and to serve as a regiment of riflemen, and another regiment to be equipped and to serve as a regiment of light infantry.]

NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

The bill for organizing the navy of the United States was taken up and read the second time as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LINN inquired what would be the additional expenditure by the proposed increase of officers and with the additional grades.

Mr. SOUTHARD replied that it would be difficult to answer the question put by the honorable Senator from Missouri. Some grades hitherto unknown to the service were added, and, consequently, the compensations had not been provided for, it being the opinion of the naval committee that the bill for the organization of the navy should be kept separate from the pay of its officers. The increased expense, however, would not be great; but if this bill passed, it would then be necessary to pass a bill fixing the pay of the increased grades.

The object of the bill was for the first time to give an organization to the navy, as there was no law fixing the number of its officers, their rank, or for prescribing the mode of passing from one rank to another, although the navy had been forty years in existence. There was also no other authority by which officers came into the navy but the appointments of the President and the confirmation of the Senate. The President might to-day appoint one hundred captains, and the Senate might confirm them, and there would be no law violated. The first feature in the bill was to fix the time and description of persons to come into the navy, which was now a matter of executive discretion. A lad, if he comes into the navy as a midshipman, if he behaves himself, becomes, in the process of time, a captain, though there is no law by which he is appointed. Children at the breast had been known to be appointed as midshipmen, as also men of 24 or 25 years of age.

The committee thought it better to regulate by law the age at which boys should enter the navy, and had fixed it at between the ages of fourteen and eighteen; though it was proper to observe that this was the rule at present existing in the navy on that subject. It was also provided that the midshipmen shall be taken from all the States of the Union, as nearly as possible in equal proportions, so that every State shall feel an equal interest in the navy. Two or three additional grades were put into the bill, through which the midshipman is to pass, in order that he may be well acquainted with every branch of the service by the time he comes to command a vessel.

Mr. S. then explained the principles on which the officers of the navy are to be promoted. With regard to the non-combatant officers, it was difficult to fix their rank by law, and that matter was therefore very appropriately left, for the present, to the Executive.

It would be proper for him to say something with regard to the grade of admiral, created by this bill, which had not heretofore existed in the service. The bill proposed to create the additional grades of admirals, vice admirals, and rear admirals, with this limitation, that there shall not be appointed more than a certain number of them. He knew that there were difficulties existing about this grade. There were feelings which were always brought into operation when admirals were mentioned. They were assimilated to an order of nobility, because the same rank was held by many noblemen in the British naval service. But such ought not to be the feelings in this country; for the grade of admiral was connected with our revolutionary history. The first resolutions of the revolutionary Congress on the subject of a navy was, to create admirals. But what was there in this rank to excite so much jealousy? It was nothing more than the rank of brigadier general; and what difference was there between a brigadier general at sea, and a brigadier general on land. There was no more a title of nobility in one than in the other. It was merely the creation of additional officers, because the creation of additional services demanded it.

It was in vain to talk of managing fleets and squadrons, commanded by a captain of the same grade with those commanding the other vessels in it. Every principle of discipline forbids it. There was a necessary intercourse between our ships and those of foreign nations. We had now a navy, which was respectable, and we must give to that right arm of the defence of the country whatever was necessary for its discipline and efficiency. This they must and ought to do. When our vessels are abroad, their commanders meet with officers commanding the vessels of foreign Powers of a higher rank than themselves, and they feel of course mortified at the difference. Why should this be so? Should our vessels serve in a combined squadron with those of foreign Powers, our flag must be degraded. Why should it be so? If there was ever a time when the grade of admiral should be created in the service, that time had now arrived. There were men in the navy who had been at sea for twenty years. [Mr. S. here paid a handsome compliment to the skill and gallantry of the officers of the navy, contending that this additional rank was due to them, as well as to the best interests of the service.] Under all circumstances, to do justice to our officers, and to make the navy, whose interests all had so deeply at heart, efficient as well as respectable, he hoped that the whole bill would pass.

Mr. BUCHANAN had not supposed that, within a week or ten days of the end of the session, this bill would be taken up with the purpose of seriously acting on it. It was a matter of deep importance, and required mature consideration, and as the Senate was thin, he thought that it had better be postponed. He did not mean to be understood as saying any thing in disparagement of the officers of the navy. Their country owed them a deep debt of gratitude, and their skill and gallantry would do honor to any service. But, for considerations of this kind, ought they to be hurried into a measure of such great importance at this late period of the session, when there was no time allowed for sufficient discussion or investigation? In order to have some idea of the importance of this bill, he would compare the number of officers it provided for with the number now in the navy. We have now, said he, thirty-nine captains, and, instead of them, this bill proposed fifty-five captains, nine commodores, and seven admirals. We have now forty masters commandant, and this bill proposes to increase the number to seventy-five. So that this bill will make the number of admirals, commodores, captains, and commanders, one hundred and forty-six. We have now two hundred and fifty-eight lieutenants, and under this bill there will be three hundred and fifty-eight first and second lieutenants, adding one hundred. The passed midshipmen were much more numerous at present than was proposed by the bill. He would say nothing more as to this part of the bill. It was sufficient to show its importance, and the impossibility of treating it properly at this late period.

At the last night of the last session they passed a bill increasing the pay of the officers of the navy; and he never gave a vote with more reluctance than he did when he voted against that bill. Subsequent reflection, however, had confirmed his convictions of the propriety of the vote he gave on that occasion. He expressed his opinion then, and he thought now, that the pay of the highest officers, considering the expenses they were subjected to on foreign stations, was fixed too low, while that of the intermediate grades was too high. The pay of the midshipmen, if they had any inclination for dissipation, was enough to ruin them. He stated his objections then, but was overruled by the arguments of the Senator from New Jersey, who contended, as now, that it was to secure the discipline and efficiency of the navy.

For one he was not disposed to give his vote on so important a measure as this, at this late period of the session. It was obvious that it could not pass both Houses without occasioning much debate; and the session was too far advanced now to engage in it. In order to try the sense of the Senate, he would move to lay the bill on the table; and if this motion should not prevail, he would then offer some amendments.

After a few additional observations from Messrs. SOUTHARD and BUCHANAN, the question was taken, and the bill was laid on the table, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Mangum, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tipton, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Nicholas, Preston Robbins, Southard, Swift, Webster—15.

After taking up, considering, and ordering several bills to a third reading, the Senate went into the consideration of executive business; after which,

Adjourned.

PAPER CURRENCY.

A resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire of the deposite banks, and other banks of good credit, whether, in the event of their continuing or becoming the depositories of the public money, they are willing to relinquish the circulation of notes less than ten dollars, and to promote the gold currency, was considered in its order.

The resolution was opposed by Messrs. EWING of Ohio, WEBSTER, and WALKER, and supported by Messrs. BENTON, NILES, and MANGUM; and,

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, the resolution was, for the present, laid on the table.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that the House had passed the bill from the Senate "to regulate the depositories of the public money," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out the thirteenth section, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with such of the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall by law authorize their treasurers, or the competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurer, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of depositories therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid, which certificate shall express the usual and legal obligations, and shall pledge the faith of the State for the safe-keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid: Provided, That, if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same shall be deposited with the other States agreeing to accept the same on deposite, in the proportion aforesaid: And provided, further, That, when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by the said Secretary, to meet the appropriations made by law, the same shall be called for in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars, from any one State, in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of $20,000 which may at any time be required.

The amendment being read,

Mr. CALHOUN moved to lay it on the table for examination; which motion, after a few words from Mr. WEBSTER, was agreed to.

[The amendments of the House to the bill granting lands to the State of Alabama, for the purposes specified therein, was taken up, and concurred in.]

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment to the deposite bill.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his acquiescence, but said he should have preferred the bill as it went from the Senate, as it was then in a form which disconnected it most completely from the State Governments. For other reasons, also, he would have preferred the bill as it went from the Senate.

Mr. MORRIS objected to the motion to concur, as he thought the amendment by which the States were bound to repay the deposite on the demand of the General Government very exceptionable, and likely to lead to serious abuses. He would rather give the money exclusively to the States than vote for this amendment. He hoped the amendment would be printed. He was opposed to all compromises, where right and principle were involved.

Mr. BUCHANAN said we had arrived at that point when we must accept the amendment, or leave the money in the deposite banks for another year. Whatever he thought of the amendment, he was not prepared to meet this responsibility. The House objected to the Senate bill, that it placed the money in the State treasuries, not as a public deposite, because the Federal Government did not reserve the power to reclaim the money at any time; and that this was not a constitutional mode of depositing. The bill was amended to obviate the objection, and he hoped the amendment would be concurred in.

SENATE.]

Adjournment, Veto—Florida Banks.

Mr. CALHOUN said the principle of the bill had not been changed, and he hoped the Senate would come to a vote. No Secretary of the Treasury will ever call for this money.

Mr. CLAY deemed the bill as amended better than it was before, because it now contained a restriction on the Treasury in calling in the money, so that it would not be in the power of the Treasury to distress the banks. He also understood that the amendment would quiet constitutional scruples somewhere, and he was himself disposed to respect and quiet scruples of that kind any how and any where.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed his preference for the bill in its amended form to the original bill.

Mr. WHITE suggested that, as the operation of a law of the States was rendered necessary by the amendment, and as the Legislature of Tennessee met but once in two years, this State might have the benefit. He wished that no State should be deprived of the benefit until her Legislature should have been in session. He would have preferred the bill as it went from the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER thought that the original bill was liable to the same objection, and that the amendment did not make the difficulty greater.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, would have preferred the bill as it went from the Senate, because he thought the certificate system the best mode of reclaiming the deposits. Still he would vote for the amendment, although it put it in the power of the States to evade the payment, should any of them be disposed to evade, which he did not expect would be the case.

Mr. WHITE remarked that the difficulty he had suggested might be avoided by the introduction of an amendment to the amendment of the House.

Mr. CALHOUN said that few, if any, of the Legislatures would be in session before the 1st of January, when the bill will take effect.

Mr. MORRIS said his great objection to the amendment was, that it created the relations of debtor and creditor between the Federal and the State Governments. The money is placed in the banks by agreement, but there could be no bargaining with the States.

Mr. BENTON said he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, did not approve of the amendment; but, thinking it necessary to provide for placing the revenue in greater security than that in which it now stands, he would surrender his objections.

Mr. WHITE said, on examination, he found that his objections had abated, and he should not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was then concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT VETO.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the message of the President of the United States, returning the bill to fix the day for the annual meeting of Congress, with his objections thereto.

The question being on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President thereto to the contrary notwithstanding, a debate ensued, in which Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. LEIGH, Mr. CALHOUN, against, and Mr. RIVES and Mr. SHEPLEY in favor of the opinion of the President, participated.

The bill was then laid on the table, at the suggestion of Mr. MORRIS, until to-morrow.

FLORIDA BANKS.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill reported by the Committee on Finance, to disapprove and annul certain acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida, and for other purposes.

This bill was accompanied by the following report:

The Committee on Finance, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate, passed on the 21st of May, 1836, "to inquire into the character, condition, and amount of capital, of the several banking institutions which have been chartered within the last three years by the Territorial Government of Florida, and to make report to the Senate whether, in their opinion, any legislation on the part of Congress is necessary, in order to disaffirm the establishment of said charters, have had that subject under consideration, and report:

That, in order to obtain full information upon the matters referred to it, the committee directed its chairman to move a resolution in Senate requesting the Secretary of State to transmit to the Senate, so soon as they might be obtained, copies of all acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida incorporating banks or other institutions with banking powers.

Sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the Secretary to obtain authenticated copies of these laws; but, inasmuch as the committee has thought it important that the attention of Congress should be drawn to the propriety of adopting some law in regard to the subject, at the present session, it has obtained, from other quarters, such information as it supposed might be relied on, and it is prepared to submit a bill to the consideration of the Senate.

By the act of the 30th of March, 1832, "for the establishment of a Territorial Government in Florida," it is prescribed that the legislative power shall be vested in the Governor, and in thirteen of the most fit and discreet persons of the Territory, to be called the Legislative Council.

The legislative powers of this Council are to extend to "all the rightful subjects of legislation," with certain exceptions enumerated in the law. It is made the duty of the Governor, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, to report to the President of the United States all the laws made by the Legislative Council, to the end that they may be laid before Congress, and any of those laws which may be disapproved by Congress shall thenceforth be of no force. There appears nothing in the act of Congress restricting the Legislative Council from granting charters to banks, and other institutions with banking powers. On the other hand, there is no limitation, in point of time, upon the authority of Congress to disapprove and annul the acts of the Legislative Council.

The power of creating such corporations is capable of abuse, and the acts passed in the Territory are so likely, ordinarily, to escape the attention of Congress, unless, for some particular reason, that attention be invited to them, that the committee are of opinion that no act of a Territorial Legislature incorporating a bank, or other institution with banking privileges, ought to be allowed to have any effect at all until approved by Congress; and in the bill which is reported, a provision is inserted intended to alter the power of all the Territorial Legislatures, in this respect, as to all future cases.

It would appear that charters were granted several years ago, by the Territorial Legislature of Florida, incorporating the Bank of Florida, at Tallahassee; the Bank of Marianna; and the Bank of Magnolia. But it is represented to the committee that these banks have all surrendered their charters, and closed their concerns. There appear to be two banks at Tallahassee: one called the Central Bank of Florida, the charter of which the committee have not been able to obtain, and all the information they have respecting it is contained in a statement of its condition, published in April last, which is herewith communicated. The other is called the Union Bank of Florida, and was created by act of the 13th of February, 1833. It has a capital of one million of dollars, with a power of increasing it to three millions, which capital is to be raised by means of a loan, on the faith of the Territory, by the directors of the bank. It has also an unlimited power of establishing branches in the Territory of Florida.

So far as the committee learn, the capital of this bank is at present one million only, which was obtained on bonds, purporting to be guaranteed by the Territory, and is said to be all loaned to planters in the Territory.

As this act was passed in February, 1833, it must be presumed to have been known to Congress at the commencement of its session, in December of that year. Two sessions, therefore, have elapsed since the period when Congress, in the ordinary course of things, would become acquainted with its provisions. And although these provisions are, in the judgment of the committee, highly objectionable, and such as no charter ought to have embraced, yet, inasmuch as Congress has forborne, for so long a period, to exercise its undoubted right of disapproving the charter, it may be doubtful whether such exercise of its authority would be now expedient. On the 19th of January, 1831, a bill passed the Legislative Council to incorporate a bank by the name and style of the Bank of Pensacola. This bill was rejected by the Governor, but was afterwards passed by the requisite majority of the members of the Legislative Council, and so became a law. Several acts, supplementary to and amendatory of the forementioned law, were subsequently passed, and are herewith communicated.

This bank was originally a bank with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars; and the committee perceive nothing unusual or extraordinary in the powers which are granted to it. This capital does not appear to have been immediately subscribed or paid in, nor are the committee informed when the bank began its operations.

On the 13th of February, 1835, an act passed the Territorial Legislature, entitled "An act to increase the capital of the Bank of Pensacola, and to amend the laws incorporating said bank, and for other purposes."

By this act the bank is authorized to increase its capital to two millions five hundred thousand dollars, with a power to establish branches at pleasure in West Florida, and one branch in Marianna. It is also authorized to buy shares, to any amount the directors see fit, in the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company; and, in order to enable the bank to make this purchase, the bank is authorized to issue bonds to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars, which bonds shall be guaranteed by the Territory, and the form of guarantee is prescribed; and as the bank may have occasion for further funds, in order to pay instalments on its railroad stock, it is to issue other bonds, to be guaranteed in like manner by the Territory. This act, it would appear, was laid before Congress on the 3d day of March last, being the last day of the session. A copy is herewith communicated.

On the 14th of February, 1835, an act passed the Legislative Council, and was approved by the Governor, entitled "An act to incorporate the Southern Life Insurance and Trust Company." This company is to be located at St. Augustine. Some of its powers are thus described:

"SEC. 2. The said company shall have power, 1st, to make insurance on lives; 2d, to grant and purchase annuities; 3d, to make any other contingent contracts involving the interest of money and the duration of life; 4th, to receive moneys in trust, and to accumulate the same, at such rates of interest as may be obtained or agreed on, not exceeding at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, or to allow such interest thereon as may be agreed on; 5th, to accept and execute all such trusts, of every description, as may be committed to them by any person or persons whatsoever, or may be transferred to them by order of any of the courts of this Territory, or by any court as a court of chancery; 6th, to receive and hold lands under grants, with such general or special trusts or covenants, so far as the same may be taken in payment of their debts, or in security of their capital or loans, or debts due them, or purchased upon sales under any law of this Territory, as may be necessary to protect the rights of the said company, and the same again to sell, convey, and dispose of; 7th, to buy, discount, and sell drafts, promissory notes, and bills of exchange; 8th, to establish and locate branches for carrying on their business."

The capital stock is two millions, and may be increased to four millions of dollars; and the whole capital is to be loaned on bonds or notes, secured on real and personal estate in the Territory of Florida. The powers of the company are to be exercised by a board of trustees, to consist of ten persons, and so classed as that the term of service of two of them shall expire at the end of each successive period of two years, being, in effect, an election of ten years, but with a power in the court of appeals, in the Territory, to remove a trustee for misbehaviour.

The company has power to issue bills or notes, other than drafts or bills of exchange, to the amount of capital actually paid in; and "to enable the said company to make loans and discounts beyond the amount of their capital, to be paid in by the stockholders as aforesaid, they may issue certificates of one thousand dollars each, bearing not more than six per cent. interest, redeemable within the range and limit of the charter, at such times as the Governor and the company may agree on, and present the same to the Governor or acting Governor of this Territory, whose duty it shall be to endorse thereon, 'Guaranteed by the Territory of Florida,' and sign his name and title of office thereto, and return the same to the said company; and the faith of the said Territory is hereby pledged as security for said company, for the faithful payment of such certificates, according to the tenor and effect of the same. But no greater amount of certificates shall be, at any time, endorsed, than may be equal to the debts placed under mortgage to the company at the time of making application, to be secured after the mode and in conformity to the manner pointed out and directed in the sixth section of the act."

The last two sections of the act are as follows:

"SEC. 25. This law shall remain unalterable, without the consent of the trustees of the said company, until the expiration of fifty years from its passage; nor shall it, at any time hereafter, be so altered as to prevent the execution by the company of any subsisting contract."

SEC. 26. This shall be taken and received in all courts, and by all judges, magistrates, and all other public officers, as a public act, and shall receive, on all occasions, a favorable construction; and all printed copies of the same, which shall be printed by, or under the authority of, the Legislative Council, shall be admitted as good evidence thereof, without any other proof whatever."

As this act was passed on the 14th of February last, it could not have reached Washington in season for its consideration by Congress at any time during the last session.

The committee hardly deem it necessary to remark, at any great length, on the extraordinary nature and provisions of the act for increasing the capital of the Bank of Pensacola, and this act incorporating the Southern Insurance Company. The acts themselves are now brought to the attention of the Senate, and their nature and provisions are clearly seen. But the committee are of opinion that both these territorial laws were highly imprudent, that they ought not to have been passed; and they submit to the Senate whether they ought now to be suffered to be carried into effect, without proper amendments, as shall reduce the amount of their capital, especially that part which is contingent, abridge and reform the grants of extraordinary powers, and take away the guarantee of the Territory from their bonds and contracts; or, at least, from all bonds and contracts which have not been issued and sold, and passed into the hands of bonafide holders, before the day of the date of this report.

Northeastern Boundary--Joseph Grant.

But it is not for Congress to make these amendments, though it should deem them necessary. The power of Congress is a simple power of disapproving the whole acts: and if nothing had been done under them, the committee would not hesitate to recommend such disapproval. Nor do they mean to say that such disapproval would be unjust; because Congress has had no earlier opportunity to examine these laws, and to act upon the question of annulling them; and it is hardly to be presumed that prudent men have ventured far, under such a charter, granted by a Territorial Legislature, whose acts were well known to be subject to the revision of Congress.

But it is competent for the Territorial Legislature, with the consent of the corporations, to amend the charters in any manner deemed proper; and the resolution which the committee report to the Senate, in relation to these two acts, will show that, in the judgment of the committee, it is expedient to give the corporators an option and an opportunity to obtain proper amendments to their charters, if they see fit.

In the session of 1836, the Territorial Legislature appear to have passed the following acts:

An act to incorporate the Bank of St. Joseph's, capital one million of dollars, and may be extended to two.

An act to incorporate a Florida Insurance and Banking Company, capital one million of dollars, and may be increased to two.

An act to incorporate the St. Joseph's Insurance Company, with a capital of one million of dollars, and may be increased to two millions.

The committee entertain no doubt that these three last-mentioned acts ought to be altogether disapproved and annulled.

Mr. WEBSTER gave a sketch of the history of the Florida legislation in reference to the incorporation of banks, and of the character of the charters which had been granted; after which,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then took up the joint resolution, reported by the same committee, respecting certain acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida; which was considered, and also ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[This resolution provides "that the act of the Territorial Legislature of Florida, passed on the 14th of February, 1835, and entitled 'An act to increase the capital of the Bank of Pensacola, and to amend the laws incorporating said bank, and for other purposes,' and the act of the same Legislature, passed on the 14th of February, 1835, and entitled 'An act to incorporate the Southern Life Insurance and Trust Company,' ought not to be suffered to remain in force with the provisions which they at present contain; nor unless they be amended by a proper reduction of the amount of capital; by a proper abridgment and reformation of the powers granted; and by taking away the guarantee of the Territory from their bonds and contracts, or at least from all such bonds and contracts as have not been actually issued and sold, and passed into the hands of bonafide holders, before the 20th day of June, 1836."

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After taking up and acting upon several private bills, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. CLAY stated that the Committee on Foreign Relations had examined the correspondence which had passed between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, for the settlement of our northeastern boundary. It had been referred, it would be recollected by the Senate, for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether it might be published without prejudice to the public interests. The committee, thinking that the opinion and wishes of the Senators from the two States of Maine and Massachusetts, more immediately interested, ought to have controlling influence on the question of publication, had afforded them an opportunity of examining the correspondence, and they all concurred in believing it might be safely published.

The negotiation has not entirely closed, although the committee regret to find that it does not promise to result in any satisfactory adjustment of the boundary question. Various endeavors, during the progress of the correspondence, to accomplish that desirable end, have failed of success. Under all the circumstances, the committee believe that much more mischief might be done from misconception and misrepresentation of what has been attempted, by withholding the correspondence from the public, than by a publication of it. The committee, therefore, concur in opinion with the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts, that it is expedient to publish it.

Mr. C. accordingly moved that it be published; which was ordered; and, upon the motion of Mr. SHEPLEY, three thousand copies were ordered.

JOSEPH GRANT.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the bill to extend the patent right of Joseph Grant, for making hat bodies, was taken up.

Mr. KNIGHT rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, this is an application of Mr. Grant for the renewal of a patent for his invention of a machine for making hat bodies. The history of the case, as I understand it, is this: Mr. Grant, some eighteen or twenty years ago, was a journeyman hatter, laboring every day to obtain sustenance for himself, wife, and family—a poor man, possessing nothing but his hands whereby he could obtain a livelihood. His business led him to the contemplation of the mechanic arts. Knowing the great labor of forming what is called the hat body, he determined, if possible, to invent something that should alleviate that part of his business. After much time and study, and many experiments, he brought forth the machine for which he now asks the extension of his patent. After he had invented it, he had not the means of putting it in operation. He showed it to several persons, and solicited their aid; but, for various reasons, none had sufficient confidence in his invention to aid him in his designs. A Baptist preacher, I believe, some connexion of Mr. Grant's, also poor, but well-informed, inspected it, and had confidence in it. He undertook, with the inventor, to carry into operation the new machine. These two men, both without property, after much trouble and perplexity, started the machine, and, to the astonishment of every body, saw the fulfillment of their expectations. They continued their business for some time, when the gentleman associated with Mr. Grant, finding it required more capital to carry on the business than they possessed, sold out to a gentleman who was willing to advance a sufficient capital to give the machine a fair trial. They proceeded in their business, when, from some cause to me unknown, it was discovered the patent of Mr. Grant was void—that it did not, in fact, cover the invention. He then applied for a new patent, and a new one was made out, of the same date as the former patent. This date was taken, not, as I understand, by the request of the patentee, but by some fixed rule of the Patent Office. They continued their business until they discovered the market was full of hat bodies, made by machinery similar to the invention of Mr. Grant. He then endeavored to seek out the violators of his patent right. He did so, and found some of them in operation. With some he compromised; others refused, and he was compelled to prosecute them; and, after expending a large sum of money in the prosecution of those trespassers on him, he obtained judgment against them, which they were not able to pay. I understand, from the papers now before the Senate, that he expended about fourteen thousand dollars, and received about twenty-one hundred, leaving a balance of expenses against him of about twelve thousand dollars. These were not the only violators of his patent; a model of it was taken to Germany, and put in operation there, and hat bodies shipped to this country. At that time the hat body was not known in the tariff laws, and they entered into our markets, in competition with the patentee, almost without a duty. This machine is considered one of the most useful inventions that has ever been made in this country; considering its simplicity, the little expense to make it, and the labor it performs, it may be placed among the first class. The cotton gin, and the machine for making card teeth and cards, may be before it; but I do not recollect any other superior in usefulness. It performs the labor of thirty men, with very little cost, compared with the manual labor. I am informed it makes two hundred and fifty hat bodies per day, when a good workman makes but nine. Had Mr. Grant lived in Georgia or Carolina, they would have given him a fortune for his invention, as they did the inventor of the cotton gin; or had he lived in England, he would have been placed by the side of Sir Richard Arkwright, and the other great inventors of that country; but here he has been trespassed on, his rights violated, and that which was his own, and should have been secured to him, has been taken from him. And when he asks a renewal of his patent for the time that was lost to him, so as to make out his fourteen years, he is told his invention, his own property, has become the vested rights and property of others, and to grant him this patent is a destruction of these vested rights; and that the time has gone by for a renewal of the patent.

Mr. President, how are the facts? Before Mr. Grant's patent had expired, he gave notice, according to law, in several newspapers which are now on your table, that he intended to apply to Congress for a renewal of his patent. This was in the year 1834; his patent did not expire until August, 1835. He did apply in December, 1834, and the Senate passed the bill extending his patent, and sent it to the other House, but the mass of business before that House at the last session prevented their acting on it. He has continued his application to the present time; and if any persons have seized on this machine since the expiration of his patent, they have done it since last August, and in full knowledge of all these facts. The patent to Oliver Evans, for manufacturing flour and meal, expired on the 7th of January, 1805; and he applied for the renewal of his patent on the 31st December of the same year, about one whole year after the expiration of his patent. His patent was renewed. I have been informed that exceptions to the renewal were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court decided in favor of the renewal of the patent. These are the facts of this case as I understand them, and I leave it to the Senate to decide as they think proper.

Messrs. WALL and NILES opposed it; after which, it was laid on the table.

HOURLY OF MEETING.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted a resolution providing for the meetings of the Senate, for the remainder of the session, at ten o'clock, A. M., and that the Senate take a recess from two to four o'clock.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he had no objection to meeting at ten o'clock, but he objected to the recess; and therefore asked for a division of the question.

Mr. PRESTON also opposed the recess.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was carried.

PATENT OFFICE.

The bill to provide a building for a Patent Office being read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. CLAY objected to the passage of the bill. He thought that the total expenditure required, according to the plan proposed, would be 400,000 or $500,000. Four millions of brick would be required by this bill, and that quantity could not be supplied this season. He wished to know what had become of the project of purchasing the building northeast of the Capitol square. The House of Representatives had been better accommodated in that building than any where else, and it appeared to be particularly well adapted for a Patent Office. But, if a splendid edifice must be built, it would be well to wait till another session, and pass a bill at a time when there might be a collection made of sufficient materials.

Mr. RUGGLES stated that the building referred to would require to be rebuilt before it could be used for any purpose, and even then it would not be more fit for the Patent Office than the building now occupied. He stated what was the crowded condition of the Patent Office at present, numbers of valuable models being crowded into the cellar. It had become absolutely necessary that the Post Office should have the whole of the building now occupied by the Patent Office. He also stated that there would be a convenient arrangement in the new building for the exhibition of manufacturing models.

Mr. CLAYTON complimented the Senator from Maine for the labor he had employed in the investigation of the Patent Office; but stated that he should prefer the purchasing of the building near the Capitol; and, for the purpose of transferring the matter to another session, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. RUGGLES asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Clay, Claytor, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Morris, Porter, Robbins, Swift, White—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Webster—18.

So the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to take up the bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of the public lands.

Mr. BLACK opposed the motion, and it was carried: Yeas 23, nays 17, as follows:

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Robinson, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—17.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, explained the nature and objects of the bill, which, for the purpose of preventing fraud, violence, and combinations, at the public land sales, substitute secret and sealed bids for the present open and oral bids, and offered some amendments to perfect the details; which were agreed to.

Mr. WALKER then moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said that this motion was intended to defeat the bill; but, as it was a measure of considerable importance, he hoped it would not be thrown aside without some discussion. He would be glad to hear the arguments for and against it before he gave his vote.

Mr. PORTER was perfectly willing to allow gentlemen an opportunity of perfecting the details of the bill, and he therefore hoped that the Senator from Mississippi would withdraw the motion. He was satisfied, however, that more frauds would be practised under the provisions of this bill than under the present practice.

Mr. PRESTON feared that the bill could not accomplish the object intended. There was more danger of frauds being practised in secrecy than when the bids were open, and in the presence of hundreds. He had heard frequent complaints of frauds in the land offices, of which he professed to know nothing; but he thought that this bill would offer strong temptation to such frauds.

Mr. EWING said he had bestowed much pains and labor in the consideration of the subject, and, in common with the committee, had come to the conclusion that this was the only plan that could be adopted to prevent violence, if not frauds, at the public land sales. Mr. E., in the course of his remarks, described the combinations and violence used at the public land sales to prevent honest bids, and gave a history of the manner in which frauds of great extent had been successfully perpetrated. Mr. E. also explained at full length the manner in which the provisions of this bill would operate in preventing frauds, violence, and combinations, and argued to show that it would amply guard against the evils that now existed. Sealed bids, he said, were made in relation to every public contract, except for the public lands: for the Post Office, for supplies for the navy and army, for the letting of contracts for roads, and, in short, for every thing but for the sales of the lands.

Mr. LINN said that, as much had been said as to frauds in the public lands, he wished to inquire particularly of the chairman whether any frauds had been alleged to have been committed in Missouri.

Mr. EWING replied that there was no doubt but that a great number of frauds had been perpetrated at the land sales; but he could not say that there were any charges that frauds had been committed in Missouri particularly.

Mr. LINN said his object was to have the skirts of Missouri cleared of any imputations that might indirectly rest upon her in consequence of the frauds that had been alleged to have taken place in the public land sales. He had travelled much through Missouri, and he had never heard of frauds and combinations there, and he felt warranted in saying that none had ever existed. Perhaps, if gentlemen from the other new States would rise and ask the same question from the chairman, similar answers to that given in relation to Missouri might be received, and thus the frauds so much magnified might be narrowed down to a very small compass. He would suggest to the Senator from Ohio, who took so deep an interest in the public lands, that the best way to prevent frauds and combinations would be to abolish the present land system altogether, and reserve the public domain in the valley of the Mississippi for the purpose of making it an asylum for the poor man of every country in the world who may be disposed to come there and cultivate the soil for an honest support.

Mr. WALKER said that he had wished that the consideration of this subject might be postponed until the next session of Congress, when the subject might be more maturely considered, and some measure devised more calculated to effect the object in view than the one before them. Mr. W. entered at length into the various objections he had to the bill, and supported them with an argument of considerable force and ability. The abolishment of the present auction system, which had existed since the adoption of the constitution, and even prior to that time, and the substitution of a species of freemasonry in its stead, would, in his opinion, lead to frauds of incalculably greater extent than had ever heretofore been alleged to have taken place. He had attended a few land sales in Mississippi, and he most solemnly believed that no frauds or violence had ever taken place at the sales there; he had seen none, and had heard of none. If violence would ever be perpetrated under the present system, it would only be where the speculator purchased the farm in the possession of the honest cultivator, and deprived him of a home for his wife and children, and he had never heard of but one case of that kind. Among his various objections to the bill, Mr. W. referred to the strong temptations that it offered to the public officers. If it took effect, they must, he said, place archangels in the land offices instead of men, or they would violate that precept of holy writ, "lead us not into temptation." Of the whole one hundred and fourteen registers and receivers, if only two villains should be among them, they could make such a scene of fraud and violence as never was before heard of. It would give the whole control of the land offices to the registers and receivers, and the sales must depend on their honesty. A stronger temptation to villany could not be presented to the cupidity of man. Mr. W. took an extended view of the process of secret bids, and described the powers of the registers and receivers over them, and showed the various modes by which the laws might be evaded, violated, and set aside, and no human being but the registers and receivers, and the few interested with them, have the slightest knowledge of their proceedings.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, was fully aware that the Committee on the Public Lands had reported this bill with a sincere desire to guard against the various frauds at the public land sales, which he had very little doubt had been perpetrated. He did believe that it was possible to devise some mode by which these frauds might be guarded against, and that they might dispose of the lands beneficially to the settler, and beneficially to the Government, without the corrupting influence of those speculations and frauds that had heretofore existed. He had looked into the bill with a sincere desire to find that it was calculated to accomplish the object in view; but, after a careful examination, he was constrained to believe that it would open the door to greater frauds than had ever yet been perpetrated; that, under its operation, they would get less money for the lands, and that it would give great facilities to the speculating tribe, while it would operate less favorably for the actual settler. Mr. K. described the manner in which the combinations of sagacious and wealthy capitalists prevented a fair competition from those who wished to purchase for actual settlement, and contended that they would have still greater facilities under the present bill. Among his other objections, he said that if this system took effect, a general suspicion would necessarily be excited against the registers and receivers, no matter whether they conducted the sales fairly or otherwise. He was perfectly convinced, that to adopt this plan would work greater evils than at present existed. He would be glad, therefore, if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands would consent to let it rest until the next session, and that they would then take it up with a sincere desire of doing something—an object that they all had at heart—to cure the evils existing in the present system.

Mr. HENDRICKS rose to repudiate the allegations of frauds, so far as they relate to the State of Indiana. He was convinced from correct information that none have ever been practised there. Mr. H. then stated his objections to the bill, believing that it would occasion more frauds and combinations than had yet been complained of, and concluded by moving to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. EWING then requested Mr. HENDRICKS to withdraw his motion; which was consented to, and Messrs. EWING and PORTER severally addressed the Chair in continuation of their arguments.

Mr. CLAY said he knew that the committee had been attentively considering this subject, and that they had been assisted by the co-operation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that, after much pains and labor, they had agreed on a system which, though it might not be perfect, was yet calculated to do much good. What were the evils complained of under the present system? Fraud and violence. Gentlemen might get up and deny that there had been any; yet they spoke only of their own belief as to what had taken place in their respective States. But this fraud and violence had not been charged against any one State in particular; but the charge had been general, and that fraud and violence had existed to an alarming degree, in relation to the public land sales, there was scarcely room to doubt. They had abundant evidence on their tables to satisfy any one on that head. His friend from Louisiana knew that the frauds with regard to pre-emptions in that State had been so great that the Governor had thought proper to make them the subject of a special communication to the Legislature. It was in vain to deny the existence of combinations and frauds. These might not be perpetrated by individuals in the State where the land sales were; but by combined bands of wealthy individuals coming from other quarters. Mr. C. went on at length in support of the bill, contending that it was the best measure that could be devised to cure the evils existing in the present system.

Mr. ROBINSON was not so much opposed to this bill as some gentlemen who had addressed the Senate on the subject; but still believing it to be exceedingly imperfect, and liable to strong objections, he must vote against it. He had risen, however, not to enter into an argument on the merits of the bill, but to say a word or two as to the violence that had been committed at one of the sales in his State. This violence had been confined to cases where the actual settler and cultivator was anxious to procure the land which he cultivated. Combinations for this purpose had occurred. The settlers in that district met some days previous to the sale, and selected a committee of respectable persons to investigate the subject. This committee examined into the case of each bonafide settler, and all such as they found embraced in that description they determined should have their lands, determining that they would cry "pre-emption," whenever the settlement of such person was offered for sale, and prevent any one else from bidding for it. Where there was not an actual settlement and cultivation, nothing of this kind had taken place. So strong was the feeling on this subject in his State, that he doubted very much, if a stranger were to go into any neighborhood and purchase the land of an actual settler, whether he would be permitted to remain there. He believed that violence had never been committed at the land sales in his State to prevent fair competition, but to prevent the speculator from getting the home of the actual settler and cultivator. Combinations of speculators were generally composed of non-residents, as those in the States where the sales took place had not the funds for such purposes.

If this bill would accomplish the object in view, and put down combinations, he would with great pleasure vote for it; but, from all the examination he had given to the subject, he was convinced that it would add to, rather than diminish, the present evils. One word as to these frauds. He was satisfied that they had been much overrated, and that the principal frauds arose from the pre-emption floats.

Mr. MORRIS differed with his colleague as to the principles on which the bill was based. His colleague looked upon the public lands as a source of revenue, while he thought the great object for which the sales should be made was the settlement of the lands and the security of the purchaser. After stating his objections to the bill, Mr. M. suggested that the best plan to cure the evils complained of would be to stop the sales at public auction and sell the lands to the actual settlers only in small quantities. This would, at all events, give them time to devise some system that would meet with more general concurrence than the present.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. BLACK, WALKER, and CALHOUN; after which the question was taken on Mr. WALKER's motion to postpone the bill indefinitely, and it was carried: Yeas 25, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Tomlinson, Webster—15.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

A message was received from the President of the United States, announcing his approval of the bill to regulate the public deposits.

Mr. CLAY remarked that the message just communicated by the President announced the gratifying fact that he had approved the deposit bill. He (Mr. C.) was extremely glad of it, and it afforded ground for great rejoicing; but he could not refrain from observing that the same fact was announced this morning in the Globe, in an editorial article which bore an authorized character; and that it was not according to established usage, nor respectful towards Congress, that his approbation of a bill passed by that body should be communicated to the editor of a newspaper prior to the communication of the fact to that House in which the bill had originated.

TEXAS.

The following message was also received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the

SENATE.]

18th instant, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the papers therewith presented. Not having accurate and detailed information of the civil, military, and political condition of Texas, I have deemed it expedient to take the necessary measures, now in progress, to procure it, before deciding upon the course to be pursued in relation to the newly declared Government.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, 23d June, 1836.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 23d June, 1836.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, requesting the President "to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession, not inconsistent with the public interest, touching the political condition of Texas—the organization of its Government, and its capacity to maintain its independence; and, also, any correspondence which may have taken place between the Executive of the United States and the Government of Texas or its agents," has the honor to lay before the President the accompanying copies of papers addressed to, and left at, the Department of State, by persons claiming to be agents of the republic of Texas; being all the information and correspondence called for by the resolution. No answers having been returned to any of these communications, they remain for further consideration, and such direction as the President shall hereafter give.

All which is respectfully presented.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The message having been read,

Mr. CLAY rose and said it did not appear to him to be necessary that a reference should be made of this message, as the President himself states that he deems it requisite that he shall have further information on the subject before he determines on the propriety of recognising the independence of Texas. The Committee on Foreign Relations, in their report, had certainly thrown out no reflection on the President as having been too tardy in his movements, but had come to the conclusion that it would be proper to recognise the independence of Texas whenever it should be communicated that she had a Government able to sustain itself. As the President had signified a desire to wait for further information before he acts, there would probably be no necessity to move to refer these papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He moved to lay the message on the table, and print it.

Mr. PRESTON stated that the only fact necessary to be established was, that the war in Texas had terminated; and that was proved by the documents accompanying the message. He would, however, concur in the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, merely reserving to himself the privilege to move further in the subject, if, on reflection, he should feel convinced that such course was advisable. The present inclination of his mind was to move to refer the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations back to that committee, with instructions to report a resolution to recognise the independence of Texas.

Mr. CLAY said that if it should be considered by the Senator from South Carolina (or any other Senator) advisable to adopt such a resolution as he had suggested, he might do so when the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs came to be acted on, and that resolution was the special order for yesterday. He did not concur in the opinion expressed by the Senator, that the sole fact to be regarded in acting on this subject was that of the termination of the war. There was also another fact, and it was that concerning which he presumed the President was now seeking information, and this was—whether there is, in fact, a Government existing in full and successful operation, so as to justify the establishment of intercourse and relations of amity. Whenever the motion to lay the message on the table and print it was disposed of, he would move to make the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations the special order for a day next week.

The message was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON said he felt himself honored in presenting to the Senate a memorial from a portion of the citizens of Louisiana on the subject of Texas. The honor was the more conspicuous, as he had been informed by one of the Senators representing that State, that it was signed by its most respectable and influential citizens. The memorial purported to be from the citizens of Opelousas, Louisiana, and expressed the deep sensibility with which they had looked on the struggle for freedom going on in Texas, and the peculiar interest they felt, being on the very confines of that country. They expressed an anxious hope that this Government should, at the earliest period, recognise the existence of this new republic which had so gloriously achieved its independence. He felt that they had received from all parts of this Union, and from the most respectable sources, communications of this nature, showing that public opinion was fully prepared for any proceedings of the Government on this subject.

Mr. P. then moved that the memorial be laid on the table and printed; which motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. TOMLINSON moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock, A. M.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved to amend the motion by making the meetings, for the remainder of the session, at ten o'clock, A. M.; which amendment was agreed to, and the motion as amended was adopted.

R. W. MEADE.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, the Senate took up a bill for the settlement of the claim of the executrix of Richard W. Meade; which was considered and discussed, and the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. HUBBARD moved an amendment, providing for a reference of the claim to certain officers of the Government, to report on the subject at the next session. The other parts of the bill were stricken out.

The demand of the yeas and nays was withdrawn, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

C. J. CATLETT.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of Charles J. Catlett: Ayes 15, noes 11.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, so as to refer the bill to the officers of the Treasury, to report on the principle.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHWARD, the bill for the organization of the navy was taken up.

Mr. S. observed that the objections heretofore made to this bill were to the number of persons to be promoted to the grade of admiral. With a view to try the sense of the Senate, he would move to strike out the four rear admirals.

This motion was agreed to, leaving in the bill one admiral and two vice admirals.

Mr. S. then moved to insert thirteen commodores instead of nine.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that he should make no decided opposition to this part of the bill, though he believed they were in danger of passing a bill that they might hereafter have cause to regret. He would have much preferred that the chairman of the committee had acquiesced in the general sense of the Senate expressed the other day, and permitted the bill to lie for the remainder of the session. It would then have been taken up at the commencement of the next session, when they would have time to mature such a bill as would put the navy, which was so deservedly a favorite of the country, and was looked upon as the right arm of our defence, on a permanent footing of efficiency and respectability. He confessed that he had strong objections to this portion of the bill for creating the grade of commodore. It was nowhere a substantial grade, and this might at least give them cause for reflection. Any hurry might produce future prejudice as well as serious injuries to this important arm of the national defence. Amongst other objections to this change, he would state one that he thought should have some weight. As long as commodore was not an established grade in the navy, it remained with the discretion of the Department to select the most able, the most enterprising, and the most vigorous of the captains for the command of a squadron on an important emergency. But the moment this grade was established by law, that advantage would be taken away. He hoped gentlemen would proceed with great caution, as any false step with regard to the navy could not easily be repaired, and might cause the most serious regrets.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that he would gladly have acquiesced if he had not believed it to be a solemn and imperative duty to endeavor to get this bill through at the present time. If the Senate should differ with him in relation to any of the grades introduced in the bill, all it would have to do would be to strike them out.

As to the grade of commodore, it was a rank known in common parlance, and would be well understood. He thought the establishment of the grade would be very serviceable to the navy, and would create no difficulties whatever. He thought, too, that the addition of this increased rank was due to those gallant officers whose long and faithful services have been so creditable to themselves and their country.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that the chairman of the committee had undoubtedly laid down just principles; but every principle must be qualified by some other, and every principle urged, without reference to others, became exaggerated. The question, then, was one of prudence. It could not be doubted but that long and faithful service should be rewarded; but by multiplying the rewards, their value would be greatly diminished, and they would be rendered less an incentive to laudable ambition. The question was, whether they were prepared, without more mature consideration, and in this hurried manner, to make this important change. He desired to treat this subject with the utmost delicacy, and to avoid making any false step in regard to that navy which was their pride and glory, and on which the defence of the country, their interest, and their Union, so essentially depended.

To determine at once the question whether the grade of commodore should be a substantial grade of the navy, he would move to strike it out.

After some remarks from Mr. SOUTHARD, in opposition to the motion,

Mr. SHEPLEY observed that he should take it for granted, if this grade of commodore were established, there being no such grade either in the British or French naval service, that difficulties would occur in foreign ports, between our commodores and the officers of those nations, about matters of ceremony and questions of precedence.

Mr. SOUTHARD replied that such difficulties had occurred, and it was because we had no officers of a higher grade in the navy than captains. By giving increased grades to our officers, the chances of such difficulties occurring would be diminished.

Mr. WEBSTER would have preferred retaining the old established grade of admiral, which was well understood, instead of having this unknown grade of commodore. He was in favor of striking out the commodores, and would, when the bill was reported to the Senate, move to reinstate the grade of rear admirals. He thought this promotion was due to the gallant officers who had added so much to our naval renown.

On taking the question, the nine commodores were stricken out.

Mr. CUTHBERT suggested that as the bill now stood, it provided for one admiral and two vice admirals. He thought it would be better to have one of each of the three grades, admiral, vice admiral, and rear admiral. He would suggest another amendment. The bill provided for two grades of lieutenants. Now, in the naval service, there was no necessity for having two grades of lieutenants, it being totally different from the land service in that particular. It had been tried either in the British or French naval service, he did not recollect which, and, being found to be attended with inconveniences, had been abandoned.

Mr. PORTER inquired if there was any difference of pay in the two grades of first and second lieutenants.

Mr. SOUTHARD replied that there undoubtedly would be, if the difference in the grades was established.

The question was then taken, and the second lieutenants were stricken out.

Mr. SOUTHARD then moved, as the one hundred second lieutenants were stricken out, to amend the bill further by increasing the number of lieutenants to 350 instead of 250.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that in looking over the navy list, he found that the number of lieutenants now consisted of 257, and that at least one half of them were on furlough or leave of absence, waiting orders. He had been informed that the number of these officers was too great to allow them sufficient opportunities of going to sea to acquire skill and experience in their profession. He was aware that large appropriations had been made this year for keeping afloat a great naval force; but there was no reason to suppose that this was to be continued. He thought it better not to increase the number of lieutenants, as there were enough in the service to officer all the vessels that would be employed.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that he had made a careful examination to ascertain the number that would be required; and taking into consideration that they would now have at sea double the number of vessels ever before afloat, the number of navy yards and receiving ships, with the casualties of sickness and other causes, he did not think they could do with a less number than was proposed.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that the gentleman, in his examination of the Naval Register, had not taken into consideration the few vessels that were afloat. They would have now double the number at sea that had ever been at sea before.

Mr. WALKER expressed the opinion that they could not do with a less number than was proposed. He had always been opposed to extravagant appropriations, yet he thought in this case the expenditure was highly necessary.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that it would be easy enough to increase the number, but it would not be so easy to diminish it. According to the chairman's own statement, it was not necessary to increase the number of lieutenants; for if one half the number of lieutenants had been heretofore ashore awaiting orders, now that they were going to send double the number of ships to sea, this half would be just enough for the purpose. He did not believe that he should succeed, and he would therefore be content if only fifty more were added, making the number of lieutenants three hundred instead of the present number of two hundred and fifty-seven.

Mr. RUGGLES observed that the amendment did not imperatively require that there should be three hundred and fifty lieutenants; but that the President might appoint that number if he should deem it necessary. Presuming that the President would not appoint more than were required for the service, he should vote for the amendment.

After some further observations from Messrs. CUTHBERT, MANGUM, and BUCHANAN, the question was taken and carried on striking out the word "two" and inserting "three," thus making three hundred and fifty instead of two hundred and fifty.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the word "fifty," so as to leave the number of lieutenants at two hundred and fifty; rejected: Ayes 22, noes not counted.

Mr. MANGUM moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was lost: Yeas 11, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Mangum, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, White—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster—25.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved further to amend the bill, by striking out fifty, and inserting forty, for the number of captains, and by striking out seventy-five, and inserting sixty, for the number of commanders; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved further to amend the bill, by striking out seventy-five for the number of passed midshipmen, and inserting one hundred and twenty-five; which motion was also agreed to.

After some remarks from Messrs. CUTHBERT, SOUTHARD, and WEBSTER, the bill was so amended as to provide for one admiral, one vice admiral, and three rear admirals; after which, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A number of bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate went into the consideration of executive business; after which, It adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at New York; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the bill so as to make it a bill to extend the relief of the bill now in existence to the sufferers who had paid their bonds previous to the passage of the act, and whose losses exceeded $1,000.

Mr. W. explained that there had been bonds paid by sufferers to the amount of $405,115 before the passage of the act.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GRATUITIES OF LAND.

Mr. BENTON moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill to grant certain quantities of land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Mississippi, and Missouri; which was agreed to.

Messrs. BENTON, WALKER, and HENDRICKS, advocated the bill.

Mr. MANGUM opposed the bill, and said that he would move to lay it on the table; and if that motion failed he would then move to insert a grant of 500,000 acres of land for each of the old States.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WALKER spoke in its support.

Mr. BLACK said he would not detain the Senate by entering into a discussion of the principles upon which similar grants had been made to several of the new States, and upon which this donation of land is asked. The bill had been many times before the Senate, and the principle had been acknowledged and sanctioned by the land bill.

I (said Mr. B.) was one who voted for the land bill, because, as I have on another occasion stated, I was fully aware that there would be on hand, after the proper disbursements of the money, a large surplus—a surplus of some thirty millions of dollars. This surplus, every one must see, could not and ought not to be permitted to remain idle where it was not wanted. I, for one, knew and said it would not; the result has verified what I said.

Sir, (said Mr. B.,) I am glad to find that I have the support and countenance of my colleague in favor of this bill; for I remember, in discussing the land bill, he declared he would not accept a five hundred thousand acre grant on the conditions prescribed, which are the same as this bill, word for word. This was said in disparagement of the land bill. I am glad that it is looked at in a different light since the passage of the general distribution act, now a law. By the land bill, Mississippi would have got a million and a half of dollars during 1837; by this bill, not one half that sum, besides resigning this valuable grant. Sir, I am in hopes the representatives will turn their attention to this matter, and to the figures of the case.

Mr. MANGUM moved to lay the bill on the table; which was carried: Yeas 22, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Page, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Webster—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White—17.

MICHIGAN.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Michigan.

The amendment struck out the salary of $2,000 appropriated by the Senate bill for the district judge of Michigan, and substituted $1,500.

The question being on the motion of Mr. CLAYTON to strike out $1,500 and insert $1,800,

Mr. CLAYTON withdrew his proposition, and the amendment of the House was concurred in.

R. W. MEADE.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the bill to settle the claim of the executrix of Richard W. Meade was taken up, for the purpose of making a slight amendment.

The motion was agreed to, the bill was amended, and read a third time and passed.

Marine Corps—Adjournment Veto.

[SENATE.]

MARINE CORPS.

The bill to regulate and increase the pay of the officers of the marine corps was taken up.

Mr. SOUTHARD explained that the bill provided that the pay of the colonel should be $3,500 per annum; of the lieutenant colonel $3,000 per annum; of the majors $2,500; and thus going gradually down to the lowest officer, $500 less for each grade.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to amend the bill by making the pay of the marine officers the same as that of officers of like grades in the infantry of the United States army, while serving on shore; and that when serving at sea their pay shall be the same as that of officers of equal rank in the navy—the rank to be previously determined by the President of the United States.

This amendment was supported by Messrs. BUCHANAN and WEBSTER, and opposed by Messrs. SOUTHARD, CLAYTON, and PRESTON; after which, the amendment was lost.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, when Mr. BUCHANAN renewed his motion to amend; and after a debate, in which the motion was supported by Messrs. BUCHANAN, CLAY, and WEBSTER, and opposed by Messrs. PRESTON, WRIGHT, and CLAYTON, it was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Clayton, Moore, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—10.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to amend the bill by providing that it shall take effect from and after the 18th June, 1834; which was carried; and

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JOSEPH GRANT.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the bill to extend the patent right of Joseph Grant was taken up, and after some remarks from Mr. K. in its support, and from Messrs. NILES and WALL in opposition to it,

Mr. RUGGLES submitted an amendment providing that the rights of those persons who have used said invention or invested capital in it since the expiration of the patent, up to the passage of the bill, shall not be affected by it; but before taking any question,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.

TEXAS.

Mr. WHITE presented the proceedings of a large meeting of citizens assembled at Nashville, and a memorial praying that Texas may be acknowledged as a sovereign, free, and independent State. Mr. WHITE expressed his acquiescence in the feeling and action of this meeting; and, on his motion, the proceedings were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill from the House making appropriations for fortifications, with two amendments. The amendments (Mr. W. stated) were of no considerable importance, and he would move for the printing of them, and move to take up the bill for consideration to-morrow. This bill contains appropriations for works in progress, and appropriates liberally and largely, the sums being equal to what would have been appropriated last year, had not the annual bill been lost between the two Houses, as well as during this session.

The amendments were then ordered to be printed.

PENSION BILL.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the Senate reconsidered the vote by which a bill granting pensions to certain individuals therein named was passed on Saturday; and the bill was then laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT VETO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the message of the President of the United States, returning the bill fixing a day for the annual meeting of Congress, and for the close of the first session of each Congress.

The question being on the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding,

Mr. MORRIS stated at length the reasoning which had brought him to the conclusion that the objections of the President are not sustained by the soundest construction of the constitution.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH asked the attention of the Senate for a moment only, as he was well aware, at this late period of the session, that the request was a great one; he would give his construction of the constitution, in relation to the question before them, with studied brevity and conciseness.

The topic is somewhat a new one, and has, for the most part, escaped the attention of commentators; for what reason, whether considered as perfectly obvious, or as not important enough to engage them, he would not undertake to decide; of this the Senate were convinced, that it was a subject wholly free from all party feelings, or from any other sinister influence that could mislead the mind. Nothing could be further from the expectation of those who voted for this bill, than an idea of violating the constitution, or infringing upon executive prerogative; and the frankness, the conciliating temper, together with the concluding sentence of the veto message, afford unquestionable evidence of the good spirit that moved the Executive.

The President, sir, in his message has quoted those parts of the constitution which he thinks bear upon this subject, and has arranged them in succession; it will be useful, and will facilitate construction, if we examine and remark the location of these quoted sections of the constitution, and see their bearing. The first quotation is from the first article in the constitution, which treats of the two Houses of Congress, and the conclusion of the fifth section refers to the several powers of each House. The next section, in the same article, which is quoted, refers to the joint powers of the two Houses. The first says that "neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting."

The obvious design of this section is to keep the two Houses together, both as to time and place, pending their session. The next quotation is from that section of the same article which prescribes the course that bills shall take in Congress before they become laws, as well as the course of every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the two Houses is necessary, and is in the following words: "Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on the question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States," &c., and shall be subject to his approbation or disapprobation, as bills are. Thus, sir, this section regulating the course of bills in Congress, as well as all resolutions, orders, or votes, which require the concurrent vote of both Houses, provides that they shall be presented to the President for his approbation or disapprobation, but excepts the question of adjournment from that course. They who framed the constitution, having in the previous section provided that, pending the session of Congress, the two Houses should not have the power to adjourn for more than three days, nor to another place than that in which they shall be sitting, excepted this question of adjournment, thus arranged, from the prescribed course of other joint acts of the two Houses; thus making the application of this exception of the question of adjournment, directly and naturally, to the foregoing adjournment, pending the session.

But the President, in his veto message, contends that the question of adjournment is not a matter of legislation, and rests it upon this clause in the constitution; and there, I think, with respectful deference, is the error in the message, viz: making the exception of adjournment, in the clause stated, universal in its application, instead of special to adjournments, pending the session. The power of regulating the sessions of Congress by law seems to be an incidental and necessary power. Already the sessions of Congress are in part regulated by law. The commencement of the sessions is prescribed by the highest law, the constitution, empowering Congress to change it by law if they think proper; and the termination of a Congress is also prescribed by law; the doubt arises exclusively upon regulating the first session of Congress, which is always the long session. The bill now under consideration takes away no power from a future Congress, as it provides "that the day of adjournment of the first session of every succeeding Congress shall be the second Monday in May, unless Congress shall, at any such session, by joint resolution, otherwise provide." If it is thought, therefore, that the good of the country and the convenience of Congress require that this long session should be limited by law, unless the Congress in session at the time should find it necessary to provide otherwise, shall it be prohibited to Congress to effect this good and this convenience, merely because the question of adjournment is excepted from being presented to the President for his approbation, as all other resolutions, orders, or votes are, which require a concurrent vote of both Houses? This would seem to be a strained construction, and more particularly as a much more natural and direct application of that exemption has been shown to the adjournments authorized during a session.

The next quoted section of the constitution is from the article relating to the Executive, and is the third section, which treats on the regular and eventual power of the Executive. It is in these words, viz:

"He (the President) may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and, in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper," &c.

From this section the President, in his veto message, concludes that the proposal to fix a day by law, to be binding in all future time, unless changed by consent of both Houses of Congress, is "to take away the contingent power of the Executive, which, in anticipated cases, is vested in him." Here, again, I think the President generalizes too much in his construction. If we examine this section closely, we shall find both its grammatical and legal construction in exact concurrence. The part of the third section of the second article quoted is one sentence, where all its parts have a direct reference to each other, and to nothing else. In enumerating the eventual or contingent powers of the Executive, it states "that he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them," and then goes on, in the same breath, to say, "in case of disagreement between them, in respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he pleases," evidently confining this power to the convention of both Houses "on extraordinary occasions," where, as experience has shown, it would be much more likely to anticipate that its use would be necessary. By thus confining the exercise of this contingent power of interfering in adjournments, (grammatically, and by every principle of construction, as I have done,) said Mr. G., to the special cases referred to, and with which it is placed in immediate relationship, the contingent executive power is left untouched, and no fear of its invasion remains; and that such is the true construction I cannot hesitate to believe. With these views, sir, (said Mr. G.,) I am constrained to dissent from the veto. I would, Mr. President, say a word upon the policy of this law, if it was admissible at this time, as I am convinced that these extremely protracted sessions of Congress are injurious, and must eventually, if persisted in, drive those men from Congress who are most fit and best qualified to be there. But I do not consider this question now before us; the policy of this law has been decided by a large majority of both Houses, and is conceded by the Executive; the only question before you is that presented by the veto, and which has been spread upon your journals—the constitutional question—and on that we are alone called to decide. Any other course, sir, would involve an absurdity; for suppose a Senator here, who, objecting to the policy of the law, but entirely clear as to its constitutionality, opposed its passage, the President returns the law with a constitutional objection alone, admitting its sound policy. If such a Senator, confident that the law is constitutional, still perseveres to decide on his opinion of its policy, which is already decided on and admitted, he sustains the veto in effect, though he condemns and opposes it in opinion; and the express object of the veto, in presenting the President's special objections to a law for consideration, fails.

Mr. PORTER said he had voted against the bill when it was brought forward, but he was opposed to the grounds taken by the President.

Mr. WALL sustained the argument of the President in a few observations.

Mr. SOUTHARD had voted against the bill, because he considered that its provisions involved an inconvenience; but he was satisfied that Congress had the constitutional power to pass the law, and he could not therefore sustain the veto, but should vote for the bill, the decided vote of the two Houses having settled the question of expediency.

Mr. NILES sustained the principles of the message, and maintained that the bill could not be sustainable, because it fettered the successors of the Congress which passed the law.

Mr. WALKER referred to the constitution to show that, when a bill was vetoed by the President, it was not required of Congress to reconsider his reasons, but only to reconsider the bill.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, the President's objections notwithstanding, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—23.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. CLAYTON asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to fix the day for the annual meeting of Congress; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

JOSEPH GRANT.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Grant was taken up, and the amendment moved by Mr. WALKER on Saturday being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed: Yeas 17, nays 14.

FRENCH AND NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITIES.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay the preceding orders on the table, that the Senate might take up the bill to anticipate the payment of the indemnities due to the claimants under the French and Neapolitan treaties.

He said he was not disposed, at this stage of the session, to occupy unnecessarily the time of the Senate with this or any other bill; but he must say he considered this one of the most important public bills upon the files of the Senate. There was now a pressure upon the money market in all the trading towns, and he knew of no way in which Congress could so effectually contribute to the relief of the mercantile interests, to the extent proposed, as by the passage of this bill. Every Senator would recollect that the instalments were still due under the French treaty, the one to become due in one and the other in two years from the present time. Under the Neapolitan treaty, his recollection was that seven instalments were yet due, to be paid annually. It would, therefore, be seven years before the money would be paid under this last treaty. All the money due under both treaties was bearing an interest of at least four per centum per annum, which would make the advance of the money a safe and profitable operation for the Treasury, while its advance would contribute instant relief, to the amount of about four millions of dollars, to the great mercantile interests of the country, which are now suffering for the want of immediate cash capital. The present condition of the Treasury would permit the advance without any injury to any national interest, and he most earnestly hoped that the bill would be taken up, and would meet the favor and approbation of the Senate.

Mr. W. said his object in making the motion at this time was that it might be a test of the disposition of the Senate as to the bill itself. He had made the motion a few days since, unsuccessfully; and he had not at that time made any explanations whatever of his views in reference to the bill and its public importance. He now hoped he might so far obtain the attention of the members of the body as to prepare every Senator to vote upon the motion he had now made with reference to the fate of the bill. There could be no questions of detail. The only provisions contained in the bill, and the only provisions required, were that the money should be advanced from the Treasury to the claimants, and that assignments of their claims against these respective foreign Governments be taken by the United States in exchange for the money. The effect would merely be an investment of the money at an interest of four per cent. per annum, while the capital advanced would go to the immediate relief of the mercantile interests. He had made careful inquiries at the Treasury, and found that the appropriation would not vary far from four millions of dollars, and would not, very certainly, exceed that sum.

Mr. W. said he had made these remarks that the vote might be decisive of the fate of the bill for the present session. If the Senate should refuse, upon the present occasion, to take up the bill, he should not feel it to be his duty again to move it. He therefore would ask the yeas and noes upon the question, that the expression might be decisive and satisfactory, as well to the Senate as to the parties and interests concerned.

After a few words of conversation between Messrs. WEBSTER, PORTER, LINN, and WRIGHT, the vote was taken, and the motion was lost. The yeas and noes upon it were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Porter, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Webster, White—21.

ARMORIES, ARSENALS, &amp;c.

The bill to establish a foundry, an armory in the West and one in the South, arsenals in the States in which the same have not yet been established, and depots for arms in certain States and Territories, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALHOUN thought it was too late in the session to act on a bill of such importance, involving such heavy appropriations; and he would therefore move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LINN hoped that the postponement would not be ordered. For many years Congress had acted in both of its branches favorably for an armory in the West, though not in both at the same time, and there never had been a doubt of the importance of some of the objects included in this bill.

The history of the last war showed the great importance of an armory on the western waters, and, in further confirmation of the necessity of one there, he would call the attention of gentlemen to the report of the Secretary of War on the subject. The Secretary (Mr. L. said) went into an exact estimate of the difference of the cost of arms manufactured in the West and those manufactured east of the mountains, the difference being in favor of the former. The importance of an armory in the West in time of war was manifest; every one acquainted with the resources of Missouri would at once see the great economy there would be in having arms manufactured there. Within a compass of twenty miles square, in that State, could be found every material used both in the manufacture of arms and of gunpowder; and this, too, where there were the greatest facilities for water transportation. He regretted that the armory for the West did not stand in a bill by itself; but, as it was, he should vote for the whole bill.

Mr. BENTON observed that there were now nine or ten arsenals in the United States, distributed in the different States—principally at the North—and it was thought right by the Military Committee, that there should be one in every State in the Union. It was thought right that every State should be put on the same footing with the eight or nine States who now had arsenals. With respect to the armory, it rested on different foundations. We of the West, said he, have for fifteen years been endeavoring to get an armory established on our waters. We have had reports upon reports in favor of it—all showing that the expense of the transportation of arms beyond the mountains was of itself sufficient to authorize the measure. As the arms on hand became fewer and fewer, in consequence of use and decay, it would readily be seen what a supply the West would require for her constantly growing population. History showed the impossibility of supplying a country with arms at any one period. The supply must be constantly going on. In England and France, the manufacture of arms was continued with as much regularity as if they had never manufactured arms at all. Now, in Europe, the regular armies only were armed, while the body of the people went unarmed. Our people should be well armed, and not suffered to muster in time of peace with cornstalks, and carry arms in time of war that they are afraid of. The secret of the great success of the western people in battle was in their being accustomed from their childhood to the handling of arms. Mr. B. referred to a report of the Secretary of War in 1818, which recommended an armory on the western waters, on account of cheapness, and the considerable expense that would be saved in transportation. We of the West (said Mr. B.) have miscarried heretofore, by endeavoring to fix upon the place. They had now abandoned that idea, and left the location to the discretion of the Executive. They saw that of the two armories of the United States, both were east of the mountains, and if a line were drawn from Florida point to Maine, they would be found in a quarter of the Union.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that his impressions were in favor of the bill; but he observed an appropriation of $100,000 for a foundry, and he desired to know where it was to be located.

Mr. BENTON replied that the object was to have a pattern foundry at the seat of Government, to bring to the same test, not only the caliber of all the guns, but the metal used in making them.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said that he was rather in favor of the general objects of the bill, but on examination it seemed to him that there were some objections to it. He thought, as the bill stood, the foundry might be located either at Louisville or St. Louis. The Southwest, too, the most important part of the Union for an armory, was entirely excluded from the bill. It had heretofore been considered that the most favorable position for an armory was at the bend of the Tennessee river, west of the Muscle Shoals, where every convenience of water power, facilities of transportation, and materials, were to be found. He thought this would be the most favorable position for an armory, as it would there be most convenient for all the western and southwestern States. With regard to arsenals of depot, every gentleman would see the propriety of having them in every State, for the purpose of supplying arms to the militia. No gentleman, he believed, would object to this. With regard to arsenals of construction, he understood it as another name for an armory. Why should they have one at the South, and one in the West, and establish another arsenal of construction at St. Louis? An arsenal of construction, he presumed, was for the manufacture of small arms, and it was therefore the same thing as an armory. He would vote against the indefinite postponement of the bill, with a view of having such amendments made as would relieve the bill from any objections.

Mr. PORTER said he agreed with the Senator from Alabama, that there was no particular reason for having an armory in the South. He believed that St. Louis was as advantageous a position for Louisiana as any other place, considering the facilities of transportation from there.

Mr. LINN, in reply to Mr. KING of Alabama, said that he really thought that the gentleman's State belonged to the West. He had always been very willing to claim Alabama as a western State. The position spoken of by the gentleman from Alabama had been recommended, when the resources of Missouri were not so well understood as they now were. When he was up before he remarked, that within the compass of twenty miles square, in Missouri, could be found all the advantages of water power, with the facilities of transportation to any part of the West, together with all the materials in the greatest abundance used in the manufacture of arms and ammunition; such as iron, copper, coal, manganese, zinc, ammonia, nitre, sulphur, and lead. He was perfectly willing that Missouri should enter into competition with Alabama, and to yield to the latter, if she could show superior advantages for an armory on her waters.

Mr. CALHOUN, after some remarks, renewed his motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said that, as respected additional armories, the report of the Secretary of War was decidedly averse to them. If an armory were established in the West, he thought one of those now existing ought to be abolished. The Secretary said that the present establishments could turn out about thirty or forty thousand stand of arms a year, and that there were about eight hundred thousand now on hand—a number, he should suppose, sufficient for the present wants of the country. He was not disposed, Mr. K. said, to increase the number of armories, but he would be very willing to support the principles of this bill so far as to establish depots for arms in the States where there were no arsenals. But, as it was suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, they had hardly time this session to act with a sufficient understanding of the subject, and he hoped the motion to postpone would prevail.

After some remarks from Messrs. LINN and WALL, in opposition to the postponement, the question was taken on Mr. CALHOUN's motion, and it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Crittenden, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Mangum, Moore, Page, Preston, Robins, Southard, Swift—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—22.

After some remarks from Messrs. BENTON and BUCHANAN in favor of the bill, and from Mr. KING, of Georgia, in favor of the postponement, Mr. K. moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was rejected: Yeas 16, nays 17.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved to strike out the armory in the South; and after some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN and PRESTON, in opposition to the motion, it was carried.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved further to amend the bill by inserting the words "or Southwest." The effect of this amendment is to leave it to the discretion of the President to locate the armory either in the West or Southwest.

This motion was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the arsenal of construction at St. Louis was stricken out; after which

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining for some time with closed doors, on reopening,

The Senate adjourned.

RESCINDING RESOLUTION.

The following preamble and resolution, offered by Mr. WHITE, being under consideration—

Whereas, on the 28th day of March, 1834, the Senate of the United States adopted a resolution in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And whereas, upon the question whether said resolution should be adopted, it was decided by one fifth of the Senators present that the same should be taken by yeas and nays, and the votes of the several members now stand recorded on the journal of the Senate:

And whereas the said resolution still remains on the journal of the Senate in full force, not rescinded, reversed, repealed, or annulled; and cannot now be expunged, cancelled, or in any way obliterated or defaced without violating that clause of the constitution of the United States which is in the following words, to wit: "Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of either House, on any question, shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal."

And whereas each Senator, before taking his seat, was bound to take, and did take, an oath to support said constitution:

And whereas the President of the United States, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, alluded to in said resolution, did not, in the opinion of the Senate, assume upon himself authority and powers not conferred upon him by the constitution and laws: Therefore, it is

Resolved, That the said resolution, and the opinion therein expressed, be, and the same hereby are, rescinded, reversed, and annulled; and it is hereby declared that the said resolution ought not to be considered as having had, or as now or hereafter having, any force or effect whatever.

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, by means not within my control, I have become so far connected with this subject as to consider it a duty to submit the resolution now under consideration, and to urge its adoption by such reasons as are satisfactory to my own mind. During our last session, the honorable Senator from Missouri offered a resolution, proposing that we should order the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, to be expunged from the journal. When it was taken up for consideration, entertaining the opinion that the Senate had not the power to make such an order, I moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the order to expunge, and all which followed it, and inserting that the resolution should be rescinded, reversed, repealed, and declared to be null and void. The Senator from Alabama moved that the question be first taken on striking out the word "expunge," and, after a very short debate, it was stricken out by almost a unanimous vote; and then, upon the motion of one of the Senators from Massachusetts, the subject was laid on the table. At this session we have a proposition, which is now on the table, for a qualified or limited expunging. Still believing my first impressions on the subject were correct, I have ventured to submit my resolution, and upon it will desire the decision of the Senate.

The first position assumed in the preamble to my resolution liable to doubt is, that we have not the power to expunge from our journal the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834.

Our Government is republican, and, by the constitution, it was intended that all agents in the different departments of it should be responsible for their public conduct. With a view to secure this accountability, so far as the two Houses of Congress are concerned, and also for the purpose of perpetuating a knowledge of what should be done by them, it is provided by the constitution of the United States, 5th section of the 1st article, that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may, in their judgment, require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House, on any question, shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." Generally, that interpretation of the constitution, or of a statute, is the true one, which would be put upon it by a common man. It appears to me very clear that were a common man asked what did the framers of the constitution mean should be done, when they used the language just quoted, he would answer, that each House should have faithfully recorded the proceedings of each day, and carefully preserve the book in which they were recorded. To determine the meaning of this word "keep," we are not to look into a glossary to see how many different definitions we can find, but to the context and to the object the framers of the constitution wished to attain. Each House is directed to keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same. The object evidently is, that the body itself may at all times know what it and its predecessors have done, and that the constituent may also know what has been done, and by whom.—[Bayard's Exposition of the Constitution, p. 58.]

If, as soon as we have recorded our daily proceedings, we have performed the whole duty required by this clause, and may then burn, tear up, obliterate, or expunge the journal, the whole object will be defeated. The convention were aware that neither House would be always in session, and that, when in session, the members themselves could not, in person, keep the journal; provision is therefore made in article 1, sections 2 and 3, that each House shall have power to appoint the necessary officers. Through officers thus appointed, the journal is kept and preserved, as the records of courts are kept and preserved by their clerks.

We are not only to keep the journal, but from time to time to publish the same. The journal which is kept is the one which is to be published; not once only, but from time to time. If we admit that after our proceedings have been once published, then we may expunge, how shall we comply with the injunction to publish from time to time? Those to whom the printed copies have been delivered are under no constitutional obligation to preserve their copies. They may be destroyed at pleasure. Upon their care we must depend to enable us to publish a second or third edition; yet we have been directed to keep, and from time to time publish. Again: if we do not publish a second or third edition from our own journal, having expunged some of our proceedings immediately after the first publication, then the first edition and the subsequent ones will not agree, because the expunged proceedings will not appear in the last publications, no matter whether the expunging is considered literal or figurative. And, what will make the matter worse is, there will be no record in charge of our own officer, by which to prove which edition is a true copy.

The provisions in the 7th section of the same article strongly support the construction for which I contend:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and, if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases, the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall not be a law."

The like ceremonies are to be gone through in relation to orders, resolutions, or votes, in which the concurrence of both Houses is necessary. Now, sir, is any gentleman prepared to say that, in any case arising under this section, we have the power to expunge the journal? If we cannot, how can we in any other case? The language requiring us to keep a journal of our proceedings is as strong and imperative as the language of this section requiring the President's objections to be entered on the journal, and the names of the voters to be recorded. The same solemn guards are thrown around both; and if we now have the power to expunge the journal of March, 1834, we also have the power to go back and expunge from the journals the proceedings in relation to any veto sent to us by any President.

To keep a journal of our proceedings must mean that we shall have them faithfully recorded, and then the record carefully preserved; otherwise, the whole context is disregarded, and the great object of responsibility of legislative agents defeated. Let us, for a moment, consider some of the familiar cases put by the other side. We employ a man "to keep the door." After he has opened it, and let some person in or out of the House, surely he is not at liberty to break the door. A man employs a person to keep his house. After the house is put in good order, the housekeeper is not at liberty to break or burn the furniture, or to expunge it, by making black marks around it. A merchant employs a person to keep his store and books. After the day's or week's work is over, the clerk is not at liberty to tear out or expunge any of the entries, showing the goods sold, or the cash received; yet all these things might lawfully be done by these different persons, if the arguments in favor of expunging our journal are correct.

It has been sometimes urged that each House has a discretion as to the matter that shall be put on its journal. This, to some extent, is true, but cannot affect my argument. Each House is forever bound to put enough matter on the journal to show on what subjects it acted and the decision of the body on each subject. To prove this discretionary power, it is said we may select for publication such parts of the journal as we please, and keep the rest secret. It is true, by the clause under consideration, each House is bound to keep a journal of all its proceedings, but may refrain from having published such parts as the public interest requires should be kept secret. This power to refrain from publishing is expressly given, and therefore may be legally exercised. It is, with me, conclusive to show that we are bound always to preserve the journal. Parts of it we need not publish. Now, if we are not bound to preserve the record of our proceedings, there would be no evidence in existence of what had been done upon those subjects in relation to which the journal had not been published.

Again: we have the express power given not to publish some parts of our proceedings; if, in addition to this, we assume the power which is not given, to expunge what we please, we may, and probably will, some time choose not to publish some proceeding which would not be acceptable to our constituents; and then, after it had performed what we intended, we could expunge it, and thus evade all that responsibility intended to be secured. It is said the journal is nothing but inducement to some other matter more important. This opinion I do not think is well founded. The journals, so far from being considered as merely introductory, or inducement to something more important, and therefore in our power to dispose of as we please, ought to be viewed as sacred, because they contain the only evidence of the judgment of the representatives of the people upon the different subjects acted on; they are the very essence, or, as the lawyers term it, the gist of the whole matter.

In our free and happy country our laws are binding, because they contain the will of the people themselves, expressed by their representatives, in the mode pointed out in the constitution. The journal is the only evidence of this will. An act is not binding because it is signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, but because it is the expressed will of a majority in each House; and the journal is the highest evidence of this will. At the last session, by some mistake, a bill, which our journal shows was indefinitely postponed, was signed by the presiding officers and by the President. It was no law, although it had the form of one. It wanted the essence, the will of a majority of one of the Houses, and the journal of that House is the highest and only evidence of the defect. I therefore deny that we have any power to expunge, on the ground that the journal is mere inducement to something more important. But, again, even if it were only inducement, I deny, on that account, we have any power to disobey a command of the constitution. It says we shall keep a journal of our proceedings. We call Heaven to witness we will obey this command. In consequence of this solemn promise, we are intrusted with matters of the highest interest. We have faithfully recorded one of our proceedings, but afterwards tear or blot it out, or expunge it—that is, prick it out—and are called upon for the reason, and answer, it was of no consequence, because it was mere inducement to something else. The excuse ought never to be admitted; if it is in one case, it might be in every case. We may obliterate, expunge, or burn, the whole.

It is further urged, if the whole record is destroyed, after the journal has been published, it makes no difference, because each printed copy is the journal. This I think an entire mistake; the printed journal is only a copy of the original, and, although it may be admitted as evidence in court, it is only because it is supposed to be a true copy of the original, and it has been printed by public authority; and because you cannot procure the original, it being the duty of the Secretary to keep it in his own possession. The original is the best evidence; and the party is only excused from producing it because he cannot procure it. Suppose the copy offered not a true one, the error is always corrected by having recourse to the original.

Again: if all these printed copies are originals, and we order the journal to be expunged, we must make our Secretary apply the process to each copy; if he does to one, and not to all, they will vary from each other; and if we apply the process to the original, and not to the printed copies, every copy will vary from the original. The journal of 1834 has been published—many copies of it—the obnoxious resolution with the rest. Suppose we now expunge it, actually or figuratively, and then publish another edition, the resolution would not appear in the last edition, and thus it would vary from that now in existence. If we decide that the printed copies are to be considered as the originals, and not copies merely, it appears to me we endanger the purity of our whole proceedings. It will be very easy for those who are ingenious in villany to print with our mark and impose on the world spurious copies, and insert as our proceedings matters which never occurred.

It is thought we err in giving the same sanctity to our journal which is properly given to the records of courts of justice; which, it is admitted, cannot be expunged or altered after the term. In my opinion, our journal ought to be considered the most sacred of the two. The records of the courts only affect the private rights of individuals; our records affect all society. Records of courts are only required to be kept by legislative enactments; the records of each House of Congress were not left to statutory enactments, but are required to be kept by the constitution itself.

Those who insist that we have the power to expunge, seek support from precedents; and it has been said that in the sixth year of the reign of Henry VIII. it was enacted that a record should be kept of the leaves of absence granted to different members of the Parliament. And from this it is argued that Parliament was bound by law after that time to keep a journal; and if they expunged any of their proceedings, so may we. To this I answer, that the expunging of an entry made on the journal after that time, on any other subject than of giving leave of absence to a member, is of no more weight than if such a statute had never been enacted; and gentlemen had not produced, and I do not believe they can produce, a case in which either House expunged any such entry. The statute did not require a record to be made of any thing except leave of absence; and if any other proceeding was recorded in the same book, it was by some order of the House; and the same power could, at any time, order it to be expunged, just as well as if it had been recorded in any other book. Our constitution requires that we shall keep a journal of all our proceedings; and we ought to preserve the whole with as much care as the Parliament did their leaves of absence.

By the articles of confederation, Congress was required to publish every month the journal of their proceedings; and from this it is inferred they were bound to keep a journal of all their proceedings. In the first place, I think this inference very far from imposing the same obligation upon the old Congress that is imposed on us by the present constitution. In the next place, if it did, what cases have gentlemen shown of any matter being expunged from their journals? None.

It were a useless consumption of time in me to notice in detail the different cases cited, to show that the journals have been expunged by both Houses in Great Britain, under the Colonial Government in Virginia, and in the State of Massachusetts; because the same general answer may be given to all. The Legislature was not required, by either a constitution or a law, to keep a journal. The journal was only kept by virtue of the order or usage of each House, and could be changed at any time, to any extent either House might think right. But a precedent has been referred to in my own State, and there the constitution does require that each House shall keep a journal. Gentlemen who rely upon this precedent have been misinformed. They have not named the case, but I can be at no loss as to what the reference is made. It must be the case of Judge Williams, who was impeached and tried; and to convict, the constitution required two thirds of the members. When opinions were expressed, there were two thirds for conviction, if absent members were not counted; if they were, there were not two thirds. Upon this point there was a great variety of opinion, and ultimately the presiding member discharged the Judge as acquitted. On the next morning, when the journal was read, a member moved to correct it, because the court had authorized no such order. This motion, it will be perceived, was in a court; therefore, no precedent for us. Next, it was not to expunge any thing which the Senate had done, but to strike from the journal that which had been put there by mistake, and which the body never had ordered. Now, sir, if a man were set to search a case unlike the one before us, he could not do better than take the Tennessee case.

Two precedents have been referred to in the proceedings of Congress, upon which I will make one or two remarks.

On the last day of the session of 1806, two petitions were presented by a member of the Senate, complaining of the conduct of one of our courts. They were received by the body, and disposed of. During the same day a member moved to return the petitions, and to expunge the order for their reception from the journal; which was done accordingly.

The first observation I make is, that we are to keep a journal of our proceedings. In other words, at the end of each day our record ought to show the result of our judgment upon each subject before us. The journal of that day does not show this precisely. After the entry was expunged, the subject of those memorials was placed precisely where, in the judgment of that body, it ought to rest; and that was, that Congress should have nothing to do with it. I will illustrate my meaning by a familiar case. A merchant, in the forenoon, sells a bale of cloth to a customer, who pays him one hundred dollars for it. He enters the transaction on his journal. In the afternoon of the same day the customer returns, and asks the merchant to take back the cloth, and return him his money; with which request he complies; and, instead of encumbering his journal with another useless entry, he scratches out, or, in other words, expunges, the entry he made when he sold the cloth. After this expunging, his journal will show the exact truth relative to this bale of cloth; that is, it will give no account whatever of the transaction, because the cloth was his in the morning, and it is still his the next morning. If we expunge the resolution of 28th March, 1834, by an order now made, our journal of that day will be so altered as not to show the result of the Senate's judgment on that day upon that subject; therefore, there is no likeness in the two cases.

Again: if they were similar, the precedent ought to have no weight whatever. There was no time for either discussion or deliberation. Besides, this was done in high party times; related to an exciting topic—Burr's conspiracy—and the expunging was ordered by a strictly party vote.

The second case is that which occurred in the House of Representatives in 1822.

Mr. Randolph announced the death of Mr. Pinckney, who was not dead; and, for that reason, moved an adjournment. The adjournment took place; and the next day he moved that the reason assigned for the adjournment should be expunged, because it was not true; and it was accordingly expunged. In this case, what the House did was not expunged. It had, in fact, adjourned, and so the journal still shows; but the reason why they came to a decision to adjourn, being founded in mistake, was expunged.

Now, sir, the journal at this moment shows, as well as it did when the entry was made, the proceedings of the House on that day; and all the alteration produced is, that the reason for one of their acts cannot be known, as it is expunged. But in the case under consideration, to expunge would be to destroy all evidence of a decision itself; for which I insist we have no precedent in the case relied on. The truth must be, the members of the convention were well aware of all the precedents in Great Britain, and in our own country, which existed when they framed the constitution, and intended to leave nothing to the discretion of either House. They intended effectually to secure a just accountability from the representative to the constituent; therefore, they used in the constitution itself the imperative language, "Each House shall keep a journal," &c. Let us not, then, be misled by precedents which we fancy may bear us out. At best they are nothing "but crutches on which weak minds sustain themselves;" and if we are sustained by these precedents in expunging the resolution of 1834, the precedent which we will now make may sustain those who come after us in expunging important principles from the constitution itself.

It is urged that the mere act of expunging the journal is not a matter of any importance; it is the effect or moral of the resolution which it is desired to remove. Why not adopt my resolution, then? No man can doubt our power to rescind, repeal, and reverse, the resolution. The bad moral taught by the resolution will be removed by the subsequent decision pronouncing the former one to be erroneous. But it is thought best to use the word "expunge," as, by the use of that word in parliamentary proceedings, the principles of civil liberty have been maintained in other countries. If it has been always used for wise and good purposes elsewhere, let us be cautious that we do not so use it as eventually to produce mischief in this the most free and favored country in the world.

It appears to me, however, that this word, like every thing else over which we have no control, has been sometimes used when correct principles were asserted, and, in other instances, when the reverse was the case. When King James entered one of the Houses of the British Parliament, and with his own hand expunged the journal; when the House of Lords expunged the recognisance entered into before the Lord Mayor of London; and when the journals of the Virginia Legislature were expunged, or attempted to be expunged, during the Colonial Government, it was not the watchword of the friends of liberty. I am not aware that it ever has been used, and I fear it never will be used, in aid of civil liberty, or the rights of man, when the process is resorted to to gratify the feelings of those in power, who are generally too prone to believe liberty is attacked whenever any portion of their conduct is disapproved, or there is any attempt to impose restraints on their liberty to do as they imagine is most for the public good.

Mr. President, I propose in the next place to examine the soundness of the reason assigned why we may and ought to expunge.

It is briefly this: that, as the Senate is the tribunal established by the constitution to try the President when impeached, it is unconstitutional to pass a resolution which charges him with a crime for which he might be impeached, and that this resolution not only charges, but convicts him of a crime. I do not concur in this opinion, and beg leave to assign my reasons for dissenting from it.

Under the constitution, the powers of the Senate are judicial, executive, or legislative; judicial, when trying impeachments, executive, when advising the President in relation to treaties, or as to the persons to be appointed to office; legislative, in making laws, and in every thing connected with making, amending, or repealing them. [Constitution U. S., art. 1, sec. 1.]

The power of the Senate in all legislative matters is equal to that of the House of Representatives in all respects, with the single exception, that bills to raise revenue must originate in the House. In the discharge of any legislative or executive duty, any individual member may say in his place that the President, or any other civil officer, has assumed powers not conferred upon him by the constitution or laws. What any one may lawfully say, every other may say with equal propriety. What any one or all may say, individually, all, or a majority, may, with propriety, express by way of resolution, which is nothing but an expression of the opinion of a majority on a given subject.

The objection to this resolution is, that it charges the President with, and convicts him of, a crime, for which he may be impeached by the House; and, in that case, it would be the duty of the Senate to try him; therefore, it was unconstitutional to adopt the resolution.

To this I answer, first, if it were an unconstitutional act to pass the resolution, it furnishes no reason why it should be expunged. If it did, we might go back and expunge from the journal every thing which had been done by political opponents, from the adoption of the constitution, which we chose to say was unconstitutional; all entries relative to the alien and sedition laws, chartering of banks, &c. These entries, which we deem violations of the constitution, of all others, are the ones we ought to desire should stand. By them the disgrace of political opponents would be perpetuated. Were I one of a majority who voted for such unconstitutional proceedings, I would feel very grateful to opponents who would wipe out, or expunge, the evidence of my disgrace so soon as they obtained the power.

But again: we find in the constitution, first article, third section, these words:

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

And, in article two, section four, the language following:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

To my mind it is very clear that neither the President nor any other civil officer can be impeached, unless he is charged with some crime. The question then is, does the resolution of the 28th of March, 1834, charge the President with the commission of a crime? It is in these words:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

It is with this resolution, and this only, we have to deal. As to what the bank or its agents had said or done, or as to the arguments or speeches of gentlemen, the Senate has given no opinion; and, upon the question now pending, we have nothing to do with them. I affirm that this resolution does not impute to the President any crime or misdemeanor whatever. There can be no such thing as a crime, without a bad motive. The resolution is entirely silent as to the motives by which the Chief Magistrate was governed. It therefore charges nothing but mere error of judgment. It alleges he assumed powers not conferred by the constitution or laws; but whether the motives which induced him to assume these powers were virtuous, or the reverse, is not stated. If they were to promote the public good, and he honestly believed the powers he assumed had been conferred, although he might be mistaken, yet he ought to be applauded as a patriot, instead of being censured as a criminal.

Intention to do wrong--bad motives--are the essence of crime; and without them there can be no such thing. In this very case, if, in every act the President did, he mistook his powers, but still acted from high and pure motives, no honest tribunal upon earth could convict him of crime. This new doctrine of crime without evil intent has no sanction in morals, in reason, or in any adjudged case. The only cases referred to for its support are the impeachments against Judges Chase and Pickering. In the first of these, it is true, some of the articles of impeachment did not charge bad motives, but upon those he was acquitted without a dissenting voice.

In Pickering's case, the question was whether he was sane or not. He had been a highly respectable man, but acted badly on the bench; and it was alleged he was deranged. It was answered, if he was deranged, it was from intemperance, and therefore an aggravation of the offence; and on that ground he was convicted. God forbid that a doctrine so unreasonable, so inconsistent with our imperfect condition, as that of crime without evil design, should ever be sanctioned anywhere, especially here. You and I are obliged to act in this very question; it is our public duty to form opinions, and act upon them; we disagree; must one of us be guilty of a crime? Look at the situation of courts. A cause is tried before two judges in an inferior court, and they disagree; must one be a criminal? A writ of error is taken from an inferior to a higher tribunal, and the judgment reversed; are the judges of the court to be viewed and treated as criminals? If they are, suppose there to be a still higher tribunal, to which the same cause is carried, and the last decision reversed, and the first established: what are you to do then—punish the second set of judges?

In the federal circuit courts, a judge of the Supreme Court and the district judge decide a cause; a writ of error is taken to the Supreme Court, where the same judge forms one of the court, and he concurs with his brethren in reversing his own decision. What is to be done with him? According to this strange doctrine, he is obliged to be guilty of a crime, because he has decided against himself. Away with such doctrine; it is absurd. Error and crime are as distinct as the motives by which angels and devils are governed.

The great error in the argument on the other side is occasioned by not attending to the distinction between the acts of private citizens and public officers. A private individual does an unlawful act; the law presumes he did it from bad motives; because, so far from being compelled to act, it was his duty not to act. In the case of a public officer, he is compelled to act; he is sworn to do so; and whenever he does an official act, the presumption is that his motives were good, although the act may have been contrary to law. If the law were not so, no honest man, conscious of his defects, would ever fill an office. He is bound to act—sworn to do so; and when he uses all the means within his reach to inform himself, and exercises his best judgment, he is innocent, whether his acts are lawful or the reverse. This distinction between the acts of individuals and of public officers runs through all the cases which can be found in our books. The acts spoken of in the resolution as assumptions of power, in derogation of the constitution and law, were acts done by the President in his official capacity; therefore, the resolution imputes to him no criminality whatever.

The Senate unanimously adopted a resolution against the late Postmaster General, condemning some of his acts as unlawful; but it charges him with no crime. If error is hereafter to constitute crime in our public officers, I should like to know who is to be judge. Who feels that he has the infallible standard? If any one will say "I have it," my word for it, if you will cultivate his acquaintance, you will soon find he wants the common requisites—integrity and talents—essential to constitute a tolerable judge.

If we expunge the journal, then we will have established the doctrine that, in every case, a President, or any other civil officer, may assume authority and powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both, and we dare not say that is our opinion. Against such a doctrine I enter my protest. We not only have the power, but it is our duty to exercise it whenever such a case occurs. Suppose the President to nominate for some office a man who already holds the office of governor or judge; I surely would have a right to say I will not vote for him, because I think he has, in the office he now holds, assumed powers he did not possess, and therefore I will not trust him farther. After having said so, if he is impeached, I cannot be challenged and excluded from sitting as one of his triers.

I have charged him with no crime; and, having given an opinion that his conduct was unlawful does not disqualify me. If this were so, we must reverse the whole order of things; and whenever a judge is called on to decide a cause similar to one he had before decided, we must exclude him, and appoint some other; whereas the common impression has ever been, that the judge is the better qualified for having examined and previously decided the same or a similar question.

In England a peer cannot be challenged because he has previously given an opinion; nor can a Senator here. They are judges, having a right to decide the law as well as the facts of the case.

But the Senate heretofore attempted to exercise this very power in the case of the Panama nominations. Mr. Adams, (I beg pardon, the late President,) in his message, told us he had the power to have sent ministers without consulting the Senate, but, as they were soon to be in session, he thought it best to delay the appointments, and consult them. A resolution was submitted, denying this claimed power, and a long discussion ensued. If we contested this claimed but unexercised power, can any one doubt but, if it had been exercised, we would have denied it by a resolution if we could? For one, I never doubted but the President honestly entertained the opinion expressed.

The subject of removing the deposits had been regularly brought before the Senate by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was one on which we had a right to legislate. We had a right to know why it was done, and how it was done; to either approve or disapprove; to legislate upon it; to direct the money to be returned, or to be kept any where else; in short, to approve or disapprove what had been done. We could have thanked the Executive for his prompt attention to the public interest; for his efficiency in displacing one Secretary, who would not remove the money, and appointing another who would. Why, then, had the Senate no power to say that, in doing these things, he transcended his powers? To me it appears they had constitutionally the power to pass the resolution. But it then was, and yet is, my opinion that, in exercising this power, the Senate themselves erred when they resolved that he had assumed powers not conferred. I believed he had the power to remove the Secretary, and to do every other act then attributed to him, if he believed a proper case was made out for its exercise. Am I to be told by Senators who voted for the resolution that I committed a crime when I voted against them? I hope not. Nor am I at liberty to say they committed a crime when they disagreed in opinion with me. This is every thing the resolution charges the President with. He thought he had the power which he exercised; a majority of the Senate thought he had not, and so expressed themselves in the resolution, not questioning the purity of the motives from which he acted. By doing so, they did not assume any power not conferred on them by the constitution.

In Great Britain the House of Lords acts as a court. A writ of error lies there to remove a cause from the Court of King's Bench. Suppose a cause thus removed, and the judgment reversed, because the judges had assumed powers they did not possess; if they were afterwards impeached for so deciding, because they were bribed, could not the Peers try the impeachment? Undoubtedly they could. I cannot vote to expunge or deface our journal, because I think the constitution forbids it. I cannot assign as a reason for either expunging or rescinding the resolution that the Senate had no power to adopt it, because I do not think so; and because I think it of the last importance we should retain with the Senate those powers vested in it for high and important purposes, and which are, or may be, essential to preserve the liberty of the people: but most willingly can I vote to rescind, reverse, and repeal, the resolution: because I think that the Senate erred in adopting it. To say the least, there are doubts of our power to expunge; and no one, I think, ought to be certain the Senate had no power to adopt the resolution. Why, then, shall we cling to the word "expunge," and to this reason, when there is a plain course to pursue, in which what is due to the Chief Magistrate and to ourselves can be accomplished? To me the reason is obvious. To expunge has become an executive measure. It is now the watchword of a party; and, by its use, those are to be hunted down who will not conform to the will of the party. In March, 1834, when the resolution was adopted, a majority of the Senate was opposed to the Chief Magistrate. His long and valuable services have endeared him to the American people. They are sensitive as to every thing which can affect his reputation as a man or as an officer.

At the last session, the member from Missouri (I doubt not, from a conviction of the correctness of the procedure) submitted his proposition to expunge. The Chief Magistrate had made up his mind who should be his successor, and had determined to use all his personal influence and official patronage to secure his election. Whilst there was a majority of the Senate opposed to him, this patronage could not be brought to operate with full effect. Upon discussing the expunging resolution, the opinions of every Senator were expressed. The times of some were then expiring—the very day of voting. The venerable Chief Magistrate at once saw the use which could be made of this instrument, and he has given it his full influence ever since, under the hope that, through its use, the Senate could be expurgated; members whom he deemed unworthy of the station excluded; and their places supplied by others, in his opinion, more worthy. He seized the weapon, and has wielded it with all the effect he could. The cry "expunge" was raised, and has been continued. I shall speak of what I know, and what I believe to be true. The time of one of the Senators in my own State had expired. Members of the Legislature and of the House of Representatives were to be elected in August. The Chief Magistrate interfered, through the agency of others, in the elections to be made by the people, and in the election to be made by the Legislature. Does any one who hears me doubt this statement? He need not. The following facts will show, incontestably, that he interfered in the elections to be made by the people:

1st. His two letters addressed to the Rev. Mr. Gwin, which all who look into newspapers must have read. They were intended for publication, and were actually published.

2d. Besides the number of copies of the Globe itself, hundreds of which he has sent to Tennessee under his frank, he franked many copies of the prospectus for the extra Globe, which contains very little except misrepresentations and insinuations utterly unfounded and untrue. There can be no pretence that this was sent because it contained any speech, or any public document. There is no such thing in it. I hold one that he sent to Tennessee, frank and all, in my hand, just as received by the gentleman to whom it was addressed; and many others were scattered through the country under his frank.

3d. He wrote a letter to Mr. Curry, which was used in Colonel Standefer's district, with a view to influence public opinion.

4th. He wrote a letter to my colleague, a copy of which was furnished to Mr. Johnson, who used it in his canvass upon the stump, with a view to aid his election; and it must have been intended for such use when written, otherwise we must suppose my colleague abused the confidence of the Chief Magistrate, in permitting his letter to be applied to a purpose not intended by the writer.

These few facts, independent of many others which might be stated, satisfy me that he did interfere, and use his influence with the people to regulate their opinions in the elections.

Secondly. He interfered with the Legislature.

1. On the next day after they assembled, under his frank, each member received three numbers of the extra Globe, amounting to three hundred. Here is one of them, frank and all. Some of these Globes contain matter of the lowest kind, intended, no doubt, to disgust the members with their former Senator, and to prevent his re-election.

2. He wrote a letter to Mr. Nicholson, one of the members, which we have seen published in the newspaper, in which he complains of the former Senator for not defending him on the expunging resolution at the last session, and justifying the use made of his franking privilege.

3. He wrote a similar letter to Mr. Brown, another member, a copy of which I now hold in my hand.

4. He wrote to Mr. Guild, one of the leading members, a letter containing an argument to prove the propriety of instructing the Senators to vote for expunging the resolution of March, 1834, and urging the propriety of giving such instructions, and authorized Mr. Guild to submit it to the perusal of other members, which he did; and

5. From this place was sent to this same Mr. Guild a copy of the form of expunging, which the Senators were to be instructed to use; and this form corresponds, as I have understood, with that used in the resolution proposed at this session by the Senator from Missouri.

All these facts prove that the first object was to defeat the re-election of a Senator who, at the last session, had shown he would not conform his conduct to the will of the Chief Magistrate; and, when that failed, to cause such instructions to be given as it was known that that Senator could not obey, and thereby force him to resign. Both these objects failed. The Senator was re-elected, and the Legislature would not give any instructions.

Mr. President, I have not stated these facts by way of complaint against the Executive. I perhaps am, least of all others, competent to judge whether such a course was in conformity with his station or his peculiar situation; but I state them that justice may be done to the independence of the Legislature, and to their determination not to be persuaded or forced from what they thought to be the path of duty. Their course is the more commendable, when it is remembered they sat within a few miles of his residence; were surrounded by his personal friends; and that they themselves can furnish from their own body many of his earliest, firmest, and most undeviating political and personal friends. Let it be remembered, also, that they then were, and now are, the firm and unflinching supporters of his administration, upon every point where his measures conform to the principles avowed to bring him into power. Yet they would not, and did not, give their Senators any instructions upon this question. They were willing to trust them without instructions upon this as well as other points; and on this account it is that I feel myself under higher obligations to endeavor to carry out the will of my State upon this subject, than I should have been if formally instructed.

My opinion had been expressed, and was well known; I believe it conforms to the opinion of my State and its Legislature; and I hold myself especially bound to endeavor to have it effected by the adoption of the resolution which I have submitted. Those who believe that either I or the people of my State are opponents of the administration, mistake our character. Our politics are as they have been; we now stand on the same ground, advocate the same principles we did in 1828, when sustaining General Jackson to bring him into power. But we are the slaves of no man; and when it is attempted to ingraft on our principles a system which does not belong to them, I will not yield my assent, be the consequences what they may. My wish is to rescind, reverse, and repeal, the resolution of 1834, because, in my judgment, it is erroneous, and because I believe such is the judgment of my State. To vote to expunge it, I cannot; because, in my opinion, the constitution forbids it; and, anxious as my constituents are to vindicate the character of the Chief Magistrate, they will never require me to do so at the expense of that sacred instrument, which we are all under the most high and most solemn obligations to maintain inviolate.

Mr. WALKER expressed the grounds on which he should vote against the resolution.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken on the rescinding resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. King of Georgia, White—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wright—28.

So the resolution was negatived.

Mr. WRIGHT presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of New York, instructing their Senators to support Mr. BENTON's expunging resolutions. Mr. W. said that he had had these resolutions in his possession for some time, and had only delayed presenting them till the subject was called up in the Senate.

Mr. CLAY observed that, as the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee was disposed of, he thought it would be proper to take up the other resolution on the same subject and dispose of it also. He had not the charge of these resolutions, and would therefore make no motion.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he would move to take it up. He did not wish to make a speech on it, but having been instructed by his Legislature to vote against these expunging resolutions, he wished to record his vote in obedience to his instructions.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that there were only thirty Senators present, and he hardly thought gentlemen would take a question of such importance when the Senate was so thinly attended.

Mr. BENTON said that he had intended to ask for the vote on his resolution after the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee was disposed of, or rather to give notice of the hour when he would call it up, in order that there might be a full attendance of Senators when they came to the vote. If 12 o'clock to-morrow was agreeable to the Senate, he would call up the resolution at that hour.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed his concurrence in Mr. BENTON's notice, and withdrew his motion.

JOSEPH GRANT.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT, the vote by which the bill for the relief of Joseph Grant had been ordered to a third reading was reconsidered.

It was then moved by Mr. KNIGHT to strike out the amendment which secured from harm those who had used the invention (for hat bodies) since the patent had expired, which this bill was intended to renew.

Some discussion took place, in which Mr. RUGGLES, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. PORTER, Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. CLAY, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. KNIGHT, and Mr. NILES, took part.

The yeas and noes were then demanded by Mr. WRIGHT, and ordered, on the motion to strike out.

The question was then about to be taken, when Mr. HUBBARD moved to lay the bill on the table; which was decided in the negative: Yeas 18, nays 20.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider the vote amending the bill by inserting the proviso, and decided in the negative: Yeas 18, nays 19.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 19, nays 17.

[This bill was to renew a patent, expired perhaps two years ago, for a machine for making hat bodies. Since the expiration of the patent, the invention had fallen into the public hands, and was now in common use. Mr. RUGGLES introduced an amendment to secure to those who have the machines the right of using them, notwithstanding the renewal of the patent. The bill had been originally ordered to be engrossed, with this amendment ingrafted upon it; but as it was complained that this prevented the patentee from making any advantage of his invention, the motion to reconsider was made.]

PATENT OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES, the Senate took up the bill providing for a building for the accommodation of the Patent Office, the bill being on its third reading.

Mr. CLAY called for the reading of the communication made by William Brent and others, offering to sell the old brick capitol to the Government, for the use of the Patent Office; which being read,

Mr. RUGGLES laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the committee of the other House on the subject; which was read; and after some remarks from Mr. RUGGLES in support of the bill, and from Messrs. CRITTENDEN and CLAYTON in opposition to it,

Mr. CLAYTON moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill providing for the purchase of the building formerly used for the temporary accommodation of Congress; and after some remarks from Messrs. RUGGLES, CLAYTON, and CALHOUN, the motion was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Kent, Leigh, Moore, Nicholas, Page, Porter, White—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Niles, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall—19.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to amend the bill by adding the following proviso: "providing a contract can be made for the erection and completion of the same in a workmanlike and faithful manner, for a sum not exceeding $108,000, to include all expenses whatever," which amendment was agreed to; and on the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 20, nays 11, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Leigh, Moore, Porter, Southard—11.

JOHN BRAHAN.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the

SENATE.]

John Brahan.

Treasury, in answer to a resolution of his on the subject of money paid by the legal representatives of the late General Brahan to the United States district attorney for the northern district of Alabama, and by him paid into the hands of certain men in Madison county, Alabama.

Mr. MOORE said he had introduced the resolution which had brought forth the report and accompanying documents as a response, under a sense of official public duty, in consequence of rumors having obtained currency deeply implicating the Treasury Department, the United States district attorney for the northern district of Alabama, and others, concerning a loan of public money, amounting to something like thirty-six thousand dollars, to Caruthers & Kinkle, and others, in Alabama, for one, two, three, four, and five years. In order that others may fully understand the history of this transaction, it would be necessary to bear in mind that, in 1819, the late General Brahan became indebted to the Government for about eighty thousand dollars; and upon his executing deeds of trust and mortgage, upon real and personal property, which gave the Government full and ample indemnity, indulgence had been given him in his lifetime, which had been extended to his legal representatives until a short time past; and now, he presumed, in consequence of the very great exigency and straitened condition of the public finances at present, the Department was not permitted to give longer indulgence, and that the Executive had been required to coerce payment from the estate; which having been done, and the money paid into the hands of the district attorney for the northern district of Alabama, he, in pursuance of what he presumed to be his instructions from the Treasury Department, had paid the same over to Caruthers & Kinkle, and others, on a loan upon time, and still holding the estate of the late General Brahan responsible for the final payment of the debt.

Mr. M. said, from the conspicuous situation these beneficiaries and recipients of the favor of the Treasury Department occupy in the correspondence now before the Senate, it may not be improper to inquire who they are, and more particularly as regards Caruthers & Kinkle. Sir, said he, these gentlemen are celebrated in their section of country as being warm and enthusiastic political partisans, great favorites of the administration, and particularly of the Post Office Department, from which they have heretofore (not under the present head of that Department) obtained all the important mail contracts in that section of country; and having risen to affluence by a liberal participation in the extra allowance system, they take "Turner also," Simon Pure, into the firm, who, by carrying religion on his lips and politics in his heart, had rendered himself acceptable to the party. The firm, the trio, have been loud and noisy politicians, "express great fears of the awful consequence of dividing the party; yes, the democratic party, in their estimation, ought not to be divided." They have been active, also, in exciting and prosecuting an unnatural and illiberal persecution against any public servant whom they thought had been too honest to sacrifice his principles and his honor for party considerations, who was too proud to become a fawning sycophant, and too independent to be as servile as some of their own party and they themselves were. And now, when from the laborious exertions of his honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] and his colleagues on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom the public owe much for the exposure of that maladministration and system of favoritism and espionage that had bankrupted the Department, and which exposure had put a stop to the extra allowance system, these gentlemen abandoned many of their contracts for carrying the mail, and became successful applicants for the loan of the public money, in order to carry on large land speculations, which promise greater advantages than mail contracts without extra allowances. For he was informed, upon good authority, that Caruthers went forth with the money to the great land market, for the purpose of investing it in land speculations. It was necessary that he should be in a hurry, because he had good reason to believe that the heirs of General Brahan might complain, (as they have done,) and cause an examination to be made into the transaction, which might produce utter disappointment.

And although he would not say that the head of the Treasury Department had been wilfully derelict in duty, yet he would say that he thought the whole correspondence authorized a strong suspicion that he had not used due diligence in this matter, in order to prevent impositions. Sir, said Mr. M., will any one believe, if he had been so lost to a proper sense of what was due to himself as a public functionary, and those whom he represented, as to have interested himself for any political friend, that he could have obtained from the Treasury Department the use of thirty-six thousand dollars for five years, under similar circumstances? No, sir. No one knew better than did the President, [Mr. KING,] that his application, either for himself or his friend, would have been properly scrutinized; and the impropriety would have appeared glaring. Can any one doubt whether the Secretary of the Treasury would then have replied to the Solicitor of the Treasury so readily, and in such laconic style, "make the arrangement (forthwith) to-day?" Mr. M. said he was not so much opposed to these men having the use of this money—for he would as soon they should have it as for the pet banks to receive it and loan it out to other partisans—but his objection was to the manner in which it had been unnecessarily coerced from the worthy widow and heirs of the late General Brahan, whom he thought had more claim upon the public sympathy than those into whose hands it had been placed, whose only merit was their zeal, activity, and devotion, in party politics.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) one thing most extraordinary was, that whilst the Treasury Department acknowledges the debt already well secured, and that "it had no right to substitute one debtor in the place of another for the same debt," that it should have seen the propriety and utility, as connected with the public interest, and a due regard to that justice which the worthy widow and heirs of the late General Brahan had a right to demand, of granting indulgence for the payment of this money, when a portion had already been paid into the hands of the executors, and the property sold and bonds obtained entirely sufficient to meet the payment of the remainder, and upon application not made by the widow and heirs or legal representatives, but those unconnected with the estate; but for the estate to be held still responsible for the final payment of the debt virtually already discharged, whilst others have the use of the money for speculative purposes, was truly "the unkindest cut of all." Sir, (said Mr. M.,) men are so ignorant and blind as not to see the leading cause which influences these men in their political course; why they inscribe on the door of their mail coaches the name of the heir apparent "in large capital letters;" why they cry out so loud, "don't divide the democratic party;" yes, "the lovely democratic party" "must not be divided;" why the Governor of Alabama appoints the senior contractor his aide-camp, and why his aid franks him and his slavish creatures in turn through all their line of many contracts.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) is it not a little surprising that this military Governor should have permitted his patriotic and military aid to go in pursuit of large land speculations, instead of accompanying him to the Creek nation in pursuit of that rich harvest of military glory and military laurels which have been so profusely heaped upon him of late? But, sir, to be serious. The plain English of all this is, they do not want "the spoils divided;" they want "all the loaves and fishes," all the money themselves; and to obtain it they are willing to become "man-worshippers" and mere subalterns in the ranks of unprincipled partisans.

Mr. M. said he would detain the Senate no longer; but concluded by asking that it would indulge him in his proposition to have the report and accompanying documents printed.

Here Mr. WRIGHT moved that the motion to print be laid on the table until to-morrow morning; which was agreed to.

After transacting some other business,
The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. CLAY rose and said he had a petition to present from the citizens of a portion of Kentucky, recommending the Colonization Society to the favorable notice of Congress, and asking aid in its behalf. Mr. C. said it was too late, he was aware, for any action on the petition at this session; but he would take occasion to remark that, after all his experience and his observation of the course of the society, his convictions as to the utility of this great project remained without change; and he trusted that the society would hereafter receive a larger portion of the public favor than it had heretofore enjoyed. At present, he would merely move to lay the petition on the table; which was agreed to.

JOHN BRAHAN.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the case of General John Brahan, which was yesterday laid on the table; and a discussion ensued, which lasted several hours, in which Mr. KING of Alabama, Mr. PORTER, and Mr. EWING of Ohio, participated.

Mr. MOORE said he had not been disappointed in the effort made by his colleague to palliate the censure which he thought was likely to fall upon the Treasury Department for the course it had pursued relative to this matter; but he could not believe he had been at all successful in that effort. Mr. M. said his colleague had been adroit in his attempt to change the true issue. He had done him the honor to refer to his course some three or four years since, in opposition to the bill for the relief of General Brahan himself. He would not deny that at that time he opposed the bill, believing conscientiously that, from the peculiar manner in which the debt had accrued, he, consistently with a duty he then owed those whom he represented, was bound to oppose it; and although he then differed from his colleague, the Senate then accorded in his views. But times had changed. The Treasury at that time was not overflowing. The wits of the best statesmen then had not been put to the rack in order to devise ways and means for its appropriation. The bill then was for the relief of General Brahan, for the reasons alluded to, which it was unnecessary for him to enlarge upon. It was true he opposed it from a sense of duty, but he could not admit that his colleague had done him justice in quoting some terms in which that opposition was made; in that he had been mistaken. But this was a matter foreign to the question before the Senate. He had, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, been desirous that the bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of the late General Brahan should have received their favorable consideration, and was yet in hopes the Senate would pass the bill, and for this he did not consider himself as obnoxious to the charge of inconsistency. Times were different; the parties had changed, and the bill itself was a different measure. Again he said his colleague had unnecessarily and gratuitously volunteered himself in the defence of the honorable member in the other House who represented the district in which the parties resided, before any charge against him had been made; he had never mentioned his name in any remarks of his in connexion with this matter; his volunteering his defence, therefore, was altogether uncalled for. He knew his colleague was unwilling to see any thing like politics connected with the giving Caruthers & Kinkle and D. B. Turner the use of the thirty-six thousand dollars of the public money. It was natural for his colleague to be skeptical and unwilling to receive light on this subject, yet he hoped he would be willing to let the report and accompanying documents be printed, which would enable others to judge for themselves. Mr. M. said it was contended that all who had had any agency in this matter had acted with a view of promoting the interest of Mrs. Brahan and the heirs of the late General Brahan; but with such views the course pursued, he thought, was inconsistent, and not at all calculated to produce such a result.

If the indulgence and the use of the money had been sought for them, the application would have been made by them or the legal representatives; and if, as has been contended by his colleague, the object in giving the order upon the United States district attorney in favor of Caruthers had been only to suspend the final settlement of the matter until time was given to know the final action of Congress upon the bill now pending, why then he would say they had been very unfortunate in the means they had availed themselves of in order to effect that object.

With such an object in view, it seemed to him the order would have been different. Not that the "arrangement" should be made to-day, or immediately (he believed was the word;) but let a conditional arrangement be made by which these men may have the money for the use of the estate until the fate of the bill pending before Congress shall be known; but, in lieu of this, orders were given that these partisan gentry should have the benefit of the money for five years, unconditionally, and without consulting the widow and heirs immediately interested.

Mr. M. said he thought, as he had said before, that if the application for the use of this money had proceeded from those entertaining different political views, and by some who had been less distinguished as enthusiastic and zealous partisans, the application would have been more rigidly scrutinized, and the result different; but he was willing the public should have an opportunity of forming a correct opinion upon this subject, and, to enable it to do so, he hoped the report and documents would be printed; and they were ordered to be printed accordingly.

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill from the House making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States for the year 1836, was taken up; and Mr. W. went into an explanation of the details of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to reduce the amount of appropriations, on the ground that it was impossible to expend so large a sum as that appropriated during the remainder of the year, economically or profitably. The old rate of expenditure for fortifications, he said, had never exceeded $800,000 in a year; and now it was proposed to appropriate, in time of profound peace, when there was not the slightest prospect of a war, in this bill, and the one that had been sent from the Senate to the House, at least four and a half millions of dollars. He wished to know, and he earnestly desired gentlemen to answer him, why it was sought to make this vast and unusual appropriation at this time. Was it intended that it should remain locked up in the Treasury, or remain in the hands of the disbursing agents? It was perfectly clear, he said, that this money would not be required, and ought not be appropriated; and he therefore moved to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the appropriations one half.

Mr. CLAYTON did not consider the appropriations too high, considering that last year the fortification bill was lost, and that they were now appropriating for two years instead of one. In order to obviate the difficulties suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, as to the moneys remaining idle in the hands of the disbursing agents, he would submit an amendment, providing that it shall not be drawn from the Treasury until it is wanted for the expenditures authorized by the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN withdrew his motion to recommit, in order to give way to the above amendment by Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. CLAY thought there was no inconsistency between the two propositions, to amend the bill as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, with the view of reducing the amount proposed for fortifications, and to amend it as proposed by the Senator from Delaware, to restrain the issue of money from the public Treasury, except as it should be called for in a course of regular disbursement. Both might be well adopted, and he hoped would be.

He had, however, risen more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the enormous and alarming amount of appropriations which had been actually made, or were in progress, during the session. He had procured from the Secretary of the Senate a statement of such as had been made by bills which had passed one or both Houses up to the 27th of last month, when it amounted to about twenty-five millions. Since then, other bills had passed, which swelled it up to thirty-two or three millions; and other bills were now in progress, and would probably pass, carrying it up to forty millions, or beyond that sum. Forty millions of dollars in one year, when we have no debt, and no foreign war! Will not the country be justly alarmed, profoundly astonished, when it hears of these enormous appropriations? Is it possible to proceed with the Government on such a scale of expenditure?

Why, sir, it is a greater amount than is appropriated to similar objects by the British Parliament, since its reform, in one year. The whole revenue of Great Britain is about forty-two millions sterling, of which sum twenty-eight millions is applied to the public debt, six to the payment of pensions, annuities, &c., and only about eight millions to the current annual expenses of the whole of their vast establishment, military and naval, and the civil Government at home and abroad. Now, forty millions of dollars exceed eight millions sterling. Who would have supposed that an administration which came in upon pledges and promises of retrenchment, reform, and economy, should in the eighth year of its rule have swelled the expenditure of the Government to an amount exceeding that of Great Britain? And this surprise must be increased when we reflect that the British Parliament stands to the people of Great Britain in the double relation of the Federal and State Governments to the people of the United States.

When Mr. Adams left the administration, the current annual expenses of the Government, exclusive of the public debt, amounted to about twelve millions. Only a few years ago a Secretary of the Treasury under the present administration (Mr. McLane) estimated the ordinary expenses of the Government at fifteen millions annually. Even during the present session, the able Senator from New York, when the land bill was under discussion, placed them, for a series of succeeding years, at eighteen millions. And now we propose, in this year, to more than treble the amount of expenditure during the extravagant administration, as it was charged, of Mr. Adams!

Mr. C. hoped the Senate would pause. He called upon the friends of the administration, in no taunting or reproachful spirit, to redeem the pledges and promises with which they came into power. If the love of country, if a faithful discharge of duty to the people, if a just economy would not animate them, and stay these extravagant appropriations, he hoped the devotion to party would. Could they expect to continue in power (and he candidly confessed that he was not particularly anxious that they should) with such unexampled appropriations? How can they meet their constituents with these bills staring them in the face?

And for what purpose shall they be made? Does any man believe, will any Senator rise in his place and say, that these immense appropriations can be prudently, safely, and wisely disbursed? He had, indeed, heard it was not expected they would be. He had heard, what was too wicked, profligate, and monstrous, for him to believe, that it was intended to withdraw the appropriations from the public Treasury, place them to the credit of disbursing officers, in the custody of local banks, and thus elude the operation of the deposit bill which has recently passed. That bill had been demanded by the people of this country. It had passed, from a profound sense of duty, in consequence of that demand, by unprecedented majorities in both Houses. And he would not allow himself for a moment to believe that a sinister design existed any where to elude the operation of that great and salutary measure. What, sir! is the money of the people of this country to be held in the deposit banks, one of which, according to a statement going the rounds of the papers, has made 14½ per cent. dividend for six months?

The annual average appropriations for fortifications heretofore have been about seven hundred and fifty or eight hundred thousand dollars; and by the bill now before us, and that for a similar object which we have sent to the House, if both pass, we shall have appropriated for fortifications for one year four millions and a half. Is it possible in one year judiciously to expend this enormous sum? When we look at the price of labor, the demands upon it, for an increase of the army, for volunteers, and for the general avocations of society, does any body believe that this vast sum can be judiciously laid out? It has been said that, having omitted to make any appropriation last year, we ought this year to appropriate double the ordinary sum. But, if you cannot safely expend it, why should that be done? He was willing to make large and liberal appropriations for the navy and for fortifications; we ought, however, to look to all our great interests, and regulate the appropriations in reference to a survey of the whole country; and he earnestly entreated the Senate to fulfil the hopes and expectations which had been recently inspired in the people of this country, by checking and putting itself decidedly against this rash, wild, and ruinous extravagance. He would vote for the commitment, to reduce the appropriations one half; after which there would remain an amount equal to double the ordinary annual appropriations, without including the sum in the bill now before the House.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the recommitment in a speech of some length. He denied that the appropriations were unreasonable, considering that they were now passing a bill for two years, instead of one, in consequence of the loss of the fortification bill of the last year. He asked gentlemen to point out any particular item in the bill, and show that it was unnecessary and unreasonable. The appropriations, he said, were all founded on estimates from the War Department, and made with a view to economy, as far as was consistent with the public service. Even if gentlemen were correct in their predictions, there could be no inconvenience in appropriating more money than would be expended within the year; for by the deposit bill just passed, it would all, after the 1st of January, be distributed among the States, no more being drawn from the Treasury than would be wanted for expenditure. In reply to Mr. CALHOUN's argument, as to time, Mr. W. said that last year not a dollar was appropriated; and now that they were in the middle of the year, without having appropriated a dollar, they were told that they must not appropriate this money because it could not be expended. When, he asked, would another bill for fortifications be passed? Why, not before the 3d of March next; and the works would be stopped. Mr. W. said that gentlemen, in speaking of the heavy appropriations under this bill, did not seem to consider that there was a considerable amount appropriated in it that had no connexion with fortifications. Mr. W. then took a view of these items; such as arsenals, accoutrements for the volunteers and for the army, fire engines, to be distributed among the public buildings, &c. As to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, he had no objections to it.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, expressed his strong objections to appropriating at this time so much larger a sum than had ever been before applied to such objects; and contended that the experience of former years showed that when appropriations did not run over $800,000, large balances of it remained unexpended at the end of the year. He was satisfied that it would be impossible to spend more than one third of this money, from the want of engineers, and the difficulty of procuring labor and materials in sufficient quantities. If there was any one to blame for the lateness of the appropriation, it was the House of Representatives, who had kept the bill back to this time.

After some remarks from Mr. CALHOUN,

Mr. CLAYTON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALL moved to amend the bill by providing that of the appropriation in the 18th line, for Fort Delaware, the Secretary of War shall be authorized to expend a sum not exceeding $36,000, to perfect the title of the United States to the Pea Patch, in case it shall be his opinion, and that of the Attorney General, that such perfection of title is necessary.

An elaborate and lengthy legal argument grew out of this motion, in which the original and conflicting titles of the States of Delaware and New Jersey, and the title of the United States under Delaware, and that of Dr. Gale under New Jersey, was discussed with great force and ability. Messrs. WALL and SOUTHARD contending for the validity of the title of New Jersey, to show that the title of the United States was imperfect, and Messrs. BAYARD and CLAYTON contending for the validity of the title of the State of Delaware, and the perfection of the grant to the United States; the argument being principally between Messrs. WALL and BAYARD.

On taking the question, Mr. WALL's amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, Ewing of Illinois, Linn, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Southard, Tomlinson, Wall—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Leigh, Moore, Nicholas, Page, Porter, Rives, Robbins, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—25.

Mr. CALHOUN then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to reduce the appropriations to an amount not exceeding one million six hundred thousand dollars.

After some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, CRITTENDEN, and EWING of Ohio, in favor of the motion, and from Mr. CLAYTON, in opposition to it, the question was taken and lost: Yeas 18, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King of Alabama, Leigh, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Webster, Wright—20.

Mr. CLAY then moved to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of going into executive business.

Mr. BENTON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the question was decided: Yeas 16, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Leigh, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—21.

Mr. CLAY said he would make another effort to bring down the expenditures of this bill, and this would be the last effort he would make for arresting the enormous, extravagant, and alarming appropriations of this Congress. After some remarks, Mr. C. moved to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the appropriations one third.

Mr. CLAYTON asked for a division of the question. He desired to see it taken on the question of recommitment first. He felt the force of the arguments of the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky, and he was willing that the bill should be recommitted, in order that an examination might be made to see if any of the items could be reduced consistently with a due regard to the public service. But he never could give his vote to instruct the committee to bring down the appropriations to an arbitrary standard without considering what could or could not be properly reduced. Gentlemen talked of unprecedented, enormous, and alarming appropriations, and this might all be so, but he doubted it. He wanted gentlemen to put their fingers on a single item of this bill and show him that it could be dispensed with. He, for his part, could not see any that ought to be dispensed with. He knew that there were many items in this bill which were in the bill of the last year that was lost, and no man objected to them. Now gentlemen talked of the enormous appropriations in the aggregate, without showing any particular items that could be objected to.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that it was well known, in the first place, that this bill had not suddenly sprung up, and that it did not come before them without sufficient estimates. It came to them with the approbation of the other House, with whom appropriations usually originate. It was, therefore, not a little extraordinary that the Senators from South Carolina and Kentucky should indulge in a strain of invective and declamation, not to show that the appropriations were not suited to the exigencies of the country, but against the strength and capacity of the country to carry on the usual and ordinary operations in providing for its defence. Never before was it doubted that a nation had the strength and capacity to use the ample means at its own disposal. A most wonderful and profound calculation, that the power of a nation to provide for the security and happiness of its members was diminished in proportion to the abundance of its resources! He had no objections to a full examination of the appropriations contained in this bill; but let it, he said, be made on just and correct principles, and not in accordance with the denunciations of the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina. It was not the mere sound of pompous language and loud declamation that should weigh against the appropriations in this bill. Let gentlemen, as the Senator from Delaware had well remarked, point out the items that were extravagant or unnecessary; let gentlemen correct the estimates, and show that they were too high, instead of indulging in general denunciations. Convince him that any particular item was extravagant or unnecessary, and he would most cheerfully vote either to reduce or strike it out.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. WEBSTER, CALHOUN, PRESTON, and DAVIS, after which the question was taken on the recommitment without instructions, and carried: Yeas 24, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—18.

After the consideration of executive business, The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that he should not resume the Chair, during the present session, after this day.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

Mr. BENTON, after a few remarks, in reference to the cause which prevented him from calling up the expunging resolution yesterday, said he left it to the Senate to act in reference to it as they might think proper.

After a few remarks from Mr. PRESTON, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. BENTON, the subject was finally dropped.

The remarks of Mr. CLAY were as follows:

Mr. CLAY said that he would take the opportunity of saying that it had been his fixed purpose, considering the relation in which he stood to the resolution of March, 1834, and to the Senate, as having offered it, to address the Senate on the subject of it. He was particularly desirous to have vindicated the resolution in the assertion which it contained of the exercise of executive power in derogation from the constitution and laws of the United States. After the fullest reflection, his judgment remained unchanged, that it was an exercise of illegal and unconstitutional power, and dangerous to the liberties of the people of this country. And if he could have seen a suitable occasion, after hearing all that could be urged against the resolution, he should have endeavored to maintain, by argument, that proposition. But it has been so treated, from time to time, taken up and laid upon the table, (the last time to afford an opportunity to the present Chief Magistrate of an eastern State to deliver his sentiments upon it, when he (Mr. C.) was detained from the Senate by the illness of a member of his family,) that he has not seen a fit moment when he could, according to his sense of propriety, address the Senate. It is now, as every Senator must feel, entirely too late in the session, when important public business was pressing upon both Houses, to protract the discussion upon this resolution. Mr. C. was anxious to have brought forward from the present democratic fountain in this country a precedent,* on all substantial points directly applicable, against the process of mutilating and expunging the journals of the Senate. But, solicitous as he was to discuss the particular topic, and to spread before the Senate the precedent to which he referred, he could not think of trespassing on the time of the Senate during the precious moments that remain. With respect to the final disposition to be made of the resolution, he was content to acquiesce in any decision the Senate might think proper to make. If it be its pleasure to take up the resolution and pass definitively upon it, without further debate, he would be satisfied.

The bill from the House to change the time for the annual meeting of Congress was taken up, and indefinitely postponed: Yeas 24.

The resolution from the House to change the joint rules so as to continue all unfinished business in both Houses over to the next session was indefinitely postponed.

TEXAS.

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of Texas.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, suggested that the subject should be made the special order for the 4th of July, when legislative business shall be ended, this being the last day when bills can be sent to the House.

Mr. PRESTON moved to postpone the subject till to-morrow.

The question was then taken, and the consideration of the subject was postponed till to-morrow.

ARMORIES, ARSENALS, &c.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill to establish a foundry or armory in the West, arsenals in the States in which none have yet been established, and depots for arms in certain States and Territories, was taken up.

The bill was supported by Messrs. WALKER, BENTON, WEBSTER, and LINN, and opposed by Messrs. CRITTENDEN and CALHOUN.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said that, as he was in favor of some of the objects of the bill, it was with great reluctance that he voted against the bill, on account of some items that he could not approve. He could not at any time vote for a bill, any part of the object of which was the expenditure of money alone, without regard to national utility; and that this was a bill of this character seemed partially acknowledged by some of its friends. There was no fitness, he said, in establishing arsenals in every State, without regard to location or utility. And one half at least of the arsenals proposed would be as useless as would be a horse stable in the city of Venice. And as to the armory in the West, it was about as much called for as an additional Capitol, or a navy yard in the western prairies. Where was the necessity for it? We had now on hand upwards of 8,000,000 stand of arms, which he himself thought enough, as it was about as many as France or England had, with their large military establishments, and three times our population. The utmost that any one required was one million, and we now proposed to expend $555,000 for an armory, only required to expedite the supply of two hundred thousand stand of arms, not needed immediately, and he believed not needed at all; when the number required would be supplied from existing establishments before the work would be completed. In answer to all this, however, it was said that justice required an expenditure of money in the West. He could not subscribe to such a principle. The work was a national work, and if it were not necessary any where, it was not necessary in the West. If the Senator from Mississippi wished another depot in his State, let him have it; if another were needed in Missouri, let it be built; and if more were shown to be necessary any where in the West or elsewhere, he was ready to vote for them, but could not vote for works of enormous cost in the construction, and which would have to be kept up at a very heavy additional annual expenditure, merely for the purpose of expending money in any particular section of country.

Joseph Grant—Fortification Bill.

In truth, Mr. K. said, the importance of these expenditures was greatly overrated by gentlemen. Wealth was never created in any community by a mere expenditure of money. Jobbers might be enriched by Government expenditures, but communities were only enriched by a steady increase of capital, and permanent investments increasing the quantity of valuable products. He could refer his friend from Missouri to an example, upon a small scale, of a community depending upon Government expenditure alone. He referred to the District of Columbia, whose financial condition the Senator himself had truly stated to be worse than that of ten miles square in any part of the globe, not excepting the deserts of Arabia. He thought uncertain expenditures in this country, where all the population were already well employed, was attended often with injurious rather than beneficial consequences, as the people are too apt to depend on expenditures alone. After referring to the subject of a national foundry, which, he said, he was disposed to vote for, that we might have a national establishment of this kind, although we were pressed by no necessity on this head, as we could be abundantly supplied with cannon from the existing private establishments, he concluded by regretting that he could not vote for the bill, in consequence of the objectionable items it contained.

The bill was then passed: Yeas 24, nays 15, as follows.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—15.

JOSEPH GRANT.

A bill granting a patent to Joseph Grant was read a third time, and passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Cuthbert, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Georgia, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Southard, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Wright—16.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836, reported that the committee had had this bill under consideration; but it having been referred to them without instructions, and believing that no reductions could be made consistently with the public service, and in the absence of all information to show the propriety of such a reduction, they had come to the determination to report back the bill in the same state in which it had been referred to them.

Mr. W. moved to strike out the appropriations for arsenals in Missouri, Arkansas, and at Memphis, Tennessee, the same being included in the arsenal bill just passed; which was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to strike out the appropriation of $150,000 for Fort Delaware, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robbins, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—22.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to reduce the appropriations to such sum as may be judiciously expended by the 4th of March next.

Mr. CLAY made some remarks on the singularity of the committee having reported the bill back without reduction, after the sense of the Senate had been expressed in favor of reduction.

Mr. WRIGHT replied as to the impossibility of the committee having any further information since yesterday, which had not been before the committee for months.

Mr. CLAY asked for what purpose the bill was committed. Was it to be permitted that a majority of a committee should overrule the decision of a majority of the Senate? After the Senator had made the same statement yesterday, the Senate ordered the recommitment, and here, after a few hours, the bill is brought back in the same form.

After some few remarks from Mr. PRESTON and Mr. WRIGHT,

Mr. CLAY said that it had been stated that two thousand guns were all that would be required to arm the fortifications, and that we had one thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and, as liberal appropriations had been made in another bill, he could not see the propriety of voting the large sums in this bill. He stated that $200,000 was wanted for the transportation of arms; and a gentleman of responsibility had stated, in the other House, that all the arms in the country could be transported for $25,000.

Mr. CALHOUN adverted to the necessity for some point at which the accumulation of arms must stop, and when there would be a tremendous reaction, when the losses in consequence of risk, insurance, impediment, &c., would be infinitely greater than the value of the arms.

Mr. CUTHBERT stated his understanding of the feelings and views which influenced the Senate to recommit the bill, and alleged that there was a change of ground, and, of course, in the action of the gentlemen on the other side. He warned them not to incur the suspicion of acting only for the purpose of winning popular favor, and to recollect that the verdict of the country had been repeatedly given in favor of the system of defence on which this bill was founded.

Mr. PRESTON said that he was in entire ignorance of the matters on which he was now called to vote. He stated what had been for many years the amount of the annual appropriations for fortifications, and protested against doubling now, when six months of the year had expired.

After some further debate, the question was taken on the motion, and decided in the negative: Yeas 18, nays 21.

The question was then taken on engrossing the amendment, and ordering the bill to be read a third time, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Rugles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing of Ohio, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Preston, Southard—9.

DEATH OF JAMES MADISON.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to you the melancholy intelligence of the death of JAMES MADISON, Ex-President of the United States. He departed this life at half past six o'clock, on the morning of the 28th instant, full of years and full of honors.

I hasten this communication, in order that Congress may adopt such measures as may be proper to testify their sense of the respect which is due to the memory of one whose life, has contributed so essentially to the happiness and glory of his country, and to the good of mankind.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mr. RIVES addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, I feel that it would be an act of sacrilegious temerity, were I to attempt to add to the intrinsic pathos of the melancholy intelligence just announced to us by the President of the United States, by any thing in the way of eulogy on the character of the great man whose decease he has communicated to us. The eulogy of Mr. Madison is written in every page of the history of his country, to whose service his whole life was devoted, and with every great event in whose annals his name stands conspicuously and enduringly identified. Filled, however, as his life was, from its dawn to its close, with labors of patriotism and superior wisdom, there is one great work of his which must ever recur prominently to the grateful memory of his country. He was, in an especial manner, the founder and author of that glorious constitution which is the bond of our Union and the charter of our liberties; and it was graciously vouchsafed to him, in the order of providence, to witness, for a longer period than any of his illustrious colleagues, the rich blessings which have resulted from its establishment. He was the last surviving signer of that sacred instrument. Amid the general grief which pervades the nation, may we not indulge one consolation at least, in the hope that his death, whilst adding the last seal to his own fame and glory, will, in some sort, canonize the work of his hands, and surround with a new veneration that precious relic of the wisdom of our departed patriots and sages.

But, sir, I will not speak of the public life of Mr. Madison; it is known to us all; it is appreciated by us all. It was my privilege to see and to know him in the scenes of that classic retirement in which he passed the evening of his days. It was there that the mild lustre of his private virtues, which formed the crowning grace of his character, and is the indispensable complement of a true public glory, was seen and felt. But who can paint him there? Who can adequately describe that fascinating suavity of temper and manners, that spirit and grace of conversation so happily blended with the oracles of philosophy and experience, that amiable and cultivated benevolence, ever watchful of the feelings and comfort of others, even in the minutest trifles, which, together, formed, around the hearth of Montpelier, a group of social virtues and attractions which, however incompetent the powers of language to portray, none who have felt their influence can ever forget? In speaking of these things, Mr. President, I am but too forcibly reminded of my own personal loss in the general and national calamity which we all bewail. I was the neighbor of Mr. Madison, sir, and enjoyed his kindness and friendship; and if, in speaking of a great national bereavement, my mind recurs too fondly to the chasm his death has left in the immediate circle of his friends, something, I trust, will be pardoned to the feelings of the heart.

It is my melancholy satisfaction to have received, in all probability, the last letter ever signed by his hand. It bears date only six days before his death, and furnishes, in its contents, a striking illustration of that amiable benevolence, and sensibility to the kindness of others, which formed so prominent a trait in his character. In that letter, which is now before me, he spoke of his enfeebled health; and his trembling and unsteady signature, so much in contrast with the usual firmness and regularity of his writing, bore a graphic and melancholy intimation of his approaching end. Still I trusted that his light might hold out to the 4th of July, that he might be restored on that glorious anniversary to an immortal companionship with those great men and patriots with whom he had been intimately connected in life, and whose coincident deaths, on the birthday of the nation's freedom, had imparted to that day, if possible, an additional and mysterious illustration. But it has been ordered otherwise. His career has been closed at an epoch which, forty-nine years ago, witnessed his most efficient labors in the illustrious assembly which laid the foundations of our present system of Government, and will thus, by the remembrance of his death, as well as by the services of his life, more closely associate him with that great work which is at once the source and the guarantee of his country's happiness and glory.

What honors, Mr. President, are there, by which we can do justice to a character which history will hold up to future ages as a model of public and private virtue, not surpassed by the brightest examples in ancient or modern times? Sir, there are none. Still it is proper that, as representatives of the American people, we should show, by some suitable manifestations, how sincerely and deeply we participate in the universal feeling of grief on this mournful occasion; and I move you, therefore, the following resolution:

[SENATE.]

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the President of the United States.

The resolution was unanimously adopted; and,

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the committee was appointed by the Chair, consisting of the following gentlemen: Messrs. RIVES, CLAY, CALHOUN, GRUNDY, BUCHANAN, LEIGH, and TALLEMADGE.

SUPPLEMENTARY DEPOSIT BILL.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill supplementary to an act to regulate the deposits of the public money was taken up for consideration.

[This bill goes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer money from the deposit banks in any State or Territory to any other deposit bank, when it is necessary to prevent the accumulation of too much of the public money in any one bank.]

Mr. MANGUM moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew the motion.

Mr. WALKER renewed the motion, and it was negatived.

The amendment of the committee was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. MANGUM moved that the Senate take a recess till seven o'clock; which was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The bill supplemental to the act to regulate the public deposits was read the third time and passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Mangum, Moore, Walker, White—6.

WISCONSIN.

The bill to create the office of surveyor of public lands in the Territory of Wisconsin was taken up for consideration.

Mr. TIPTON moved to lay the bill on the table, considering the office unnecessary.

Mr. EWING opposed the motion, and, on taking the question, it was rejected.

Mr. TIPTON then moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole, and inserting a substitute, providing that the office of surveyor general of the public lands, for Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, shall be held at —, Indiana.

Mr. T. accompanied this motion with some remarks in its favor.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said that there were, no doubt, many advantages in the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, but he thought it too late in the session now to obtain information from the General Land Office, which was necessary before making so important a change.

Mr. TIPTON's motion was rejected, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was, in a subsequent part of the evening, read the third time and passed.

RESPECT TO JAMES MADISON.

Mr. RIVES, from the select committee appointed to meet such committee as might be appointed by the other House to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation in the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"The President of the United States having communicated to the two Houses of Congress the melancholy intelligence of the death of their illustrious fellow-citizen, James Madison, of Virginia, late President of the United States, and the two Houses sharing in the general grief which this distressing event must produce—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the chairs of the President of the Senate and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives be shrouded in black during the residue of the session, and that the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the members and officers of both Houses, wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. Madison, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for her person and character, and of their sincere condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence.

After transacting a large amount of other business, principally in relation to bills,

The Senate adjourned at about half past 12 o'clock.

FRIDAY, JULY 1.

PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE PRO TEM.

At eleven o'clock, A. M., the Secretary called the Senate to order; and,

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tem.; and the ballots being counted, the votes appeared to be as follows:

For Mr. KING, of Alabama,	-	-	-	22
For Mr. SOUTHARD,	-	-	-	14
Scattering,	-	-	-	4

So that Mr. KING, of Alabama, was declared to be duly elected President of the Senate, pro tem., and was conducted to the chair by Mr. WHITE.

The President pro tem. returned his thanks, to the following effect:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

This flattering manifestation of the confidence and respect of my brother Senators fills my heart with the liveliest sensibility.

To be called to preside over the deliberations of the Senate of the United States, distinguished as it is for intelligence, moral worth, and a patriotic devotion to the principles of liberty, is an honor of which the first in this land might be justly proud. I shall enter, gentlemen, upon the discharge of the duties which your kindness has devolved upon me, with the determination to discharge them zealously, faithfully, and impartially. I am, however, fully aware that, unless I am sustained by the Senate, all my efforts correctly and usefully to discharge them must prove vain and fruitless; but the order, the decorum, which has heretofore so eminently distinguished the Senate of the United States; the courtesy and good feeling which has uniformly marked the official and social intercourse of its members, gives to me the strongest assurance that I may confidently rely on their kindness and support. I earnestly request honorable Senators to make proper allowances for the errors into which I may occasionally fall, and to aid me in correcting them.

SENATE.]

Texas.

[JULY 1, 1836.]

TEXAS.

Mr. PRESTON moved the Senate to take up the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of Texas.

Mr. PRESTON made some remarks, in the course of which he stated that he had with difficulty restrained himself from offering an amendment to recognise the independence of Texas immediately. He gave a brief narrative of the events of the revolution in Texas, and stated that he had this morning received authentic information, in the form of a letter from Mr. Austin, which confirms the statement that General Filasola had carried into effect the armistice agreed on between the Texian Government and Santa Anna. This treaty Mr. P. regarded as amounting to a recognition on the part of Mexico of the independence of Texas. The Vice President of Texas was about to proceed to Vera Cruz, to enforce from the mouths of the Texian guns the conclusion of a definitive treaty of peace between the two countries.

Mr. P. continued, at some length, to expatiate on the situation and achievements and claims of Texas, and adverted to certain treaty stipulations with Mexico concerning the Indians west of the Sabine, which stipulations it would only be in the power of Texas now to carry into effect. He concluded with offering to amend the resolution by adding an expression of the gratification which the Senate felt on hearing of the course taken by the President of the United States to obtain information of the situation of Texas.

Mr. CLAY said he had no objection to the amendment, as it is in consonance with the tone of the report. He did not agree that the fact of a new State having expelled her enemy, or having even captured the head of the hostile force, was, of itself, sufficient to warrant a recognition of her independence as one of the family of nations. In reference to the remark of the Senator that Texas only could carry into effect the treaty we have negotiated with Mexico, (Mr. C. said,) no principle in the law of nations was more settled than that the branches of a nation were bound to fulfil the stipulations of a treaty made by the head; and Texas was now as much bound by the treaty with Mexico, as was Mexico herself. We are bound to have some sympathy with the people of Mexico, while we heap indignities upon the vain-glorious and cruel tyrant Santa Anna; and he hoped that this would be a cherished feeling towards the eight millions of the people of Mexico, and that we would wait so long as to give them an opportunity, in the first place, to recognise the independence of Texas, by the treaty which the Senator had said the Vice President of Texas was on his way to Vera Cruz to conclude. This would be the course most glorious and most advantageous to Texas. If he were to yield to his own feelings merely, he might be inclined not only to recognise Texas, but to go still farther to promote the interests of those who are struggling for their freedom. As soon as the information desired by the President should be obtained, (and the sooner the better,) he hoped the President would take that course which would be most in conformity with the feelings of the American people.

Mr. WEBSTER added a few words to express his entire acquiescence in the resolution of the committee and the amendment. He was willing to go so far as to vote funds to enable the President to send out a proper minister. But against a direct recognition he thought there existed strong objections. It was the proper function of the President to take the lead in this matter. He was of the opinion that the recency of the revolution was an objection to immediate recognition. Time was expedient where the object was not of peculiar urgency. He adverted to the generally cautious policy of our Government, carried even to the point of timidity in reference to Greece; and referred to the fact that General Houston had seconded his resolutions on the subject of sending commissioners to that republic.

Mr. WALKER made some remarks to show that Mexico had never exercised the power of government in Texas, except during a short interval when Santa Anna was in Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN concurred in every sentiment expressed in the report of the committee, and congratulated the Senate on the spectacle exhibited by the people of the United States, who, although operated upon by the strongest feelings of indignation at the outrageous conduct of the Mexicans, had confined themselves within the limits of our established policy. He did not perceive that any disadvantage could result to Texas from a little delay, now that she is in the full tide of her prosperity.

Mr. CALHOUN congratulated the Senate on the tone of the discussion; stated that he had hoped we should be ready to recognise Texas before now; but under existing circumstances, he thought we should only go at present so far as the report and resolution contemplate.

Mr. NILES said that he did not wish to prolong the debate; yet, from the relation in which he stood to the subject, he felt it a duty to express his approbation of the resolution which had been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He fully concurred in the views of the committee. He thought they had gone far enough, and had stopped at the proper point. He had on a former occasion expressed the opinion that it would be premature unqualifiedly to recognise the independence of Texas at this time, and he had seen nothing to change this opinion. In determining the question of the propriety of the recognition of the independence of Texas, there are two points of investigation: the first, whether the people of that portion of the country are in fact an independent and distinct community, exercising the powers of self-government; and, the second, whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that they are in a condition to maintain their independence.

In relation to the first question, there was no difficulty; the dominion of Mexico over Texas is completely and effectually overthrown, and the people have established a constitution and Government for themselves, founded on liberal principles, similar to those forming the basis of our own institutions. They are at this time de facto a free and independent State, governing themselves, and managing their own affairs. This elevated position, and the rights pertaining to it, no people have stronger claims to; they have been achieved and won by their valor, sacrifices, and sufferings, almost unparalleled in so short a contest. Animated by a spirit of liberty and independence, they have contended against fearful odds, with courage and determination that could hardly fail of success, and which led to the glorious victory of Saint Jacinto—a victory not surpassed in the records of modern warfare. By this single victory, not only the power of the Mexican chief was overthrown, but that of the Mexican nation, which still acknowledges him as at the head of its Government.

Texas is now free and independent; she has thrown off the dominion of Mexico, and stands forth to the world as a separate and sovereign State. But before we can extend our arms to receive and embrace her as a member of the family of nations, we must be reasonably satisfied that she is capable of maintaining the high attitude she has assumed; we must look not only to her military power, but to the number and condition of her people. Has she a population, has she resources, sufficient to sustain the rank and character of an independent State? Her population is limited; in Texas proper it does not perhaps exceed sixty thousand; and in the whole territory, including the State of Coahuila, less than two hundred thousand. This, it must be confessed, is a small population for an independent State; but it is to be remembered that all power is relative; and, in judging of the capacity of the Texians to sustain themselves as an independent people, we must also look to the condition and strength of Mexico. It is well known that the republic of Mexico, if such it can be called, has for more than twenty years been agitated and distracted by successive revolutions; that the power has been transferred from one chief to another, according to the fortune of war, or the success of the intrigues and ambitious schemes of political aspirants. In these protracted struggles, and almost continuous civil broils, the nation has become enfeebled and exhausted, and the people impoverished and plundered by the rapacity of the chiefs and military rulers. Although possessed of a considerable population, Mexico is a weak and feeble State. She has no navy, and possesses none of the elements for constructing one. The physical position and advantages of a State form an important element in its means and capacity of defence. On the Rio del Norte there is a desert of sixty miles in breadth, which seems to be a natural barrier that separates the southern from the northern portion of the Mexican territory. Or it may become the barrier and natural boundary between two great nations on this continent; the one extending south to the isthmus of Darien, the other embracing the whole country north.

If Texas is a small community for an independent State, it is to be borne in mind that there are many small independent States in Europe, surrounded by the most powerful nations; such are Portugal, Switzerland, and others. However small a State may be, yet if it have asserted and established its independence, and from physical or other causes, or the weakness of the Power claiming dominion over it, it is able to maintain it, the small amount of its population, and its weakness, as compared with the large Powers of the earth, form no objections to its being recognised and received into the family of nations. The same principles of justice and of national law apply to a small State as to a large one. In either case the question is, is it in fact independent? Is it in the possession of a Government and civil constitution, and in a condition to maintain them? In estimating the capacity of Texas to sustain the attitude she has assumed in relation to Mexico, we must not overlook the character of her population, a large portion of them having been emigrants from the United States, enterprising and enlightened. The intelligence, the physical and moral energies, of a people are of more importance than their numbers. How many Mexicans are equal to one Texian? Let the victory of Saint Jacinto answer.

Mr. N. said he would not touch on the ulterior questions connected with this subject; and he regretted that the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had alluded to the annexation of Texas to the United States. When considering the question of her independence, he thought it should be kept free from even any suggestions regarding the probable future destiny of that country. It might occasion suspicious injuries to the honor and purity of our conduct, to connect any views of ultimate aggrandizement or accession of territory with the question of doing justice to a brave people upon our borders struggling for their rights. Whatever may be the ultimate destiny of that country, or its influence on that of this republic, he was not disposed to inquire on this occasion, as no considerations of that character ought to influence us, either to grant or withhold a recognition. Whether it would be for the interest and safety of the United States to purchase Texas, was a question that he did not wish to see connected with the one before the Senate; that question, should it ever arise, would probably be found beset with many difficulties, and may excite a deep conflict of feelings. He would only say, that destiny, which no legislative foresight or human sagacity can control, had no doubt intimately connected Texas with the United States. Nothing can be more clear than this. She is upon our borders, and is and will be settled by citizens of this Union, speaking our own language, carrying with them the spirit of our free institutions, and the same love of liberty glowing in their hearts. Destiny had established intimate political connexion between the United States and Texas; but what that relation would be, whether that territory would be annexed to this Union, and form one or more States, or whether it would exist as an independent nation under the protection of the United States, time only could determine. Such political relations were not incompatible with the rights of sovereignty and independence, and have long existed between England and Portugal.

That Texas would be able to sustain the attitude she had assumed, he had little doubt; yet the recency of events there required that we should not be precipitate; time alone could test the stability and true condition of affairs in that country. He did not, however, concur with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN] that a recognition on the part of this Government at this time would not benefit Texas. He thought such an act would have great influence on her affairs; it would give them an impetus, powerful and irresistible; it would be the signal for the bold and enterprising citizens of the United States to rush like a swelling flood into that country, to share in the toils, the glory, and the rewards, of the contest which is going on. But the very fact that an unqualified recognition of the independence of Texas would exert so potent an influence in her cause, is a strong reason against such a measure in the present unsettled state of the contest. It might throw a suspicion upon our neutrality, if an act of this Government should have a direct agency in effecting the independence of a country lying upon our borders, and which may hereafter be annexed to our territory. The resolutions now before us, containing a qualified recognition, will no doubt have a favorable and salutary influence on the cause of Texian independence and liberty. It will be a voice from a great, free, and kindred people, which cannot fail to cheer, animate, and encourage the brave men on our southern border, who have shown themselves so deserving of freedom and so capable of maintaining it. This voice will reverberate throughout the Union, and its influence will not be slow nor small on our own citizens. Aroused by a spirit of liberty and enterprise, a strong current is setting that way, and its course will be onward, strong, and irresistible. If the adoption of these resolutions shall contribute to give a favorable impulsion to the cause of Texas, he should rejoice at it; for so far as it is right for this Government to go, without being exposed to the slightest imputation of an improper interference or a disregard of the strictest obligations of neutrality, so far he was prepared to go. He would scrupulously guard the national honor and faith, and strictly adhere to those principles of action which have ever controlled the course of this Government in its connexions with other nations; but these resolutions will not conflict with those principles, whilst I think they may have a favorable and salutary influence on the cause of Texian independence and freedom. He hoped they would be adopted with perfect unanimity.

Mr. SOUTHARD said:

Mr. President, the opinion and wishes expressed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] induce me to say a few words before the vote is taken. I am willing to give my assent to the resolution presented for our consideration by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and also to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] They may be justified by the events which have occurred, and by the case as it appears before us; but I am not willing to proceed further, nor bind myself to any ultimate course on the subject. We are too ignorant of the existing condition of Texas, in many respects, and have too slight materials on which to form an estimate of her future prospects, to justify us, in our capacity as Senators, in pronouncing a decision that may implicate the interests of this nation with hers. Both in the principles avowed in the report of the committee, and in the conclusion at which it arrives in the resolution, we go quite as far as prudence and sound policy will permit. Even they may lead us, at no distant day, into difficulties of which our excited sympathies and ardent feelings do not, at this moment, take proper cognizance.

I am not prepared to unite in the general expression of a belief that the independence of Texas is secured, and her struggle over. It seems to me impossible that this can be the case. Texas may—she probably will—at some period, perhaps not remote, establish her independence on a foundation which Mexico cannot shake. She has temptations to offer to enterprise, ambition, and avarice, to the better and the baser passions of our nature, which may draw to her very efficient aid in her conflict, and will, probably, carry her triumphantly through it. But I cannot persuade myself that the contest will not be renewed; and that Mexico will make no effort to reduce the rebellious province, and restore the State of Texas to the confederacy. If she should not, it will be one of the most extraordinary facts in the history of human society, and in the separation of States and nations. It seems to me incredible, when I reflect on the previous condition of that province, on the effects which must result from quietly yielding her independence, and on the population and wealth of the nation. No, sir, Santa Anna is not Mexico. His army was not the strength of that nation. She still has men and money—Bravos and Urreas—and it will not be long before we hear of them, in the administration of the Government, and at the head of armies, advancing upon Texas. I can found no opinion or act on the belief that there is an end of the conflict.

But, Mr. President, I should not have risen to express these notions, if I had not understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to declare that he regarded the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas as important, and principally important, because it prepared the way for the speedy admission of that State as a member of our Union; and that he looked anxiously to that event, as conducing to a proper balance of power, and to the perpetuation of our institutions. I am not now, sir, prepared to express an opinion on that question—a question which all must foresee will embrace interests as wide as our Union, and as lasting in their consequences as the freedom which our institutions secure. When it shall be necessarily presented to me, I shall endeavor to meet it in a manner suitable to its magnitude, and to the vital interests which it involves; but I will not, on the present resolution, anticipate it, nor can I permit an inference, as to my decision upon it, to be drawn from the vote which I now give. That vote is upon this resolution alone, and confined to it, founded upon principles sustained by the laws of nations, upon the unvarying practice of our Government, and upon the facts as they are now known to exist. It relates to the independence of Texas, not to the admission of Texas into this Union. The achievement of the one, at the proper time, may be justified; the other may be found to be opposed by the highest and strongest considerations of interest and duty. I discuss neither at this time; nor am I willing that the remarks of the Senator should lead, in or out of this chamber, to the inference that all those who vote for the resolution concur with him in opinion. The question which he has started should be left perfectly open and free.

Mr. BENTON rose and said he should confine himself strictly to the proposition presented in the resolution, and should not complicate the abstract question of recognition with speculations on the future fate of Texas. Such speculations could have no good effect upon either of the countries interested; upon Mexico, Texas, or the United States. Texas has not asked for admission into this Union. Her independence is still contested by Mexico. Her boundaries, and other important points in her political condition, are not yet adjusted. To discuss the question of her admission into this Union, under these circumstances, is to treat her with disrespect, to embroil ourselves with Mexico, to compromise the disinterestedness of our motives in the eyes of Europe, and to start among ourselves prematurely, and without reason, a question which, whenever it comes, cannot be without its own intrinsic difficulties and perplexities.

Since the three months that the affairs of Texas have been the subject of repeated discussion in this chamber, I have imposed on myself a reserve, not the effect of want of feeling, but the effect of strong feeling and some judgment combined, which has not permitted me to give utterance to the general expression of my sentiments. Once only have I spoken, and that at the most critical moment of the contest, and when the reported advance of the Mexicans upon Nacogdoches, and the actual movement of General Gaines and our own troops in that direction, gave reason to apprehend the encounter of flags, or the collision of arms, which might compromise individuals or endanger the peace of nations. It was then that I used those words, not entirely enigmatical, and which have since been repeated by some, without the prefix of their important qualifications, namely, that while neutrality was the obvious line of our duty and of our interest, yet there might be emergencies in which the obligation of duty could have no force, and the calculations of interest could have no place; when, in fact, a man should have no head to think! nothing but a heart to feel! and an arm to strike! and I illustrated this sentiment. It was after the affair of Goliad, and the imputed order to unpeople the country, with the supposititious case of prisoners assassinated, women violated, and children slaughtered, and these horrors to be perpetrated in the presence or hearing of an American army. In such a case I declared it to be my sentiment—and I now repeat it, for I feel it to be in me—in such a case, I declared it to be my sentiment that treaties were nothing, books were nothing, laws were nothing! that the paramount law of God and nature was every thing! and that the American soldier, hearing the cries of helplessness and weakness, and remembering only that he was a man, and born of woman, and the father of children, should fly to the rescue, and strike to prevent the perpetration of crimes which shock humanity and dishonor the age. I uttered this sentiment not upon impulsion, but with consideration; not for theatrical effect, but as a rule for action; not as vague declamation, but with an eye to possible or probable events, and with a view to the public justification of General Gaines and his men, if, under circumstances appalling to humanity, they should nobly resolve to obey the impulsions of the heart instead of coldly consulting the musty leaves of books and treaties.

Beyond this I do not go, and, except in this instance, I did not speak. Duty and interest prescribed to the United States a rigorous neutrality, and this condition she has faithfully fulfilled. Our young men have gone to Texas to fight; but they have gone without the sanction of the laws and against the orders of the Government. They have gone upon that impulsion which, in all ages, has carried the heroic youth of all countries to seek renown in the perils and glories of distant war. Our foreign enlistment law is not repealed. Unlike England, in the civil war now raging in Spain, we have not licensed interference by repealing our penalties: we have not stimulated action by withdrawing obstacles. No member of our Congress, like General Evans in the British Parliament, has left his seat to levy troops in the streets of the metropolis, and to lead them to battle and to victory in the land torn by civil discord. Our statute against armaments to invade friendly Powers is in full force. Proclamations have attested our neutral dispositions. Prosecutions have been ordered against violators of law. A naval force in the gulf, and a land force on the Sabine, have been directed to enforce the policy of the Government; and so far as acts have gone, the advantage has been on the side of Mexico; for the Texian armed schooner the Invincible has been brought into an American port by an American ship of war. If parties and individuals still go to Texas to fight, the act is particular, not national, compromising none but the parties themselves, and may take place on one side as well as on the other. The conduct of the administration has been strictly neutral; and, as a friend to that administration, and from my own convictions, I have conformed to its policy, avoiding the language which would irritate, and opposing the acts that might interrupt pacific and commercial communications. Mexico is our nearest neighbor, dividing with us the continent of North America, and possessing the elements of a great Power. Our boundaries are co-terminous for more than two thousand miles. We have inland and maritime commerce. She has mines; we have ships. General considerations impose upon each Power the duties of reciprocal friendship; especial inducements invite us to uninterrupted commercial intercourse. As a western Senator, coming from the banks of the Mississippi, and from the State of Missouri, I cannot be blind to the consequences of interrupting that double line of inland and maritime commerce, which, stretching to the mines of Mexico, brings back the perennial supply of solid money which enriches the interior, and enables New Orleans to purchase the vast accumulation of agricultural produce of which she is the emporium. Wonderful are the workings of commerce, and more apt to find out its own proper channels by its own operations than to be guided into them by the hand of legislation. New Orleans now is what the Havana once was—the entrepot of the Mexican trade, and the recipient of its mineral wealth. The superficial reader of commercial statistics would say that Mexico but slightly encourages our domestic industry; that she takes nothing from our agriculture, and but little from our manufactures. On the contrary, the close observer would see a very different picture. He would see the products of our soil passing to all the countries of Europe, exchanging into fine fabrics, and these returning in the ships of many nations, our own predominant, to the city of New Orleans; and thence going off in small Mexican vessels to Metamoras, Tampico, Vera Cruz, and other Mexican ports. The return from these ports is in the precious metals, and, to confine myself to a single year, as a sample of the whole, it may be stated that, of the ten millions and three quarters of silver coin and bullion received in the United States, according to the custom-house returns during the last year, eight millions and one quarter of it came from Mexico alone, and the mass of it through the port of New Orleans. This amount of treasure is not received for nothing, nor, as it would seem on the commercial tables, for foreign fabrics unconnected with American industry, but, in reality, for domestic productions changed into foreign fabrics, and giving double employment to the navigation of the country. New Orleans has taken the place of the Havana; it has become the entrepot of this trade; and many circumstances, not directed by law, or even known to lawgivers, have combined to produce the result. First, the application of steam power to the propulsion of vessels, which, in the form of tow-boats, has given to a river city a prompt and facile communication with the sea; then the advantage of full and assorted cargoes, which brings the importing vessel to a point where she delivers freight for two different empires; then the marked advantage of a return cargo, with cheap and abundant supplies, which are always found in the grand emporium of the great West; then the discriminating duties in Mexican ports in favor of Mexican vessels, which makes it advantageous to the importer to stop and tranship at New Orleans; finally, our enterprise, our police, and our free institutions, our perfect security, under just laws, for life, liberty, person and property. These circumstances, undirected by Government, and without the knowledge of Government, have given to New Orleans the supreme advantage of being the entrepot of the Mexican trade; and have presented the unparalleled spectacle of the noblest valley in the world, and the richest mines in the world, sending their respective products to meet each other at the mouth of the noblest river in the world; and there to create, in lapse of time, the most wonderful city which any age or country has ever beheld. A look upon the map of the great West, and a tolerable capacity to calculate the aggregate of geographical advantages, must impress the beholder with a vast opinion of the future greatness of New Orleans; but he will only look upon one half of the picture unless he contemplates this new branch of trade which is making the emporium of the Mississippi the entrepot of Mexican commerce, and the recipient of the Mexican mines, and which, though now so great, is still in its infancy. Let not Government mar a consummation so auspicious in its aspect, and teeming with so many rich and precious results. Let no unnecessary collision with Mexico interrupt our commerce, turn back the streams of three hundred mines to the Havana, and give a wound to a noble city which must be felt to the head spring and source of every stream that pours its tribute into the King of Floods.

Thus far Mexico has no cause of complaint. The conduct of our Government has been that of rigorous neutrality. The present motion does not depart from that line of conduct; for the proposed recognition is not only contingent upon the de facto independence of Texas, but it follows in the train, and conforms to the spirit, of the actual arrangements of the President General, Santa Anna, for the complete separation of the two countries. We have authentic information that the President General has agreed to an armistice; that he has directed the evacuation of the country; that the Mexican army is in full retreat; that the Rio Grande, a limit far beyond the discovery and settlement of La Salle in 1684, is the provisional boundary; and that negotiations are impending for the establishment of peace on the basis of separation. Mexico has had the advantage of these arrangements, though made by a captive chief, in the unmolested retreat and happy extrication of her troops from their perilous position. Under these circumstances, it can be no infringement of neutrality for the Senate of the United States to adopt a resolution for the contingent and qualified acknowledgment of Texian independence. Even after the adoption of the resolution, it will remain inoperative upon the hands of the President until he shall have the satisfactory information which shall enable him to act without detriment to any interest, and without infraction of any law.

SENATE.]

Texas.

Even without the armistice and provisional treaty with Santa Anna, I look upon the separation of the two countries as being in the fixed order of events, and absolutely certain to take place. Texas and Mexico are not formed for union. They are not homogeneous. I speak of Texas as known to La Salle, the bay of St. Bernard—(Matagorda)—and the waters which belong to it, being the western boundary.* They do not belong to the same divisions of country, nor to the same systems of commerce, nor to the same pursuits of business. They have no affinities—no attractions—no tendencies to coalesce. In the course of centuries, and while Mexico has extended her settlements infinitely further in other directions—to the head of the Rio Grande in the north, and to the mouth of the San Francisco, in the northwest; yet no settlement had been extended east, along the neighboring coast of the Gulf of Mexico. The rich and deep cotton and sugar lands of Texas, though at the very door of Mexico, yet requiring the application of a laborious industry to make them productive, have presented no temptation to the mining and pastoral population of that empire. For ages this beautiful agricultural and planting region had lain untouched. Within a few years, and by another race, its settlement has begun; and the presence of this race has not smoothed, but increased, the obstacles to union presented by nature. Sooner or later, separation would be inevitable; and the progress of human events has accelerated the operation of natural causes. Goliad has torn Texas from Mexico: Goliad has decreed independence: San Jacinto has sealed it! What the massacre decreed, the victory has sealed; and the day of the martyrdom of prisoners must forever be regarded as the day of disunion between Texas and Mexico. I speak of it politically, not morally; that massacre was a great political blunder, a miscalculation, an error, and a mistake. It was expected to put an end to resistance, to subdue rebellion, to drown revolt in blood, and to extinguish aid in terror. On the contrary, it has given life and invincibility to the cause of Texas. It has fired the souls of her own citizens, and imparted to their courage the energies of revenge and despair. It has given to her the sympathies and the commiseration of the civilized world. It has given her men and money, and claims upon the aid and a hold upon the sensibilities of the human race. If the struggle goes on, not only our America, but Europe will send its chivalry to join in the contest. I repeat it; that cruel morning of the Alamo, and that black day of Goliad, were great political faults. The blood of the martyr is the seed of the church. The blood of slaughtered patriots is the dragon's teeth sown upon the earth, from which heroes, full grown and armed, leap into life, and rush into battle. Often will the Mexican, guiltless of that blood, feel the Anglo-American steel for the deed of that day, if this war continues. Many were the innocent at San Jacinto, whose cries, in broken Spanish, abjuring Goliad and the Alamo, could not save their devoted lives from the avenging remembrance of the slaughtered garrison and the massacred prisoners.

Unhappy day, forever to be deplored, that Sunday morning, March 6, 1836, when the undaunted garrison of the Alamo, victorious in so many assaults over twenty times their number, perished to the last man by the hands of those, part of whom they had released on parole two months before, leaving not one to tell how they first dealt out to multitudes that death which they themselves finally received. Unhappy day, that Palm Sunday, March 27, when the five hundred and twelve prisoners at Goliad, issuing from the Sally port at dawn of day, one by one, under the cruel delusion of a return to their families, found themselves enveloped in double files of cavalry and infantry, marched to a spot fit for the perpetration of the horrid deed—and there, without an instant to think of parents, country, friends, and God, in the midst of the consternation of terror and surprise, were inhumanly set upon, and pitilessly put to death, in spite of those moving cries which reached to heaven, and regardless of those supplicating hands, stretched forth for mercy, from which arms had been taken, under the perfidious forms of a capitulation. Five hundred and six perished that morning—young, vigorous, brave, sons of respectable families, and the pride of many a parent's heart—and their bleeding bodies, torn with wounds, and many yet alive, were thrown in heaps upon vast fires, for the flames to consume what the steel had mangled. Six only escaped, and not by mercy, but by miracles. And this was the work of man upon his brother; of Christian upon Christian; of those upon those who adore the same God, invoke the same heavenly benediction, and draw precepts of charity and mercy from the same divine fountain. Accursed be the ground on which the dreadful deed was done! Sterile, and set apart, let it forever be! No fruitful cultivation should ever enrich it; no joyful edifice should ever adorn it; but shut up, and closed by gloomy walls, the mournful cypress, the weeping willow, and the inscriptive monument, should forever attest the foul deed of which it was the scene, and invoke from every passenger the throb of pity for the slain, and the start of horror for the slayer. And you, neglected victims of the Old Mission and of San Patricio, shall you be forgotten because your numbers were fewer, and your hapless fate more concealed? No! but to you also justice shall be done. One common fate befel you all; one common memorial shall perpetuate your names, and embalm your memories. Inexorable history will sit in judgment upon all concerned, and will reject the plea of Government orders, even if those orders emanated from the Government, instead of being dictated to it. The French National Convention, in 1793, ordered all the English prisoners who should be taken in battle to be put to death. The French armies refused to execute the decree. They answered that French soldiers were the protectors, not the assassins of prisoners; and all France, all Europe, the whole civilized world, applauded the noble reply.

But let us not forget that there is some relief to this black and bloody picture—some alleviation to the horror of its appalling features. There was humanity, as well as cruelty, at Goliad—humanity to deplore what it could not prevent. The letter of Colonel Fernandez does honor to the human heart. Doubtless many other officers felt and mourned like him, and spent the day in unavailing regrets. The ladies, Losero and others, of Metamoras, saving the doomed victims in that city, from day to day, by their intercessions, appear like ministering angels. Several public journals, and many individuals, in Mexico, have given vent to feelings worthy of Christians, and of the civilization of the age; and the poor woman on the Guadalupe, who succored and saved the young Georgian, (Hadaway,) how nobly she appears. He was one of the few that escaped the fate of the Georgia battalion sent to the Old Mission. Overpowered by famine and despair, without arms and without comrades, he entered a solitary house filled with Mexican soldiers hunting the fugitives of his party. His action amazed them; and, thinking it a snare, they stepped out to look for the armed body of which he was supposed to be the decoy. In that instant food was given him by the humane woman, and instant flight to the swamp was pointed out. He fled, receiving the fire of many guns as he went; and, escaping the perils of the way, the hazards of battle at San Jacinto, where he fought, and of Indian massacre in the Creek nation, when the two stages were taken and part of his traveling companions killed, he lives to publish in America that instance of devoted humanity in the poor woman of the Guadalupe. Such acts as all these deserve to be commemorated. They relieve the revolting picture of military barbarity—soften the resentments of nations—and redeem a people from the offence of individuals.

Great is the mistake which has prevailed in Mexico, and in some parts of the United States, on the character of the population which has gone to Texas. It has been common to disparage and to stigmatize them. Nothing could be more unjust; and, speaking from knowledge, either personally or well acquired, (for it falls to my lot to know, either from actual acquaintance or good information, the mass of its inhabitants,) I can vindicate them from erroneous imputations, and place their conduct and character on the honorable ground which they deserve to occupy. The founder of the Texian colony was Mr. Moses Austin, a respectable and enterprising native of Connecticut, and largely engaged in the lead mines of Upper Louisiana when I went to the Territory of Missouri in 1815. The present head of the colony, his son, Mr. Stephen F. Austin, then a very young man, was a member of the Territorial Legislature, distinguished for his intelligence, business habits, and gentlemanly conduct. Among the grantees we distinguish the name of Robertson, son of the patriarchal founder and first settler of West Tennessee. Of the body of the emigrants, most of them are heads of families or enterprising young men, gone to better their condition by receiving grants of fine land in a fine climate, and to continue to live under the republican form of Government to which they had been accustomed. There sits one of them, (pointing to Mr. Carson, late member of Congress from North Carolina, and now Secretary of State for Texas.) We all know him; our greetings on his appearance in this chamber attest our respect; and such as we know him to be, so do I know the multitude of those to be who have gone to Texas. They have gone, not as intruders, but as grantees; and to become a barrier between the Mexicans and the marauding Indians who infested their borders.

Heartless is the calumny invented and propagated, not from this floor, but elsewhere, on the cause of the Texian revolt. It is said to be a war for the extension of slavery. It had as well be said that our own Revolution was a war for the extension of slavery. So far from it, that no revolt, not even our own, ever had a more just and a more sacred origin. The settlers in Texas went to live under the form of Government which they had left behind in the United States—a Government which extends so many guarantees for life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and which their American and English ancestors had vindicated for so many hundred years. A succession of violent changes in Government, and the rapid overthrow of rulers, annoyed and distressed them; but they remained tranquil under every violence which did not immediately bear on themselves. In 1822 the republic of 1821 was superseded by the imperial diadem of Iturbide. In 1823 he was deposed and banished, returned and was shot, and Victoria made President. Mentuno and Bravo disputed the presidency with Victoria, and found, in banishment, the mildest issue known to unsuccessful civil war. Pedraza was elected in 1828; Guerrero overthrew him the next year. Then Bustamante overthrew Guerrero; and, quickly, Santa Anna overthrew Bustamante, and, with him, all the forms of the constitution, and the whole frame of the federative Government. By his own will, and by force, Santa Anna dissolved the existing Congress, convened another, formed the two Houses into one, called it a convention, and made it the instrument for deposing, without trial, the constitutional Vice President, Gomez Farias, putting Barragan into his place, annihilating the State Governments, and establishing a consolidated Government, of which he was monarch under the retained republican title of President. Still the Texans did not take up arms: they did not acquiesce, but they did not revolt. They retained their State Government in operation, and looked to the other States, older and more powerful than Texas, to vindicate the general cause, and to re-establish the federal constitution of 1824. In September, 1835, this was still her position. In that month a Mexican armed vessel appeared off the coast of Texas, and declared her ports blockaded. At the same time General Cos appeared in the west with an army of fifteen hundred men, with orders to arrest the State authorities, to disarm the inhabitants, leaving one gun to every five hundred souls, and to reduce the State to unconditional submission. Gonzales was the selected point for the commencement of the execution of these orders; and the first thing was the arms, those trusty rifles which the settlers had brought with them from the United States, which were their defence against savages, their resource for game, and the guard which converted their houses into castles stronger than those "which the King cannot enter." A detachment of General Cos's army appeared at the village of Gonzales on the 28th of September, and demanded the arms of the inhabitants; it was the same demand, and for the same purpose, which the British detachment under Major Pitcairn had made at Lexington, on the 19th of April, 1775. It was the same demand! and the same answer was given—resistance—battle—victory! for the American blood was at Gonzales as it had been at Lexington; and between using their arms and surrendering their arms, that blood can never hesitate. Then followed the rapid succession of brilliant events, which, in two months, left Texas without an armed enemy in her borders, and the strong forts of Goliad and the Alamo, with their garrisons and cannon, the almost bloodless prizes of a few hundred Texian rifles. This was the origin of the revolt; and a calumny more heartless can never be imagined than that which would convert this just and holy defence of life, liberty, and property, into an aggression for the extension of slavery.

Just in its origin, valiant and humane in its conduct, sacred in its object, the Texian revolt has illustrated the Anglo-Saxon character, and given it new titles to the respect and admiration of the world.

It shows that liberty, justice, valor—moral, physical, and intellectual power—discriminate that race wherever it goes. Let our America rejoice, let Old England rejoice, that the Brassos and Colorado, new and strange names—streams far beyond the western bank of the Father of Floods—have felt the impress and witnessed the exploits of a people sprung from their loins, and carrying their language, laws, and customs, their magna charta and its glorious privileges, into new regions and far distant climes. Of the individuals who have purchased lasting renown in this young war, it would be impossible, in this place, to speak in detail, and invidious to discriminate; but there is one among them whose position forms an exception, and whose early association with myself justifies and claims the tribute of a particular notice. I speak of him whose romantic victory has given to the Jacinto* that immortality in grave and serious history which the disks of Apollo had given to it in the fabulous pages of the heathen mythology. General Houston was born in the State of Virginia, county of Rockbridge; he was appointed an ensign in the army of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and served in the Creek campaign under the banners of Jackson. I was the lieutenant colonel of the regiment to which he belonged, and the first field officer to whom he reported. I then marked in him the same soldierly and gentlemanly qualities which have since distinguished his eventful career: frank, generous, brave—ready to do, or to suffer, whatever the obligations of civil or military duty imposed; and always prompt to answer the call of honor, patriotism, and friendship. Sincerely do I rejoice in his victory. It is a victory without alloy, and without parallel, except at New Orleans. It is a victory which the civilization of the age, and the honor of the human race, required him to gain; for the nineteenth century is not the age in which a repetition of the Goliad matins could be endured. Nobly has he answered the requisition; fresh and luxuriant are the laurels which adorn his brow.

It is not within the scope of my present purpose to speak of military events, and to celebrate the exploits of that vanguard of the Anglo-Saxons who are now on the confines of the ancient empire of Montezuma; but that combat of the San Jacinto! it must forever remain in the catalogue of military miracles. Seven hundred and fifty citizens, miscellaneous armed with rifles, muskets, belt pistols, and knives, under a leader who had never seen service, except as a subaltern, march to attack near double their numbers—march in open day across a clear prairie, to attack upwards of twelve hundred veterans, the elite of an invading army of seven thousand, posted in a wood, their flanks secured, front intrenched, and commanded by a general trained in civil wars, victorious in numberless battles, and chief of an empire of which no man becomes chief except as conqueror. In twenty minutes the position is forced. The combat becomes a carnage. The flowery prairie is stained with blood; the hyacinth is no longer blue, but scarlet. Six hundred Mexicans are dead; six hundred more are prisoners, half wounded; the President General himself is a prisoner; the camp and baggage all taken; and the loss to the victors, six killed and twenty wounded. Such are the results, and which no European can believe, but those who saw Jackson at New Orleans. Houston is the pupil of Jackson; and he is the first self-made general, since the time of Mark Antony, and the King Antigonus, who has taken the general of the army and the head of the Government captive in battle. Different from Antony, he has spared the life of his captive, though forfeited by every law, human and divine.

I voted in 1821 to acknowledge the absolute independence of Mexico; I vote now to recognise the contingent and expected independence of Texas. In both cases the vote is given upon the same principle—upon the principle of disjunction where conjunction is impossible or disastrous. The union of Mexico and Spain had become impossible; that of Mexico and Texas is no longer desirable or possible. A more fatal present could not be made than that of the future incorporation of the Texas of La Salle with the ancient empire of Montezuma. They could not live together, and extermination is not the genius of the age; and, besides, is more easily talked of than done. Bloodshed only could be the fruit of their conjunction; and every drop of that blood would be the dragon's teeth sown upon the earth. No wise Mexican should wish to have this Trojan horse shut up within their walls.

The debate was further continued by Mr. PRESTON, who asked for the yeas and nays on the resolution; which were ordered, and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

So the resolution was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. SWIFT, the Senate agreed to take a recess from 3 to 5 o'clock.

After taking up and going through with several bills, The Senate took a recess until 5 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill from the House making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, with amendments.

The bill was taken up, and, after some discussion between Mr. WHITE and Mr. WEBSTER, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for fortifications was received from the House, with a message concurring in one amendment, and non-concurring in the other.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate receded from the amendments which had not received the concurrence of the House.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

The Senate took up the bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, &c.

There was a discussion on this bill, in which Mr. DAVIS, Mr. MANGUM, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. WALKER, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. PORTER, Mr. LINN, Mr.

Abolition Petitions—Harbor Bill.

[SENATE.]

MOORE, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. LEIGH, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. SOUTHARD, took part.

The Committee on Commerce had reduced the amount of appropriations in this bill one third from that which had passed the House.

Mr. CLAYTON asked for the yeas and nays on the reduction made by the committee of the appropriation for Newcastle harbor, in order that he and his colleague might record their votes against it.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken, and decided in favor of the reduction: Yeas 22, nays 5.

The other amendments of the committee were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the bill was amended by the addition of an appropriation of $30,000 for surveys, under an existing law of Congress.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, King of Georgia, Leigh, Walker, White—5.

At half past one, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, JULY 2.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

Mr. MORRIS remarked that it was well known that he had had in his possession during the session several abolition petitions, which, for reasons heretofore given by him, he had failed to present. He now asked leave to present them, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALKER demanded the question as to the reception of the memorials; and, on motion of Mr. W., this question was laid on the table.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. TOMLINSON moved to take up the bill to grant half pay to the widows and orphans of those who have died, or may hereafter die, in the service of the United States.

Mr. PRESTON opposed the motion.

Mr. TOMLINSON called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered, and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 18, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Walker, Wright—15.

Mr. TOMLINSON explained and advocated the bill.

Mr. PRESTON opposed it, as extending the pension system to an enormous and alarming degree.

The debate was continued by Messrs. CALHOUN and KING of Georgia, who moved to amend the bill by confining its benefits to the widows and orphans of those who have died or may die of wounds actually received in service, or who have been killed or may be killed in action.

After a debate the amendment was adopted.

Mr. TOMLINSON submitted a further amendment, embracing the widows and children of certain revolutionary pensioners who have died since March, 1831; and an amendment at the suggestion of Mr. BUCHANAN, to provide for widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers who were married during the war and who have remained widows since; which amendments were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

DELAWARE BREAKWATER.

The bill making additional appropriations for completing the Delaware breakwater, and for the improvement of certain harbors, and for removing obstructions in certain rivers, was read the third time and passed: Yeas 25, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Niles, Page, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Walker, White—12.

DEFENCE OF THE FRONTIER.

The bill to provide for the better protection of the western frontier was taken up.

Mr. CALHOUN said a few words in opposition to the bill, and proposed laying it on the table, that the subject might be taken up next winter, when they would be in possession of the estimates and surveys for the military road contemplated.

Mr. LINN and Mr. BENTON severally addressed the Senate in support of the bill; after which it was ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read the third time and passed.

LIGHTHOUSE BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on the bill from the House making appropriations for lighthouses, &c., referred to that committee yesterday. The report states that, in so short a period as that allowed to them, it had been found impossible to give to the bill that examination which its importance required; and, although there are many useful objects which must suffer, the committee find themselves compelled to return the bill, for the Senate to make such disposition of it as may be thought desirable.

HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, &c., with amendments.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported from the committee were considered and agreed to.

On the amendment striking out the appropriation of $8,000 for the improvement of Chagrin river, and of $20,000 for the improvement of the mouth of Maumee river, Mr. EWING, of Ohio, resisted the striking out; but the amendment was agreed to: Ayes 23, noes not counted.

Some discussion ensued, in which Mr. DAVIS, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. NILES, took part, until 3 o'clock, when the Senate took a recess till 5 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

HARBOR BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for harbors, &c.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to strike out the appropriation for an ice-breaker, &c., on Staten Island.

The amendment was negatived: Ayes 14, noes 15.

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation of $20,000 for deepening the harbor of Baltimore.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH and Mr. KENT defended the appropriation.

SENATE.]

Harbor Bill.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he might be disposed to go somewhat at length into the subject of the bill, had not the most important principles connected with it already been very fully discussed. As we were pressed for time, his principal object was to give to the Senate the history of our legislation upon the subject of harbors, more in detail than had been presented, by which it would be seen that gentlemen were greatly mistaken when they supposed that this system had age to recommend it. He was astonished at the mistake of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who had stated that we were only pursuing the policy adopted by the Government from the date of the constitution.

Congress had passed an act in 1789, to pay the expenses of keeping in repair such lighthouses, buoys, beacons, public piers, &c., as the States might cede to the General Government. Some cessions were made, and the statute had been executed at a very trifling expense, for the system of jobbing had not been encouraged by the State Governments, which had only constructed such works as were of some utility.

But on the passage of this act did we find States, commercial cities, corporations, villages, and private speculating companies, pouring in upon Congress to improve their harbors, and make new ones, at the common expense of the nation? Not so. They never dreamed of such a thing. Such works had been constructed at the expense of those who were benefited by them, and it never occurred to any body that such works should be constructed at the national cost. Until recently, a system had been introduced resulting in benefits entirely local, building up cities and enriching individuals at the cost of the Government.

He had drawn off, he said, a statement which would show how far Senators were in error when they supposed this system had commenced with the Government. The first appropriation which he had been able to find for such objects as those contained in the bill was in 1816. Mr. K. then read to the Senate the following statement of appropriations made for harbors by the General Government:

1817	-	-	-	-	-
1818	-	-	-	-	-
1819	-	-	-	-	-
1820	-	-	-	-	-
1821	-	-	-	-	2,500
1822	-	-	-	-	11,500
1823	-	-	-	-	6,500
1824	-	-	-	-	40,000
1825	-	-	-	-	57,085
1826	-	-	-	-	133,505
1827	-	-	-	-	41,850
					$322,000

Here was a little upwards of three hundred thousand dollars appropriated by the Government between 1789 and 1828, and not one dollar had been appropriated for these objects for twenty-seven years after the adoption of the constitution; yet some shrewd patriots had all at once discovered that the commerce of the country would be ruined, unless two or three millions per annum should be appropriated by the Government for these local and partial purposes. Mr. K. continued the statement. He said in 1828 the breakwater was commenced, and $250,000 was appropriated for that purpose, and something for other objects, as follows:

1828 (including $250,000 for Delaware breakwater,)	-	-	$317,402
1830	-	-	-
1831	-	-	671,000
1832	-	-	541,300
1834-5	-	-	458,056

Thus the history of this harbor-making would be seen. It never commenced till 1816, when a small appropriation of $30,000 was made. Was that a precedent so popular as to be immediately followed up? No; Congress seemed so alarmed at that small transgression, that nothing more was appropriated until 1821, when the small sum of $2,500 only was appropriated, and the appropriations continued to be trifling, and principally for old works, except the Delaware breakwater, till 1832, a year which would be long remembered by the political economist of this country, as one in which a premium was offered to any one who could suggest the best means of squandering the public money. From that time the appropriations had averaged about half a million, till this year. This year, said he, we had sent to us bills from the House for near three millions, including lighthouses, and upwards of two millions for harbors alone. The bill for new works, then before the Senate as sent from the House, was near a million, and, by an estimate made by the intelligent chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House, was the commencement only of an expenditure of at least ten millions on the new works proposed. He thought the expenditure would be much more, and, from past experience in such works, the proposed new works would cost thirty millions; for it was a singular fact, that this local jobbing, once commenced, was almost interminable; and some works had cost annually, for many years, as much as the first estimate, and the estimated cost of completion more than the original estimate. It would always be so, when we undertook to war against nature, and make harbors where God never intended them, or to appropriate money merely to give a job by its expenditure. This vast expenditure was almost entirely confined to one section of the country, and was drawn from the Treasury by local combinations for no national purpose. It could not be borne by the people generally, when understood. If the proceedings of this session were an earnest of what we had to expect in future, he looked upon the subject as one of the most important that had ever agitated the councils of the country. There was nothing national in it, and the tariff was a blessing to the South, when compared with it. The tariff benefited large communities, and however onerous, was national and patriotic in its origin, and the patriotic of every section of the country were disposed to forbear long with those who struggled to maintain interests that had grown up under it. But this was a new system of local bounties and private speculation. Those who had the most modesty got the least money, and those who had the least conscience got the most money. The South had constitutional scruples upon the subject, and asked for nothing, got nothing, wanted nothing. It was, he said, not only internal improvements, but internal improvements in the worst form, and (except for our naval stations) he would like to know how those opposed to internal improvements could vote for cutting out a harbor to aid the approach of vessels to a village, and could not vote for a road between one State or one city and another. They pretended to derive their power from the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations." Well, did not the same power, in the words, extend to the regulation of commerce "among the several States?" If one was unconstitutional, the other was equally so; and the advantage was greatly in favor of the road in every other view;

Harbor Bill.

for that would be a useful highway for all the world who travelled it, and the other confined its advantages to enriching a petty corporation, or a few individuals.

But it had been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] that our revenue was collected at these ports; and there was an obligation to open them and keep them in repair on that account. And was our revenue increased by clearing out and multiplying these harbors? Not a single dollar. On the contrary, the more the ports were multiplied, the greater the expenses of collection; and consequently the revenue was diminished by the amount of this increase, and by all we expended on harbors beside. How would our national commerce suffer by an obstruction in the harbor of a particular city? If there should be an obstruction in the harbor of New York, it would only give a neighboring city some advantage, until New York, whose interest was affected, removed the obstruction. But if the Government removes the obstruction, other cities contribute to these very improvements, which have a direct tendency to injure them. If the ports of Charleston or Philadelphia, he said, had advantages over New York, that was a matter of rival interest between those cities, and had always been so considered, until this modern invention of taxing the people of the United States to relieve those who were alone interested.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had stated that other Governments had paid for opening and repairing harbors in their commercial cities. This, he thought, was not generally true. Some of the despotic sovereigns of Europe, without any limitation of power or sense of justice, occasionally took cities under their royal protection, and disbursed the public money upon them without regard to any particular rule. But the rule, he believed, was most generally to authorize the city to levy a tonnage duty on vessels for this purpose; this was the correct mode; this gave to each city its own natural advantages, and taxed those who had the benefit of the improvement.

The Senator from Massachusetts, he said, was equally in error, when he stated that the States or cities had never considered themselves bound to keep their own ports in repair since the adoption of the constitution. This was directly contradicted by the history of every important seaport in the Union, and particularly that of Baltimore, which had just been mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] Maryland had granted an annual appropriation for Baltimore of $30,000, to keep the harbor of that city in repair. As a punishment to the city for the late outrages on private property, permitted and committed by its citizens, that fund had been taken to indemnify those who had suffered by those outrages. And now, for the first time, Baltimore comes here, and, by joining in the combination, gets the same amount from the national Treasury. This, Mr. K. said, was a fair illustration of the whole system. Maryland comes into the concern, and the people of the United States are made to pay for the depredations of a Baltimore mob.

Again, said Mr. K., I have shown that harbors have been made and improved by those to whom they belonged, from 1789 until a few years back, or have not been made or improved at all. And if they had needed no improvement for so many years, he thought it good evidence that this rush for millions all at once was uncalled for by the public interest. The truth was, the public had nothing to do with the matter. This vast combination, that was to plunder the Treasury of so many millions, was made up of interests purely private and local. What was constantly the language used on the floor of both Houses, if any member expressed a doubt, who had a few thousands offered to his own State, to bribe him into silence? Why, it was, "if you don't want it, strike it out;" and was a great national interest to be controlled by the simple wish of an individual? But such language was perfectly natural, considering the manner in which these speculations and jobs were got up. Who asked for or recommended them? Any general interest? No; the applications were all from cities, from individuals, or from companies who laid out sites for towns, got Congress to make them an appropriation for a harbor, and then sold out their lots on speculation. Thousands were squandered in bribes for votes, by making an appropriation for objects entirely useless, and where the only advantage was a job in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. K. said it could not be disguised, and ought not to be denied, that this abominable system of plunder was carried through Congress by interested combinations, and could succeed in no other way. Members, by the skill of the managers, were frequently placed in such a situation that they were obliged to vote for the bill, however objectionable, to save themselves with their constituents. An honest member of the other House had told him that he had in this way been compelled to vote for the bill, although he pronounced it "a bill of abominations," and hoped it might be arrested in the Senate. The member alluded to had pronounced this new harbor bill one of the most corrupt combinations of interested speculation that had ever disgraced the country, and such Mr. K. said he believed it.

Mr. K. then called the attention of the Senate to another trick by which these managers had furnished evidence of their skill. It would be recollected that we had passed a moderate harbor bill long since, and sent it to the other House. We have never heard of it since, said Mr. K., until we find it actually incorporated in the monster before us. Why was this? Why, it was only to unite the interests of the two bills. Among other things, no doubt, great calculations of strength were made, by uniting the breakwater with the improvement of the Mississippi, and by this unnatural union between the French and the Friends, we are, said he, swept on by a current as irresistible as that of the Mississippi itself.

And here he was reminded, he said, of the curious argument of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES.] That Senator had given us sound doctrine, with much ability, and great earnestness. He had pronounced the whole system wrong, partial, unconstitutional, and unjust, and condemned the bill as very objectionable; yet concluded by saying he should vote for the bill, because, now the system had commenced, we could not stop it! I know "we can't stop it," said Mr. K., unless we vote against it. This fraudulent expenditure is doubling on us by millions per annum, and gentlemen denounce it, as in duty bound; express their alarm, shut their eyes, and vote for it; and say, "we can't stop it." Mr. K. said he felt some difficulty in comprehending the principle which led to this fatal necessity.

He hoped even the friends of the bill would have some mercy upon the South and West, and be satisfied at the present session with the enormous bill already passed. Let us, said he, have a little time to recover from the shock, and look into this heavy bill pushed upon us at the very last hour of the last day of the session, involving an expenditure so enormous, and which the committee themselves tell us they have had no time to examine. He hoped they would allow the bill to lie over till the next session, to give time to learn, at least, where the places are for whose benefit we proposed to saddle the country with such a vast expenditure. There was another reason, he said, why the friends of the bill should be content with this course. That was, the great amount of our appropriations during the present year, and the extreme difficulty of procuring labor at any price. Labor was now one hundred per cent. on the usual prices. And the great additional demand that would be created by these large Government expenditures would render it impossible to expend any thing during the present year with any regard to economy. He hoped these considerations would induce the Senate to postpone the bill to the first day of the next session, and he made a motion for that purpose.

Messrs. WALKER and MANGUM addressed the Senate in favor of Mr. KING's motion.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, then withdrew his motion, and moved to strike out all the items in the bill except the item of $75,000 for improving the mouth of the Mississippi, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided as follows: Yeas 17, nays 21:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Walker, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Niles, Page, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—18.

So the motion of Mr. KING was negatived.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, renewed his motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in December, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided as follows: Yeas 17, nays 22:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Cuthbert, Ewing of Ohio, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Walker, White—17.

So the Senate refused to postpone the bill.

The question was then taken on the renewed motion of Mr. PRESTON to strike out the clause of $20,000 for deepening the harbor of Baltimore; which was rejected: Ayes 14.

The bill was then reported as amended, and the amendments having been concurred in, the yeas and nays were ordered on the question of engrossment and reading it a third time.

There was a brief discussion between Mr. CLAY, Mr. PRESTON, Mr. WALKER, Mr. BUCHANAN, and Mr. KENT, when

Mr. PRESTON moved to strike out the item of five hundred dollars for a survey of the mouth of the Susquehanna, but withdrew his motion.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, renewed the motion, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 14, nays 24.

Mr. PRESTON moved to strike out the appropriation for the harbor of Georgetown, South Carolina: Yeas 21, nays 15.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved to strike out the appropriation of $10,000 for the harbor of Brunswick; which was negatived.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time: Yeas 21, nays 17.

The bill was then passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the amendments of the House to the bill in addition to the act making appropriations in part for the support of Government for the year 1836, made a report thereon, recommending that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House, with the exception of the amendments "for removing the naval monument to the botanic garden, $2,000," and "for extending the enclosures of the Capitol square, $25,000," which they recommend to be stricken out.

On taking the question of concurring with the committee as to striking out the provision for extending the grounds, the Senate refused to strike it out.

The appropriation of $2,000 for removing the naval monument was stricken out.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, moved that the Senate do not concur in the amendment of the House appropriating — dollars for the purchase of books and documents for the new members; which motion was agreed to: Yeas 15, nays 10.

The other amendments were concurred in.

CHOCTAW TREATY.

Mr. MOORE moved to take up the bill for the adjustment of certain claims to reservations of lands, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, with the Choctaw Indians; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill by striking out the whole of it, and inserting in lieu thereof a provision appropriating $30,000, in addition to the sum already appropriated, for the removal of the Choctaw Indians now in the State of Mississippi to the west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. PRESTON submitted whether it was in order to move to strike out the subject of the bill, and to insert an entirely different subject.

The CHAIR decided that it was always proper to move to strike out and insert.

After a debate, in which Messrs. WALKER and MOORE took part,

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was agreed to.

After taking up and finally acting upon several other bills,

It was ordered, on motion of Mr. EWING, of Ohio, that when the Senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet at 8 o'clock on Monday morning.

The Senate then (at 3 o'clock) adjourned, only eight members being present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GRUNDY submitted a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses were ready to adjourn, and desired to know whether he had any further communication to make to them.

On the suggestion of Mr. WHITE, the resolution was suffered to lie on the table for the present.

MRS. ANN ROYALL.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Mrs. Ann Royall, was taken up.

Mr. P. moved to reverse the report, so as to read that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted.

Mr. WHITE explained the nature of the claim, [interest on the commutation for half pay of the petitioner's husband, a captain in the revolutionary war.]

Messrs. PRESTON and WALKER briefly advocated the claim, and after some remarks from Messrs. WHITE and MANGUM, the report was laid on the table.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that the House had suspended the seventeenth joint rule of the two Houses, which declares that no bill shall be sent to the President for his signature on the last day of the session, until two o'clock, so far as relates to the bill for the repair of the Potomac bridge; the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States; the bill repealing the provisions in the tenth section of the tariff act of 1832; the bill to confirm certain land claims in Missouri; the bill to repeal the provisions of the act of 1792, which requires issuing the certificates on imported wines; and the bills that were passed by both Houses on Saturday, and not submitted to the President.

[SENATE.]

The question on taking up this resolution requiring the unanimous consent of the Senators present,

Mr. MANGUM objected to the consideration of the resolution.

The CHAIR declaring that the resolution could not be considered,

Mr. WALKER said he felt strongly inclined to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIR then read the 48th rule of the Senate.

Messrs. LINN and WALKER expressed their wishes that the Senator from North Carolina would withdraw his objections, so far as related to the bill to confirm land claims in Missouri, and the bill to carry into effect the compact between the United States and the States of Mississippi and Alabama.

Mr. MANGUM said he felt constrained to avail himself of the privilege conferred on him by the rule, and object to the resolution. His long experience in the Senate had convinced him of the great advantages resulting from the rule which the House proposed to suspend, and the great mischiefs that would result from dispensing with it. It had been adopted after a full knowledge of the inconveniences of the old practice, and had been found to have the most beneficial effects. They all knew the experience of Congress was such, that some of the most important bills had been passed on the last night of the session, without debate, whipt through the other House, and they (the Senate) were called on to assent to them without knowing whether they were passed by a quorum or not.

Although he felt the strongest disposition to yield to the wishes of gentlemen whose constituents were interested in particular measures, yet, on this occasion, he felt it his duty to persist in his objections. He felt that making any exceptions would be equivalent to a departure from the rule altogether; and if they excepted in favor of any particular measures in the Senate, why might not the House do the same thing, and carry it farther? He appealed to gentlemen whether his course in that body had not always been conciliatory and ready to yield to the wishes of a majority; and he assured gentlemen that, in this instance, he was actuated by no unkind or unaccommodating feelings, but solely by a sense of duty.

Mr. CALHOUN said they all knew that this rule was adopted after many years of experience, and that, on the last day of the session, the Executive had no opportunity to examine a number of bills. He felt obliged to the Senator from North Carolina for making his objections, as he thought it highly important that the rule should not be relaxed.

Mr. LINN did not suppose, for a moment, that his friend from North Carolina was actuated by any unkind feelings, but that his objections were prompted by a sense of duty; but he begged him to reflect a moment whether there were not occasions on which the most rigid rule should be dispensed with, and whether this was not one of them. It appeared (Mr. L. said) that this rule had been relaxed on more than one occasion, and he trusted the gentleman would see that there were some reasons for not so rigidly adhering to it now. If there was one single bill that ought to pass, why let it be excepted; but if it should be found that all ought not to pass, or that there were objections to them tending to create discussion, why let them fall. In this particular case he wished to except from the rule the bill for the confirmation of land claims in Missouri; a measure to which there was not the slightest objection, and one of the greatest interest to his constituents, who had been long anxiously looking for its passage. He should regret exceedingly to see that measure, which had passed both Houses, and only waited the President's signature to become a law, cut off by the rigid adherence to a rule which could not have been intended to apply to such a case. He could not conceive that it was the duty of the Senate of the United States to make its rules as irreversible as the laws of the Medes and Persians, or that it ever intended to make rules that should by no possibility be relaxed. He admitted the general propriety of the rule, but he repeated the hope that the Senator from North Carolina would see that there were occasions on which it might be departed from.

Mr. WALKER felt conscious that the objections of the Senator from North Carolina, and sustained by the Senator from South Carolina, resulted from a strict sense of duty; but he appealed to those gentlemen whether their objections to bills that had been passed in a hurry, rightfully applied to bills that passed after full consideration, and to which there were no objections. He begged gentlemen to consider whether such bills ought not to be excepted from the general rule. The bill he particularly referred to, and which he felt so anxious should become a law, was the bill to carry into effect the compact between the United States and the States of Alabama and Mississippi, relative to the sixteenth sections of school lands, which passed the Senate two months ago, was reported favorably on by the Committee on Public Lands unanimously, having the sanction of its chairman, [Mr. EWING, of Ohio,] who was so rigid in his examination of every bill relating to the public lands. Now, he appealed to gentlemen whether the rule ought to apply to such a bill as this. He did not wish the rule to be suspended with regard to any bill to which there was the slightest objection; and he hoped the Senator from North Carolina would yield to the general wish of the Senate, and withdraw his opposition.

Mr. BLACK read a list of the bills which would be sent to the President under the resolution, if adopted by the Senate, and said that he would offer an amendment to prevent its being carried further.

After some remarks from Mr. PORTER,

The CHAIR stated that the rule was imperative. The rule was, that no bill or resolution should be sent to the President on the last day of the session. The Chair, however, felt bound to sign the bills, and, in the mean time, any gentleman who thought proper might appeal from the decision.

Mr. MANGUM said that, the measure he regarded as the most pernicious not being included in the resolution, he would yield to the wishes of his friends and withdraw his objections.

Mr. LINN said that his friend from North Carolina, in withdrawing his objections, had acted with that kindness and good feeling which had always characterized his course in that body. If he could mention one act which would confer a greater degree of happiness on a particular portion of the people, he would refer to the bill he had already mentioned; and in behalf of those who would be so essentially benefited by this most just and necessary measure, he returned his thanks to the Senator from North Carolina for withdrawing his objections to the suspension of the rule.

SENATE.]

Suspension of the Rules.

After some remarks from Messrs. WALKER and BENTON,

Mr. BLACK offered an amendment to the rule of the House, specifying particularly all the acts which should be embraced in it, and confining its operation to them solely; but, at the suggestion of the Chair, modified his amendment so as to make the resolution of the House read as follows:

Resolved, That the 17th joint rule of the two Houses of Congress, which declares that no bill or resolution shall be submitted to the President for his signature on the last day of the session, be suspended so far as respects such acts and resolutions as have already passed both Houses, and received the signatures of their presiding officers.

The resolution, thus amended, was agreed to, and sent to the other House for concurrence; after which,

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, stating that they had concurred in the amendment.

After the consideration of executive business,

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his secretary, stating that he had signed the several bills (specifying them by their titles) submitted to him on that day.

The motion submitted by Mr. GRUNDY, for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States to inform him that the two Houses of Congress were ready to adjourn, and desiring to know whether he had any further communications to make to them, was taken up and agreed to.

After waiting some time,

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had answered that he had no further communications to make to Congress.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

The Senate adjourned sine die.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1835.

At twelve o'clock, M., the House was called to order by Mr. FRANKLIN, the Clerk of the last Congress.

The roll was then called by States, when two hundred and twenty-four members, constituting a quorum, having answered to their names, the Clerk announced that the first business in order was the election of a Speaker.

H. OF R.]

Election of Speaker.

Mr. PATTON said he did not know by what authority it was that the election of Speaker, about to take place, was to be done, as announced by the Clerk, by ballot—necessarily by ballot. If it was competent for Mr. P. to do so, he should move, without desiring any discussion on the question, that the election be made viva voce.

Mr. MERCER doubted whether that body, unorganized as it was, was competent to act on such a question; and, besides, he humbly conceived that it would be unwise to entertain it, as it would necessarily give rise to a long discussion. He hoped his honorable colleague would not press his motion.

Mr. PATTON said he thought the law ought to be altered; he had no doubt it would be altered; and, believing so, he desired it might be altered at once. He thought that House, if it was competent to elect, was certainly competent to prescribe the mode of election, if they thought proper. For himself, he felt very little concerned how it was to be decided; believing, however, the viva voce mode to be the one in which all elections in representative popular bodies ought to be made, he must persist in his motion.

The Clerk (Mr. FRANKLIN) read the rule of the last House of Representatives, prescribing the mode to be by ballot.

Mr. WARDWELL said there was no rule existing that could bind the present House, and the Clerk might as well read out of any other book as that.

Mr. PATTON. The rules of the last House of Representatives were not the rules of the present House; in fact, there were no rules in force until rules were adopted by the existing House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said they were now about to adopt a very important change in the usages of the House—a usage that had existed, he believed, without interruption, from the organization of the Government to the present time. What reason could have suggested itself to produce this change, he was utterly unable to perceive. It might be for the same reasons they had heard suggested last session; but as this was a new body, assembled for the first time in this city and in this house, he should not advert to them. Wishing it, however, to be known how his own vote would stand on the question, he hoped they would be indulged with the privilege of the yeas and nays; and he would move the question be so taken.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said that body was not the House of Representatives, nor were they at that moment assembled there as a House. They were nothing more than the elements out of which the House of Representatives was to be composed. Individuals came there, but it was only after taking the oath of office that they became members of that House. It was true, also, that there were no rules to organize that body; for it was as yet an incomplete and imperfect body, unorganized, and without any other rules than custom. Custom alone had sanctioned the practice that the Clerk of the House should, on the first day of the session, at twelve o'clock, call over the names of the members; and custom also had sanctioned the practice of the Clerk calling for the members to vote, and putting the question for Speaker. It was a custom, and nothing more than a custom; and he had no doubt whatever that that body was authorized, under the constitution, to proceed to the choice of a Speaker, either viva voce, by resolution, or by ballot. There was no limitation; and it was left to the discretion of that body, incomplete and imperfect as it was, to take its own course. It would, perhaps, be better to proceed according to the established usage of the House. He said that during the last session a motion was made and debated to pass a similar rule in relation to the election of printer and some other officers—he did not recollect whether that of Speaker was included or not. For himself, he preferred the mode of voting viva voce upon this question; but he well saw that if the question was then entertained and acted upon, in all human probability, the discussion would be spun out to a late hour of the day, the Clerk of the House presiding, or perhaps spun out for weeks—for all of them knew well that a question of that character could not be decided without long discussion. He hoped, therefore, that the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] would withdraw the motion, let the House proceed in its customary mode, and test the principle by proceeding to the choice of clerks viva voce; and Mr. B. would most cheerfully vote that they proceed to the choice of clerks either viva voce or by resolution, and take the question by yeas and nays.

Mr. PATTON said he did not feel the embarrassment alluded to, and he must persist in his motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, denied that the House was without rules; for they had, and were bound by the rules of the constitution.

Mr. WISE would ask by what authority the members of that House had a right at present to vote. Was any man in that assembly qualified? Non constat: at present they were all members there. Were they not to exhibit their qualifications before they undertook to exercise the duties of Representatives in Congress? They might as well else submit the question to the gallery as that body.

Mr. VANDERPOEL remarked that it must be well recollected by all the gentlemen with whom he had the honor to be associated in the last Congress, what course he then took upon this question, whether the officers of this House should be chosen viva voce or by ballot. He had the honor of submitting at that time some reasons in favor of the plan of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PATTON;] and if they were to come to a vote upon the question now before them, he should vote in favor of it; but it was very doubtful to Mr. V. whether it was expedient at this time to agitate the subject. The House was not yet organized; the debate on the same question last session occupied more than a week, and there were many gentlemen who entertained different views, who would claim the right to submit their views before the question was taken. The subject was an important one, coeval with the existence of the Government; and, though he was decidedly in favor of the change, yet he was in favor of having that change deliberately made, and after the organization of the House; and he should therefore be extremely glad if the honorable mover would withdraw his motion. Besides, he did not know what right they had to take the yeas and nays. If the House went into the question then, it seemed to him that they would have to appoint an extra Speaker, or Moderator, to preside; but he hoped they would not be subjected to the necessity of entertaining the question, and he would again most respectfully repeat the request to the gentleman to withdraw his motion.

Mr. EVANS said, both then and hereafter, he should strenuously contend against the change, whenever it was brought forward. He was unwilling to go into the discussion then; and, without any disrespect to the gentleman from Virginia, he moved to lay the motion to proceed to the election of a Speaker, viva voce, on the table.

Mr. PATTON asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MERCER had some doubts whether the Clerk could present the question, and whether one fifth had the right to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PARKER said it appeared to him the rules were clear; and he would ask by what right it was that the Clerk called that House to order but by the laws previously adopted? By what right did he call them at 12 o'clock? There was no law for 12 o'clock more than 1 o'clock; and yet every gentleman would and must admit that if 121 members met there at 11 o'clock, they would act contrary to law, and contrary to the rules governing that House. There was a set of regulations in usage which, like the common law, were binding, and they were these: that they should meet at 12 o'clock on the first Monday in December; that the Clerk of the last House should call the members, and ascertain if a quorum were present, and that those present should proceed, by ballot, to organize themselves as a body. When they have done that, and not till then, were they competent to make any regulations. On that ground he considered every innovation of the established usage of fifty odd years' standing as inexpedient, and one they had no right to adopt.

Mr. REED concurred with the gentleman from New Jersey. They must proceed to act, to a certain extent, from necessity; and he did not consider the Clerk to be an incompetent officer to manage this debate and control it; but he did hope the motion would be withdrawn. He considered the present mode of voting the true one; the usage of fifty years, from the foundation of the Government, was sufficient, and ought to be their rule of proceeding before the House was organized; and he conceived they were acting a very singular part in their present unorganized state.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said it was not his purpose to enter into the debate, but he would remark that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] seemed to him to be mistaken in supposing that the Clerk of the House stood in his place at the present time by mere custom or by presumption. Now, the rules of the last House were the laws of the present till others were adopted. Mr. M. here read the rule applying to the Clerk, that he should take an oath, and should be deemed to continue in office until another was appointed. That was the law probably of the present body; and the Clerk was in office to all intents and purposes, under that law, until it was repealed. He hoped the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw the motion; but if he saw fit to persist in it, Mr. M. said it would be his indispensable duty, although in favor of the principle, to vote to lay it on the table.

After a few words from Mr. MERCER, in explanation, the call for the yeas and nays was not seconded by one fifth of the members present; and the motion of Mr. PATTON was laid on the table without a count.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY, the House then proceeded to ballot for a Speaker.

Messrs. JOHNSON of Tennessee, EVERETT of Vermont, and ANTHONY of Pennsylvania, were appointed tellers; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that 225 had been given, as follows:

For JAMES K. POLK, - - - -	132
Scattering and blanks, - - - -	9

The honorable JAMES K. POLK, of Tennessee, having received a majority of all the votes given, was declared duly elected Speaker of the 24th Congress; and, being conducted to the chair by Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky and JARVIS of Maine, returned his thanks for the honor conferred, in the following address:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In accepting the high station to which I am called by the voice of the assembled representatives of the people, I am deeply impressed with the high distinction which is always conferred upon the presiding officer of this House, and with the weight of the responsibility which devolves upon him. Without experience in this place, called to preside over the deliberations of this House, I feel that I ought to invoke, in advance, the indulgent forbearance of its members, for any errors of judgment which may occur in the discharge of the severe duties which will devolve upon me. It shall be my pleasure to endeavor to administer the laws which may be adopted for the government of the House justly and impartially towards its members, and with a view to the preservation of that order which is indispensable to our character as a body, and to the promotion of the public interests. To preserve the dignity of this body, and its high character before the country, so far as shall depend upon its presiding officer, will be objects of my deepest solicitude; and I am sure I shall have the co-operation and support of all its members, in the discharge of my duty, with a view to these objects.

I return to you, gentlemen, my sincere acknowledgments for this manifestation of your confidence, in electing me to this high station; and my ardent hope is, that our labors here may merit and receive the approbation of our constituents, and result in the advancement of the public good.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, (the oldest member in the House,) administered the usual oath to the Speaker, when the latter qualified the members by States, as also the territorial delegates from Arkansas, Florida, and Michigan.

Mr. BEARDSLEY submitted a resolution appointing Mr. WALTER S. FRANKLIN Clerk of the House; which was agreed to, and Mr. FRANKLIN was qualified by the Speaker.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing that that body, having assembled and formed a quorum, were ready to proceed with legislative business; and that a committee had been appointed on the part of the Senate, to meet such committee as might be appointed on the part of the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress, having assembled, are ready to receive any communication which he may choose to make.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. COFFEE submitted a resolution, in substance, that the House proceed to the election of a printer for the 24th Congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, nominated Messrs. BLAIR & RIVES;

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, nominated Messrs. GALES & SEATON; and

Mr. PEYTON, of Tennessee, nominated Messrs. BRADFORD & LEARNED.

Mr. PATTON remarked, that the House having indicated an indisposition to adopt the principle of voting  viva voce, he would not press that question at this time.

The officers of the House having been directed to collect the ballots,

Mr. WHITTLESEY remarked that this resolution, he apprehended, was premature. We were about to supply an omission of a preceding Congress; and he doubted whether there was any law in existence which would authorize the present proceeding.

The SPEAKER stated that the election could only be overruled by a reconsideration of the vote adopting the resolution.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to reconsider the vote on the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, said that there was a question which it would be well to consider, before this matter was decided. He considered it incumbent upon the individual who should be chosen printer, previously to enter into bond. He did not believe that he could be required to enter into bond subsequently to his election.

Mr. ROBERTSON was in favor of the motion to reconsider. He doubted the propriety of electing a printer at all. He believed this was the opinion of a number of the members of the last Congress. He preferred that the printing should be done by contract, instead of electing a political partisan. It was certainly not magnanimous or generous in a majority here to impose upon the minority a partisan printer, who would vilify and abuse that minority.

Mr. BEARDSLEY adverted to the propriety and necessity of an immediate election of printer. He would like to know by what rule the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] anticipated that a majority of this House would appoint a printer who would vilify the minority for the due discharge of their duties here. Upon what grounds does the gentleman found any such belief? Gentlemen were not so sensitive on former occasions. It had been the practice of the preceding Congresses to choose the printer for their successors. The last House was not kind enough to perform this duty for us, and it now became the province of this House to make its own selection.

Mr. WHITTLESEY explained that he only desired that the House should not elect a printer without adopting the proper guards.

Mr. ROBERTSON, after a few remarks, presented a resolution, in the form of an agreement, providing that the public printing should be performed by contract.

Mr. WHITTLESEY waiving his motion for the present,

Mr. MANN, of New York, by consent of the House, moved the adoption of the rules of the last House.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS wished to propose an additional rule, providing that the Committee of Ways and Means should report the general annual appropriation bill within thirty days of the meeting of each session of Congress.

Mr. MANN then modified his motion so as to except the fifty-seventh rule.

Mr. REYNOLDS remarked that he did not wish to delay the business and elections of this House; but thought it was inconsistent for him to support the system of balloting for officers, as he had urged, at the last session of Congress, the mode of voting by viva voce for all officers. He continued to entertain the same principle and opinions, and accordingly felt conscientiously bound, not only not to vote for the balloting mode, but to urge the other.

Mr. R., after some remarks, modified his proposition so as to exclude the said objectionable rules; to which Mr. MANN consented, but afterwards withdrew the whole resolution.

The question, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, to reconsider the resolution to elect a printer of the House then came up.

Mr. MERCER moved an adjournment; and

Mr. GILLET called for the yeas and nays; whereupon,

Mr. MERCER withdrew the motion.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. HORACE EVERETT, WARD, EVANS, ROBERTSON, BEARDSLEY, and WHITTLESEY.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered a resolution providing that the printer should give bond and security for the performance of his duties, as laid down in the joint resolutions of March, 1819, and February, 1829, which, by unanimous consent, was adopted as a modification of Mr. CORRE's resolution.

Mr. WHITTLESEY withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBERTSON renewed it; and, upon being put, it was lost without a count.

The House then proceeded to ballot for the election of a printer; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and Mr. PEYTON of Tennessee, being appointed tellers, the result was announced as follows:

Whole number of votes 223; necessary to a choice 112.

For Messrs. Blair & Rives,	-	-	-	133
“ Gales & Seaton,	-	-	-	59
“ Bradford & Learned,	-	-	-	26
Scattering,	-	-	-	7

Whereupon Messrs. Blair & Rives were declared duly elected printers to the twenty-fourth Congress.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, which was agreed to; and Messrs. THOMSON of Ohio, MASON of Virginia, and REED of Massachusetts, were appointed a committee, on the part of the House, to wait upon the President.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, a resolution was adopted, directing that a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body that the House had assembled, elected a Speaker, and were ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. WARD, of New York, it was ordered, that, when the House adjourn, it will adjourn to meet again on to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, and at the same hour each succeeding day.

Mr. MERCER offered a resolution, providing for the appointment of a chaplain by the House, at twelve o'clock, M., to-morrow.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, moved to amend the resolution by providing that, in future, in the election of officers of the House, it shall be by viva voce.

Mr. VINTON moved an adjournment; which was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8.

MESSRS. JACKSON of Massachusetts, GALBRAITH of Pennsylvania, and TENNER of Maryland, appeared, and were qualified.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having assembled and formed quorums, were ready to receive any communication which he might desire to make, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned, and were informed that the President would communicate to each House, at twelve o'clock this day, a message in writing.

On motion of Mr. WARDWELL, the usual order for supplying the members with newspapers was adopted.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his private secretary; which was read.

[The message will be found in the appendix.]

Mr. BEARDSLEY submitted a resolution, committing the message to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that 10,000 copies, together with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the House; which was agreed to.

ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances. [See appendix.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that it be laid on the table, and that 10,000 copies be printed.

Mr. CONNOR suggested 15,000 copies.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted the suggestion as a modification of his motion. It was then agreed to.

Death of Mr. Smith—Rules and Orders of the House.

[H. OF R.]

Several other communications from the Secretary of the Treasury were laid before the House, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WISE moved to reconsider the vote directing the printing of 15,000 copies of the President's message. That, he believed, was the usual number. His object was to increase the quantity.

Mr. HARPER, of Pennsylvania, thought an increased number unnecessary. The message would be published in almost every newspaper in the country.

Mr. WISE remarked that the message was one of unusual interest, and, if the motion to reconsider prevailed, he should move to print 20,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WISE then moved to amend the resolution, by directing that 15,000 copies of the message and documents, and 5,000 copies of the message without the documents, be printed.

Mr. BEARDSLEY accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion.

The resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

DEATH OF MR. SMITH.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the death of the honorable NATHAN SMITH, a member of that body from the State of Connecticut, and that his funeral would take place at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TOUCEY, of Connecticut, submitted a resolution that the members of the House would attend the funeral of Mr. SMITH, and would wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JUDSON, of Connecticut,

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9.

After the reading of the journal of yesterday,

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House adjourned.

The House, in conformity with previous arrangements, then proceeded to the Senate chamber, and joined in the funeral solemnities assigned for this day, in honor of the memory of Senator SMITH.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10.

RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE.

The resolution offered by Mr. MANN, of New York, on Monday, for the adoption of the rules and orders of the last House, for the government of the present House, having been taken up for consideration,

Mr. GILLET moved to amend the same by embracing in the list of standing committees, "a Committee on the Militia," which was agreed to: Yeas 98.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS offered the following, as an amendment to the rules: that it shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, within thirty days after the commencement of each session of Congress, to report the general appropriation bill, or give their reasons to the House for failing so to do.

Mr. A. said that the propriety of this rule would strike so forcibly the mind of every one who, like himself, had the honor heretofore of a seat here, that it was not necessary for him to spend much time in supporting it. Its object was to hasten the progress of the annual appropriation bills. No member had been here for any length of time, who was not aware that some measure was necessary to answer this object. Sir, said Mr. A., it has been the practice heretofore to postpone the report to a late day of the session. It had been the practice to introduce into the appropriation bills new objects of legislation, on which account, however, he did not intend to impute any blame to any person or committee. In those bills had been introduced expenditures of money, and drafts on the people, which had been a subject of contention and dissension in the House. That of itself was an evil of magnitude. Another consequence of it was, that the appropriation bills dragged their slow length along through half of a year before they finally passed. He held in his hand proof of this assertion. At the first session of the last Congress, he had the honor to offer this rule, which he now again proposed, and he intended it as the first of a series of resolutions on the subject. He offered it, he said, on the 10th of February, and two months elapsed before he could prevail upon the House to consider it. When it was taken up, other business occupied the attention of the House.

Last session, its consideration was prevented by want of time, and the great pressure of other business. At the first session of the twenty-third Congress, on the 11th of February, the day after he offered his resolution, an act of appropriation, in part, was passed. It was an act making appropriations, to the amount of five or six hundred thousand dollars, for the pay and mileage of members of this House, of the Clerk and officers of the House, for the pay and mileage of the Senators, the contingent expenses of both Houses, &c. Not a cent was appropriated for any other service, except that of members of Congress. On the 27th of June, three days before the close of the session, the general appropriation bill was passed. What, in the mean time, asked Mr. A., was the condition of the President of the nation, before other nations of the earth? what was the condition of the heads of Department, his assistants? what was the situation of the judges of the land; of the army and navy; of every officer of every department of the public service? What, indeed, was the condition of every individual citizen, whether rich or poor, well-fed or starving, who had demands on the public? All were obliged to live on credit, or starve. We were, he thought, obliged to provide for others as well as for ourselves. What reason was there for the extraordinary delay and procrastination in this act. It was because new clauses were introduced into the bill, occasioning long debates in the Senate, as well as in the House. He would now pass to the last session. The general appropriation bill was then passed with great difficulty. In consequence of its long procrastination, it became questionable, in the last hour of the session, whether we had made any appropriations or not. But he would say no more on that subject. "If the House would adopt the resolution which he proposed, and which was merely in the nature of an experiment, to which no one could have any objection, the bills would be stripped of every thing but the appropriations; and if any new objects presented themselves, they would be put in separate bills, not hazarding what was indispensable and of immediate necessity for compliance with existing laws.

Mr. A. had, he said, fixed the limit at thirty days; but, for his own part, he saw no reason why the committee could not report within ten days after the commencement of the session. The committee had nothing to do but to examine and see what was authorized by law; and having done that, there was no reason why they could not report within ten days. The bill could be passed in fifteen days afterwards. It would then go to the Senate, and there it would receive the same attention and despatch. In fact, he saw no reason why all the appropriation bills could not be presented to the President before the first day of January. They ought to be passed before the first of the year. The demands then become due, and there was no possible reason or excuse for not then paying off at least one half of the debts of the Government. Every new-year's day would thus find the Treasury ready to pay off the demands upon it. He would not further trespass upon the time of the House in pressing this motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would like, he said, to hear the amendment read. It having been read,

Mr. C. said he concurred entirely in the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as to the evils he complained of; and, probably, they were more manifest last session than at any former period; but Mr. C. dissented entirely to the position taken by the gentleman, that it ever had been, at least in his experience, short as it had been in the Committee of Ways and Means, and long as it had been in the House, that it was justly ascribable to that committee. Mr. C. would appeal to every old member of that House, whether it had not been uniformly the practice for the chairman of that committee to appeal and urge upon the House the necessity of taking up the appropriation bills; and whether the uniform habits of the House had not been to postpone and postpone them again, from day to day, in defiance of all entreaties. If the gentleman wishes to reach the evil he complained of, he should make his appeal to the House. He should prescribe the law by which that House should be bound to take the bills up and proceed with them. The honorable gentleman prescribed duties to the Committee of Ways and Means; but the gentleman must be aware, his knowledge and experience must satisfy him, that every item in the appropriation bills, relating to the army and navy, was a matter of constant communication between the committee and the Department. How could he expect the committee to adopt a mere estimate, without reason? Every item must undergo full investigation before any one member of the committee would consent to its insertion. A most laborious duty had to be performed before the bill came into the House.

Mr. C. said he did not rise for the purpose of objecting to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it had a modification that the committee could give their reasons for not having reported the bills, and therefore the proposition was not very operative upon the committee, because, if they were ready to report they would report, and if not, they could obtain further time. Still, Mr. C. would say he thought the time too short. With regard to the measure before the House at the last session, he regretted as much as any gentleman that the Senate were in the habit of putting upon the appropriation bills others that had nothing to do with them. He alluded to the United States Military Academy bill. Was it because the committee had not reported the bill early enough to be acted on? Was it the fault of the gentleman who had charge of the bill that it was not called up? Did not every gentleman, then a member of the House, know that more than a dozen attempts were made to get the bill up, and every attempt failed, till, in the last emergency, the Senate were under the necessity of attaching it to the appropriation bill for the general expenses of the Government? Mr. C. rose not for the purpose, he said, of opposing the principle of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but merely to show that the House itself was the origin of all the evils of which the gentleman complained; but he did not think the proposition one calculated to promote or facilitate business. He knew of no committee last session that did not report in time, except one; and he did not think the gentleman from Massachusetts, having secured, as they did, by their united counsel, a unanimous vote upon the French question, would find fault with the Committee on Foreign Relations in not having been premature. He did not think the fault was with a committee, for every committee would do its duty; and if they did not act, the House had power to compel them.

Mr. C. concurred with the gentleman in another point, and that was, that it had been the practice of the House, in some cases, to insert provisions of the kind he complained of. He believed, however, the gentleman would do him the justice to say that he (Mr. C.) had uniformly acted with him in opposing such clauses—in other words, new appropriations. He had done it heretofore, and should do it again; and would at all times unite with that gentleman in opposing every thing of the kind, from that or any other committee. Still, the committee was not so much to blame as the House itself; and the House, he was sure, would pardon him, for he spoke of what it was perfectly sensible. There were some gentlemen who had uniformly resisted every thing in an appropriation bill not already authorized by law; and he would again pledge himself to unite with them on all occasions.

Mr. C. concluded by requesting Mr. ADAMS to amend his resolution so as to extend the time to six weeks instead of thirty days.

Mr. VANDERPOEL was, he said, totally opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it involved a principle which he well knew was not intended by the honorable mover—that of discourtesy to the Committee of Ways and Means, whoever they might be. Mr. V. would ask the House whether it was right and courteous to apply the spur exclusively to that committee? And was not the amendment of the gentleman founded upon the apprehension that, peradventure, that committee would not do its duty? Now, in all charity to every committee of that House, he was willing to presume—nay, he was bound to presume—that every committee appointed by the Chair would feel the high responsibilities and obligations imposed upon them, and feel resolved to do their duty, and do it promptly. Why was it necessary to call upon this committee alone? Ah! says the gentleman, we have suffered a great deal of inconvenience heretofore. My answer to that is, said Mr. V., that this committee will profit from the lessons of past experience. If we suffered inconvenience from procrastination last year, and the year before, I have no doubt the Committee of Ways and Means will feel stimulated from that circumstance; and it is surely unnecessary, at this stage, to issue our mandate that they shall report within thirty days. Mr. V. agreed with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that they did suffer some inconvenience last year from procrastination, but he did not attach all the blame to the Committee of Ways and Means. If fault was any where, it was as much in the House, and perhaps more, than in the committee. He well recollected that the chairman of that committee would come in there, day after day, and entreat and implore the House to take up the appropriation bills; and he well recollected, also, that those appeals were made in vain. Mr. V. should vote against the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS had, he said, been very unfortunate in explaining his views, if he had given the gentlemen from New York any reason to suppose that he wished or intended to censure the Committee of Ways and Means, or any member of that committee. Sir, said he, I disclaim any imputation upon that committee. I spoke of evils which existed, evils which were felt and acknowledged, and from which it was my object to obtain a remedy. The gentleman particularly who last spoke seemed to suppose that I intended to cast censure on the Committee of Ways and Means; I meant no sort of censure on that or any other committee of the House. I stated the fact that the general appropriation bill did not pass at the last session until within three hours of the expiration of the Congress. I throw no blame, on this account, on any committee of this House. Far from it. But whether that bill had passed was a subject of dispute, and it was in imminent danger of being lost. It was finally saved by the House agreeing to the proposition of the Senate.

Rules and Orders of the House.

Of this he had spoken only as an illustration of the necessity of passing the bill at an earlier day. It was not his object to trammel the committee, and, on the contrary, he wished to give it full latitude and liberty. If they were not ready at the end of the thirty days, they would say so to the House, and have the time extended. He called on the Committee of Ways and Means to put the House in possession of the bills. We must have them before we can act upon them at all. He supposed that thirty days would be a sufficient time for the committee to retain them under consideration. His proposition left the committee just as independent as any other committee. It imposed upon them no extraordinary duty, and he would venture to say that they would always be ready to report within the time proposed, should the resolution be passed. Should this motion be agreed to, he would propose another rule, assigning certain days for the House to take up and consider the appropriation bills. His object, in expediting the action of the committee, was to hasten the action of the House. He hoped it would not be believed by the gentleman from New York that it was his object or desire to impute any censure to the Committee of Ways and Means or any other committee that ever existed. Abuses often crept in, one lapping over another, without the possibility of correction. When they were felt, and severely felt, then it was time to apply a remedy. He knew no other committee whose action it was necessary to accelerate at all, and his only object, in relation to this, was to hasten the action of the House.

Mr. MERCER said he concurred less in the argument than in the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. His argument went to a restriction of the time within which money bills should be debated in this House; and against this doctrine he must, with all possible respect, protest. The appropriation bills were the only subjects on which the general interests of the country could be debated; and it had been the practice of the Government, from its foundation, to consider them in this light, especially since the time when it was customary to discuss such subjects in an answer to the President's message. The only occasion now afforded for such general discussion was the appropriation bills, and he was unwilling to have it go abroad that it was the wish of this House to restrict that discussion. It was well known that the appropriation bills were sent to this House by the Committee of Ways and Means, and to them by the Departments, and they were generally hurried through the House, or passed without due consideration. Taking them up was generally the signal for the dispersion of the members, and any man was scouted at who presumed to raise his voice against any one item in the bills. For himself, he was unwilling to bear any blame for the delay of the appropriations in former years. Between 11 and 12 o'clock on the last night of last session, we were in danger of losing the whole appropriation bill, and the bill making appropriations for fortifications was passed only ten minutes before the hand was on the figure denoting the hour at which the session expired.

Mr. H. EVERETT rose to move an amendment to the amendment. Before offering it, he would remark that the blame of delay did not rest on the committee only, but also on the House. He desired that the House should do their part of the duty as well as the committee; and he therefore moved, as an addition to the amendment, the following: "And the general appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any bills of a public nature."

Mr. ADAMS accepted the amendment, as a modification. It was his intention to accelerate the action of the House, and therefore he was perfectly willing to accept it. While up, he would reply to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman thought that the House would be compelled to pass the bills as soon as they were reported; but the gentleman knew, surely, that the House was their own master, and that it was not in the power of any one to restrain them. No one was more willing than he was to have every appropriation bill discussed, even till the end of the session, before it should end in an unnecessary charge on the people. But, sir, the gentleman has a different idea of an appropriation bill from mine. In my view (said Mr. A.) an appropriation bill ought to be nothing more than a draft on the Treasury for a debt due by law; and then the only question in regard to it is, whether it is authorized by law, and whether we shall pay our just debts.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS said it was the object of the gentleman from Massachusetts to prevent the introduction into the appropriation bills of any matter not authorized by law; but his proposition was, in his opinion, inadequate to this end. If it simply provided that the committee should report no other appropriations than those authorized by law, that would be a remedy for the evil complained of by the gentleman. But, if it was merely required of the committee to report the bill within thirty days, they might, though it was to be presumed they would not, introduce into the bill a hundred new appropriations. The remedy, he thought, was inadequate for the evil. He had seen that the more rules were multiplied, the more complex they became, and the more difficult it was to get along with the business of the House. It might happen very often that, though the appropriation bills were important, other bills were also equally or more important; and he had noticed, that the more we limited our discretion the more difficulty we had to encounter. He had no doubt that the amendment would retard instead of accelerate the business of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said the only material point was whether the House should be made to act after the bill was reported. He did not consider the motion, in any other view, as at all material. He wished the appropriation bills to have a preference here. They ought to have, and the last provision of the amendment therefore met his entire concurrence. But he did not consider it important whether the bills came in thirty days or not from the committee; all knew where the reports of bills came from. The committee take the reports of the heads of Departments, and we take theirs. Every body knew that, in a great measure, we must rely upon the capacity, integrity, and honor, of those who are at the head of the Departments and prepared the estimates. He knew how troublesome was the duty of a chairman of a committee, who was obliged to make himself master of all the details of these bills, and be prepared to reply to any objections which might be made to them. A former colleague of his had aptly compared himself, when in that situation, to "the man in the Almanac, stuck all over with sticks." Every individual who spoke pointed always towards the chairman. It would be time, he thought, to pass on this motion after the new man who was to preside over this committee had been appointed. The Ajax, who was to sustain the administration, must be allowed some time to consult the Departments and prepare himself for his task. Last year there was a long debate here, on a blacksmith's pay, between the gentleman from North Carolina and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; and on every item the chairman must be prepared to give full and satisfactory information. But (said Mr. S.) if the further time should not be given for this purpose, I go for the last provision. Bring up the bills, and then let us hear the argument on them. Let them have the preference for the purpose of argument. Last year many important bills failed for want of time. He wished the appropriation bills to be first discussed, first acted on, first passed or lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose to move the reference of the whole subject to a select committee, believing that to be the usual course. He submitted the following motion: That the rules and orders of the House be referred to a select committee, to see if any alteration in them be necessary.

Mr. MERCER suggested an alteration so as to secure the benefit of the rules of the last House until the committee were ready to report. The rules were once referred and no report was made on them at all. While up, he would express his surprise that no one had made any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont. Mr. M. made some further remarks, which did not reach the ear of the reporter.

Mr. PARKER said the proper way was to appoint a committee to adopt rules, and, in the mean time, to act on the rules of last year. There must be some rules to go by, or the Speaker could not be directed to appoint the standing committees.

Mr. WILLIAMS modified his proposition, so as to provide that, "until the committee made their report, and it was definitively acted on by the House, the rules and orders of the last House should be the rules and orders of this House."

Mr. ADAMS said that the effect of this motion was, by a side wind, to destroy his object entirely. He thought himself entitled to a decision of the House on his proposition. Sending his proposition to the committee was to involve it in a boundless ocean of discussion, from which it would never emerge. Many projects of alteration would be offered, and the whole session would pass before any thing was done. He wanted the decision on his motion to amend, and he would move it as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIR suggested that the gentleman from Massachusetts might better attain his object by moving his amendment in the shape of instructions to the committee.

Mr. ADAMS said, as his only object was to get the decision of the House, he would move the proposition as instructions to the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS remarked that he was sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts should suppose that he wished to evade any decision. He had never attempted to elude any decision which was urged by any gentleman, much less by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He wished to get rid of this discussion, which promised to be long and unprofitable. But he would withdraw the proposition in order to enable the House to decide on the question, giving notice that afterwards he should renew it.

Mr. WISE said he should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was not the business of the committee to make reports of their own acts and doings; it was not their business to take up any original matter. It was their duty, as the agents of us, the Commons—the Commons, coming fresh from the people—to ask of those who have the disbursement of the public money, (he would say nothing about its custody at present,) what they proposed to do with it. This he wished to know immediately, in presenti. If the gentleman brings in a proposition to limit the discussion to any particular length of time, he should most distinctly oppose it. The high obligations of this House to the people were paramount to any other; but they were often forgotten, left behind, trampled on, while the House acted only in a secondary relation to the President. In relation to the President we too often acted, not feeling, as Commons, a just sense of our obligations to the people.

I do not (said Mr. W.) excuse myself for the delay of the appropriation bills. I will hold the King here by the purse strings of the nation. I will hold him by his salary. I will hold all the Departments by the purse strings. The House should never forget its relation to the people, in subserviency to the King. What was said by my colleague from Virginia was true. The members are neglectful of the duty which they owe the people in relation to the appropriation bills. They read the current news, pay a visit, or look into the Senate chamber, the moment that those bills are taken up for consideration, instead of exercising a rigid and watchful scrutiny over them. At the last session we voted away thirty-three thousand dollars for making a pavement around the President's house for English coaches to grind, and in planting trees, shrubbery, &c. He held the documents in his hand. This appropriation for the President's house ought to have been scrutinized by those who held the money of the people.

In conclusion, (Mr. W. said,) if God spared his life, and the people kept him in his place here, he would hold on to the appropriation bills to the last minute. He would put himself on the watch over the public money. The relation of this House, as the Commons, as the representatives of the people, was of a character paramount to the relation of mere partisans.

Mr. MANN, of New York, felt constrained, he said, to renew the motion for the reference of this subject to a select committee, which motion had been made and withdrawn by the gentleman from North Carolina; not that he wished to deprive the gentleman from Massachusetts of the opportunity to get a decision on his proposition, but that he wished to bring the discussion to a close. It was true that there was some inconvenience arising from the delay of committees, but he knew something of the inconvenience to which committees were subjected. It was not practicable for them to sit on the subjects before them within the time prescribed in the motion. The labor of preparing the report of the Committee of Ways and Means was very great; and he presumed that even the gentleman from Massachusetts would be unwilling to undertake to perform it in thirty days. The delay of the bills was not owing to the committee so much as to the House. They were delayed in their progress here till we were admonished that the public service was in danger from the want of that action. Under these impressions, though he believed that if the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts could be carried into effect, it would be productive of much benefit, he should be obliged to vote against it. He understood there would be various propositions to amend the rules, which would probably give rise to discussions lasting several days, while, in the mean time, we should be exposed to inconvenience for the want of rules. He moved the reference of the subject to a select committee.

Mr. ADAMS moved his proposition as instructions to the committee.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the instructions by putting them in the form of an inquiry into the expediency of the proposed rule; which was lost, 69 rising in the affirmative, noes not counted.

The question recurring on Mr. ADAMS's motion,

Mr. VINTON called for a division of the question. The rule proposed required, he said, first, that the committee should report within thirty days, and then it made the appropriation bill the standing order for the day, in preference to all other business. It would come up as a matter of course, the Speaker having no discretion in relation to it.

Those who have objections to any items of the bill would be allowed no time to make inquiries respecting them. It would not be in order to call up any other question, of whatever magnitude it might be. This, he said, would embarrass and trammel the House to no purpose; for, after all, every gentleman was satisfied of one thing, that when the majority was disposed to get at a question, they would, in some way, get at it. We cannot take the Government out of the hands of the majority and put it into that of the minority.

Mr. H. EVERETT moved, as an amendment to the instructions, that no appropriation should be reported or be in order as an amendment to a bill for any expenditure not before authorized by law.

Mr. ADAMS said, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] that the rule would show the sense of the House that those bills, de jure, had the preference over others; but it would not prevent the House from taking up any other bill. The proposition of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] would, he said, complicate his object extremely; his object being simply to hasten the report from the committee.

Mr. EVERETT withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on the first branch of Mr. ADAMS's motion to instruct, and it was determined in the affirmative, 91 to 76.

Mr. ADAMS then modified the second branch, so as to provide that "the appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House."

The question being taken, this motion was also agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, moved to include in the instructions an alteration of the rule for the admission of persons to the privileged seats, so as to include in the list of persons to be admitted the district attorneys, including the district attorney of the District of Columbia.

This motion was supported by Messrs. THOMAS and BEARDSLEY; and, the question being taken upon it, it was lost.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, moved the following: "That the committee be instructed to consider the expediency of amending the 25th rule, by making all amendments in order pending the main question." The object of the amendment was to bear on the previous question.

After a few remarks by the mover, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER moved a further instruction to the select committee, that, during the session of the House, the members shall remain uncovered, unless specially permitted by the Speaker.

Messrs. PARKER and BRIGGS briefly advocated this motion, and it was opposed by Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. PARKS moved to amend the amendment by instructing the committee to consider all propositions relative to the rules which might be handed them by any member. Mr. P. was induced to make the motion, to avoid any unnecessary consumption of time in discussing the various instructions which gentlemen were desirous of offering.

After a few additional remarks by Mr. PARKER, in favor of his motion, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to, and the select committee was ordered to consist of nine.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY,

Ordered, That the standing committees of the House be now appointed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, submitted a resolution granting the use of the hall of Representatives, on Tuesday evening next, to the American Colonization Society; which was agreed to: Yeas 104, nays not counted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted a resolution for furnishing documents, bills, &c., to certain departments and officers of the Government therein named; the consideration of which, at the instance of Mr. MANN, of New York, was waived for the present.

Several messages from the President of the United States were received by the hands of Mr. DONELSON, his private secretary; which were laid before the House by the Speaker, and consisted of—

1st. A communication, enclosing a report from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to certain transfers of appropriation; which, on motion of Mr. CAMRELENG, was ordered to be printed.

2d. A message, enclosing a report of the Secretary of War of certain astronomical observations made with a view to the ascertainment of the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio; which, on motion of Mr. JOHN Q. ADAMS, was referred to a select committee of nine, and ordered to be printed.

3d. A message, transmitting a copy of the constitution (and various documents in reference thereto) adopted by a convention recently assembled in the Territory of Michigan, with a view to the formation of a new State out of said Territory.

Mr. J. Y. MASON, of Virginia, moved to refer the latter communication to a select committee, and that it be printed.

Mr. HAMER moved to refer the message to the same select committee to which the communication in reference to the northern boundary of the State of Ohio had been committed.

Mr. MASON remarked that, personally, he was indifferent as to the committee to which this subject was referred. There was some delicacy involved in the two communications, which perhaps might be obviated by sending them to different committees. He should cheerfully acquiesce in the decision of the House upon the subject of reference.

Mr. HOWARD moved to amend the propositions, by referring the latter message and the accompanying documents to the standing Committee on Territories. He should follow up this motion, if it succeeded, by moving to reconsider the vote whereby the communication in reference to the northern boundary of Ohio had just been referred to a select committee, with a view to its reference to the Committee on Territories. He conceived there was no propriety in sending to select committees matters which appropriately belonged to the standing committees of the House.

Before any question was taken, the House, on motion, adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14.

Messrs. GRAVES, of Kentucky, and GARLAND, of Louisiana, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

After the reading of the journal of the proceedings of Thursday,

Mr. HOWARD moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the message from the President relative to the Ohio and Michigan boundary line was ordered to be referred to a select committee; and, on his motion, the further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

DEATH OF MR. WILDMAN.

Mr. HALEY, of Connecticut, announced the death of his colleague, the Hon. ZALMON WILDMAN, a Representative in Congress from the State of Connecticut; and, after a few remarks in eulogy of the deceased, submitted a motion for the usual demonstrations of respect for his memory; which was unanimously adopted.

DEATH OF MR. KANE.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the death of the Hon. ELIAS K. KANE, Senator from the State of Illinois, and informing the House that the fune-

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15.

The SPEAKER notified the House that, in compliance with its rules, he should to-morrow call for petitions and memorials in the order of States and Territories.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House proceeded to the election of its officers by ballot.

Six ballotings for the choice of a Sergeant-at-arms took place, the last of which resulted as follows:

For Roderick Dorsey,	-	-	122
Oliver Pease,	-	-	92
Scattering,	-	-	4

So RODERICK DORSEY, of Maryland, was elected.

Mr. BOCKEE offered a resolution, proposing the reelection of Mr. OVERTON CARR as doorkeeper, and J. W. HUNTER as assistant doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. HAWES said he believed that, according to the rules of the House, where the persons nominated were opposed, it was necessary to proceed to an election. He had no objection to the nomination now made for doorkeeper, but, as he understood that there would be opposition as to the office of assistant doorkeeper, he must object to so much of the resolution offered.

On motion of Mr. McCARTY,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, and Mr. RILEY, of Louisiana, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

RODERICK DORSET, elected Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, presented himself and was qualified.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, understanding, he said, that by a presentation of a petition, a member was not made responsible for its propositions, presented a petition signed by 172 females, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAMER moved that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then presented a similar petition, which he moved to lay on the table.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said, as it was extremely desirable to have an expression of sentiment on this subject, by the House, he would ask for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. BOON called for the reading of the memorial. After it was read,

Mr. EVERETT rose to ask whether the motion to lay on the table was made by the member who presented the petition.

Mr. FAIRFIELD replied in the affirmative.

Mr. SLADE moved that the memorial be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked the division of the question.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked the yeas and nays on the motion to print, and they were ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. C. Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Claiborne, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hammond, Hannegan, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Samuel S. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Banks, Borden, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, Clark, Cushing, Darlington, Evans, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Harper, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hubley, William Jackson, James, LaPorte, Love, Morris, Parker, Dutée J. Pearce, Potts, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Sprague, Wardwell, Whittlesey—31.

Mr. SLADE said that, having made the motion to print, he would beg leave to say a few words in its support. He should not be discouraged in pressing the motion, by the vote which had just been given to lay the memorial on the table. Many gentlemen, he knew, had voted in favor of that motion, simply upon the ground that it had been made by the gentleman who had presented the memorial, but who would not, he was persuaded, deny the memorialists the privilege of laying their views before the House and the country, in the manner contemplated by the motion he had made. He thought the printing was due to the memorialists, and to the subject of their memorial. It was, confessedly, one of great national importance. It had long occupied the anxious attention of a large and highly respectable portion of the country, who had repeatedly pressed the subject upon the consideration of Congress; and whatever might be the views of gentlemen in regard to the expediency of granting the prayer of the memorialists, it seemed to him that it was due to them, as a matter of common courtesy and common right, that the memorial should be printed, to the end that it might receive that attention which the importance of the question and the character of the memorialists demanded.

He was, indeed, personally unacquainted with them; but they belonged to a section of the country as much enlightened on the subject of human rights, and as well informed in regard to their constitutional privileges, as any other portion of the Union. If they were of the same stamp with those of his constituents who entertained the same views, and who had instructed him to present memorials similar to that now before the House, he was sure that none could deny to them a respectful hearing, and to their memorial the regard, at least, which would be indicated by ordering it to be printed.

These memorials for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia were less connected with the efforts for a general and immediate abolition of slavery in the southern States than was commonly believed. He had charge of memorials of the same character, which he knew contained the names of many individuals who had no connexion with abolition societies, and who did not harmonize with their views in regard to the object of their efforts; but who, nevertheless, felt deeply impressed with a conviction of the right and the duty of Congress to act upon this subject, and to abolish slavery, and erase from the national escutcheon the foul blot of the slave trade within the limits of this District.

Mr. SLADE said he was well aware of the rule suggested by the Chair, which he did not intend to transgress by any attempt to discuss the merits of the question involved in the memorial. He only insisted on the propriety of printing it; and he felt warranted in pressing his motion, not only by the considerations he had suggested, but by the additional one that former memorials to the same effect had been printed by order of the House. He referred, especially, to one which had been presented in 1828, signed by more than eleven hundred citizens of this District, great numbers of whom were slaveholders, and many of whom he knew to be among the most respectable inhabitants of the District. That memorial set forth in strong language the evils of slavery, and painted, in vivid colors, the abominations of the slave trade within this territory over which Congress is invested with the right of exclusive legislation. The signers of the memorial were not in a situation to be accused of fanaticism, while they were in a condition to form a correct judgment with regard to the evils of which they complained, and for which they besought Congress to provide a remedy; and if gentlemen would take the trouble to examine that petition, they would find the evils of slavery and the slave trade set forth in stronger language than that which was employed in the memorial which he now asked the House to print. He would add, that the memorial to which he referred was called up two years ago by an honorable member from New Hampshire, now a member of the Senate; and, on his motion, was ordered to be printed with the names of the signers. He submitted whether, with this precedent before them, the House could refuse to make the order which his motion contemplated.

Mr. VANDERPOEL remarked that, inasmuch as the memorial had been audibly read by the Clerk, and the contents of it were now well understood by every member of the House, and as the motion to print was debatable, and the debate now commenced was very unprofitable, and would, in all probability, if not arrested, consume the day, he would move to lay the motion to print upon the table; and upon that motion he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered by the House.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, French, Fry, Philo C. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Sloane, Sprague, Vinton, Wardwell, Webster, Whittlesey—49.

So the motion to print was laid on the table.

Numerous petitions and memorials were now presented; among which,

The SPEAKER presented the petition of David Hew-land, of North Carolina, contesting the election of James Graham to a seat in this House, as a Representative from the State of North Carolina.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, the petition and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. HAMER, of Ohio, rose and remarked that he was absent from his seat when the question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] and he asked leave now to record his vote; but it was objected to.

Mr. HOLSEY, of Georgia, asked leave to record his vote on the motion to lay the motion to print the memorial presented by the gentleman from Maine on the table; and an objection being made,

Mr. HOLSEY moved the suspension of the rule, to enable him to effect his object; which motion was negatived.

The SPEAKER presented a letter from ELIJAH E. CHABRY, transmitting his credentials as a Representative in Congress from the State of Michigan.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said the gentleman could not be considered a member of the House, and was not entitled to a seat as such. As Michigan had assumed the position of a State, and the question of her admission was pending, the House could not prejudice that question by admitting the gentleman to a seat as a member. But, as an act of courtesy to him, he moved that a seat be assigned to him within the House, and that his communication be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER said he could not concur in the propriety of the course suggested. In order to have time to consult the precedents on the subject, he moved that the motion be laid on the table.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved an adjournment; which was agreed to, and

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The House took up the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. BOCKEE, for the appointment of certain officers of the House.

Mr. BOCKEE modified the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That OVERTON CARR be appointed principal doorkeeper of the House; and the resolution was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. BOCKEE then submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the House do now proceed to the choice of an assistant doorkeeper, by ballot.

Mr. HAYNES nominated Colonel JOHN W. HUNTER.

Mr. PATTON nominated JOHN B. DADE.

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, nominated OLIVER PEASE. Messrs. HAYNES, PATTON, and ALLAN of Kentucky, were appointed tellers.

The result of the first ballot was as follows:

For Hunter,	-	-	-	-	155
Dade,	-	-	-	-	29
Pease,	-	-	-	-	17
Blanks,	-	-	-	-	5

JOHN W. HUNTER, having a majority of all the votes, was declared to be duly elected.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. BEARDSLEY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, Mr. J. Q. ADAMS in the chair.

Mr. BEARDSLEY offered the following resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands, to the condition of the General Land Office, and to improvements in the land system, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of War, and the public interest intrusted to the War Department, except so much thereof as relates to Indian affairs, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the militia of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the Indian tribes, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the political relations of the United States with foreign nations, including "the ascertainment of the claims to be paid and the apportionment of the funds under the convention made with Spain," be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the commerce of the United States with foreign nations and their dependencies be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith; the custody of the public moneys, and every thing connected therewith; the offices of commissioners of loans and of the sinking fund, and every thing connected with the operations of those offices; and the Bank of the United States, including the books and stock of the United States in that institution, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the public interest intrusted to the Navy Department, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to the report of the Postmaster General, the condition and operations of the Post Office Department, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to "amending that part of the constitution which provides for the election of the President and Vice President of the United States," be referred to a select committee.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates "to the present condition of the District of Columbia," and which recommends a revision of its laws and the extension of political rights to its citizens, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates "to the defects which exist in the judicial system of the United States," and which recommend an extension of that system to all the States, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the Committee rose and reported the resolutions, and they were concurred in by the House.

The select committee on the subject of the election of the President and Vice President of the United States was ordered to consist of nine.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, moved the adoption of the customary joint resolution for the election of two chaplains to Congress.

Mr. WARDWELL stated that he had intended, when this resolution should be considered by the House, to offer an amendment, prohibiting the use of this hall on the Sabbath to the chaplains of Congress, or for any other purpose whatsoever. As he did not, however, wish to embarrass the election of chaplains, which he should not oppose, and as some members supposed that such would be the effect, he would not now offer the amendment, but would give notice that he should, at some future day, offer a resolution, the effect of which will be, if adopted by the House, to close this hall on the Sabbath.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, for supplying the heads of Departments and bureaux, and other officers of the Government, with copies of the public documents printed by order of Congress, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. PATTON objected to the resolution, on the ground that no object of public utility could be gained by it.

After some remarks from Messrs. MANN, WISE, MILLER, and JOHNSON of Kentucky.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire and report whether, in the transaction of public business, the public interest would be promoted in whole or in part; which was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WHITTLESEY offered some reasons connected with the private bills long before Congress, which have heretofore failed for want of time, in opposition to the motion.

After a few words from Mr. WARD, and a suggestion from Mr. MERCER, that next Friday being Christmas, the House would not probably sit, nor on the following Friday, which would be new-year's day,

Mr. BOON moved that the motion be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the estimates of the Treasury, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House then adjourned till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 18.

Mr. McKENNAN appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JACKSON, of Massachusetts, presented a petition from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying Congress to provide for the immediate abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia; which he moved to refer to a select committee.

Mr. HAMMOND moved that the petition be not received. The large majority by which the House had rejected a similar petition a few days ago had been very gratifying to him, and no doubt would be very gratifying to the whole South. He had hoped it would satisfy gentlemen charged with such petitions, of the impropriety of introducing them here. Since, however, it had not had that effect, and they persisted still in urging them upon the House and upon the country, he thought it was not requiring too much of the House, to ask it to put a more decided seal of reprobation on them, by peremptorily rejecting this.

The SPEAKER said he was not aware that such a motion had ever been sustained by the former practice of the House; and in addition to that, by a standing rule of the House, (the 45th,) petitions and memorials could not be debated or decided on the day of their presentation, but must lie over one day, unless the House should direct otherwise.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, then moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. HAMMOND said, as he was aware of no rule of the House restricting the rejection of petitions, he would modify his motion accordingly, by moving that the House reject the petition.

H. OF R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER remarked that the motion of Mr. GARLAND would take precedence.

Mr. HAMMOND begged the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] to withdraw his motion to lay on the table, that we might have a direct vote upon this matter. He was not disposed to go into a discussion of the question involved in the petition; though, should it be urged, he would not shrink from it a hair's breadth; but he did think it due to the House and the country, to give at once the most decisive evidence of the sentiments entertained here upon this subject. He wished to put an end to these petitions. He could not sit there and see the rights of the southern people assaulted day after day, by the ignorant fanatics from whom these memorials proceeded.

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman to suspend his remarks until he read the 45th rule of the House, which was as follows: "Petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place: a brief statement of the contents thereof shall verbally be made by the introducer, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order they were read." Unless, therefore, the House should direct otherwise, the Chair would be compelled, under the rule, to arrest any discussion, and direct the petition to lie over till to-morrow. Besides, the question to lie on the table, having precedence, was not debatable.

Mr. HAMMOND'S object, he said, was not to debate the merits of the question, but to move, if it was in order to do so, the rejection of the petition.

The SPEAKER replied that the rule was imperative on himself to arrest debate or decision on the petition, unless the House directed otherwise, and it must lie over one day.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the motion to reject brought up the whole merits of the question, and would necessarily bring on the very debate the gentleman said he desired to avoid; and he maintained that the motion to lie on the table was in order.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, said he felt compelled to insist upon his motion to lay the petition on the table for the present.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said that he did not like to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but it was of some importance that the rights of members should be clearly ascertained. He was sure that it was perfectly in order for any gentleman to make the point whether or not a paper should be received, and to move its rejection.

The SPEAKER said, as the question was new to him, he had doubts for a moment; he now entertained the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] but the motion to lay the petition on the table interposing, took precedence.

Mr. WILLIAMS contended that the latter motion would apply only after the petition had been received, and was in possession of the House.

Mr. HAWES rose to a question of order. Unless the gentleman took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, he was out of order in addressing the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS intended to appeal. He was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, that the petition should be laid upon the table, but he could not consent that that motion should ride over one that was prior to it. He begged to refer the honorable Speaker to an example set by one of his predecessors. It was that of a memorial sent to that House a few years ago, from a representative of some one of the South American revolutionary Governments. That representative of this South American Government took upon himself to appeal from the decision of the President of the United States to the nation, through the House of Representatives, and his memorial was presented by the presiding officer of that House. A question was raised by a distinguished member from Pennsylvania, and a motion was made that the petition should not be received, and the House decided that it should not be received. Now, that was altogether preliminary to the question of laying on the table, and had precedence of it. A motion to lay on the table could only be maintained when the subject was before the House; and after the question, whether it should be received or not, or whether it should be laid before the House, had been decided. It was with a view of ascertaining that question that Mr. W. appealed from the decision of the Chair; for he was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, to lay the petition on the table, but he was also in favor of first receiving it.

Mr. MERCER well remembered, he said, the case cited by the gentleman from North Carolina, and if he was not mistaken, the question on that occasion was not in relation to the constitutional power of that House to refuse to receive petitions from citizens of the United States, for the right to petition was reserved to our citizens by the constitution; but it was as to whether an individual, not a citizen of the United States, could come there and petition; the petitioner in that case being a commander in one of the South American Governments.

The SPEAKER stated the question before the House as it then stood, and said he should be glad to have the judgment of the House upon it. After reading the forty-fifth rule, and also the thirty-second rule, laying down the order of privileged motions, of which that to lie on the table stands second, he remarked that the Chair considered the petition as having been received by the House, and had entertained the motions for a time; but, under the former rule, the petition ought to lie over. If, however, the House set that aside, still the motion to lie on the table having the preference, the question could not be debated on its merits. If in error, the Chair would be very happy to be corrected. The question then before the House was, Shall the decision of the Chair be sustained?

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, thought it would be better that the petition lie over for one day without being debated at that time. As the question was a new one, or about to be decided for the first time, it would be safest for the House at least to let the petition lie over one day; and he would, therefore, suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that this course had better be adopted, and at the next day of meeting the House could then either reject it or lay it on the table. Mr. B. thought the decision of the Chair, that the petition should lie over, in substance right, and he thought it certainly the safest course to pursue.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he should have supported the views of the last gentleman, if a different course had not been taken the other day. He could see no reason why the course pursued in relation to the petition presented by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] should be departed from now; nor why, after the decisive vote that went forth to the country, expressive of the views and feelings of so large a majority on that occasion, they should now assume a different shape. Had the question itself undergone any change? If what was then done was wrong, let them say so, and let those who were unacquainted with the rules of proceeding know they were in error; but he saw nothing in the rules that conflicted with the course now sought to be pursued in relation to the petition on the table. He did hope that, so far as related to the memorials and petitions of this kind, some additional views would be given, to satisfy gentlemen who felt it their duty to introduce and present them, and to satisfy their constituents who thought it necessary to send them there; and that, as it seemed to him, could best be done now by a vote of rejection. What the decisions of the House might be, he knew not; but if there was such a rule in existence, that the House had no power to reject a petition presented to it, whether respectful or not, it was time the rule should be altered, for he was well assured that they would be harassed throughout the session. He should be sorry if the House was tied down by any rule to receive any and every petition, whether respectful or not. Suppose a petition were presented to the House, and it was found to contain matter disrespectful to a single member of the House, would not a motion to reject it be in order? He would respectfully ask whether he understood the decision of the Chair correctly, that a motion to reject could not be entertained on the presentation of a petition.

The SPEAKER replied that he had not so stated. When the gentleman from South Carolina first submitted his motion, the Chair stated that he was not aware of any such motion having been made in that House during the period the individual occupying the Chair had been a member; that it was new to him at the moment. The Chair, however, did not feel authorized to say the motion should not be entertained; but if it was, he then decided that the motion to lay on the table would have precedence; or that if the motion to reject was received by itself, it was not debatable, because, under the rule of the House, it must lie over one day, unless the House should direct otherwise.

Mr. GLASCOCK had misapprehended the Chair, and would conclude by calling upon the House, that, as they had given one decided vote on the question before, they should not repeat it in the same way, but change their course, and reject the petition altogether.

Mr. HAMMOND would read to the House the rule under which he thought it was entirely competent for him to make the motion—it was this: "When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker." Now, the motion he made was a demand by him upon the Speaker to put the question, whether the petition should be considered or not; and it was a motion any member of the House had a right to put, according to the rules. His reason for making the motion was not that he wished to enter into a discussion of this subject, though he did not fear it, and would never shrink from it, but because he did not wish to disturb that House, nor harass the country, by allowing such petitions to come there. Still he could not sit there, and allow petition after petition to pour in, until they became callous to the subject. He could not sit there, and see the rights of the South assailed, day after day, by ignorant fanatics, without calling upon that House to put the stamp of reprobation upon such conduct.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that the merits of the whole question were not open on a mere question of order.

Mr. HAMMOND would confine himself by saying that if the House should decide that the motion to lay on the table has preference, he would then move that the petition be laid on the table till to-morrow, in order to call it up and move to reject it.

Mr. PEYTON had hoped, and yet hoped, that gentlemen would not give up the motion. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] was mistaken. There had been no decisive vote yet given upon this question. There had been an evasive vote given upon it. Had not Mr. P. sat by and seen gentlemen who voted differently at the last session of Congress, now voting in favor of laying the petition on the table? But these firebrands were cast upon the House now at an earlier day than usual; that spirit was abroad in the land, and it was left for the representatives of the people to meet it.

Mr. REED called the gentleman to order, as his remarks were not pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. PEYTON said he was assigning reasons for sustaining the motion for the decision of the House at that time, pursuant to the demand made by the honorable member from South Carolina. He hoped they should be permitted to meet this question at its beginning in some shape or other. Now, it struck him with great force, that when a petition was presented containing matter improper for legislation, that the House ought to reject it; and before it was received, it could not be laid on the table for one day. Consequently the question of its reception or rejection must, as a matter of necessity, be first decided, and that brought prompt action upon the whole question. He would repeat that he wished a more decisive vote, and one that would ascertain the wishes, the views, and the feelings of gentlemen upon it; and if they met it, he would say, with the gentleman from Georgia, that it would be decisive. Another reason why it should be acted upon in the present stage, before the consideration of it, was, that it asked Congress to do what every man in the country knew it had no power to do. Suppose a petition were sent there, praying the House to break down our republican form of government, and erect a monarchy upon its ruins, would any one say the House had the power to act upon such a petition? And had the House more power in the present case? Was not the first question to be decided before the petition could be laid on the table? He thought, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina the proper one, and that it must necessarily have precedence of all others; and he desired to consider it, and to consider it at once. It would then be seen whether gentlemen would encourage their constituents every where to send there such floods of these petitions as would cover the tables of that hall like the locusts of Egypt, for such would be the result in twelve months. Those gentlemen who had not made up their minds to meet this question, in any and every shape in which it would be presented, must take the responsibility. He wanted no evasive votes. He wanted no propositions to lay on the table. He met the question fully at once, by saying that House had no power whatever to interfere with the question. For these reasons, he should vote for sustaining the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SLADE raised a question of order as to debating the question of order under consideration. The petition itself, said Mr. S., could not be debated upon the day of its presentation; and this principle, he understood, carried along with it a principle which would prohibit any discussion on the motion to reject, or the appeal from the decision of the Chair, then before the House; and the motion to lay on the table could not be debatable. Under these circumstances, he thought no motion connected with this petition could be debated that day, and he therefore submitted whether it did not follow that the appeal from the decision of the Chair, on this subject, could not be debated.

The SPEAKER said an appeal from his decision, as a question of appeal, was certainly debatable, although the motions out of which that appeal rose were not.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, could assure the House that he was not disposed to avoid this question in any form or shape; and he hoped, while he had the honor of a seat there, he should be prepared to meet it whenever it might come, and wherever it might come from. He had submitted his motion because he thought the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina could not then be put; but if the House decided it could, Mr. G.

H. OF R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

would withdraw his motion to lay the petition on the table. The motion to reject came up with the motion to refer the petition to a select committee; the former, as he understood, not being entertained, or not in order, it was then that Mr. G. moved to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. BEARDSLEY asked whether the appeal from the decision of the Chair went only to the rejection of the petition, or also to the question of laying it on the table.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] had taken an appeal from both.

Mr. WILLIAMS understood the Chair to decide that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, whether the petition should be considered, or whether it should be received, was not in order. Now, Mr. W. contended, with all due respect, that when a petition is presented, if any member choose to demand it, he could require the preliminary question to be put, Shall the petition be received? I understood the Chair to decide that the question could not be put.

The SPEAKER replied that the Chair had distinctly stated that, upon a moment's reflection, he admitted the motion for consideration of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then there is no question of appeal.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, as there was no question of appeal pending, but two motions, one to reject and the other to lay the petition on the table, both of which would lie over till to-morrow, he would move that the House proceed at once to decide the last motion, which took precedence.

The question was then put, whether the House would consider the petition now; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND said, as the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to reject was then in order, he would withdraw his motion to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. BEARDSLEY renewed it.

Mr. HAMMOND rose to request the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] to withdraw his motion. He expressed his surprise that, but a moment ago, when the motion to lay on the table, made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] was before the House, he [Mr. BEARDSLEY] had expressed his desire to have a direct, "unentangled" vote on the proposition to reject. Yet now, when the gentleman from Virginia withdraws his motion, he instantly renews it.

Mr. PATTON asked if the Chair considered the petition to have been received.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. PATTON understood that if the motion to consider prevailed, it was distinctly declared that the motion to receive or not receive the petition would be in order. That was a competent motion, which any member of the House had a right to make. Now, it was understood as having been received; the proposition not to receive is thereby cut off. That seemed to be the effect. If that be the effect—and if it be the effect the House did not intend to produce—he trusted the House would put itself in statu quo; and that they should have an opportunity of putting a direct vote upon it. If that was the state of the question, Mr. P. would feel himself compelled to move a reconsideration of the vote thus taken.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said the right to petition was a sacred right, guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by the constitution, and was one, therefore, the House was bound to respect. To obviate the objections urged by the gentleman, he would withdraw his motion to lay the petition on the table, and move to lay the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, to reject the petition, on the table.

Mr. HAMMOND asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE rose to a point of order. It seemed to him, according to the usual action of the House, that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] must be out of order. A motion was made originally to reject the petition; whereupon a motion was then made to lay the petition on the table; but being withdrawn, the question then came upon the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, instantan. The motion, therefore, to lay that motion on the table was out of order, because the House had decided it would immediately consider the motion to reject.

The SPEAKER said that the House had decided they would consider the petition now; but, pending the consideration, the House may decide to lay on the table; and therefore the motion was in order.

Mr. WISE would ask the Chair if there was any pendency of consideration in a motion to consider.

The SPEAKER said, pending the consideration of a question, it was competent for any member to move to lay the matter on the table.

Mr. WISE. The motion then before the House was effectually to undo the decision of the House already made.

Mr. VINTON begged to inquire of the Chair, as it would govern his vote, if the motion to lay on the table the motion to reject prevailed, whether the petition would also go on the table; or what would be the pending question.

The CHAIR understood that, by an affirmative vote on the motion to lay the motion to reject on the table, the petition also would go on the table with it.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, as gentlemen seemed to feel some embarrassment in voting upon this proposition, though he himself did not, he would withdraw his last motion, and renew the other to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. JAMES asked for the reading of the petition; and it was read from the Clerk's table.

Mr. THOMAS said he was surprised to discover that there are gentlemen who are not content with the evidence which has already been given that a very large majority of this House are opposed to any interference whatever, not only with the rights of slaveholders in the southern States, but with the existence of slavery within the District of Columbia. We have already laid on the table, by a vote of nearly three to one, two memorials similar to the one now under consideration. But gentlemen say those votes are equivocal; they wish to have direct proof that the rights of slaveholders are not in danger from any interference on the part of Congress. Mr. T. said that he did not concur in this opinion. The vote to lay on the table had been given to signify a decided opposition to the prayer of the petitioners; nevertheless, he would make a motion which would, he thought, place this subject before the House in a position to afford an opportunity to remove all misapprehension which really existed, and deprive every man every where of all pretext for maintaining that southern property and southern rights are in danger.

Mr. T. then moved to reconsider the vote just given by the House in favor of considering this petition, and said, if this motion is adopted, we shall then have this petition before us in the position in which it was placed when first presented to the House. In the vote given in favor of considering this memorial, many members had been undoubtedly taken by surprise. Some members who are in favor of rejecting this and other similar memorials, and others who are in favor of receiving and then laying on the table this and all petitions of like import, united in the vote which he had moved to reconsider. This strange combination could not have been created without a mistake somewhere. Gentlemen must have supposed that by the adoption of the motion to consider this memorial, the difficulty which has arisen by reason of the decision of the Chair would alone be removed; and that, instead of postponing until to-morrow all action on this subject, we would now proceed to dispose of it, either by a vote to reject or to lay it on the table.

I am not disposed, Mr. Speaker, to afford unnecessarily an opportunity to discuss here the relative rights of master and slave. As one of the representatives of a slaveholding State, I would never provoke an examination here calculated to create false hopes in the minds of an ignorant and stupid population. We have been told, I know not how truly, that great and general excitement has already been produced in some of the southern States, by the circulation of a few fanatical pamphlets. If this be true, is it not madness, worse than madness, to struggle to elicit evidence that there is in that House any one man willing to re-echo the sentiment which these incendiary publications contain? I have been opposed, sir, to all discussion on this subject, and accordingly have voted repeatedly in the two preceding Congresses to lay on the table every proposition calculated to elicit useless and angry debate. And I have been, and am, grateful to the representatives from the North and West, where slavery does not exist, for their cordial and earnest effort to extinguish every firebrand which has been thrown in here, either in the form of speeches or petitions, tending to destroy the broad foundation on which our Union rests. But is it not obvious that our exertions have not been crowned with complete success? In the last two Congresses, the petitions of the abolitionists were laid on the table, as an evidence of our reprobation of their objects; notwithstanding, at the present session we have already received those petitions, and shall probably have to dispose of several more. These fanatical crusaders against evils abroad, who have, no doubt, vices enough at their own doors to exhaust, in their correction, that overflowing Christian charity of which they boast so much and manifest so little, nothing daunted, continue to pour their poisons into that national chalice, from which the whole people of the United States have so long quaffed the sweet waters of concord and Union. Now, what is to be done? For one, I am prepared to meet directly every question connected with these memorials. I am willing to follow the precedent set by Congress on another question. The opponents of a Sunday mail petitioned Congress; their memorials were rejected, because their object was unreasonable; they persisted, and their numbers increased; the House of Representatives finally referred all those petitions to a select committee; from which emanated one of the most masterly state papers which has ever been published in the country. It was addressed to the understanding, not to the passions, of the American people; and there was a response from all quarters to its cogent, persuasive, and conclusive reasoning. Its arguments were unanswered and are unanswerable; and the petitioners were silenced. The oil was spread over the troubled waters, and the turbulent waves became still.

Gentlemen say we must prevent any discussion on the subject of these memorials, because they must inevitably disturb the harmony of our Union. There was a time when the force of this reason could be fully felt by all. But has not that time gone by? Without our agency, indeed in defiance of all precautions on the part of Congress, the power and purpose of the General Government to interfere with the question of slavery has been, and will be, discussed in every newspaper, in every periodical publication, from Maine to Missouri. It is a gross error to suppose that this House can, by a mere sic volo, give law to the people of the United States. The members of this House are not in positions stable enough for that. To attempt it would be as vain as the effort of Xerxes to chain with links of iron the surging sea. Our march is not to be always on the mountain wave of popular opinion. We are here to-day—we are gone to-morrow; and must return to our respective places in that great deep, that vast hall of legislation, the confines of which are coextensive with the boundaries of the Union, and there assist those who are now our constituents, to fashion and form that public opinion, which must ever direct and control the whole operations of this Government.

"Like bubbles on the sea of matter borne,
We rise, we break, and to the sea return."

Assuming these positions to be true, how ought the members of this House to act on the present occasion? To decide that question satisfactorily for myself, has been, until to-day, a difficult task. Twice, during the present session, I have voted to lay on the table petitions from the abolitionists. This was done under the impression that such a proceeding would be entirely satisfactory to the whole southern delegation. The large majority of northern and western votes by which it was done, too, was hailed by me as evidence conclusive that there is no disposition in these sections of the Union to do any act calculated to disturb the harmony of our Union. To-day we are told that the vote to lay on the table is an equivocal act. That it has been resorted to to afford an opportunity to pretending enemies of abolition to conceal their future purposes. Sir, is it right and proper, under these circumstances, to persevere in the course which has been heretofore pursued? If gentlemen on this floor can be so far misled as to suppose there is a lurking intention in the mind of any member to turn loose an ignorant and helpless population to pillage and plunder, in what condition will you leave many of the constituents of gentlemen who are remote from the scene of action? Will they not be in a proper condition to become the instruments of the designing? May not rash and misguided men, in one extreme of the Union, engender those suspicions and distrusts which will be necessarily destructive of all the ends for which this Government was established? And may not the headstrong fanatics of the North be furnished with the means of increasing their paltry numbers by inculcating the belief that their nefarious purposes are but postponed? In my humble opinion, if we refuse to act decidedly, to meet all questions connected with this unpleasant subject directly, we shall furnish the enemies of our peace and Union with a most dangerous weapon. We shall supply the means to faction and fanaticism to agitate the whole country. And the day may come when these few and furious destroyers of this country's happiness and glory will have produced real, not as it is now, imaginary, in the North—not as it is now, a very limited, but an extensive excitement—which will sweep in waves to the very walls of that constitutional temple in which our fathers fondly hoped they had garnered up so many bright hopes and so many blessings for this magnificent confederacy.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared now to meet the responsibilities which circumstances have imposed upon us. I am prepared to vote for the reception of the petition, and of all other memorials of similar character; and am ready to vote against laying them on the table; to declare distinctly that the prayers of these petitioners are unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS said that they were very much embarrassed, and it occurred to him that there was but one conceivable mode by which they could be relieved from that embarrassment. He understood that, by the rule of the House, upon the presentation of petitions, unless the question is required to be put by a member of the House, or by the Speaker, that the same is received as a matter of course; in other words, received by a vote of the House, sub silentio. If this be the fact, then, this petition had been received. It seemed to him that the best mode would be to throw the petition back again to the point where it was left by the gentleman who presented it; and, in order to do that, he would propose to move a reconsideration of the vote of the House by which the petition was received. He would go farther back than the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] and move a reconsideration of the vote of the House whereby the petition had been received.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said his colleague would be satisfied, upon a moment's reflection, that no benefit could result from such a motion. It was the constitutional right of the people of this country to petition to that House, and no vote was ever taken on receiving a petition. When an honorable representative rose and presented a petition, it was received; and the first question which any member had a right to demand, was, that it be considered. If the House determine not to consider it, they are to determine at once; and that he understood to be the point in their proceedings at which it was the object of the gentleman from Maryland to arrive; and Mr. M. hoped the gentleman's motion would be adopted. He had hoped that, after the proceedings which had already taken place in that House, there would have been a general acquiescence in the only, if not the express sense of the House, by an overwhelming majority, not to entertain such petitions as that under consideration. The only mode in which there could be a more direct sense of the House on the subject was by adopting the motion of the gentleman from Maryland; and then, if it be the pleasure of the majority of the House not to consider the petition, and so to determine at once, there the matter would end; and he hoped the motion would be adopted, and then that the House would determine not to consider the petition.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was satisfied that most of the difficulty arose from misconception. The honorable member from South Carolina desired to have a direct vote of the House upon the motion to reject, or not to receive, the petition under consideration. Other gentlemen, who agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, who last addressed the Chair, said they would not vote in the affirmative on such a question, because it was in violation of the rights of the people of this country to petition upon all subjects; and the House of Representatives was bound to receive their petitions. When received, it was true the House might decline acting on them, or might dispose of them in a variety of ways. For himself, (Mr. B. said,) the House having received this petition, he was ready to give a direct vote upon it, a vote that should mark the opinion of the House upon the character of such petitions, by saying affirmatively that they would not consider it. If that would meet the views of honorable gentlemen, he was willing to modify his motion to lay on the table, and to move that the House would not consider the petition, or would reject its prayer; although laying it on the table he thought equivalent to either of the modifications indicated.

All Mr. B. desired was to preserve the right of their constituents to petition; a sacred and invaluable right, guaranteed to them under the constitution, and the exercise of which the House was bound to treat with respect. If the petition were in insulting terms, they might send it back; but if their constituents sent them one that was respectful in its language, but of whose prayer they entirely disapproved, let them lay it on the table, or reject its prayer. If any gentleman supposed that a vote of the House not to consider this petition, and all other petitions of the same character, would more distinctly mark the reprobation of the House, then Mr. B. would with great pleasure modify his motion. Why, then, should they reconsider, as proposed by the motion of the gentleman from Maryland? For what purpose? Was it to entertain the question of rejecting the petition? He understood that to be the object of the mover; and, if so, he hoped the House would not reconsider, but that they would preserve to their constituents the right of petitioning, and, by a vote to lay on the table, preclude all further debate upon this exciting and mischievous topic.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was willing to meet this question in any way. He had been so the last session and the session before, and declared his willingness then, in deference and respect to his southern brethren, who he knew agreed with him in interest and feeling; and, at their suggestion, he agreed with them in voting to give the matter the go-by. He then thought, and still thought, that the people of the South ought to know and to see and to hear, all that we know and see and hear upon this subject. He was anxious, however, if they were to come to any expression of opinion and feeling on this matter, so momentous to the South, that they should not be brought to that vote entangled by the rules of that House. He wished, when the opinion of the South upon this subject should be expressed, and their feelings made known, it would be done in a way that would leave no doubt what that opinion and those feelings were. And he was persuaded that, when their opinions and feelings came unshackled by forms or rules, or any thing but the mere question itself, the South would satisfy the North, East, and West—would satisfy the whole world—nay, would convince even fanatics themselves, that they must let us alone upon this point; and convince them, and all the agitators and movers of these petitions, that they had as well let us alone, and employ themselves in removing from their own eye the beam which is in it, rather than disturb themselves so much about the mote that is in their brother's eye. Let us not (said Mr. B.) come to a vote that will leave the world in doubt whether we voted on the rule or the thing—let this petition pass, and no doubt they will be coming again to-morrow—ay, in a half hour—with one that will enable us to meet it face to face, and toe to toe, and leave neither them nor the world in doubt what we mean. Mr. B. concluded by saying that he rose to ask what would be the effect of his vote—ay or no—on the question itself. He would give the best vote he could, but did not know himself how that vote would be understood. He would content himself with the belief that the question would come up in a form which would leave no doubt either with himself or any one.

Mr. PEYTON was in favor of the motion to reconsider. He would not have troubled the House with any remarks again, but for the position assumed by the gentleman from New York. That gentleman contended that the right of petition was a sacred right, guaranteed to every American citizen under the constitution; and that the House had no right to deprive them of the exercise of that right. Mr. P. said they had the right to petition, and to think and to say what they pleased; and, further, they had the right to send any matter they chose throughout all the country, without regard to consequences, and that House had no power to resist it. But, then, he claimed that, when it came to that House, the representatives had the right to treat it and dispose of it in such manner as they thought best. Was the sacred right of petition any dearer than many other sacred rights—the right to property, to liberty, and to life? And had not the attention of the House been called, by the message of the President of the United States, to this very question of this sacred right of thinking, and writing, and sending through the mail, such documents as were then before them? Should they connect the efforts of a few fanatics to disturb the harmony and peace of the country with those sacred and inalienable rights to which the gentleman alluded? Should they connect the attempt, whether it came by petition to Congress or by a document transmitted in any other mode, to throw a firebrand into the South, with the sacred rights of liberty and property?

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that the merits of the question could not be gone into under the motion before the House.

Mr. PEYTON only meant to reply to what he considered to be the constitutional right contended for by the gentleman from New York—the right of the citizen, every where, to send such papers and petitions there. He was endeavoring to meet this, by saying that the slave question was not one to which the right of petitioning applied; but that if it did, and petitions were sent to that House, and papers of the same character were distributed over the country, it would have the effect of touching a chord that would arouse all America.

Mr. RIPLEY said that this was a grave and important question. There was no subject of deeper interest in the quarter of the country from whence he came. He had been sent here to oppose every effort of a certain class of citizens, in reference to slavery within this District, or elsewhere. In disposing of the question before the House, care should be taken rather to allay the public feeling than to add to the existing excitement. The right of petition was a solemn one, and had been guaranteed from the time of magna charta to the present moment. Our citizens have a right to petition for a change of their constitution, and, indeed, for a change in the form of Government. Every decorous memorial should be received; but, when received, it is in the power of the House to dispose of it as it may deem proper. The motion to reject this petition was an incipient question, and, in his opinion, should take precedence. He again adverted to the great excitement in the South on this subject, and the importance of allaying that excitement by a decisive course here. If the gentlemen from the North were sincere in their friendship for their brethren in the South, and were desirous of breaking down the double wall of partition between those two sections of the country, they could give an earnest on the present occasion, by voting promptly to reject this petition; and when it shall go forth that we have rejected it by a vast majority, it will have an effect even upon the fanatics themselves, who do not understand the position and feeling of the South on this subject, while it will, at the same time, allay the existing excitement in that portion of the country.

Mr. WISE was for sustaining the motion to reconsider; and, for one, could testify that he had voted under a misapprehension. In voting for the motion to consider the petition, he thought he was voting to have a direct decision of the House on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina. He was intending to bring the House also to a direct decision of the question, and had no idea, after the House had decided it would consider the petition, that the consideration itself would be evaded.

Mr. W. had misapprehended in another particular. He had not understood the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to be to consider the petition to-day, but to consider his motion to reject the petition, which was what Mr. W. wished to consider. So help him God, he never wished to consider the petition of an incendiary, but he would consider the motion to reject the petition, and he warned the gentleman from South Carolina that these were the means of evading his motion. Mr. W. then referred to the proceedings of the Senate two years ago, on a motion to reject a petition to that body, containing matter disrespectful to the honorable William Wilkins, then a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, to show that such a course was within the rules of order; and asked whether the gentleman from New York considered the present a respectful petition, where gentlemen on that floor were characterized as land pirates? He had hoped that, after the proceedings at a celebrated meeting at Utica last summer, where the gentleman himself took a very prominent part, he should have had that gentleman's vote on the question of rejecting this petition—a petition that was both insulting in language and incendiary in its character. Mr. W. hoped the motion would prevail, although he did not consider it in itself decisive. They could never get a direct vote on that question. Many would vote not to reject it, on account of the sacred right of petition, but he hoped the House would not evade the question. He hoped gentlemen who professed to be friendly to the South would come out and avow their principles and their opinions. If the House desired to evade the question, let the South know it. If it was the opinion that Congress had the right to interfere in this question, let the South know it at once, and it would know what to do. Their predecessors had told them what to do. They had no longer any business there. Their business was at home, to report to their people. He would go home, never to return there again, if that House were to say, directly or indirectly, that Congress had that power. That was the question he wished to bring before the House, whether the House had the constitutional power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia at all. He denied the right.

It was important to have a direct decision on this question, and there was no way of getting it, but by sustaining the motion then under consideration. Gentlemen must show they are either for or against us, and if they would not show it upon the direct questions, and upon the main questions, they should show it upon the incidental questions; and he, for one, would be willing to consider this as the test question. Those who are for laying the motion on the table, he viewed as evading the question, and so would the South view them. Those who were for a direct vote on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, would be viewed as the friends of the South, and not the South alone, but of the whole nation. He would repeat, the petition was not respectful to the House, and therefore it ought to be rejected. He could never consent to refer or consider a petition that called the members of the South land pirates.

Mr. HAMER inquired of the Chair, whether, if the present motion prevailed, it would be competent then for the gentleman from South Carolina, or any other gentleman, to move to reject the petition?

The SPEAKER said he was under the impression that that would be a competent motion.

Mr. HAMMOND said it had been far from his intention, when he made the motion he did, to throw a firebrand into that House. On the contrary, he had hoped by it to exclude one from the House. He thought the motion a very simple and direct one; and, ignorant as he was of the rules of the House, he had no idea that the House had it not in its power to protect its own dignity, and the feelings of its members, by rejecting instantaneously anything calculated to affect either the one or the other. If the House had no such rule, the rule of common sense ought to govern it.

When the proposition was made to consider this petition, it was made by himself, with a view of then moving its rejection. Under the decision of the Speaker, that motion was decided not to be in order. The subsequent vote was a trap into which they fell, and he thanked the gentleman from Maryland for having made a motion by which they could extricate themselves. Should the House determine to reconsider that motion, he (Mr. H.) would then move the rejection of the petition; for he was resolved that the House should vote directly on the question. Let no member there lay the flattering unction to his soul that he could escape the question, for it should be decided. He did not make the motion with any reference to party politics. God forbid that he should make a motion of such a purport, to affect a miserable scramble for offices in this country. No! His object was a more sacred one. It was to protect the rights of his constituents and his own; and if they could not maintain them by the action of that House, they would maintain them by their own action. They did not call upon the House to protect them; they did not ask that House or the Government to protect them; they stood erect, self-confident, united, strong, and they asked no protection, but scorned assistance, and defied opposition. Mr. H. said his motion involved no constitutional right of any citizen of the country. But if they had the right to petition, had not the House the right to reject? Was there any constitutional privilege that demanded of the House that it should imperatively receive and consider the petition of any citizen? He thought not; and even if there were, the constitutional privilege would operate both ways; and when they chose to petition, the House could choose to reject. To the recommendation of the gentleman from Maryland, to refer this petition to a select committee, in order that they might make a report, Mr. H. was utterly opposed. He would not treat that petition with so much respect, nor was he disposed to fire, that he might exhibit his skill. He had no idea of scattering firebrands through the country, that he might distinguish himself in putting them out. He did not wish to discuss the question, and he begged the House to understand that, in the few remarks he had made, he did not design discussing it. Whenever it was discussed, they would go much deeper in the matter than this. Whenever it should be, if ever, taken up in that House for discussion, it might expect to find parties and principles anatomized and held up to the view of the world that were now treated with lenity. He hoped, however, now, that the House would take a direct, unentangled, and simple vote upon the question.

Mr. BEARDSLEY desired to correct a misapprehension of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PEXTON.] That honorable gentleman seemed to understand Mr. B. to say, that the citizens of this country had not only the right to petition that House, and to send papers of this character there, but that they had also the right to transmit such papers to every part of the Union, in every possible way.

Mr. PEXTON did not understand the gentleman so, nor did he intend to be so understood himself.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he understood the gentleman very distinctly to say, that he (Mr. B.) had asserted that the citizens of this country had not only the right to send their petitions here, but also to send their papers elsewhere. The honorable gentleman, however, disclaimed it, and Mr. B. was satisfied.

A word or two upon another subject. If the motion of the gentleman from Maryland should prevail, the Chair has decided that this matter, instead of being disposed of to-day, went over to another day; and the House could not but see that after wasting this day—for it was wasting, or worse than wasting—they would to-morrow be in the same situation as at first. For what purpose would the House reconsider its vote, and spend another day, or perhaps a week, in this discussion? He hoped that the House would follow the example, the salutary example, set by preceding Congresses, by putting all papers of this description on the table without debate. That motion was pending, and followed the one made by the gentleman to reconsider. If that should be rejected, the motion would come up for laying the petition on the table, and nailing it there, whence it would not be taken during the session. If other petitions of the same character came, let them share the same fate.

Another remark or two. It was, it must have been, obvious to all, that there were those who desired to continue the discussion of this question. He could not and he would not say they did it from any improper motive; but it could not have escaped the attention of the House, that gentlemen desired to speak, and talk, and discuss this question of slavery, harassing as it was to the country. Those who voted to lay a similar paper on the table the other day, those who would vote to lay the one under consideration on the table to-day, were those who desired to avoid discussion. For what purpose was the continuation of the discussion now desired? Every one knew that petitions of this kind had been presented for the last four years, but no discussion had taken place upon them. He hoped, most sincerely, that that House would not invite or sanction this discussion. He would tell gentlemen there were fanatics and incendiaries at the South, as well as at the North, who hoped to profit by the agitation of this subject. Those who voted to put the petition on the table were for preserving peace and quiet there, and for preserving peace, quiet, and order, in every part of the Union. Let us, then, (said Mr. B.,) nail it to the counter, and thus silence debate. He hoped the motion of the gentleman from Maryland would not prevail; but that the motion pending upon that, to lay it on the table, would prevail, and then they would see no firebrands in that House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was surprised at the range which the debate had taken upon the question now before the House. He believed it was incompatible with the interests and true objects of those who were opposed to the mischievous doings of the modern abolitionists. Mr. V. said that he was the last man on that floor to dodge or evade any direct point or vote, that should indicate his opinion upon the principle involved in the petition now upon the Speaker's table. He would, as prefatory to the few remarks he intended to submit, take occasion to say that he had last year, as a member of the District Committee, to which similar petitions were then referred, opposed, and he would always, and forever, while he had a seat here, oppose any measure that might directly or indirectly favor, or forward, or countenance, the views and objects expressed by such petitions. He was opposed, openly and unconditionally opposed, to the interference of Congress with slavery in the District of Columbia, and to the mischievous and incendiary doings of abolitionists and abolition societies, in relation to slavery in the slaveholding States. He (Mr. V.) had never had any doubts, or qualms, or scruples, as to what was his duty upon this momentous subject, as an American citizen, and as one of the Representatives of one of these confederated States. But while he made this unequivocal avowal of his sentiments, he would not refrain from remarking that, if he had entertained any such doubts or scruples, he had heard speeches to-day from certain quarters very ill calculated to remove those doubts or scruples. Why had this debate taken such an immeasurable range? Was it consistent with one of the cardinal doctrines of the friends of the South, that the subject was one so delicate in its nature, that the less that was said about it the better? It really appeared to him that we were aiding the efforts of the abolitionists, by shooting off, upon a mere preliminary question, into dissertations upon the evils and abominations wrought by northern abolitionists.

What was the question before the House? It was upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] to reconsider the vote taken this morning, to the end that that honorable gentleman might move (as he had promised to do) the question, whether the House would consider the petition. He would vote first to reconsider, and then he would, if the question were propounded, vote against considering the petition, and for reasons which he would very briefly state.

Mr. V. conceived that this course would save the rights of all parties. It would save the sacred right of petition, and secure the object of all those who felt duly solicitous for the rights and interests of the slaveholding States. For (said Mr. V.) the motion or question whether we will consider the petition presupposes the reception of it. That motion proceeds upon the assumption that the petition is already here before us, as it now surely is in point of fact; and a negative vote to the proposition, whether we will consider the petition, would certainly be as emphatic a mode of expressing our disapprobation, nay, our reprobation, of the object of the petitioners, as could well be conceived. It would be a strong and marked refusal to let the petition go through the ordinary routine of legislation, and would be telling the petitioners, the nation, and the world, that the notions of the petitioners were so heretical, and their doings were so mischievous and incendiary, that co-incident that such petitions were read, we would consign them to a grave from which there should be no resurrection. Was it not clearly so, viewing this subject through the medium of common sense, and testing it by the rules of parliamentary logic? Yes, sir. The refusal to consider the petition would be telling such petitioners, in language that could not and would not be misunderstood, to cease their abortive and incendiary efforts to disturb the rights of property recognised and guaranteed by those men of olden times, who were so much wiser and better than the reformers and fanatics of modern days. Why, then, were we disputing about forms? Why not march directly to the point upon which all the true enemies of abolitionists would agree? Refuse to consider the petition, and you do what should be done, and that in the most prompt manner.

Mr. V. said he could not but repeat his surprise, that any gentleman could conceive that the interest of the South could be advanced by the protraction of this debate. He had flattered himself that the vote that was given a few days ago, upon the memorial presented by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] had given this exciting subject its quietus for the session. He imputed no sinister motives to any gentleman, and he trusted that he cherished none himself. He believed that gentlemen here meant what they not only avowed that they did mean, but what they solemnly pledged by their votes that they meant. He had supposed that common charity, not to mention parliamentary courtesy, required this species of faith from every gentleman upon this floor. He, therefore, had believed that when gentlemen had refused on Monday the courtesy of even printing the petition presented by the gentleman from Maine, in addition to their vote to lay it on the table, it should serve as a most ample guarantee, that all who voted against printing were decidedly opposed to the prayer of the petitioners. And was this not so, sir, according to all the known and legitimate deductions from parliamentary proceedings? Had gentlemen, before today, ever imagined or proposed a more summary and unequivocal mode of rejecting the prayer of a petition than was indicated by a refusal to print it, and an almost unanimous vote to lay it on the table? It would be probably recollected what course he (Mr. V.) had taken in regard to the petition of the honorable gentleman from Maine. The mover of the petition himself moved to lay it on the table, and many gentlemen no doubt voted to lay it on the table, because of this circumstance. An honorable colleague of his own [Mr. GRANGER] had preceded his vote with the inquiry, whether the gentleman who introduced the petition moved to lay it on the table; and, upon receiving an affirmative response from the Chair, he replied, "Then I vote in the affirmative!" Mr. V., for the purpose of more effectually ascertaining the sense of the House, and to arrest an unprofitable debate upon this exciting subject, then moved also to lay the motion to print the petition on the table; and the triumphant affirmative vote upon that question should have satisfied, and was sufficient to satisfy the nation, that such petitions would never receive the least countenance from this House. Strong as that vote was, it was evidently not near so strong as a vote would be upon a direct proposition to reject the prayer of the petition. Many gentlemen, doubtless, voted in favor of printing from considerations of courtesy to the petitioners, who would vote against the object of the petition. After all that had taken place on Monday, he had supposed that the sense of this House against the exciting and diabolical schemes of the abolitionists had been expressed to the nation and to the world, in a manner so clear and so emphatic, that "the wayfaring man, though a fool," could not err as to what were the sentiments of a vast majority of this House; but from the proceedings, of to-day, it would seem that some gentlemen supposed he was mistaken.

Mr. HARPER, of Pennsylvania, wished briefly to state the grounds of his two former votes on this subject, and those upon which he should then vote. He voted against the motion to lay the petition from Maine, and the motion to print it, on the table, not because he entertained a sentiment in common with the abolitionists, but because he thought the sense of the House ought to be fairly, decisively, clearly, and unequivocally, expressed on this subject, so as to prevent its being troubled with it hereafter. Therefore was it that he voted against laying both questions on the table. He was convinced that the mere rejecting the petitions would not be satisfactory, and would not be giving such reasons as would be convincing to the minds of those people who sent them there. If the House were to give these memorials to a committee, and let them bring in such a report as should clearly express the sentiments of the country, these petitions would cease. He hoped, therefore, the House would meet the question on cool, dispassionate, and temperate grounds, and that they would permit it to take the course he had recommended. Mr. H. said he should vote against the motion to reconsider, because he wanted the question fully considered in the way he had indicated. He wanted to get a report from a committee that would be adopted by the House, and thereby save further agitation on the subject.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that, in considering every question affecting the public interest, the calmest deliberation became the representatives of a free people. In all the wide range of the legislative duties of Congress, all must concur there was none which required more essentially a dispassionate and deliberate disposition than this; without it, the beneficial moral influences of their decision must be lost to the country. He was aware of the extreme delicacy of the subject—of the deeply seated sensibility which it excited, and which it was impossible to allay—of the extreme difficulty of approaching it without excited feeling; but no practical good could result from strong denunciation or impassioned invective. He did not rise to discuss the subject referred to in the petition. A respectable portion of his constituents had instructed him not to engage in such a discussion; but he wished to submit a few observations to the House, in the sincere hope that the embarrassment of their situation might be relieved, and a decisive vote taken on this important and exciting topic.

This same subject had been presented to the consideration of Congress, from time to time, since he had a seat there, on the petition of persons who had, as these petitioners have, no community of interest in the alleged grievance of which they complained; and he would here say, what he firmly believed, that he had never seen on the floor of the House of Representatives a half dozen members, of any party, disposed to exercise their legislative authority for the abolition of slavery here or elsewhere.

In the course of this debate, he was happy to have heard every gentleman express a decided opposition to the prayer of the petition. All concurred that there should be no legislative enactment in conformity to their wishes. But the difficulty exists in the conflicting views as to the means by which this end is to be attained. How is the subject to be disposed of?

The House has decided to consider the petition. The gentleman from Maryland has moved to reconsider that vote. Some gentlemen are opposed to this motion, because they wish to lay the petition on the table, from which it cannot be called up without the concurrence of two thirds of the House, and thus give it its quietus, and in effect refuse to consider it. But will they accomplish their object? I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] to have suggested that, if more agreeable to the House, he will modify his motion to lay on the table, so as to refuse to consider the prayer of the petition. It appeared to him that this was precisely equivalent to a direct vote on the question of consideration; and although avoided now, it must be met on some other petition of a similar character with this.

It is necessary that the House should meet the question. When, on a former day, a gentleman from Maine presented a similar petition, and moved to lay it on the table, he (Mr. M.) had demanded that the question should be taken by yeas and nays, and, in doing so, alluded to the deep sensibility which pervaded a large portion of the country on the subject, and asked the members of the House to express their opinions on the principle involved in the petition in the vote then to be given. The result was an overwhelming majority against the petition. He had hoped, most sincerely, that the decision then made would have been acquiesced in; and that gentlemen charged with such petitions, from respect to the expressed opinion of the House, would have withheld them, or, on presenting them, would have consigned them to the same fate. In this he was disappointed; and to him it was apparent, that laying one or many of these exciting petitions on the table would not relieve the House, and it was necessary to adopt a more decisive mode. In his judgment, this could only be done by refusing to consider them.

Other gentlemen are disposed to refer the subject to one of the committees of the House. He asked, what beneficial result could be effected? The only object of a reference to a committee was, that the subject referred might be investigated, and its details prepared with more accuracy and despatch, for the purpose of legislative action. To such examination, a committee was better suited than the House. But surely the House would not refer a petition, embracing a great principle, which has agitated the public mind throughout the country, and on which every member is prepared to express his opinion. But it is urged that a report adverse to the petition would aid in allaying excitement, and restrain a perseverance in this mischievous course. Has not this been done? Has not more than one able report, condemning similar petitions, been made to this House in former sessions, and published to the world? We cannot desire merely a republication of what has already been published, and we will deceive ourselves if we hope to repress a fanatical spirit by giving such a countenance to the effusions of misguided zeal.

If, said Mr. M., the House is prepared to decide upon the principle of this petition, why may we not reject it at once? Surely there is not one disposed to exercise the high and dangerous power which the petitioners invoke at our hands; why, then, shall we entertain the subject? why keep alive those feelings of apprehension and excitement which it is our sacred duty to allay? To refer the petition is an act of supererogation, which can do no good, and will do much mischief. The most unexceptionable mode in which we can accomplish this object is to reconsider the vote; and then it will be competent for the House at once to refuse to consider the petition, or to reject it; and if a majority of the House (and I doubt not there is an overwhelming majority) are opposed to the petition, let them meet the question at once, and terminate those angry discussions, and allay those bitter feelings which scar, if they do not break, the pillars of the noble edifice of our constitution and liberty.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, said he had no disposition to discuss the merits of this deeply exciting question at any time, and his respect for the rules of the House would prevent his attempting to do so, under the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] to reconsider; which motion he hoped would be withdrawn, and then the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] so far modified as to meet the approbation of all who are most sensitive upon this agitating question; and he rose to add his request to the suggestion made by his friend (he hoped he might so call him) from Virginia. This was not the last memorial of the same character which would be sent here. It was perfectly apparent that the question must be met now, or at some future time, fully and explicitly, and such an expression of this House given as could leave no possible room to doubt as to the opinions and sentiments entertained by its members. He, (Mr. P.,) indeed, considered the overwhelming vote of the House the other day, laying a memorial of similar tenor; and, he believed, the same in terms, upon the table, as fixing upon it the stamp of reprobation. He supposed that all sections of the country would be satisfied with that expression; but gentlemen seemed now to consider the vote as equivocal and evasive. He was unwilling that any imputation should rest upon the North, in consequence of the misguided and fanatical zeal of a few—comparatively very few—who, however honest might have been their purposes, he believed had done incalculable mischief, and whose movements he knew received no more sanction among the great mass of the people of the North, than they did at the South. For one, he, (Mr. P.,) while he would be the last to infringe upon any of the sacred reserved rights of the people, was prepared to stamp with disapprobation, in the most express and unequivocal terms, the whole movement upon this subject.

Mr. P. said he would not resume his seat, without tendering to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASOX,] just and generous as he always was, his acknowledgments for the admission frankly made in the opening of his remarks. He had said that, during the period that he had occupied a seat in this House, (as Mr. P. understood him,) he had never known six men seriously disposed to interfere with the rights of the slaveholders at the South. Sir, said Mr. P., gentlemen may be assured there was no such disposition as a general sentiment prevailing among the people; at least, he felt confidence in asserting that, among the people of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, there was not one in a hundred who did not entertain the most sacred regard for the rights of their southern brethren--nay, not one in five hundred who would not have those rights protected at any and every hazard. There was not the slightest disposition to interfere with any rights secured by the constitution, which binds together, and which he humbly hoped ever would bind together, this great and glorious confederacy as one family. Mr. P. had only to say that, to some sweeping charges of improper interference, the action of the people of the North at home during the last year, and the vote of their representatives here the other day, was a sufficient and conclusive answer.

Thus much he had thought due to himself and to those whom he had the honor to represent. If the motion to lie upon the table should be persisted in, he should vote for it, though he would prefer to meet the question in some form which could by no possibility be considered either equivocal or evasive.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, suggested that the object might be accomplished by a resolution to this effect: that the House, having the petition under consideration, resolved that it be rejected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought his honorable colleague misapprehended the object of the motion to reconsider, which was to reconsider the vote to consider the petition this day. Mr. C. should vote to reconsider, in order to move to suspend the 45th rule, and consider the petition.

A motion was here made by Mr. VINTON, that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. PICKENS said, as the question had taken a much wider range than had at first been anticipated, he hoped he should be allowed to trespass with a few observations. He understood the gentleman who moved the consideration of the memorial did it with a view to leave open the question whether it should be considered to-day or not; and, in order to get rid of the 45th rule, as suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] a motion would be made to suspend it, to enable the House to take up a resolution that the petition be rejected. That seemed to be the present position of the question.

In connexion with this subject, said Mr. P., there were many interests involved. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] had alluded to the sacred right of the citizens to petition. That was unquestionable. But, as the gentleman from Virginia had well remarked, that House had also the right to reject; and Mr. P. put it to the House whether they could not do so, even if the petition were couched in respectful terms. There were, however, other interests concerned in this matter. They had even higher duties to perform than their mere duties as representatives; they had their own individual constituents in the District of Columbia; and if their rights were not to be maintained in that House, where, let him ask, would their protection be? [Mr. P. then referred to the act of cession from Virginia, which he was about to read, when the Chair interposed, and said the sense of the House must first be taken, before the discussion could be extended to the merits of the question.]

Mr. P. said then he would confine himself to what had been thrown out by the gentleman from New York. That gentleman had asked, why was it that discussion was desired upon that floor? and intimated that certain fanatics, as well in the South as in the North, desired to agitate this question. Mr. P. desired to take that opportunity to throw back the insinuation with scorn and contempt. Sir, said Mr. P., we do desire to agitate this question. We desire it, because we believe we have been foully slandered before the world; and I stand here prepared, at any time when the question shall come up, to vindicate the institutions of the people I have the honor in part to represent, from the foul aspersion and calumny thrown upon them. These are the motives which prompt us to desire discussion. He had heard some insinuations thrown out from higher quarters than the gentleman from New York, that certain gentlemen of the South, belonging to a certain party, desired the discussion of this question to advance the interests of a particular individual; and he would again repeat that it was a foul and infamous calumny, and those who uttered it knew it to be such when they uttered it.

Mr. MAY called the gentleman to order for going into the merits of the question, and was sustained by the Chair.

Mr. P. explained, that, as the discussion had already taken a wide range, it was difficult to keep within the strict rule. He had risen to express a hope that the House would suffer a direct vote to be taken on this question, and he only intended to urge another reason in favor of sustaining the motion of the gentleman from Maryland. If that motion prevailed, then, as had been suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, the question itself should be brought directly before the House for its immediate decision. These were questions in which the most momentous concerns of this confederacy were involved, and it was extremely to be desired that there should be an immediate decision on them in that House.

Mr. HAMER said, if ever there had arisen an occasion in which it was necessary to call the attention of the House to the wisdom of the 45th rule, it would be found in the discussion of this day. While this discussion continued as it was then progressing, it was very doubtful, when they came to vote upon the final disposition of this petition, whether all the members of the House would be prepared to give that vote to-day, which they might give to-morrow; and he did not believe that such a debate was exceedingly well calculated to a calm, dispassionate, and deliberate consideration of the question. He was of opinion, therefore, that, in order to disentangle (to use the words of a gentleman who had spoken to-day) ourselves from embarrassment, it would be better to adjourn; and he therefore made that motion.

Tellers were appointed, and the House refused: Ayes 93, noes 103.

Mr. HOWARD said, in order to check even himself in debate, and with a view, if he could, to obtain the opinion of the House, whether in the outset he was right or not, he would move to lay the motion of his honorable colleague, [Mr. THOMAS,] from whom it gave him great pain to differ, on the table.

Mr. JUDSON asked both the gentlemen from Maryland to accept a proposition he intended to offer, in the shape of two resolutions. First, resolved that the vote of the House just taken on the petition be, and the same is hereby, reconsidered. Second, resolved that the 45th rule of the House be suspended; and said petition being under consideration, resolved that it be, and the same is hereby, rejected. If the House would give its consent, he would move these two resolutions.

The motion being objected to, the question then recurred to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; whereupon

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken by tellers, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 119, noes 72.

So the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was carried.

Mr. HAMMOND then modified his motion, in substance, as follows: Resolved that the 45th rule of this House be suspended; and resolved that the petition, &c., be, and the same is hereby, rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired what was the question before the House.

The CHAIR informed the House that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] being secondary to the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] the question before the House was the motion to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. GLASCOCK suggested the propriety of withdrawing that motion, and taking the question on the motion to reject.

Mr. H. EVERETT asked if the effect of the motion just carried was not to lay the whole subject on the table.

The CHAIR replied that was not the effect.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, expressed a hope that the motion to lay the petition on the table would be withdrawn, and let the question be taken on the second part of the resolution of the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] without debate.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he could not yield his motion; for the practice of the House, for years past, had been to lay all such papers on the table, and such a disposition of them he believed to have been satisfactory to the country at large.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to lay the petition on the table, the question was so taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 95, nays 121, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. C. Allan, Anthony, Ash, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Carr, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Crane, Cushing, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Evans, Fairfield, French, Fry, W. K. Fuller, Haley, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, S. S. Thompson, Toucey, Towns, Vanderpoel, Ward, Washington, White, Whittlesey, Wise—121.

So the House refused to lay the petition on the table.

Mr. HAMMOND then modified his resolution as follows: Resolved, that said petition be, and the same is hereby, rejected.

Mr. HAWKINS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HUNT apprehended, he said, that there was but one sentiment on this subject in that House; and let gentlemen extend their observation over this wide and extended country, and perceive what had been passing since this abolition question was first agitated, and they would see he was correct, that there was but one sentiment every where. He apprehended that gentlemen on all sides merely differed as to the means of effecting a general and desired end—an end they were all seeking, and which was to give quiet and composure to this republic, upon this exciting question. He would repeat, he was thoroughly convinced that the only difference of opinion that existed was with regard to the means to effect a desirable end. It had been said, that if they rejected this petition, they should give quiet to the country, and no other petitions or memorials of a like tendency would be sent there. Would this be so? If constituents chose to send their petitions to that House, would not gentlemen feel it their duty to present them? Permit him to say, that if there be any thing indecorous or disrespectful in a memorial presented there, to any member of the House, or to any member of the Government, then he understood it to be parliamentary to reject it; but if, on the other hand, the memorial be couched in respectful language, it was a right guaranteed the citizens of this country by the constitution, to memorialize that House. The right he held to be a sacred one, and he could never consent to infringe upon it, even by implication.

Humble as he was, said Mr. H., it might not, perhaps, be unknown to some there, that upon this abolition question he had extended the principle so far as to go for all the gentlemen of the South contended for. He could also assure them that, among the New England men, there was but one universal and unanimous sentiment upon the subject. But to go back again to the mode of effecting the desired end, that of giving quiet and repose to this agitating question, and to this excited community, Mr. H. held ideas with regard to it, which he submitted with all due deference. He held that the quiet of the community could not be ensured by suppressing information and inquiry; but, on the contrary, both policy and expediency, and the true course they owed to their constituents, dictated that they should give to these memorials and these petitions the usual course. He would appeal to an eminent instance, within the knowledge of every one present, which did more than all the meetings on the subject, by way of putting down the fanatical zeal in regard to the Sunday mail. As long as the House laid those memorials on the tables, so long were they loaded with them, session after session; but the very moment it gave them what he conceived to be their proper direction, by referring them to a committee, which made a report thereon, that very moment the excitement was allayed, and nothing more was heard on the subject. He asked gentlemen to carry back their recollections to what the effect was upon the republic. The subject was put forever at rest; and so, he apprehended, it would be with the present, for he considered the cases analogous.

It was true, said Mr. H., the subject was an irritating one; but they, as representatives of the people, were bound to meet it. They could not shut their eyes to what was going on around them. They could not slight nor evade it; nor did he believe it was the disposition of any honorable member there to do so. The only difference in judgment appeared to him to be as to the means to effect the end. To refer, then, to the analogous case, Mr. H.'s own deliberate judgment was, that they should give to all these petitions the usual parliamentary course, for this was not the last, in all human probability, that would be sent there. They could not conceal from themselves the fact that the public were advised of the existence of these memorials. They would be sent to members there; and, judging from what he felt to be his own duty, he apprehended that other gentlemen would also feel it to be their duty to present them. He asked, then, that they would show the South fairly the principles they maintained, by referring this and all similar petitions and memorials, either to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or to some special committee, with instructions to report. They did not doubt what would be the nature of the report, and he apprehended he ran no risk in pledging himself that there was not a man in that House but would give his sanction to a report that should put this question forever at rest; silence the fanatics on the one hand, and satisfy our brethren of the South on the other. He would again assure gentlemen that the feeling of the North was entirely sound and healthy on this subject. This was not the first public occasion on which Mr. H. had avowed the feelings he entertained on this question. He had avowed them on other occasions; and in the great meeting at Utica, to which allusion had been made, he had done all he could, although he took not such a prominent part as his honorable colleague over the way, [Mr. BEARDSLEY.] But to ask him to vote for the rejection of this petition, was to ask him to do what seemed to him not a proper and respectful course, if he might be permitted to use that term. With a view of enabling other gentlemen who might have similar memorials to present, to pursue the course their own sense of duty directed, and with a view of carrying out the action of the House in a way which might speak to the nation unanimously on this question, through the report of some proper committee, Mr. H. said he should be constrained to vote against the motion then under consideration. Late as it was, an enfeebled as he was, yet he would not permit his vote to be recorded on the question without briefly explaining his views.

Mr. GLASCOCK said it must be gratifying to every individual to have listened to the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNT,] who had just taken his seat; and he believed it must be equally gratifying to every portion of the House to have been placed in possession of his views upon this question, though a large portion of them must differ with the gentleman in regard to the policy he thinks ought to be adopted in relation to it. The discussion that had taken place to-day, Mr. G. had no hesitation in saying, would be hailed in the South as the greatest omen that the permanency of this great and glorious Union was about to be secured; and, for one coming from that section of the country, he hesitated not to believe that the honest difference of opinion that did exist, was an honest difference of opinion only as to the manner and mode in which this question should be settled. For one, he believed the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to be one that would be approved, at least the best approved, by that portion of the people from whom he came. He admitted it was the constitutional right of every citizen of the country to petition this and the other branch of the Legislature. It was a feature in the constitution itself, and it was an inseparable privilege, which he believed no individual who advocated this motion had pretended to deny. But he contended that, whenever the petition was brought forward, that very moment the constitutional requisite had been complied with, and it then became the duty of the House to treat it as its merits deserved. Now, he would appeal to the gentleman himself, and ask him whether there be not in that petition language which calls upon the House to frown upon it with indignation? He would ask if there be not charges in it that called for the unanimous voice of reprobation of those opposed to it? He would to God that he could act on this occasion with the gentleman; but the proper course to be pursued in relation to the petition was to reject it; and in rejecting it, he could not for himself believe that a similar petition would again be presented for the consideration of that body. With due deference to the opinions of those who represent States, some few of whom might be favorable to the principles contained in the petition, it would, in his humble conception, be virtually a disrespect to the majority, either way, who might vote to reject or to receive, afterwards to vote to lay it on the table; and he wished, therefore, to avoid this by bringing the question at once and directly to bear upon the motion to reject it.

But there was another reason, which he would suggest to the consideration of the House. They would not be deprived of meeting the question fully, freely, and deliberately, hereafter. What did the President recommend in his annual message? He recommended to the consideration of that House the prohibition of, or some law to prevent, the circulation of these incendiary publications through the Post Office Department. Then they would have an opportunity of expressing fully their views in relation to this matter. It was then he expected again to hear the voice of that gentleman in vindication of the views he had now taken. Then he trusted they would have but one voice throughout that House; and when that vote should be received, the South would be secure in their lives, their property, and their rights. It would be then they might say this republic is safe; then every thing like disunion would be quieted, and, he trusted, forever.

Mr. SUTHERLAND believed, he said, that no man in that House, who had known him for any length of time, could doubt his feelings upon this question. He came from a section of country that was exceedingly anxious to allay, as far as possible, all kinds of excitement upon a question so agitating to the South. He came there prepared, as far as he could, to vote upon that question; and he trusted that, when the time came to meet it, it would be met in a manner the great interests connected with it demanded. But he would say, in advance, that he was not quite satisfied with some of the feelings expressed from certain quarters of this country to-day in that House. They were bound by all the ties that kept the Union together to meet this question freely and boldly, to throw aside every prejudice, and sacrifice it upon the altar, for their country's good; and it did not become them to excite each other by any kind of language.

Mr. S. lived in a State, he said, once a slaveholding State, and which had been one of the first to abolish slavery, having found it expedient to start early in this question. He lived in a State, too, where they as sincerely and honestly regarded the rights of the South as any other State in the Union. And he came especially from a district that he knew—and if he could use stronger language he would—that he knew utterly despised and detested the whole question of a prompt and speedy abolition of slavery in the South. He knew that he spoke their voice when he said he was prepared to go all the lengths that honor and justice should require at his hands. While he admitted so much, he also looked at this: that the constitution guaranteed to us all the right to send our petitions to that House. But he went further, and took the other side of the question: that if that petition be not draughted in the style in which it ought to be, or if it be even inflammatory in its nature, and calculated to excite the feelings, why, then, he would throw it out, because they were assembled there fairly and dispassionately to meet this question. He would neither allow the high feelings of the South to disturb him in his judgment, nor the high feelings of the North, who were some of them anxious to run all lengths, and some of them to cast the firebrand of slavery and abolition into that House. Now, on the question under consideration, he went with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK,] that if there was any thing in that paper that did not comport with the dignity and respect of the House, vote for its rejection, come from where it might. But, at the same time, Mr. S. always held himself bound to vote for every petition sent there in a proper style and language, on any and every question, be it what it might, from any quarter of the nation.

Mr. S. did not rise, he said, so much with a view of making these remarks, but to state a fact of which the House was probably not aware before the last vote was taken on this question. He would state to the House that it had already, that day, that very morning, referred a memorial upon this very question to the Committee on the District of Columbia; and the Chair would state whether he was correct or not.

The SPEAKER stated the fact to be so, and that he had conferred with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] who presented the petition, informing him that it was the intention of the Chair to call the attention of the House to it. It was doubtless through inadvertence that the members of the House did not generally hear it; but the Chair intended to have made a statement of the fact to the House, and he so informed the mover.

Mr. HAMMOND said the presentation of the petition had escaped him, or he should have made the same motion with regard to that, which he did with reference to the other.

Mr. PATTON then moved to reconsider the vote by which the memorial presented by Mr. BRIGGS was referred.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested it would be better to postpone the consideration of it till the one before the House to-day was disposed of; which was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAWKINS called for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them; and tellers being appointed, the yeas were 120, noes not counted.

So the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose, he said, to throw himself on the indulgence of the House, for the purpose of asking what he was sure would be granted—the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in the city of New York.

Mr. JARVIS moved a suspension of the rule, so as to permit any of the committees to make reports; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then presented the following correspondence, report, and bill:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 19, 1835.

SIR: I enclose, herewith, a copy of a communication received this morning from the collector of the customs at New York, and of my reply to it; and I venture to express a hope that all due indulgence will be extended by Congress to the sufferers who are indebted to the United States.

I remain, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. C. C. CAMBRELENG,

Ch. Com. of Ways and Means.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, half past 2 o'clock,

New York, December 17, 1835.

DEAR SIR: Last night, between eight and nine o'clock, a fire broke out near the merchants' exchange, and is still raging most violently, although the firemen have got it under control. By this disastrous visitation, between four and five hundred buildings have been destroyed, and goods and other effects to the amount of from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars. This calamity falls principally upon the heavy importing merchants; and they must unquestionably become greatly embarrassed, and many of them ruined.

The bonds of these individuals must be dishonored; all business is suspended, and our city, from being the seat of prosperity and wealth, within twenty-four hours, is now the abode of sorrow and despondency. It was thought, at first, that the bonds which should not be paid, owing to the consternation and confusion which prevail at present, might be held subject to your decision upon the matter; but, upon more mature reflection, I have determined that I cannot, in any way, or under any circumstances, deviate from the course laid down by the law. Consequently I shall hand them over to the district attorney, as usual, trusting and believing that Congress will forthwith take some action on the subject of this heavy calamity.

The merchants' exchange and post office being destroyed, I have caused temporary accommodations to be erected in the inspector's rooms, attached to this office, for the accommodation of the latter, until better can be procured elsewhere. The effects of the post office were all saved from injury.

This office was in the greatest danger for a long time, as was one half of the city. But I did not remove an article, but was prepared to save every thing had it been necessary.

I am, dear sir, with the greatest respect,

Your obedient servant,

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, Collector.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

From the Secretary of the Treasury to the Collector at New York.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

December 19, 1835.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 17th instant, communicating the disastrous intelligence concerning the late fire in the city of New York, has been received.

I hardly need assure you that, under this great calamity, your citizens shall have extended to them, from this Department, every indulgence which their misfortunes require, and which the laws and official duty will permit me to render.

I therefore approve of your course in furnishing temporary accommodations for the post office, and have sanctioned the proposal of the marshal to tender also for the same purpose the use of the rooms in the City Hall now occupied by the United States courts.

In respect to delay in the collection of bonds, or to remissions or reductions of duties in certain cases, they both deserve very favorable consideration. But as you remark concerning your own power about the former, it may be added as to my power about both, that the acts of Congress now give me no control over the subject. I do not doubt, however, that the subject will be taken up by Congress on Monday, and some expression of its views soon given, and, in the mean time, I do not hesitate to believe that you and the district attorney would be sustained and justified if, in the exercise of a sound discretion under this afflicting emergency, you did not press the collection of bonds in all cases, where the public security would not be impaired by a short delay, and where the parties are in a situation which would probably cause Congress to extend to them some relief.

With much sympathy and regard,

I am your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

SAMUEL SWARTWOUT, Esq.

P. S. The Solicitor of the Treasury will be requested to write to a similar effect to-day to the district attorney, in regard to the bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury having transmitted to the Committee of Ways and Means a letter from the collector of the port of New York, giving an account of the late disastrous conflagration at that place, and representing the entire suspension of credit and prostration of trade, the committee respectfully submit the following report:

Deeply sympathizing with the immediate and several sufferers by a great national calamity, the Committee of Ways and Means lost no time in considering the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury. The disaster is of an unparalleled character, and its consequences must be felt by every interest and every quarter of the Union. An exercise of all the constitutional powers of the Federal Government is in this instance demanded, not only by the highest considerations of national policy and justice, but prompt measures are essentially necessary to the collection of the revenue in every part of the Union to the public interest in every branch of the national expenditure, and to arrest, or at least to diminish, the calamitous effects of the late conflagration on all interests, and in every section of the country.

In considering what measures were best calculated to moderate the shock upon the trade, revenue, and industry of the country, three propositions were suggested, viz: the extension of the credit on bonds due from those who have suffered by the late fire, three, four, and five years—placing the vast surplus revenues of the country where they may be more actively and extensively employed, in our cities, in extending relief to the embarrassed and impoverished debtors of Government, and remitting the duty on all merchandise destroyed in original packages. The committee submit a bill embracing the first two propositions. The first provision is in accordance with the practice of Government heretofore; the second, while it will most extensively relieve the immediate wants of trade, and aid in reviving the energies of the commercial capital of the Union, cannot diminish in any manner the security of Government, or embarrass the operations of the Treasury. The question of remitting duties on property destroyed was also considered by the committee, but appearing to require previous examination and more deliberation, and not wishing to delay the proposed measures of relief, it was not finally acted on.

Whereas various persons are indebted to the United States for duties on merchandise, for which bonds have been given, with one or more sureties, payable to the collector for the district of New York, and the said persons have suffered a loss of property by the late conflagration at that place,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause to be extended (with the assent of the sureties thereon) the time of the payment of all bonds heretofore given for duties as aforesaid, to periods not exceeding an average of three, four, and five years; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively payable in average periods of three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled as aforesaid. And the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up or cancel all such bonds upon the receipt of others described in this act; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 17th day of the present month.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to such banks as he may select any surplus moneys of the Government, or any part thereof, which may not be required for the public service, and to permit the same to remain in such banks for twelve months from the passage of this act.

After the reading of this bill, Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was another subject before the committee which was not definitively acted on, viz: the remission of duties on goods destroyed, which required more examination and deliberation. This subject was brought before the committee by the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letters from the collector of the port of New York. He would not detain the House by any remarks on the subject now, and merely remarking that it was with infinite regret, for the cause of it, that he found himself called upon, as the first act in his new situation, to bring in a bill of this description, he would ask the indulgence of the House to take up the subject to-morrow.

The bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McKEON hoped, he said, that the bill would be acted on speedily, and the committee would soon report on the proposition to remit the duties.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated, as the bill was in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it could be taken up at any time after the papers were printed.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the petition from sundry inhabitants of the town of Wrentham, in Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The motion to reject the petition still pending,

Mr. OWENS rose to address the House; but

Mr. PINCKNEY expressed a hope that the subject would be suspended, in order to present petitions and memorials.

Mr. OWENS said he would with great pleasure accede to the wish of the gentleman from South Carolina, if the matter itself was not a matter of very great import. He rose for the purpose of endeavoring to reconcile the conflicting opinions of gentlemen on all sides, and to submit certain propositions, which, he trusted, if the House would accept, would put to rest this agitating, delicate, and dangerous question. It was useless for him to regret that this question had been brought before the House. It was useless to regret that this question had been the subject of discussion. The apple of discord had been thrown into the House. It had not been done by the South. But it was there, and the House must meet it—the House must handle it. But he did regret—he deeply deplored—the manner in which the debate on it had been conducted. It was not calculated to do any good, but was well calculated to produce anti-social as well as hostile feelings. Nor did he agree with some gentlemen in their remarks that the South asked no aid from the North. On the contrary, he would say that the South did ask aid from the North, and the North wanted aid from the South. Their wants were reciprocal, and it was these wants that produced our confederacy. It was these wants that had cemented our Union; and it was the increase of these wants that would give perpetuity—nay, immortality—to it. The propositions he wished to submit to the House, he did trust, and confidently believed, the honorable mover of the original proposition would accept and support, and that the House itself would give a warm and cordial support. The propositions he intended to submit were couched in language as strong, if not stronger, than the original motion, and they were more extended in their operation. It was not to meet the question on this petition alone, but to meet the question, come in what shape it might. It was to operate upon all petitions that might come with the same tendency or object; nay, in one word, it was to grapple with the subject itself. He perfectly agreed with the advocates of the original motion, that this was a measure that required a bold, a prompt, and decisive expression of opinion from that House. The South required it; the country required it. It could not be blinked. It could not be evaded by legislative finesse. It ought not to be eluded by technical objections. He therefore reiterated that he confidently expected those gentlemen, as lovers of their country, and well-wishers of the peace and safety of the land, would support his resolution with warmth. He had, also, no doubt that those gentlemen whose sense of delicacy suggested constitutional objections to the rejection of petitions, would support the propositions he should have the honor to submit to the House, because they would find that these propositions were free from that objection. He admitted, in the fullest latitude, the constitutional right to petition, what was termed the sacred right of petitioning, but he hoped he might add, without offence, that, from the evidence he had of its abuse, a good man might doubt whether the good compensated for the evil, if the evil were not temporary, and the good permanent and lasting. There was another class of individuals to whom he would address himself. It was those who, in all probability, would be for the principles contained in the petition.

H. of R.]

To those gentlemen he would say, not assuming the character of a lecturer, but as their associate, that admitting the constitutional right to act upon this subject, which he denied, he would tell those gentlemen that right was not an abstract position and unqualified term; that, in the exercise of every right, there were corresponding duties; and that the first duty of an American statesman, of an American legislator, was to look to the welfare of the people and to the integrity of the republic; he would say to them that, in discussing this, or any other question of a national and political character, they must not examine it with the warm imagination of an enthusiast, with the characteristic tenderness of the philanthropist, nor with the cold calculations of the philosopher, but as statesmen, looking at it in all its bearings; and if they were satisfied in their consciences that it was not calculated to benefit the republic, they ought not to legislate upon it. If gentlemen would turn their minds upon this subject, he was satisfied they would have no hesitation as to their course. If the propositions he should have the honor to submit to the House be acceded to by a triumphant majority, he had no hesitation in saying that it would be considered by the country as the harbinger of peace, the rainbow that would dissipate the clouds and darkness now resting on the land. With these views, and under the operations of these feelings, he would move the House to lay the original proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] on the table, together with every matter connected with it, so as to enable him to submit his propositions to the House.

Mr. OWENS then sent the following resolutions to the Chair, which were read.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the question of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress.

And be it further resolved, That in case any petitions praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of this House that the same ought to be laid on the table without reading.

Mr. OWENS expressed the hope that the resolutions would be accepted by the gentleman from South Carolina, in lieu of his motion to reject the petition.

Mr. HAMMOND was very sorry, he said, that he could not accept the proposition, and he hoped the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his motion.

Mr. WISE proposed to amend the first resolution by adding, "because Congress has no power to legislate on it under the constitution of the United States;" and to amend the second by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting, "that this House will not receive any future memorials on that subject;" adding that with these modifications, he would vote for the resolutions.

Mr. OWENS declined the acceptance of the amendments as modifications of his resolutions.

Mr. PATTON asked what would be the consequence of laying the motion on the table? Would the resolutions of the gentleman from Georgia then be in order?

The CHAIR replied that they would not. It would be in order to move to suspend the rule, to allow him to move them, or, when the States were called for resolutions, they might be offered without suspension of the rule.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS rose to inquire what was the state of this question; and he asked from confessed ignorance of what the question was. On the last day, when the subject was debated, such a variety of motions was following each other in rapid succession, and apparently without object or order, that he had entirely lost the train of them. A memorial for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, in the District of Columbia, was presented by an honorable colleague of his, [Mr. JACKSON,] who moved its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a select committee.

The SPEAKER here reminded the gentleman that the motion before the House allowed of no discussion, and said he would state the question.

Mr. ADAMS asked if a similar petition, presented by another of his colleagues, was not, on the same day, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and whether the subject was not, therefore, actually before that committee.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative; but stated that a motion to reconsider the vote of reference was pending. He would now state the question, for the information of the House. A memorial was presented, and three motions made in regard to it: one to commit, another to lay on the table, and a third to reject. The motion now before the House was to lay the petition, and all the motions pending in reference to it, on the table.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the petition, and all the motions relating to it, on the table, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 140, nays 76, as follows:

Mr. OWENS moved that the rules of the House be suspended, in order to allow him to offer the resolutions he had already indicated to the House; on which he asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 100, nays 115, as follows:

So the House refused to suspend the rule. [Two thirds of the members present would have been necessary to carry that question.]

Mr. PATTON called up the motion made by him on Friday last, to reconsider the vote of the House by which a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District, presented by a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Briggs,] was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion having been taken up—

Mr. PATTON rose and addressed the House as follows:

He said that the vote which had been just taken, against suspending the rules for the purpose of taking up the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. OWENS,] must have convinced the House, and especially those gentlemen from the South who had voted for laying the former petition on the table, inconsistently with their vote on Friday last upon the same proposition, of the futility of any such scheme as had been proposed for procuring a direct vote of the House upon the principles involved in the petitions that had been offered, and would continue to be offered, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Those with whom he felt and acted on this question gave this apparently inconsistent vote under the belief that there would be no difficulty in suspending the rules to take up the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia. They so calculated, and were deceived or mistaken. I, said Mr. P., had no confidence in such calculation, and was not mistaken. That vote, said Mr. P., I think, has further demonstrated that it is idle to attempt to avoid this subject by any parliamentary manœuvre, and that the only way of obtaining a direct vote upon the great and interesting questions embraced by them, is by making a proposition presenting the question growing out of the petitions in connexion with the petitions themselves.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that this House should be apprized and fully impressed with the necessity of quieting the anxiety, the agitation, and the alarm for the institutions of the country, which are abroad in the land, and that as the means, perhaps the only means, of doing so, it should meet those questions directly, and dispose of them decisively and permanently. I am ready to meet these questions; and I believe I express the universal sentiment of the representation from the South, in saying they are ready to meet it; and while we do not desire discussion, and for one I will do nothing to provoke it, at the same time we will not, we cannot, we dare not, shrink from it, if it be forced upon us from other quarters. I prefer voting upon the questions at once, and without discussion, if possible. If this subject must be discussed, it ought to be discussed, and it is hoped will be discussed, in the spirit which ought to characterize members of the same political family, and alike imbued with the patriotic purpose of rendering permanent this great and glorious Union.

Let the vote referring this petition be reconsidered, a reference made by inadvertence, and then the petition will be open again for consideration; and, in connexion with it, let the principles involved in the petition be presented for the consideration and decision of the House in some form, which will show distinctly and unequivocally that a majority of the representatives of the people of the North, as well as of the South, are opposed to the schemes of the abolitionists, and also to the efforts which are making to interfere with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. Let it be shown, if it be so, that there is such a majority opposed to an interference with slavery in this District, not upon considerations merely temporary, and influenced by existing political circumstances, but upon those high and paramount considerations which belong to the great rights of property, as well as individual and political safety, which are connected with it.

My own strong, abiding, and confiding opinion is, that this Government has no right to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. But, sir, I am aware of the difficulties which exist in the minds of many gentlemen from the North on this question. It is, perhaps, rational that they should, from their position, their habits of thinking, and their prejudices, entertain more difficulty on this subject than we do. I feel every disposition to respect their opinions, and to make great allowance even for their prejudices. Give us, then, a distinct, unequivocal, and unevasive vote upon the propriety of interfering with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. Satisfy us that the House is opposed to such interference upon the grounds of principle, permanent, abiding, which reach above, and go beyond, the transient and fleeting circumstances of the hour, and uninfluenced by the existing political contests of the day.

Do this, and I care nothing about discussing or deciding the constitutional question. I will not quarrel about what will then be a mere abstraction. A declaration of the conviction of the House, that they will not, and that Congress ought not, to interfere in this matter, now or hereafter, will satisfy the people of the South, and especially the States of Virginia and Maryland, who are more especially interested in the question. It should be known, it is not disguised—it would be mere affectation to attempt to conceal the fact—that there does exist in many parts of the southern country a strong apprehension, I will not say suspicion, that there are some, here and elsewhere, who are indisposed to meet this question fairly and directly;

"That palter with us in a double sense."

[The CHAIR here remarked that the gentleman from Virginia would be pleased to remember that it was not proper to discuss the merits of the petition upon the motion to reconsider.]

Mr. P. resumed. I was not, Mr. Speaker, discussing the merits of the question; and I am sure that the Chair, on reflection, as well as the House, will do me the justice to remember that I have not said one word, in the way of argument, on the merits of the question involved in the petition. I am urging the propriety of reconsideration, so that we may have a direct vote upon these principles, and, if need be, discuss them. I repeat, then, and I say it for no purpose or wish to arouse the feelings, to influence the pride, or rouse the resentment of any gentleman here, that there does exist an apprehension that there are some who wish to evade this question, and who seem to be with us, while they are in truth against us; "that keep the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope."

It is necessary, in every point of view, to have a direct vote on this question. Let such a decision be made, as I trust and am willing to believe there will be, from the votes heretofore taken, and the present excitement of the country will be allayed. So far as this subject is concerned, the South will repose again in the confidence that this most essential and vital interest of theirs will not be disturbed and made the subject of perpetual and angry conflict. Let it be sure that the efforts made by these petitions will not be entertained by Congress, now nor hereafter, and you will at once calm the troubled waters of agitation. Refuse to do it, and you incur the risk of aggravating that excitement into a storm which may shake the pillars of the confederacy to their deep-seated foundation.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said he hoped the motion to reconsider this vote would not prevail; and he expressed this hope for the very reason which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] had assigned for voting in favor of the motion. It appears to me (said Mr. A.) that the only way of getting this question from the view of the House and of the nation, is to dispose of all petitions on the subject in the same way. This is not a new opinion; I assumed this position in my very first act as a member of this House, from the very time when I first took my seat as a member of the 22d Congress. At that time fifteen petitions were transmitted to me, not from my own constituents, but from citizens of the Society of Friends in the State of Pennsylvania, with a request that I would present them to the House. Sir, I did so in homage to the sacred right of petition—a right which, in whatever manner it may be treated by other members of this House, shall never be treated by me other than with respect.

But, sir, not being in favor of the object of the petitions, I then gave notice to the House and to the country, that upon the supposition that these petitions had been transmitted to me under the expectation that I should present them, I felt it my duty to say I should not support them. And, sir, the reason which I gave at that time for declining to support them was precisely the same reason which the gentleman from Virginia now gives for reconsidering this motion—namely, to keep the discussion of the subject out of the House. I said, sir, that I believed this discussion would be altogether unprofitable to the House and to the country; but, in deference to the sacred right of petition, I moved that these fifteen petitions, all of which were numerous signed, should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, at the head of which was, at that time, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, now, I regret to say—and the whole country has occasion to regret—no more. These petitions were thus referred, and, after a short period of time, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia made a report to this House, which report was read, and unanimously accepted; and nothing more has been heard of these petitions from that day to this. In taking the course I then took, I was not sustained by the unanimous voice of my own constituents; there were many among them, persons as respectable and as entitled to consideration as any others, who disapproved of the course I pursued on that occasion.

Attempts were made within the district I then represented to get up meetings of the people to instruct me to pursue a different course, or to multiply petitions of the same character. These efforts were continued during the whole of that long session of Congress; but, I am gratified to add, without any other result than that, from one single town of the district which I had the honor to represent, a solitary petition was forwarded before the close of the session, with a request that I would present it to the House. Sir, I did present it, and it was referred to the same Committee on the District of Columbia, and I believe nothing more has been heard of it since. From the experience of this session, I was perfectly satisfied that the true and only method of keeping this subject out of discussion was, to take that course; to refer all petitions of this kind to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some other Committee of the House, to receive their report, and to accept it unanimously. This does equal justice to all parties in the country; it avoids the discussion of this agitating question on the one hand, and, on the other, it pays due respect to the right of the constituent to petition.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Two years afterwards, similar petitions were presented, and at that time an effort made, without success, to do that which has now been done successfully in one instance. An effort was made to lay these petitions on the table; the House did not accede to the proposition: they referred the petitions as they had been before referred, and with the same result. For, from the moment that these petitions are referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, they go to the family vault "of all the Capulets," and you will never hear of them afterwards.

At the first session of the last Congress, a gentleman from the State of New York, a distinguished member of this House, now no longer here, which I regret to say, although I do not doubt that his place is well supplied, presented one or more petitions to this effect, and delivered a long and eloquent speech of two hours in support of them. And what was the result? He was not answered: not a word was said, but the vote of the House was taken; the petitions were referred to the Committee on the District, and we have heard nothing more of them since. At the same session, or probably at the very last session, a distinguished member of this House, from the State of Connecticut, presented one or more petitions to the same effect, and declared in his place that he himself concurred in all the opinions expressed. Did this declaration light up the flame of discord in this House? Sir, he was heard with patience and complacency. He moved the reference of the petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and there they went to sleep the sleep of death. Mr. ADAMS, speaking from recollection, was [the Reporter is requested by him to state] mistaken with respect to the reference of the petitions presented at the last session of Congress to the committee. They were then for the first time laid on the table, as was the motion to print one of them. At the preceding session of the last Congress, as at all former times, all such petitions had been referred to committees and printed when so desired. Why not adopt the same course now? Here is a petition which has been already referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Leave it there, and, my word for it, sir, you will have just such a result as has taken place time after time before. Your Committee on the District certainly is not an abolition committee. You will have a fit, proper, and able report from them; the House, sub silentio, will adopt it, and you will hear no more about it. But if you are to reconsider the vote, and to lay these petitions on the table; if you come to the resolution that this House will not receive any more petitions, what will be the consequence? In a large portion of this country every individual member who votes with you will be left at home at the next election, and some one will be sent who is not prepared to lay these petitions on the table.

What will be the next consequence? Sir, you will have discussion; and, to my regret I say it, discussion has been called for and challenged upon this floor. It has been challenged. And what will the discussion amount to? A discussion upon the merits of slavery. Sir, on such a discussion every speech made by a Representative from the north of Mason and Dixon's line, in this House, will be an incendiary pamphlet, and what will you do with them? The speeches of my colleagues, probably of myself, will be incendiary; because, if discussion is thrust upon us, I doubt not I might make a speech as incendiary as any pamphlet upon which such torrents of denunciation have been poured upon us. If I were capable of the craven and recreant spirit of shrinking from expressing, not probably so much my own sentiments as those of my constituents, I should go home to their scorn, and they would send here a man who would represent them more faithfully.

Well, sir, what becomes of these incendiary pamphlets, the speeches in this House, if they go to the public? What will be done with them by the public press? The newspapers report these speeches; every speech is circulated through your whole country; and how can you arrest it? Will you introduce a resolution that members of this House shall not speak a word in derogation of the sublime merits of slavery? You must have a resolution of this kind, to follow the one laid upon your table this morning—a resolution that no member of this House shall dare to utter an incendiary sentiment! And what is that incendiary sentiment? Why, it is, in substance, the contents of these pamphlets. Well, sir, you begin with suppressing the right of petition; you must next suppress the right of speech in this House; for you must offer a resolution that every member who dares to express a sentiment of this kind shall be expelled, or that the speeches shall not go forth to the public—shall not be circulated. What will be the consequence then? You suppress the right of petition; you suppress the freedom of speech; the freedom of the press, and the freedom of religion; for, in the minds of many worthy, honest, and honorable men, fanatics, if you please so to call them, this is a religious question, in which they act under what they believe to be a sense of duty to their God; and, however erroneous may be their conclusions, it is not for me, nor for this House, to judge them. Therefore, sir, in deference to what has been heretofore the usage of this House, in deference to the respect which is due to the right of petition, and the respect which is due to the right of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion, I hope that this petition will be left where it has been placed by the House, in the possession of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that we shall hear no more about it.

Mr. BOULDIN said he had for many sufficient reasons for a long time entertained the most profound respect for the gentleman last up, [Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts,] and for no one thing more than for what he had always been informed and believed in relation to this same subject, now before the House. He had been informed by his predecessor, [Mr. Randolph], of whom the world knew far more than he could tell them, that the gentleman had at all times paid the most delicate and tender regard to our rights and our interest, as well as our feelings, upon this subject. He had ever remarked the same sacred and inviolate regard paid to it by him since he (Mr. B.) had the honor of a seat on this floor. He would be obliged to depart from him a little on this occasion, not so much that he had an objection of himself to referring the subject-matter to the committee, were there nothing in the petition but a naked request that we should abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, as on account of certain other matter that is in it. He had on another day expressed his willingness to meet the question flatly, and that his constituents should know all he knew in relation to it; but in deference to his brethren from the South—a deference he had always felt, and would feel, and would act under, in some good degree, he had not insisted, both sessions he had had the honor of a seat in that House, on coming directly to the question, and putting the South in possession of all that was contained in those petitions.

Mr. B. said he did not know how the House could get at the contents of a petition without reading it, and if all the South would accord with him, and could see as he did, were one of the petitions presented with nothing but the petition—nothing insulting to the South—he would be willing to refer it to the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which he had the honor to be a member. But, while the preamble contained slurs on the South, he never could again, he trusted, sit patiently and hear abuse of his constituents, direct or indirect, referred to a committee of that House for consideration. He would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if there was any thing abusive in the petitions referred to the committee and reported on? If he heard the petition read rightly, there were many disrespectful slurs thrown over the people of the South.

Mr. BARRES said he thought it likely the gentleman from Virginia labored under a mistake; and if he would yield the floor for a few moments, for the petition was very short, Mr. B. would ask the House to have it read, which had not been done at the time of its presentation.

Mr. BOULDIN had understood, he said, that they were all from one printed copy, and took it for granted it was word for word with the one that had, in some sort, been under debate. He would, then, rather hear it read.

The petition was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. B. continued. He was pleased to find it not as bad by any means as the other. Yet it contained nearly the same in substance. All that was contained in this petition in relation to trading in human flesh, applied to this District, applied also with equal force to Virginia. All these petitions took a swaggering stand over the South, and proposed a kind of guardianship over their morals, and were dreadfully afraid that holding negroes had made us vastly corrupt, and would make us more so. Let him that is without fault cast the first stone. "We thank God that we are not as other men, whoremongers and adulterers." This was the language of these petitions, all of them. They might and did have a little thin gauze over them, such as this: They did not presume to dictate to the South—they did not mean to disparage their sister States, or dictate to them. But the acts they do are such as to call down the vengeance of Heaven upon them. Comparisons were drawn, express or implied. He had no idea of imitating these petitioners, and swaggering over the North; but who first made traffic of human flesh, and made profit by bringing the negroes here? and who expects to be paid for carrying them back? Now, both have a name over the Atlantic, where we are known only by character. Did these petitioners ever hear of a man's suffering merely by its being made known that he came from a State in this Union south of Mason and Dixon's line? Did any man ever hear or know of a nation of people on any side of Mason and Dixon's line that stood higher for any of the cardinal virtues—honor, truth, justice, and charity, gentleness of heart, and honesty? Was it thought that we would suffer by a comparison with the petitioners?

The ladies, too, had petitioned. God forbid that a word of disrespect should escape him in relation to the ladies in any quarter of the world. Let him at all times be sensible of the deference and devotion that was at all times under all circumstances due to them. But let no one from any quarter think it necessary to petition Congress to preserve the ladies of the South from corruption. He would draw no comparisons between ladies, neither was there any thing to compare to them; but he would beseech these fair petitioners to give themselves no further trouble about the ladies of the South. They were in no danger of contamination. Could they suffer by comparison with the fair in any part of the world, in any quality that could adorn or ornament the sex, or render it lovely? It was a mere hypothesis that negro slavery had corrupted the people; the fact was not so. It was true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had said, that a gentleman, last session, had made a long and eloquent speech, and when he concluded, nothing was said, and the petition was laid on the table, where it has slept the sleep of death.

It is true, as the gentleman says, that the petitions of last session upon the same subject, have all met the same fate. But since that time there had been a great change in things. Shall we stand here, (said Mr. B.,) after all that has passed during the summer, and hear and receive abusive petitions on abolition—patiently, too? He was surprised to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] say, that the speeches of himself and those of his colleagues might, and probably would be, if pushed much further on this subject, as incendiary as any of those pamphlets, and he had not thought it; and if such were their feelings, he would prefer they should come out. But he was sure the gentleman did not entertain feelings and objects as incendiary as many expressed in those pamphlets. He was sure the gentleman had not taken the trouble to read some that he (Mr. B.) had seen. Did he know that they contained propositions, with actions according with them, that would freeze the blood with horror to witness if put into execution, that could never be thought of without shuddering, by any man who felt for his wife, his children, his friends, his neighbors, or his country. He knew the gentleman entertained no such objects or feelings towards us, and harbored no such designs against us.

In conclusion, Mr. B. said that he would vote for the reconsideration; and if a petition came on without any offensive language attached to it, and his brethren and colleagues from the South should agree with him, he would have no particular objection to have it referred, and a direct answer given.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] had congratulated the House and the country upon the tone and language of the gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States who had taken part in this debate. I (said Mr. T.) very heartily concurred in that congratulation. I am not disposed to look for sinister and bad motives where those which are direct and honorable are avowed. I must, for the present at least, take it for granted that gentlemen mean what they say. I will not drive off those who may be our friends by prematurely suspecting or denouncing them. But I must say that the course of some gentlemen to-day has been well calculated to impair that confidence, and to justify suspicions then expressed by some of my friends. Of one thing I assure gentlemen, that, with all the manoeuvring of parliamentary, let me add of party, tactics, that they shall not elude a direct issue upon this question—an issue that will have to be met with masks off. And then, sir, either my confidence in gentlemen or the suspicions of my friends will be justified.

But, sir, if I was satisfied with the language of the non-slaveholding gentlemen, I was rejoiced, in my heart was I glad, to listen to the manly and decided language of the gentleman from Georgia. It gave me assurance that, on this question, if no other, there will be a thorough union of the whole South, in council and in action, if need be, on this great and absorbing question. Yes, sir, this absorbing question, by whose salutary warmth, ay, heat, if you please, the pestilent vapors of party strife and personal faction will be taken up. The question before the House is, will it reconsider a vote heretofore inadvertently given (as is admitted on all hands) on the reference of a petition? A vote on a kindred petition has just been taken, and gentlemen all around me exclaim they were tricked, they were entrapped. Yes, sir, such is the language of a distinguished gentleman from Virginia, with whom I find myself acting on this question; but with whom, in all human probability, I shall find myself acting on no other. And, sir, let me ask, if the majority desire to avail themselves of a vote thus obtained? I know not the feelings of this body, but, regarding it as a body of gentlemen, I am almost afraid of giving offence by asking the question. Those with whom I act here, sir, and with whom I have acted in times which are past, and in a crisis, every thing of which I am willing should be forgotten, but the great principles which were asserted, a band of patriots whose party name is the only epitaph I desire upon my tomb, have been charged with getting up this discussion for party purposes. It is untrue. No, sir, we not only will not ourselves, nor will we allow others to touch this vital and delicate question for any such purpose. On this subject, hands off is the word. Thus far may you go, but no farther. Let gentlemen here and elsewhere go on in their petty intrigues, their degrading scramble for the offices, the honors of this Government—but there is one interest which must not be involved, and it is this.

As to discussing this subject before any human tribunal, I will not. I will not condescend to vindicate to this House or elsewhere, this or any other of our domestic institutions. It is no affair of yours; you have no right to touch it, still less to demand a reason of us for its continuance. The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] and I must say that his voice sounded in my ear as the voice of a friend, said that we of the South could not know the state of things at the North; that in his district there was not one abolitionist in five hundred. If I did not know it before, I do now, sir, because he has said so. Let me say, in my turn, that he does not know the state of feeling at the South, and I do, with a full knowledge of all my responsibilities, declare that in my opinion nothing will satisfy the excited, the almost frenzied South, but an indignant rejection of these petitions; such a rejection as will, at the same time that it respects the right of petitioning, express the predetermination, the foregone conclusion, of the House on the subject—a rejection, sir, that will satisfy the South, and serve as an indignant rebuke to the fanatics of the North. But we are told that such a course, whilst it would satisfy the South, would offend the people of the North. How so, sir? I had thought that it was the South that was interfered with, the South that was injured, that it was the South that was to be satisfied. Who is it at the North that we are to conciliate? The fanatics? Fanatics, did I say, sir? Never before was so vile a band dignified with that name. They are murderers, foul murderers, accessories before the fact, and they know it, of murder, robbery, rape, infanticide. Sir, this question must be settled; if I may so speak, it must be killed; a just regard to the rights and feelings of the South, to the peace and harmony of this great republic, the permanency of our institutions, demand it; in short, sir, every consideration which can address itself to a patriot demands it. Yes, sir, in the presence of the armed monarchies of Europe, with all the powerful elements both on this and the other side of the Atlantic, already in incipient commotion, already rumbling in their deep crater, he is wilfully blind who does not see that the time is not distant when union, concert, all the patriotism, all the virtue, all the wisdom of our whole country, will be demanded. Shall we, sir, continue to stir this most prolific source of discord, ay of hatred, or shall we settle it, and forever?

Mr. Speaker, there are very few things which my constituents could ask of me that I would not do. But, sir, if these insulting petitions—insulting alike to them and to me—are continually to be read here; if I am to be told that my constituents are land-pirates, cruel, inhuman, avaricious—yes, sir, avaricious—(some of these adjectives, considering the geography of these petitions, are badly chosen;) if, I repeat, my constituents are to be here calumniated and insulted, they must get some other proxy than myself to receive these insults. Sir, the people of the universal South have for years regarded this question of emancipation in this District as identical with a proposition to emancipate the slaves of the whole South, and no human power can change that opinion; and, sir, let me ask if that is not the view of these petitioners themselves? What is their language? “That slavery” causes our nation to be regarded by the world as cruel, avaricious, inhuman. Will abolition in this District remove that impression whilst slavery exists in the whole South? Why no, sir; and they well know it. They mean more. Would a direct proposition to emancipate the slaves of the South be entertained here one moment? Dare this House do it? Dare it do it, I say; for I am sure it would not dare to do an act which might produce calamities so terrible to us all. And yet, sir, this proposition, which both sides regard as identical, is to be treated with all due courtesy, lest you offend that very worthy band of gentlemen, the fanatics of the North, a most notable set of philanthropists, who seek to place the black race in a worse condition than they now are, and that such would be the result, they have the daily evidence before their eyes, by the massacre of the whites of the whole South. I tell gentlemen that they are walking in a magazine with a lighted torch in their hands. Gentlemen may not be aware that, while they are indulging in very poor sarcasms “on the sublime beauties” of slavery, they are not, I am sure they are not, aware of the true situation of the country as to this most delicate and dangerous subject. Yes, sir, whilst gentlemen are indulging here or elsewhere a sickly philanthropy, and shedding, or causing to be shed, crocodile tears over the condition of the poor African, they must cause tears to flow of a very different kind, such tears as were shed at Southampton. This, sir, is all that they can do. As to any effort now or ever to accomplish their purposes, no one man at the South has any fears. No, sir, thank God, on this subject we are united, and our position is one of security, of impregnable safety. Mr. Speaker, I should be an unworthy representative of the people who have honored me with their confidence, if I could so far forget what was due to myself and to this House, as to indulge in the language of menace, but still more unworthy if I were to palter with this great subject. I cannot, sir, mollify with a phrase. I have not obtained my seat here by prating about this glorious Union. I will only now say that I have a profound, I hope a wise, but by no means a fanatical, attachment to it. There are things which I value more, and I tell gentlemen, in all candor and good feeling, that, if the people of any portion of this country regard slavery as a national disgrace, they must make up their minds whether the advantages of a union with us are worth the disgrace, if any thing be the price to honorable men of dishonor; or, sir, they must cut the cord that unites and be off; and God speed them, however much I should deplore the event under any other circumstances.

The very distinguished member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has stated some appalling facts in a speech, sir, to which I must apply, with some change of the order, a very pointed remark, as his remarks always are pointed, made by that gentleman on the message of the President at the last session, that, whatever the world may think of its spirit, there can be but one opinion of its prudence. He says, sir, that, if this matter is forced upon the House, the speeches of every member north of Mason and Dickinson's line, will be an incendiary pamphlet. I trust not, sir. I can but hope that gentleman is mistaken. That venerable gentleman has been so long, and, in some instances, so fortunate for his country, in the public service, that much of the history of his life is known to us all; and, sir, we certainly have a very striking instance about the period of 1808 of a very acute and very accurate perception of the state of public opinion, and to what point it was tending; but, sir, (and I would not for the world recall to that distinguished gentleman an unpleasant reminiscence,) we had about this time last year an equally signal instance of a mistake as to the sentiments of his own constituents upon the subject of the French war. I will not say a mistake which he may have had occasion to regret, but it was certainly one which forced upon him the extremity of having to demonstrate that a spade was not a spade.

H. or R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

I hope that the gentleman is again, as last year, mistaken as to the public sentiment of the North. But, sir, be he right or wrong, the South demands to know the truth, and if I had not been so resolved before that speech was made, to bring gentlemen to the experimentum crucis—the test of a vote—I am now.

One word in conclusion; and, sir, it is from one who, however obscure, was not the least ardent in the late happily ended struggle of the State of South Carolina. I assure this House, and proclaim from my place here to the country, that there is not now one remnant of unkind feeling on the part of the people of that State to any other section. "The winter of our discontent" is gone, and I bear the most willing testimony to the balmy influence of the popular meetings at the North upon our irritated community. It may be in God's good providence—a providence always good, often inscrutable—that, however vile may have been the instruments used in causing this excitement, it may end in the cordial, the affectionate union of all actions. Improve the opportunity. The action of this House may go forth into the South with healing on its wings, or, sir, it may, to use the eloquent language of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] be the signal to rally the clan. The ties that bind us together, and I thank God for it, are many and powerful: the silver bond of interest; but that interest must be mutual; the silken cord of affection, the most powerful of all—or the iron chain of despotism—but let me tell you, sir, that every link of that chain will be blood stained.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, said, the question is upon the reconsideration of a vote which was taken by the House on Saturday last, and then decided in the affirmative, to refer a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia to the Committee upon the District. It is with reluctance, Mr. Speaker, that I feel myself constrained to trespass for a moment upon the patience of the House, in offering my reasons for the vote which I shall give. I should not do it now, if I did not feel reminded of my duty, by a remark which incidentally fell from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] this morning, that some years ago it had devolved upon him to present a number of petitions upon this subject, from the Society of Friends in the State of Pennsylvania, many members of which Society I have the honor of representing upon this floor; and I may be permitted to take the occasion to say, although this is not the time nor the place to pass a eulogium, that they are as respectable, as honorable, and as intelligent, as any other portion of the community. Sir, for the same reasons which I understood to actuate the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who sits near me, although their views of the means to attain this object are different, to wit: to give quiet and repose to this agitating question, I shall vote against the reconsideration. I hold it to be important, that we should meet this question in all its bearings; that a reference should be made of these memorials to a committee, who would give it a calm, dispassionate, and temperate consideration; present the facts of the case to this House and to the country; and let it be finally acted upon as other petitions are, that we and the country may arrive at a safe and satisfactory conclusion upon it. Sir, it is to appease and assuage the troubled waters that have been moving upon this question, that I am in favor of a reference, in order that there may be a report upon it by the committee. It has been stated that there are matters of deep and vital importance involved in the decision of this absorbing question; matters affecting the constitution and laws of the land: it has been stated, that there are vested rights of property, which rights are guaranteed to the people of the District, of which we could not constitutionally deprive them. And upon this part of the inquiry, there was an attempt made by a gentleman, two or three days ago, to refer to and read the ordinance or act of cession of a part of this District; but in the then pending question, it was pronounced not to be in order to go into the merits of the inquiry. I hold it to be pertinent and important that the relative position in which the master and the slave stand towards each other in this District, upon legal and constitutional principles, should be made known to the community. But, sir, there is another view of this interesting subject, which merits the respect of a reference and the attention of a committee. The consideration of the expediency of agitating the subject at this time; the propriety of changing the laws of this District with reference to the inhabitants and the surrounding States, are matters which are presented before us, and the sense and justice of Congress are appealed to on that ground. It is urged upon us, and yet without the opportunity of accompanying the appeal by the alleged reasons, that Congress should refrain from stirring this subject. Is it not important, sir, that the arguments on both sides, and on all sides, of this question, should be set forth, that the people may be informed, and that they may judge for themselves? It is, I take it, of the highest importance to the people, both of the North and the South, that this inquiry should be had, freely and dispassionately. It is with this view, and for these reasons, that I am opposed to a reconsideration of the subject, and wish it to abide the decision already made. Sir, upon this question, it is not competent for me to enter into the merits or demerits of the principles, or of the abolition of slavery. I am admonished by the hour, that I ought not further to prolong this debate; but being placed in the position in which I am, and entertaining the opinions which I do, I could not, in duty to myself or my constituents, forbear to ask the indulgence of the House to submit these few reflections, before I record my vote upon the journals.

Mr. M. having concluded, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The question being that depending from yesterday, on the motion of Mr. PATRON for a reconsideration of the vote by which a memorial praying Congress to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, was referred to the Committee on the District—

Mr. GRANGER, of New York, rose and said:

Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest against the manner in which the names of these petitioners have been confounded with the abolitionists of the North. They are men of as pure hearts and as pure lives as any gentlemen of South Carolina; they are men to whom the constitution of this country is as sacred as it is to the inhabitants of the South, and who will rally in its defence with a spirit and power equal to that which was ever brought to its aid by that gallant people. Sir, I hold the abolitionists of the North in no higher respect than do the gentlemen from Carolina, or from any other section of the country. There are many of them for whose motives I have no respect; there are others whose motives are honest, but to whom, misguided as they are, I would say, stay your hand; you must not "scatter, firebrands, arrows, and death, and say, we are in sport." Of them I say, deal with them, under the constitution and laws of the land, as you think proper; but when I am called upon to confound these petitioners with such persons, I feel it my duty to enter my protest.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Sir, who are these petitioners? They are persons who, looking to the letter of the constitution of their country, and finding there that Congress has the right of exclusive legislation for this District, and not looking beyond that, to the grants of cession by the States of Virginia and Maryland, to see under what reservations those grants were made and accepted; and without stopping to ask the still more important question, whether the residents of the District of Columbia require any interference, suppose that Congress have a right to legislate upon this subject. Starting upon this abstract proposition, they have supposed they had a right to appear at the bar of this House, and to ask that the seat of Government of a free nation should be inhabited by those only who are free.

Such, sir, is the condition of these petitioners; and I can never consent that they should be designated as murderers, or that their names should be mingled with those of the abolitionists.

Let us take them more in detail. Who are they? I first mention my worthy predecessor, [Mr. Dickson,] in whose bosom beats a heart as honest as God ever gave to man, and in whose veins flows the blood of as pure a patriotism as animates the breast of any member of this House. He is not a gentleman against whom the charge of constructive murder is to be brought.

Who next? I am a citizen of New York, a State that will assist the gentlemen of South Carolina in keeping the chain of union bright and strong to the last. And, although sometimes collision may arise, and there may be more friction than is desirable, still it is a collision which will bring the chain from the contest stronger and brighter than before. It should be remembered, and I regret to say that it seems to have been forgotten, that the popular branch of the Legislature of New York, during the winter session of 1829, by a most decided majority, embracing all political parties, and as much talent and patriotism as can be found in any legislative hall of this nation, passed by a decided vote their opinion that it was competent for the Congress of the United States to legislate on this subject. I cannot consent, and I should hold southern gentlemen recreant to their own honor could they consent, that a charge thus odious should be quietly made against the representatives of their people; nor can I consent that it should be made against mine. A majority of the Legislature of New York, differing as I did in part from them, are not, by implication, or construction, murderers; and although there may be those in this House on whom the duty of defending that Legislature would more properly devolve, still I cannot pass over this allegation in silence.

Who are next? The peaceful disciples of William Penn!—a people who inflict wounds nowhere, but who carry the healing balm of consolation and sympathy for human suffering throughout the civilized world. I have yet to learn that this society should be called murderers, but for the courtesy of any gentleman.

Who next? The ladies! for they have presented petitions here. I probably shall not differ with some, as to the propriety of their interference; nor will they differ from me when I say that, if they choose to bring their power to bear, such petitioners are most fearful disturbers of man's repose. Indeed, there are few gentlemen, from the South or the North, who have not received many heartfelt wounds from that source; but which, fortunately, are not of a character to endanger the Union. These murderers are like those in Macbeth—they only "murder sleep." This, sir, is the situation of the petitioners, against whom gentlemen have uttered such denunciations.

But we are called upon to consider this question, for the purpose of expressing our opinion on the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and at the same time we are told that it should not be discussed. Sir, a resolution has been read at the table, and, when in order, we are told, is to be submitted to the consideration of the House, which will open this question for debate as fully as if it had been referred to a committee, and they had reported a bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. And yet we are to reconsider this vote, and then to cripple the debate, merely because the question cannot be discussed.

Why is it that we have become so suddenly sensitive? Differing as I do from many of my constituents, I have never entertained but one opinion—and that is, that even if the constitutional right exists, which I doubt strongly, there is no question of policy now existing which should call for legislation upon this subject.

I subscribe to the doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. J. Q. Adams,] asserted yesterday; and I find no reason why this petition should be driven from the House. It has been read at the table. Are not its terms respectful? I think they are; and that, if they are not crimped and plaited according to the strictest conventional rules of refined society, still they are so respectful that, proceeding from freemen, the representatives of freemen, in my opinion, are bound to receive them.

If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Hammond] wishes my direct vote upon this question, let him meet the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, (I believe,) that these petitions go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or to a select committee, and that a report be made, as it will be made, meeting the wishes of these gentlemen; and then he shall have my vote fearlessly in his favor. But when he insists that I shall either evade this question, or strike through it and inflict a deep wound on the guaranteed right of petition, then I say, as fearlessly, that I will stand by the doctrine of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, however heterodox that doctrine may appear. Who would have believed that from the very quarter of the country to which the constitution of the United States could not be made acceptable until the right of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right of petition, had been secured, this proposition would have emanated? Who would have believed that an attempt would have been made to drive the petitioners from this hall by those very men who profess to believe, as I believe, "that freedom of opinion is to be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat error?"

Mr. INGERSOLL rose and said:

Believing that the motion before the House will not reach the object entertained by either side, I have put together a resolution which it is my intention to submit for consideration when it shall be perfectly in order. It runs thus:

H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the holding of slaves is a right clearly recognised by the constitution of the United States, and is thereby secured to the citizens of those States whose policy does not forbid it as the legitimate subject of individual property, and source of political influence and power, and all attempts to interfere with or molest them in its exercise or enjoyment are impolitic, unconstitutional, and unjust.

Surely the proposition now before us does not go to the root of the evil. Encouragement to petitions having for their object the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, is deprecated, because (as has been said) it would be an entering wedge to further interference. Rights exist which are in themselves considered unquestionable. These are to be guarded from any and every encroachment. Be it so. Why not assert and maintain them, then, at once, without regard to the mere incident which, although far from insignificant in itself, must be comparatively unimportant?

The nature of the motion now submitted is such as scarcely to afford an opportunity to decide either of the important questions to which attention has been called in the course of the debate. They are two: First, the one immediately involved in the memorial on the table, and expressed on the face of it—the abolition or continuance of slavery in the District of Columbia; and, secondly, the broader and more pressing inquiry, whether measures shall be resorted to for the purpose of assuaging the feelings, and arresting and preventing attempts to interfere with the constitutional rights and personal security of the citizens of the slaveholding States.

It will be perceived at once that the last of these inquiries is not directly involved at all in the proceeding before us. If it be so in any way, it must be incidentally only. In that sense, I cannot doubt it, since it has been made (as to the abuse itself, or the probable remedy for it) a prominent object of remark throughout the discussion. That the two things may have a bearing upon each other, is altogether a reasonable conclusion, and, in that view, a separation of them in debate could not fairly be expected. But it is perfectly clear that the adoption of the resolution, or the rejection of it, will settle nothing with regard to the more important and interesting inquiry and complaint—the complaint of undue interference, and the inquiry how it can best be put a stop to at present, and avoided in future. If legislation be unnecessary to prevent the diffusion of injurious publications, they will be equally prevented whether slavery be abolished in the District of Columbia or not. If legislation, on the other hand, be requisite for that purpose, it must still be resorted to, although slavery should be preserved and perpetuated here as it originally stood, and still exists in those sections of the two growing empires that were cut off from their parent stocks for the exclusive legislation of the United States.

Thus nothing will be gained or lost to the one question by the determination of the other, even if that determination itself were now within the reach of the House. Will the vote now aimed at reach the object that gentlemen on both sides of the question desire to attain? Will it fairly or effectually decide the point of abolition or conservation any where? I fear not, and believing that to be the case, and believing, also, that a mere silent vote would not sufficiently explain the motives which lead to it, I will venture to trespass for a moment on the patience of the House, by urging the reasons which induce me to wish that another course might have been taken. Before I sit down, I may trouble the House also with a remark as to the necessity, or the absence of it, of movements here in relation to the evils complained of in the Southern and some of the Western States.

As to the whole question, the State of Pennsylvania is peculiarly circumstanced. She has at this moment scarcely a remnant of slave population within her limits. Her soil and climate do not require it. A respectable part of her people, too, descendants of her patriarchal founder, and retaining all of his primitive simplicity in feeling and in manners, consists of individuals who are supposed to be generally opposed to slavery according to the sincerest convictions of their consciences. In their own practice they scrupulously refrain from it. Some of them rigidly abstain from those enjoyments, and even comforts, of life which are the ordinary products of slave labor. Yet, in such a community, among a people whose masses and aggregate contain a large ingredient of the character I have described, feelings have been entertained and expressed, measures have been adopted and promulgated, which, if the sympathies of the South are to be influenced by the promptness and sincerity of corresponding sympathies, cannot fail to win their affection and regard. I want to impress on the minds of honorable gentlemen around me, and, through them, on the nation, that, in the district which I have the honor in part to represent, there has been as cordial and animated an expression of sentiment on this irritating subject as could have resounded in acclamation from one of their own hospitable cities, or arisen from the midst of their own fertile fields. If Pennsylvania was the first to dispense with these institutions for herself, she has not been the last to buckle on her armor, and to extend the right hand of fellowship to her brethren of the South. I mean to make no vain boast of her liberality, to claim no merit here for her motives. History has recorded the event of her abolition. Let it stand, if you will, upon the present occasion, on the ground of her not wanting, for her own best interests, the continuance of slavery. She certainly deems her condition the better without it. Yet I have the satisfaction to say, without a boast, that our constituents are not apt to be backward in the duties of kindness and assistance at a moment of apprehended or existing need. The flames which have been devastating a portion of a sister city had not ceased to blaze, when they gave living proofs of the sincerity of their friendship, and the ardor and promptness with which they would lend their succor to their suffering friends.

I had hoped that there was no substantial difference of opinion on the principal point, in this House, and, therefore, as the representation is universal, that there could be virtually none in the nation. The chord that appeared to vibrate in harmony here, is only responsive to sounds that have been uttered on the banks of almost every river north of the Susquehannah, to the extremest limits of the land. Until very recently these strings would not have been struck at all. An occasion had not before presented itself, when such utterance would have been necessary, and in the absence of necessity it would have been unwise. The North deemed itself bound, indeed, to abstain from a discussion that would have been eminently unprofitable at any former period of the national history. Their patriots had united in planting seed, which was to be left peculiarly, if not exclusively, to the culture of their co-patriots of the South. There grew up from it a sensitive plant that would scarcely bear the slightest touch, and, by common consent, its delicacy was respected, and all interference with it was avoided.

Time, however, in its experimental course, gave birth to prodigious changes in the colonial institutions of another country, and the officious sensibilities of some of its own subjects were influenced to an attempt to fasten or frighten them upon us. The standard was raised with a prudence at least equal to the zeal which prompted its erection, at a distance from the scene where the effect was to be produced. Some few misguided individuals answered to the signal. We, of the North, its actual population, strangers to all that was conceived or in progress about us, began to suffer under the stigma of hostility and incendiary disposition towards our southern brethren. I cannot be mistaken when I say that the belief was general that the whole northern population was arrayed in feeling against them. It was necessary to disabuse both them and the misjudging few who were equally in error among ourselves. An early effort was made among those who had descended from the first laborers in the blood-stained fields of the Revolution, who fell at Lexington, who, on a memorable occasion, gave the tea to the deep. Their motives were explained, and the necessity of resistance to foreign intermeddling and domestic folly was made manifest by one who, cotemporary with the early history and councils of the republic, and now its time-honored sage, knew best how to illustrate the character of the federal compact, and the duties which, as a compromise, it enjoined.

The citizens of Pennsylvania were not less prompt in the expression of their decided disapprobation of all attempts to disturb the settled faith of the Union. This was done in well-attended meetings of the people, whose sentiments, it is said, are never wrong. The expression was as emphatic as the sentiment which it sprang from was cordial and sincere. The promises and pledges of friendship were pure and unalloyed. But they were individual and unofficial. Our friends of the South seemed to look for something more. A manifesto of good-will was expected from a source that might be regarded at once permanent and responsible. Accordingly, at the very first opportunity that presented itself, at the now recent meeting of the Legislature, the Executive of Pennsylvania, in his annual message, openly echoed the sentiments and judgments of the people. If it be necessary, the Legislature will do the like. What further do the intelligence and power of the South require? Nothing; literally nothing. In the best judgments of their wise and honorable men, they ought to be, and they will be satisfied. What measures they will adopt for themselves, thus assured against distant aggression, must be for their own wisdom to decide, and their own firmness to execute. They have stout hearts and strong arms. Whether (I will add) in the course which may be governed by Divine Providence, the day shall come when they will choose to make arrangements for safe and eventual emancipation, must be left under that guidance which cannot err—exclusively to themselves.

I come to ask them, in behalf of the North; of those who have done all that could be expected, or that has been required; of those who are prepared to do whatever may be necessary or useful in the day of greater need; I merely ask that the subject shall be approached (now that it must be met in this great council) with mutual forbearance and respect. Jealousy herself ought not to doubt the disposition to keep the relations between the two sections of the country free from all influences, except those that are the most generous and just. My object is to allay excitement, by proving, if I can, that the causes of it exist no longer, and that they will not arise hereafter, unless they are excited by the conflict of unnecessary and irritating discussion.

In accounting for much of the feeling that has extended through the southern States, I address myself rather to their distant fellow-citizens than to themselves. Indignation at attempted or perpetrated wrongs was not to be condemned or wondered at. If half the effects imputed to it are likely to ensue from the interference that is complained of, that drop of cold blood that stirs or stagnates in the veins of a native of the South, would be rebellious to his nature. It is not because any attempts could be made with success at actual emancipation, much less at the final overthrow of law and order, that those things are deprecated. One wide-spread revolution, ending in the supremacy of a population of African descent, is, I presume, too chimerical and absurd to be within the serious apprehension of any one. Moral force and well-digested discipline; capacity for order and arrangement; wisdom to direct, and valor not to be subdued, among the high-minded and well-educated citizens of that section of the country, forbid the idea of any thing like permanent or extensive mischief.

Yet there are evils of a less wide-spread influence, of which the dread is by no means visionary; and, with regard to them, early alarm, and steady watchfulness and precaution, are only true wisdom.

A distinguished and eloquent Representative from Virginia once declared upon this floor that the midnight bell never tolled for fire at Richmond that the mother did not clasp her infant more closely to her breast. It was, in his estimation, no idle fear that doubted between the perils of accidental conflagration and the horrors of domestic massacre. Accordingly, more than once has the tocsin sounded to the rescue from existing or clearly meditated insurrection. The fires of servile war were actually lighted at Southampton; and, although they were speedily extinguished, they left a section of our common country clothed in the garments of affliction. The best of our citizens have been occasionally called on to sit in special commission on the unhappy victims of a salutary vengeance, and it has been necessary, on such occurrences, to present to other evil-doers a terrible example. Single instances of ferocious assassination have also occurred. An unhappy slave has been convicted within the last week in this very District of an attempt to murder his mistress as she slept. An anticipation of such scenes in time to come, prompted by the fatal recollection of them in times past, may well arouse the anxious feelings, the active indignation of those to whom belongs the care of the helpless and the feeble.

We need not go far back in time to discover among the outbreaks of slavery traces of some of the bloodiest butcheries that history records. The elements of fury that could not be satisfied; of a brutal appetite for blind and indiscriminate revenge, never were more aptly mixed for mischief than in the instance of the revolution of St. Domingo. Rome, in the dark hour of the conspiracy of Catiline, did not exhibit a darker picture of human suffering and human crime.

"All hate had license given it; all rage reins;
Slaughter bestrid the streets:
No age was spared—no sex—no age, no degree;
Not infants in the porch of life were free.
Virgins, and widows, matrons, tender wives,
All died."

Independently of the threat of attack on life, it is impossible to overlook the perfectly justifiable motives that give value to property, and make it a duty to guard it from violation. The constitution communicates this character to the right of the slave-owner, and secures him in the enjoyment of it. It does more, much more. Its very first article confers an importance on slave population dearer, in the estimate of freemen, and in its constitution, towards the legitimate exercise of sovereign power, than any which grows out of mere pecuniary circumstances. In the established ratio of representation, and the consequent influence of the representatives, and the force and dignity they enjoy for themselves and for their constituents, there is (as all of us familiarly know) an additional power vested in the slave-holding States derived from that circumstance alone, equal to three-fifths of what they would possess, if every slave were a free man, and, to all intents, a citizen.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

When life or property, or the privilege of representation, is invaded, or threatened with invasion, a spirit of more than opposition is aroused, and resistance to the uttermost is the consequence. I thus freely acknowledge, because I deeply feel, how natural is the impulse which would prevent and repel encroachment, that would meet it at the onset, or anticipate its organization. But I confess it appears to me that the occasion now presented is not calculated to call forth, and would but waste, the feelings of alarmed affection, of watchful stewardship, of indignant patriotism, to which I have adverted. No attempt is here made to interfere with any of these sacred rights. The same constitution which gives a thrice-told security to the possessor of slaves, and guards him from the invasion of his undoubted privileges, confers too on Congress the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, in such District (limited to ten miles in extent) as may become the seat of the Federal Government. I am not about to argue the question, whether this large grant does, or does not, include the power to abolish slavery. Such discussion would, at all events, be premature, and is out of the course which it is my object at present to pursue. Legislation, however, is sovereignty; and it may be, that, in a given event, Congress can pass upon that grave subject without encroaching upon any rights, vested or contingent, admitted or alleged. I will not anticipate the contingency of a previous abolition in Maryland and Virginia, and of the united voice of all the inhabitants of the District, raised in one general prayer for abolition. Nor do I overlook the proviso in the cession from Virginia, the true construction of which must limit it, I think, to landed property. It is easy to perceive, on the other hand, an essential difference between the voluntary sacrifice of a particular State surrendering its own property, as would be the case where it is done through its particular representatives, and the corresponding movements of Congress upon petitions from a distance with regard to a District which has no especial representation. I do not mean to argue that Congress can legislate away this property, even with the consent of the owners; but I am not prepared to admit that they cannot. Certainly a very different issue is presented by those inquiries from that which grows out of the supposed daring inroads of foreign enemies and domestic traitors. It would be greatly to be deplored that the case should be made to assume a false position, and that a question so easily to be resolved as that which rests upon the plain letter of the constitution, should be embarrassed by difficulties that its spirit alone can overcome, and be confounded with a question that is altogether different, and (at least, comparatively speaking,) doubtful. I would not be understood as requiring that the question of abolition here should be left undetermined; but I would have it met, whenever it is encountered, fairly and fully. Let it be so determined, if at all, as will place it at rest, now and forever; at rest for ourselves, and at rest for the whole civilized world; so at rest, as will afford an answer even to the agitating orator of the British Parliament, whose itinerant humanity has extended, as it should seem, in tender mercy to the superintendence of our domestic institutions.

How will a mere vote upon the little emergency of this little petition effect the object, take it in any sense? From how many souls, male and female, adults and minors, does it come? I speak of it with entire respect, but I allude to its numerical strength, compared with that of the whole republic. Thirteen, or a hundred and thirty, or thirteen hundred, if you will. What is that to thirteen or fourteen millions? Every day may bring forth new memorials of the same, or (which is the same thing in the view I am now taking) of an opposite character. Would the simple rejection of any number of them avail? No, sir. Ominous suggestions are contained in the conclusion of this very paper, that the petitioners are not readily to be turned aside. Applications may be renewed again, and again, and again. The whole time of the House, and the whole business of the nation, may be suspended by the discussion or decision of them in detail, in settling, one by one, memorials without number; in the expression of indignation within these walls, and in the exercise of a persevering obstinacy without them. In such a conflict the race would not probably be to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. Heretofore petitions have been referred, or laid upon the table. An honorable gentleman has said the circumstances are different at present. Then treat them differently. Do not let them remain unanswered, as they will be in effect by simple rejection in each case, but take, or make an early opportunity (if it must be) to decide them all. In that decision, pronounce an emphatic vindication of all we do.

Besides, these detailed decisions, which I confess I deprecate, may not be uniform. To say nothing of the effect that may be produced on particular members by the character and language of particular memorials, by their peculiar knowledge of some sets of petitioners, and want of knowledge of others, and a consequent predisposition or indisposition to listen to their requests, in any thing like a doubtful case, majorities may vibrate from circumstances altogether adventitious, and this may possibly be considered a case of that description. There are, I think, some ninety-nine Representatives from slave-holding states, and one hundred and forty-one from those which are not. I do not know that this makes an essential difference. I hope it does not. But it may operate in some degree, as early habits of thinking and association cannot fail to act upon the mind. Members may be absent from their seats. In the shapes which this subject assumes, momentous, as in some aspects it is, it may come up any and every day. It may steal upon the House unconsciously to itself, and almost so to the mover. We have had but few days for presenting petitions. On each, I believe, it has been the subject of discussion: and, if this motion prevails, the result in the different cases will have been different. I could not ask for a better illustration. For every member to be every hour in his place, watchful of all and partaking of all, would be more than mortal strength and clear-sightedness would bear. It would require the eyes of Argus, and as many hands. We cannot forget, besides, the mournful memento which has been already more than once repeated among us—the shafts of death that have already fallen thickly in the midst of us to manifest our feebleness and mortality.

Thus one day a petition may be received, the next rejected, and the third laid on the table, and the fourth perhaps thrown under the table. What is the result to ourselves, to the nation, to the world? Nothing; worse than nothing: uncertainty and doubt; that fear of change that perplexes nations. This body owes to itself the aim at least, and the attainment, as nearly as may be practicable, of consistency in its doings. Acts of legislation ought not, under similar circumstances, in the course of a political voyage, to veer with the flag at her topmast head, but to be steadfast and true as the needle upon the deck.

I promised, before taking my seat, to say a word as to the suggestion, coming from a high official source, of the propriety of congressional regulations over the Post Office, respecting these grave matters. I am inclined to doubt the necessity, rather than to withhold, if desired, the passage of a remedial statute. It is a question of police—of mere police; and that is a subject which the General Government could not touch if it would, and would not if it could. If individuals are found trespassing on rights so delicate and sacred as these, they can be punished. If the instruments of their misdeeds, the publications and other missiles of mischief, can be discovered, they may be destroyed. By the old law, misdoers taken in the mainour, with proofs of guilty conduct and design about them, were liable not only to be arrested without warrant, but hung up without arraignment. The evidence of their offence was flagrant in their hands. They were themselves reeking with criminal act and purpose, beyond, as was believed, the possibility of denial, and therefore beyond the necessity of farther or formal proof.

Modern usage, it is true, has given to the penal law a milder aspect. Proof is not dispensed with, the rather because it is satisfactory and clear. The law now interposes and prevents the consummation of the crime. It arrests the flight of the criminal, and compels him to restore his ill-gotten gains. It stands guard over the safety of the citizen and the State, by exercising the glorious attribute of preventive justice. It reserves, however, the last offices of vengeance until guilt has been duly proved before the competent tribunal; has been made manifest, not only in existence, but in evidence, to the face of day. It needs not the acknowledgment of the criminal, or the positive and direct proof of his misdeed. The mute eloquence of circumstances still makes its due impression, and often unaided does its office. Its consists of the half-extinguished torch of the malignant incendiary; of the bleeding victim of the highway robber; of the telltale drop upon the dagger of the dark assassin.

To reach these objects is properly the duty of the municipal law. It is within the power of every well-constituted civil society to vindicate itself. The powers and the privileges of the General Government (extensive and useful as I believe they are and ought to be) cannot, in matters of a criminal nature, suspend or supersede the municipal regulations of a particular Commonwealth.

The establishment of post roads, constitutional to the letter, could not dedicate that portion of the territory of a State over which they pass to the use of a band of highwaymen. Jurisdiction and legislation, too, remain to every other purpose as entire after the establishment of the post road as before. The analogous and incidental establishment of post offices is liable to the same results. Can any one suppose that a magic circle is drawn round the office where the mail is opened to diffuse the blessings of intelligence and affection; the cement of private and public union; the principles of happy and virtuous association; but ready, perhaps, also, to disgorge the poisonous effluvia of insurrection, discord, and death; and that within that circle every thing is inaccessible to the approach of the municipal law?

The SPEAKER here suggested that the question before the House did not cover the subject which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was now discussing.

Mr. INGERSOLL observed that he was aware that he owed to the indulgence of the House the privilege of making the last few remarks which had fallen from him. It was a subject, however, in many of its relations so delicate and so disturbing, that he was anxious to say at once what appeared to him to belong to it, even incidentally. He would cheerfully conform to the suggestion of the Chair, and conclude with a single remark.

Let us seek the important objects which all of us have in view, with the best feelings and through the proper means, and we cannot fail to attain them. They consist of the harmony and the happiness of the republic, the preservation and prosperity of the Union. In endeavoring to attain them, let us, the representatives of the people, with one accord, seek to bring together, not the opinion of an ancient battle crimsoned with the life's blood of common enemies, but the first-fruits of a generous patriotism, the willing offerings of every section of a common country; and let us place them, with the aspirations of fervent and devoted hearts for her tranquillity and happiness, upon one common altar.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he had avoided all participation in this debate, because he thought it wise to do so, and he should then say a very few words in relation to it. All that he would say he deemed necessary from certain remarks that had fallen from one of his honorable colleagues that morning, [Mr. GRANGER.] That gentleman was pleased to say that it had been forgotten that the Legislature of New York, not longer ago than the year 1829, had passed resolutions upon the subject of the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia.

[Mr. GRANGER explained. His words were: it seemed to have been forgotten that the popular branch of the Legislature had passed resolutions—and, said Mr. G., I leave the gentleman there.]

Mr. M. resumed. He said he fully believed that gentlemen of the South on that floor were entirely sincere in their assurances to us that such discussions were unprofitable and productive of any thing but utility, dangerous to their rights, and perhaps destructive to the lives of their wives, their children, and their citizens. He had hoped that gentlemen giving such assurances would have refrained from going into the discussion, but in this he had been greatly disappointed. He would forewarn the House, that it was not his intention to deviate far from the course he had prescribed for himself, and he would not now trespass at all if it had not been for some remarks made by his honorable colleague [Mr. GRANGER] who first addressed the House this morning. My colleague, sir, said Mr. M., has been pleased to say that it seemed to be forgotten that the Legislature of New York, not longer ago than 1829, passed resolutions in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

[Mr. GRANGER here explained, by saying that such resolutions were only passed by the popular branch of that Legislature.]

Mr. M. continued, and said that the impression he received from the gentleman's remarks was as he had stated, and he thought he had heard him distinctly and attentively; but it was possible he might not have done so, and he was happy to have the gentleman understood. Mr. M. said he had the honor of having been an humble member of that Legislature; and, on looking into its journal, he found that there were four others of his colleagues on this floor, who were then also his associates, [Messrs. W. K. FULLER, EFNER, P. C. FULLER, and HAZELTINE.] His colleague [Mr. GRANGER] was not in that Legislature, as he had been accustomed heretofore to be; and, having stated this fact, said Mr. M., perhaps it is due to the gentleman that I should state the reason, and it is, that he was at the previous election a candidate for the Lieutenant Governor's chair of that State, which he failed to reach, for the simple reason that he could not get votes enough.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on looking into the journal containing the record of the decision taken on the passage of the resolution to which my colleague has alluded, (and it is due to my colleagues to state it, after what has fallen from the gentleman,) I find the record to be consistent with all my former and subsequent action upon the subject. I am there recorded as voting with my two colleagues, with whom it has usually been my pleasure to act on most questions, [Messrs. W. K. FULLER and EFNER,] as voting against the resolutions, while I find my other colleagues, [Messrs. P. C. FULLER and HAZELTINE,] who have always been aliens to most of my views upon political questions, recorded as there voting for them.

My course, sir, and that of my friends generally, at home as well as on this floor, has been consistent in opposing any interference upon this subject. It is true, sir, that resolution passed that Assembly; passed, too, sir, for purposes and by means which I am not permitted to discuss here; but, having been sent to the other branch of the Legislature for their concurrence, it slept, I believe, in the same family vault with those mentioned yesterday by the honorable gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] of Massachusetts, "the tomb of the Capulets." After this explanation, sir, the gentleman is welcome to all the "gulls he may catch by that fly"—to all the benefits which he can appropriate to himself in this, the next, or any other campaign. Having said thus much in reply to my colleague, and being on the floor, said Mr. M., I beg leave to add that my own opinions on this subject are in accordance with those of my constituents with whose views I am acquainted, or ought to be presumed to be so; and, sir, I may claim some acquaintance with the people of the State of New York. Sir, said Mr. M., I am fully warranted in saying that, from my acquaintance with that people, there is not one person in five hundred, among a population of more than two millions of people in that State, who is in favor of abolition, or any other interference with the rights of master and slave in the South. Among the political friends with whom I have uniformly acted, (the republicans,) I have never known one—no, sir, not a single one. Sir, said Mr. M., there is no constitutional ambiguity, to my mind, on this subject; for, while it is admitted that Congress have exclusive power "of legislation in all cases whatever," in the District of Columbia, the constitution has prohibited any of our interference with the local institutions of the States. The Union and constitution, sir, were the result of concession and compromise. The subject under debate formed one of the points. We agreed; we entered into the compact with our southern brethren; and the question now presented by them to us—the real question (when the argument is pushed to the full extent) propounded to us of the North—is, whether we will live up to the bargain we have made, to the compact and union we have entered into? For myself, for my constituents and friends, I answer, without hesitation or mental reservation, that, under all circumstances and in every vicissitude, good or evil, we will—we will, though the heavens fall. What more need I say? (said Mr. M.) I will ask gentlemen to believe us sincere. Why suspect our sincerity? What motive have we to interfere in concerns that do not concern us? Sir, the people of New York can have no motive for such interference.

The few misguided men in the North, who are desirous of intruding their misdirected philanthropy upon the South, have political and party purposes to subserve. Sensible of their own want of consideration in their own community, of their own destitution of political integrity and patriotism, they seek even infamous notoriety in attempts to destroy the institutions of their country. I have placed my vote on our State legislative journals against them, and I shall repeat that vote on your journal as often as I may have opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I have deprecated this debate, and deplored the spirit in which it is conducted. Shall it come to this, that an American Congress shall be bandying epithets springing from youthful or excited feelings? Is it necessary, sir, to accuse any individual of crimes, and stigmatize him with epithets, that shall with me be nameless? For myself, sir, I cannot consent to such an employment; and I trust that we may conduct our further proceedings in such manner as will avoid it.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Virginia, said no part of the Union was more deeply interested in the subject under discussion than that he had the honor to represent. Yet he had remained silent till the course of the debate left him no alternative but to overcome his reluctance, almost invincible, to trouble the House, or incur the imputation of shrinking from the discharge of his duty.

He was sincerely grateful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] for the generous impulse which had prompted his effort to tranquillize the South. For one, he thanked him for the warm sympathy he had expressed for the southern people, and the disposition he had evinced to do them justice. He had hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would, indeed, have gone to the root of the mischief. But he was sorry to say that the measure he had proposed was not calculated to attain his object, and had wholly disappointed the expectations he had raised. What did the gentleman propose? In effect, to declare that Congress had no power to liberate slaves within the limits of those States which authorize them to be held as property! And had it come to that? Were we to accept, as a mighty boon, a recognition of the right of our citizens to hold their own property, guaranteed by their own State laws, and by the federal constitution itself? Nothing could more strikingly prove how rapid had been the strides of fanaticism and usurpation than the fact that a member of that House should deem it necessary gravely to offer such a resolution. The right of the States to mould their domestic institutions, in this respect, to suit themselves, was not to be drawn in question. The petitioners themselves had not ventured to ask for any direct interference with the States. They had only prayed for the abolition of slavery in this District; and our right to do that was the question we were called upon to decide.

Mr. R. said he was gratified to hear from all quarters of the House the strongest avowals of hostility to the schemes of those who were seeking to disturb the peace of the country. But it was obvious to remark that the action of the House did not correspond with these professions. No measures were proposed to put down the agitators, or secure our tranquillity. There seemed an evident desire to elude the real question. He little expected such a disposition would have been evinced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman was among the last to whom he could have ascribed a willingness—in his own emphatic language—to dodge any question, or withhold his candid judgment upon it. If gentlemen are really desirous of allaying the apprehensions of the South, the question made by the petitioners must be met. It will not do to give it the go-by. If, as he hoped, a majority should decide against the right of Congress to interfere in this matter, here or elsewhere, quiet might be restored. But if they were prepared to assert the right, it was high time the southern people should know it. Not that they might sever the Union. He would take occasion to say they were as much attached to the Union—he could speak for his own State—as those who dwelt north of Mason and Dixon's line; but they ought to know the ground on which they stood, that they might at once appeal to their brethren of the other States for such an amendment of the constitution as might effectually guaranty their property and their peace. He could not consent they should remain in doubt on this vital question—that the flame should be merely smothered for the present, to break out at some other time. It was for that reason he had uniformly voted against every attempt to evade a direct decision, and should give his cordial support to the motion of his colleague [Mr. PATTON] now under consideration.

The right of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia had, so far as he had heard, scarcely been noticed, until adverted to this morning by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] He did not understand them as affirming the right, nor could he learn precisely upon what ground others maintained it. What did the petitioners intend by praying for the abolition of slavery? They meant, he presumed, not that the citizens of the District might manumit their slaves, but that Congress should, with or without their consent, emancipate them. None would contend that this could be done without compensating the owners. Such a proceeding would be simply to confiscate their property. Nor could it be taken from them against their consent, although its full value should be paid. The United States had no power under the constitution to take private property, unless for public use. In proposing to wrest this kind of property from the owner, it was not intended to appropriate it to the use of the United States. They had no occasion for it. The object was, on the contrary, as property, to destroy its use—to annihilate it.

Should the owner even be willing to surrender it for a just compensation, he knew of no rightful authority to apply the public funds to the purchase or emancipation of slaves. He doubted whether the United States could lawfully become a slaveholder. It did not vary the case to say the purchase would be made with the benevolent purpose of emancipating them. If they could purchase, they might hold; if they could buy, they might sell; if they could emancipate, they might prescribe the conditions of emancipation. And what conditions, he desired to know, was it expected to impose? He knew of no clause in the constitution by which the restraints to be laid upon emancipated slaves were defined; nor which gave to it power to create another distinct and anomalous class, in addition to that already existing in this District, of persons nominally free, but politically slaves. Or was it designed to make them absolutely and really free? To confer on them all the privileges of citizenship? Were they to be admitted to the council board? To take their seats in the jury box? To be elevated to the bench? To be eligible to all the offices of Government? Were they to be introduced into our social circles? The southern people, while they retained their present feelings, would never tolerate such a state of society. Those feelings were deeply interwoven in their nature, and would continue to have their influence, possibly, till the Ethiopian should change his skin, or the leopard his spots.

The eighth section of the first article of the constitution was regarded by some as conferring on Congress supreme authority over the District. It was true it gave to it exclusive legislation over the ten miles square, but exclusive was not synonymous with unlimited. It must still legislate within constitutional limits. It could no more transcend those limits within the District, than beyond it. It had no more power to confiscate the property of its inhabitants, than to subject them to ex post facto laws, or deprive them of the liberty of speech or the press.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] had adverted to a clause in the Virginia act of cession. That clause was intended to prevent the United States from acquiring an interest in the soil, or interfering with landed titles. Its literal import might seem, at the first blush, to warrant the construction alluded to, because it was confined in terms to land only. But that construction was not warranted by the true spirit of the instrument, or of the constitution, though the right of the citizens to their lands was expressly guaranteed. But it by no means followed that all other property was left at the mercy of Congress. The constitution protected all private property against seizure, unless required for public use. It is not to be believed that Virginia and Maryland would ever have consented to a transfer of their citizens, subjecting them to be disposed of their property, or be exiled from their homes, at the will of a Legislature in whose election they had no voice. Let us suppose the District had been ceded by States whose institutions did not admit of slavery—by New York and Pennsylvania. What would have been thought of a petition from the South to establish slavery within the limits of the grant? It would have been regarded, as it ought, as asking a violation of law, and a breach of good faith. Yet the same authority which was supposed to warrant the abolition of slavery by Congress, would seem to warrant its establishment; and the one attempt would be no less a breach of good faith than the other.

Mr. R. said he had not thought it relevant or proper to discuss the general question of slavery; still less had he considered himself at liberty to vindicate the right of the slaveholding States to mould their domestic institutions, in accordance with their views. He could recognise no authority in Congress to call any State to answer at its bar for the exercise of this undoubted right. He excepted to the jurisdiction of the tribunal. He felt bound to oppose the attempt at the threshold. In doing, this, however, he was very far from desiring to abridge the sacred right of petition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] need feel no alarm. That right would not be invaded, or an attempt made to destroy the liberty of speech or of the press. There was no danger of another sedition law. Yet some limits even to the freedom of speech and the press had at all times existed, and seemed essential to the protection of society. One who should counsel or command another to commit a murder, or who should print and circulate slanderous imputations upon character, would scarcely be permitted to plead the liberty of speech or the press in bar of a prosecution. Still less ought such a defence to avail those who would instigate the massacre of a whole community.

Gentlemen had complained of the warmth manifested in this debate by members from the South. Great allowances, he thought, ought to be made, if, situated as they were, they could not wholly repress their feelings, or view this subject as calmly as those who inhabit cooler regions, and are more distant from the scene of danger. But whatever heat might be exhibited on this occasion, party feeling at least should not be mingled with it. Considerations of infinitely greater magnitude than the petty interests of party influenced the people of the South. They were contending for the preservation of their property, for the security of their lives. He would confidently appeal to his colleague [Mr. MASON] who came from that section of the State in which the new sect had celebrated its orgies in the blood of women and children, to say whether the movement on this subject in Virginia was regarded as one of a party character? No, sir. From one extremity of the State to the other the people had met together, without respect to party distinctions, to consult on their common interest and safety, and had concurred in one universal expression of execration and abhorrence for the enemies of our peace. It was true, as had been often repeated, a firebrand had been cast among us. But it came not from the South: it came from the North; or rather from a small band of ruffians which the North harbors in its bosom. The South desired to extinguish it: to leave no spark alive that, at some future day, might be blown into a flame to consume the temple of our peace, our union, and our liberty.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, not perceiving that any good could result from prolonging the debate, felt a reluctance in saying any thing upon the subject; but, coming from a State, from its peculiar situation, more deeply interested in the question than any other, and knowing the intense excitement recently produced among his constituents, by the daring attempts of the fanatics of the North to stimulate their slaves to insurrection, he considered it his duty to offer a few remarks. He had the honor, in part, he said, to represent a brave and patriotic people, ardently attached to the union of the States; but they are also attached to their families and to their rights of property, and are prepared to defend them when assailed from any quarter. They would not look on silently, and permit their lives and properties to be endangered by the lawless proceedings of a wicked and contemptible set of fanatics, of a different section of the Union, who are unacquainted with them and with the condition of their slaves, who are in a happy situation compared with the peasantry and operatives in any other part of the world. He would not discuss the power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He concurred in the opinion expressed by the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that the members from the southern States should not, on any occasion, argue such a question. He would as soon discuss a proposition to divest the people of the southern States of their lands, or of a proposition to abolish the Government. But he would say to the abolitionists, and entertaining the opinions he did he could not say less, that the exercise of such a power by Congress would convulse the whole Union. The people of the South would not submit to such an act. They do not believe that Congress possesses the power to legislate upon the subject; and they know that such an act of legislation would be immediately followed by an attempt to emancipate all the slaves in the Union. Under these circumstances, it would be their duty to meet the question at once; and knowing the feelings of the people of the slaveholding States, as he did, he had no hesitation in saying that, if such an attempt should ever seriously be made here to effect the views of the abolitionists in this respect, it will be met by the united power of the whole South, and with a spirit becoming a high-minded people, acting in defence of every thing dear to them. He did not make these remarks from disrespect to any member of this honorable body; on the contrary, it afforded him great pleasure to bear testimony to the honorable and kind feelings manifested in relation to this question, by the members from the non-slaveholding States generally, towards their fellow-citizens of the South; all of them seem to reprobate the incendiary publications. And whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the extent of the right of petition, or as to the power of Congress to legislate upon the subject, he did not believe that five members of this House—indeed, he hoped that not one member—desired, under the existing state of things, to see the measure proposed by the petitioners adopted.

Is it not important, then, in every point of view, that a course should now be pursued that shall put this question to rest forever—that will allay the excited feelings which prevail, and restore harmony to the Union? How is this to be effected? Not by referring the petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as proposed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] nor by laying them on the table, as proposed by other gentlemen.

Similar petitions had been referred to that committee at a former session, and an able report made adverse to the prayer of the petitioners, which was unanimously adopted by this House; yet, at the ensuing session, a number of petitions of the same character were presented, and laid upon the table, by a vote approaching to unanimity. Did these proceedings silence the abolitionists? No. They seem to have stimulated their zeal; for we now hear of loads of such petitions. The first one presented at this session was disposed of as those presented at the last session, having been laid upon the table without debate. Thus it appears that, notwithstanding both the courses now proposed to be pursued have heretofore been adopted, conveying the strongest evidence of the opinions and feelings of this House, the abolitionists are not satisfied. They appear to be determined to persevere, session after session, until they effect their object. Are we not called upon, then, by every consideration that can operate upon men who are attached to the Union, and wish to allay the angry feelings which prevail, and to restore harmony among the people, to put an end to this agitating question, by either rejecting at once this and all such petitions, or by adopting a resolution declaring that Congress does not possess the power of legislating upon the subject. If the abolitionists, in defiance of public opinion, and of the decisive votes of this House, shall continue to send their incendiary petitions here, and to keep alive the apprehensions of the people of the South, let them be rejected with indignation. He had no constitutional scruples in voting to reject their petitions. When presented, they are in possession of the House, to be disposed of as it may deem proper. But they may be with propriety rejected, without impairing the right of petition, on another ground. They contain matter disrespectful to the members of this body, from the non-slaveholding States, insulting to the people of the South, and are calculated to produce the most disastrous consequences to the country. He hoped that the motion to reconsider the vote referring the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia would prevail, and that it would be rejected, and that a resolution similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Georgia would be adopted.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia, rose, he said, to express his hearty concurrence not only in the views of his colleague, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] but in his expression of thanks to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] for his kind motives and sentiments and sympathies towards the South. But, sir, (said Mr. W.), at the same time that I ascribe all proper motives to the gentleman, and give him the right hand of fellowship for his noble and kind feeling towards us, he must permit me to inform the House of the fact that I have already astonished the honorable gentleman by informing him, that if I were to vote for the resolutions which he has offered, declaring that Congress has no power of legislation over the subject of slavery in the States, I should be scouted—scouted, sir—from the district and by the people whom I represent.

To declare that Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the States! Has it come to this? Is the question already pushed beyond the Rubicon? Has it passed through the District of Columbia, crossed the Potomac, and reached the shores of Virginia? If it has, that is what I wish to know—what the South should know. But, no, sir, that is not the meaning of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, though that would be the interpretation of my constituents. He means tranquility, peace, confidence, and union. We mean precisely the same thing; and his resolutions only show how little the good and the patriotic of both the North and the South understand each other upon this delicate subject. His resolutions would be the farthest from giving us tranquility, peace, and confidence, as a guard and guarantee of our rights and safety. Sir, the gentleman has every qualification, like his own great physicians of Philadelphia, of a good physician, but the opportunities of observation and information have not enabled him or them to judge of southern complaints. He must first see and talk with us, and feel our pulse, before he can prescribe.

The gentleman says by adopting his resolutions we shall avoid all doubtful questions, and simply declare truths and principles which are admitted by all, and never were doubted by any. And that, sir, is exactly what the South can never consent to. We can never consent to declare merely those of our rights which no one can, and which no one shall ever doubt, and to abandon those which are continually attacked, and which thousands are continually endeavoring, even under the right of petition, the freedom of debate, the freedom of the press, the freedom of religion, and the power of the constitution, to destroy. To adopt the resolutions of the gentleman, would be to imply that a doubt existed as to our powers of legislation over slavery in the States, where none ever did exist—as to which the case was, and ever has been, a clear one; and would conclude us forever upon this debatable and doubtful ground of the ten miles square. We wish to exclude all such conclusions, and to settle only the questions upon which some doubt is pretended. Here, in this District, is the doubt, the only doubt, on this subject, which we can ever admit, even by implication; and it is this doubt, here, which the South wishes to be settled. It is not the way, sir, to tranquillize the public mind, to leave doubtful questions unsettled, much less to start doubts where they were never dreamed of. We must grapple with this question, though it grapples with the vitals of the constitution.

The North is mistaken: we are not understood. Sir, we are not afraid of this question, or of its discussion, because we wish to explain our feelings and opinions, and desire them to be more fully known, and to be better understood. Some are for laying these petitions on the table, and others are for putting them to sleep, by referring them to a committee. Would either course settle the question? I know it will not. I know my own people, and I know it is their fixed determination to allow of no doubt in regard to this matter. Their wish is not that this subject shall be discussed for effect, to answer or subvert any sinister purpose, or to arouse any unnecessary excitement; but alone with a view to a settlement of this strife forever, by obtaining from Congress a declaration, not of war, but of peace and safety. We bring not the subject before you; but, on the contrary, we wish to protest, and call on you to protest with us, against these petitions which come here, against our peace, property, and lives, bringing with them civil discord and danger of disunion. We invite not the subject, but wish Congress to say with us to the North, "Hold off!" Yes, sir, that is our feeling. In the midst of servile insurrection, we would say to the North, "Hold off!" Above the cries of midnight murders, we would cry to the North, "Hold off!" When the torch of the incendiary shall "make the darkness of midnight glitter with the blaze of our dwellings," to light assassins to their victims, we will, with an infant in one hand and the weapon of defence in the other, still cry to the North, "Hold off!" And, sir, if Congress will but take up the subject and adopt a resolution which I shall in due time offer, disclaiming all power to grant the prayers of these petitioners, you will, before it is too late, say to the North, "Hold off!"

There is one other way to settle this question, and to give permanent security for the peace and safety, not of the South alone, but of the whole country. To say to such petitioners it is inexpedient, it is dangerous, to grant your prayers, is to say a vain thing, as long as they live under the conviction that you have the power to do what they ask. Tell me not, sir, that such advice and such wisdom will allay the fire of fanaticism. It is worse than vain to reason with infatuation. They will cease to inflame the country only when they are convinced that their own efforts are vain. Say to them, "You are not only asking us to disturb the peace of the country, but to violate its constitution; and they will then see it is vain to petition. Sir, it is not because these petitions are insulting to us that I object to their presentation—I, for one, could not be insulted by the ravings of madmen: it is not because they endanger our property and lives—we are fully able to protect ourselves; but it is because they ask us to violate the constitution—to break the covenant of our Union, and to destroy that Union itself, that I would not entertain them for a moment as subjects of legislation.

So far has this matter gone that nothing will now satisfy the South but the settlement of this vexed question—"Has Congress the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia?" If these petitions prayed for the passage of a law undeniably unconstitutional—if they prayed for the establishment of a religion, the union of church and state, an ex post facto law, or a bill of attainder—they would be harmless; for there could be no prospect of action upon them to shake the very foundation of the Government. They might be received in safety, and might be laid on the table without fear of their being ever called up. But, sir, they pray for that which they say, and some on this floor say, they may rightfully claim to have granted to them. They pray for the abolition of slavery in this District; they pray for what it is said they have the right to petition; they pray for the blood of the covenant! Upon their skirts, not upon ours, say we, be the blood of that covenant, if it must be shed—a sacrifice to raving fanaticism and folly! When must the controversy end? What security is there that the fearful controversy is not yet to commence? Can we be quiet whilst the question is mooted—"Has Congress the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia?" That is the question. We say no. Who here says ay?

I will show, sir, by the constitution, that there is no such power in Congress. Congress is created the Legislature of the Union, with certain specific powers of national legislation granted; and the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States or to the people. Over the people of the States of this Union the powers given to Congress are enumerated and limited. Among the granted powers is the power—

"To exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district, &c., as may by cession of particular States, &c., become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts," &c.

Thus Congress is constituted a Legislature in two characters and in a twofold relation.

It is a national Legislature for the Union, with specific and enumerated powers. And,

It is a local Legislature, with "exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over" the District of Columbia.

In order to decide this great and serious question correctly, all that we have to do is to bear in mind the fact of this double relation of Congress, and the proper distinction between Congress as a national and Congress as a local Legislature.

Do these petitions come to us in the one character or in the other? They cannot come to us as the Legislature of the Union, for it will not be contended that there is any such power enumerated or implied even in the constitution, as that which they ask of us to exercise as the national Legislature. They are sent to us as the local Legislature for the District; and what do the words "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" mean?

These words certainly give to Congress alone, exclusively, the power to legislate for the District of Columbia. No State can legislate for it, and the District, not being represented, cannot legislate for itself. The question is, what power of legislation is given? To what extent may Congress in its local character legislate?

H. OF R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

It is readily admitted that Congress, as a local Legislature, has to some extent a power of legislation over the people of the District, which it has not as a national Legislature over the people of the States. This clause of the constitution undoubtedly does not mean that the enumerated powers of Congress, to legislate over the States only, shall be exercised exclusively over the District; for many of these powers, belonging to the national Legislature, are wholly inapplicable, and all wholly inadequate to the various objects of municipal regulations for which Congress alone can and must provide by law in the District. But whilst the constitution does give "exclusive" legislation over the District, it does not define the powers of that legislation. It is true, it uses the sweeping, and, to many minds, the absolute terms, "in all cases whatsoever," but still the question remains, is this legislation absolute and unlimited—is it supreme and uncontrolled? Does the constitution make this local Legislature a "supreme power" to "prescribe" any "rule of civil conduct" in the District of Columbia, as Parliament may in the Kingdom of Great Britain?

Surely there is enough good sense and sound logic in this House to ward off the conclusion that, because the power of this local Legislature is undefined, it is, therefore, unchecked and unrestrained. Do any contend for such a proposition? If so, let us follow out its results to the most monstrous absurdities.

There are certain clauses of the constitution of the United States which restrain Congress, as the national Legislature, from passing certain laws: As that which forbids the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, the passage of a bill of attainder or ex post facto law; a law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people to assemble and petition; or the right of the people to keep and bear arms; or the right to be secure in persons, houses, papers, and effects: As in that which says: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." Will it be contended that the local Legislature of the District of Columbia has unlimited power to pass laws impairing any of these rights?

Again: to go further. Congress is prohibited from passing certain laws, partial in their operation as between the States, ex nomine: As in that clause which provides that "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties, in another." Can the local Legislature for the District of Columbia pass a law taxing articles exported from Alexandria? Can it give a preference to the ports of the District over those of the States of the Union, because this preference is prohibited as between one State only and another? Can it oblige vessels to or from the States to enter, clear, or pay duties, in the District?

Again, sir, the constitution requires certain duties and obligations from one State to another to be discharged and observed. "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Can the local Legislature of this District deprive any citizen of a State of any of his privileges and immunities, because the District, ex nomine, is not named in this clause? And "no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." Here is a most important provision, one of the sacred compromises of the Union—the guarantee of slave property. Will it be contended that this provision of the constitution, so sacred to the South, can be nullified by the local Legislature of this District? That it could pass a law in the District—not being a State—which would free every fugitive slave "the moment he set his foot on the soil"? Sir, the bare possibility of this construction is enough to account for all the sensitiveness of the South on this question of abolition here. Admit this construction of unlimited legislation over the District, and it is plain and obvious that every fugitive slave, at least from the States, as well as all slaves in the District, will be free too soon for the safety of this Government. The faith, the compromise, the guarantee, the constitution, which our fathers pledged and made with each other, will be gone forever. And who can say that fanatics and incendiaries have not had this cunning to mark this device for universal emancipation—that they would not have the heart to mutilate the plain letter of the constitution by this verbal criticism? Can there be a doubt but that we would be rent asunder by the "entering wedge" of abolition in the District? Can there be a doubt that this power would be claimed? This claim of abolition in the District is not an indirect but a direct claim of the power of abolition in the States. He who says that it would be merely "inexpedient" to abolish slavery in the District, says that it would be merely "inexpedient" to abolish slavery in the States.

Again: The constitution prohibits the States from doing many acts, without mentioning the District of Columbia. "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money," &c.—(Sec. 10, art 1.) Will it be said that the local Legislature of this District can do any of these acts? Certainly the District of Columbia can do what none of the States of this Union can do, if this construction of the phrase "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," as contended for necessarily by those who attempt to abolish slavery here, be the correct construction of the constitution. In short, if this construction of these words be correct, there is no restraint upon the general powers of Congress in favor of civil rights and privileges in this District; there is no prohibition of the passage of partial laws, by the local Legislature of this District, injuriously affecting, in fact destroying, all the rights and equality of the States. None of the reciprocal and mutual duties and obligations of the people of the States belong to the people of the District of Columbia; and the local Legislature of the District of Columbia, distinct from the Legislature of the Union and the State Legislatures, may do what neither the Legislature of the Union nor the State Legislatures may do, and what the constitution never intended should be done by any power in the country. The District of Columbia might be either the most favored and free, or the most enslaved and oppressed, of any portion of the United States; and there would be an uncontrolled, irresponsible, and untaxed despotism at once established, without the slow pace of progressive steps, to glut upon all that is free and all that is fair in this happy land! Such a construction cannot prevail unless there be a settled determination not to keep the good faith of the federal compact.

If, then, such a construction is absurd, and this clause of the constitution does not confer absolute power of legislation, by what is the local legislation of Congress restrained, and how far? I think, sir, from what has been said, we may lay down some general rules, at least, which restrain legislation over the District. I would say, sir, 1st, that nothing which Congress is expressly prohibited by the constitution from doing as a national

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Legislature, can it do as a local Legislature for the District of Columbia.

2d. That all the duties and obligations which the States are bound by the constitution to discharge and observe from one to the other, the District of Columbia or its Legislature is bound to discharge and observe towards the States, respectively.

3d. That the local Legislature of the District of Columbia can do no act or pass no law which the States are prohibited from doing or passing by the constitution.

Sir, in addition to these rules, deduced, and necessarily deduced, from the constitution, it has already been decided by that judge, who is now in heaven reaping the rewards of his righteous judgments—by Marshall—that there are great leading principles in the nature of society and of government which prescribe limits to our legislation. In Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, he says: "It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power; and, if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation? To the Legislature all legislative power is granted; but the question, whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public be in the nature of the legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection." "How far the power of giving the law may involve every other power, in cases where the constitution is silent, never has been, and perhaps never can be, definitely stated." Even so, sir, where the constitution is silent, but here, fortunately, the constitution speaks too plainly to be misunderstood. It expressly declares that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation."

Sir, several of the States of this Union have gradually emancipated the slaves within their borders, in their own way, and in their own time. But no State, to the honor of the nation and its institutions, has ever yet violated the great principle of vested rights. None of them have ever, within my knowledge, taken slave property, against the consent of the owners, and without compensation. They have never gone farther than, with the unanimous consent of masters, to adopt what is called the "post nati" principle, and to declare that rights which did not exist at the time should never exist—to make those free which would in future have been slaves. It may be well said, in reference to State legislation, that "private property can only be taken for public use." What "use" is a slave taken for, who is taken for emancipation?

Why, sir, that which can only be taken for "use," would be taken to be disqualified for "use." True, you may say there is a "use" of policy, of philanthropy, of fancy, or fanaticism, for which a slave may be taken; but that is not the true sense of the constitution. The only foundation of the Government's right to take a slave, is, that he is private property—the Government cannot change the relation of master and slave, even for public use. The Government may impress a horse or a slave for the public use of defending a city, or for any other emergency. If the horse or slave be destroyed, the Government must make just compensation for the entire value; and if not destroyed, they are returned to the master. The power to change all the relations of property and ownership, and to destroy vested rights, cannot be admitted to be in the State Legislatures even; they could not make compensation without taxing their people to pay themselves, which is no compensation at all. The "nature of society and of government" in the District of Columbia restrains the local Legislature here, much more than "the nature of society and of government" in the States restrains their Legislatures. Remember, sir, that the local Legislature here is distinct from the national; and, if so, where are the coffers of the Legislature of the District of Columbia, from which to make just compensation? Can this local Legislature plunder the Treasury of the national Legislature; take the money of your constituents and of mine, to pay for emancipated slaves here? The entire revenue of which Congress has control belongs to the Treasury of the United States, and not to the Treasury of the District of Columbia. The purposes for which that national treasure shall be appropriated are specified; the powers all enumerated which can touch it. Is there such a purpose or such a power as to purchase slaves? If they may be bought for freedom, may they not be bought for bondage? Will these petitioners themselves contend that the Government can become a slaveholder and taskmaster? And, if the local Legislature shall not use the funds of the national Legislature for such purpose as this, what other means has it to abolish slavery by making just compensation? Will you rob Peter to pay Paul, tax the right hand to pay the left, tax the slaveholders themselves to pay themselves?

Again, and above all, will you dare to tax a people to pay themselves, who are without representation of their own choice? Taxation without representation, to take private property for no public use, against the consent of the owners, would be the very essence of tyranny and oppression. The constitution must forbid so violent a wrong, and no right of petition or any other right can claim to effect it.

And, sir, as to this right of petition, what common interest in slavery here have the people of Maine or Massachusetts with the people of this District? These petitioners must pray to us as the local Legislature of the District. This local Legislature is to this District what the State Legislature of Virginia is to that State. Have the people of the non-slaveholding States a right to petition the Legislature of Virginia to abolish slavery within her limits? No more have any other people than the District people themselves a right to petition the local Legislature here to abolish slavery in their limits, if it be a subject of petition and legislation at all. These fanatics are as alien to this tender interest as the foreigner Thompson, whom they have nursed like a viper in their bosoms.

But, sir, local legislation in this District is still more restrained by the affinity of this local to the national Legislature. Though we constitute two distinct Legislatures, yet we are the same body of men. At the same time we are the Legislature of this District, we are the Legislature of this Union. The same Congress which enacts municipal laws for the people of the District of Columbia, is the high constitutional lawgiver of the people of the United States. The same body of legislators which is bound to protect and provide for the local welfare of this people immediately around us, is, by a paramount duty and interest, bound to protect and provide for the general welfare of this whole nation. This is incorporated deeply in the bosom of the constitution, and is no principle of mere expediency. What would be the consequence of exercising or attempting to exercise this legislative power claimed? Congress never can act upon the subject of abolition in the District, with the consent of a majority of the people of this nation. The South will always be unanimous, and I flatter myself, sir, that we shall always have a large minority at least of patriotism and intelligence with us in the North. No human tongue can tell the consequences—fanaticism would triumph, indeed, and this nation would bid a long farewell to all its glory, freedom, and happiness! This Congress, which is solemnly bound by the constitution to protect the States of this Union from domestic violence, would, by abolishing slavery in this District, send a flaming torch of discord throughout the land; excite insurrection and rebellion; force resistance to violations of civil rights, and eventually dissolve the Union. By madly attempting to knock imaginary manacles from off the hands of some few nominal slaves, it would merge a prosperous nation of happy freemen into the horrors of a bloody revolution, and finally handcuff both bond and free with the chains of inevitable despotism!

But, sir, let us advert to the reading of the constitution again. If Congress has entire and absolute legislation over this District, it has the power to exercise "like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the State Legislatures, for the erection of forts," &c. Now, sir, I put this case: Old Point Comfort is a place purchased for the erection of a fort in the State of Virginia. There are a number of slaves hired out there from the adjoining counties. Some persons, I believe, have removed there from the neighborhood, hold their slaves there, and hire them out to Government. Can Congress abolish slavery there? Sir, if we can abolish slavery here, we can there. Is there any such ultimate design? Would it be tolerated? What, sir, can you station outposts of abolition in the very heart of the slave States? Monstrous and absurd!

Again, sir, if ambition and madness, joined with false philanthropy and fanaticism, do not arrest our onward march to unparalleled greatness, this nation of freemen, this empire of civil liberty, this asylum of the oppressed, will extend its vast boundaries from sea to sea—its dominion will extend to the uttermost bounds of this continent. When we shall thus have increased, we must at some not far distant day remove our seat of Government. Abolish slavery in this District, and what an anomaly will be exhibited when it reverts back to the slave States which have ceded it! Could you return the trust as it was committed to your charge? Could you now place these portions of Virginia and Maryland in statu quo? Would your freedmen again become slaves? Would these States permit them to remain freedmen? Sir, if you did not violate the letter of the acts of cession, you would commit a breach of the faith implied by the cession of those States. Why was their cession required, why is their consent to the purchase of places required by the constitution—if it was not to give the States the power of imposing condition and restraint upon your legislation over their ceded territory? And I confidently ask "if the nature of society and of Government" in Maryland and Virginia is not, of itself, independent of conditions expressed in the acts of cession, sufficient to restrain your power of legislation over this subject?

Such, sir, are the considerations and causes which imperiously restrain your power of legislation on the abolition of slavery in this District, and which authoritatively forbid the North to meddle with a subject which concerns not its people. Shall we be asked, then, is there no power any where to legislate upon this subject in these limits, even though the people of the District themselves should demand its exercise? No, sir, no. The people of the District themselves cannot ask you to violate the constitution, much less can they give you the power to do so. They can no more give you, by their petitions and prayers, the power to abolish their slavery, than they can by any act of their own give you the power to allow them a representative on this floor. I would sooner vote to violate the constitution by giving them representation in Congress, than I would vote to violate the constitution by taking from them their private property without representation. What need have they of legislation to abolish their slavery? May they not emancipate without further legislation to aid them? Yes, sir; by the laws of Virginia and Maryland, which are still unreppealed as to them, each man who holds slaves, and wishes to petition for legislation, may already, without our assistance, legislate by will or deed of emancipation for himself! And dare you, or any power, to tear from him his property against his assent? Idle, and hypocritical, and false, then, is the pretence of any necessity for the exercise of this power so dangerous and dreadful!

We desire Congress to expressly disclaim any such power, in order that the people of the North may understand it will be vain for them to offer such petitions, because it is unconstitutional for us to grant them. It must be settled that there are restraining principles in the constitution; restrictions to the power of local legislation; restrictions to all the rights of government and citizenship.

Sir, my object in explaining these views has been purely to convince the honest and patriotic portion of the North (and I know that there are many such) of their error and misapprehension on this subject of power, and to obtain their aid and efforts in giving peace and security to their brethren of the South. Sorry, indeed, was I to listen to the inflammatory and intemperate remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER.] The figures which they presented to me were those of the keepers of bloodhounds, holding them by the leashes. They patted their bloodhounds on the head, and caressed them for "no murderers."

Sir, those whom these pets of the gentlemen pursue and harass, can best judge of their taste for blood. Can these gentlemen, can any, be so inhuman as to feel the disposition to hiss on these bloodhounds? Do any delight in encouraging the spirit of fanaticism, by soothing and complimenting these kind, amiable, peaceable, good Quakers, priests, foreigners, and ladies, who heat this agitation? The honorable gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] asks if we wish to discuss the "sublime merits of slavery?" I think, sir, it is a subject as sublime at least as his conceptions of the character of the fair Desdemona, who carried "amalgamation" practically too far in his opinion and mine, too; but it is not a discussion of slavery that we ask. We never will discuss that subject with gentlemen but in one way, which I will not mention. The only question which we will discuss, and that to enlighten the public mind on a question which has never been discussed enough to be understood, is, "whether Congress has the power to abolish slavery in this District?" And I hope, sir, that in the discussion of that question, "every speech north of Mason and Dixon's line" will not be, as he has predicted, "an incendiary pamphlet." I cannot believe it. Nor do I think it possible that the people of the North, when they are sufficiently enlightened by temperate and sober discussion of that question, would turn out their representatives for supporting the rights of our people and the sanctity of the constitution.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] said that his good petitioners were not abolitionists. I think, sir, they are next akin to them. Many of them are women. By the by, sir, have women, too, the right of petition? Are they citizens? No one, Mr. Speaker, pays more cordial homage to the fair sex than I do. Woman in the parlor, woman in her proper sphere, is the ornament and comfort of man; but out of the parlor, out of her sphere, if there is a devil on earth, when she is a devil, woman is a devil incarnate! If I were to paint the image of a demon, a fiend riding on the blast of strife and ruin, hissing rage, and rapine, and rape, and murder, on our lives and property, and matrons and maids, of the South, it should be the form of a woman with the hair of the furies! One good sanctified priest can persuade all the women in the parish to be abolitionists. And what sort of a Government are we to have if women and priests are to influence our legislation? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] told us that this is a religious question. I protest against religion having any thing to do with the political and constitutional questions of this Government. Neither women nor priests are politicians, except in the intrigues of court. This is a delicate political question, and those only should deal with it who have some common sense as well as experience as statesmen, and who are honest patriots.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] has given the message of the Governor of his State as an assurance of fraternal feeling to the South. Sir, that message was, no doubt, like many other assurances from the North, well meant; but the South can view no such assurances as satisfactory. The Governor, if I read his message right, recommended no legislative action whatever to his State Legislature, but recommended them to leave the whole subject to public sentiment alone. We require, particularly in my section of Virginia, most efficient aid from the State Legislatures of Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey. Not a year passes in which numbers of our slaves do not escape to some one or all of these States. The constitution guarantees to us our right of property in fugitive slaves; but that guarantee is rendered null and void for the want of State protection from mobs and "public sentiment," which obstruct the exercise of that right. What kind of protection do we meet when we go in pursuit of our slaves? Every obstacle is interposed between the master and the recovery of his property. It was but a few months since that a citizen of my own county went to New York to recover his fugitive slave; the slave knew his master, and the master knew his slave; but black witnesses were arrayed against respectable white witnesses, and were made to swear that the slave had been a resident of New York for a time longer than that within which he had eloped. And this, sir, is not an uncommon case. All that we ask is, that the faith of the covenant shall be kept; and how can this provision of the constitution be available to our rights, if black witnesses shall be allowed to swear against white men in a case involving the question of a right of property to a fugitive slave in a non-slaveholding State?

The South asks no other aid or protection of the North than a faithful observance of the federal compact. They feel no other apprehension than from northern violators of the constitution.

The gentleman [Mr. INGERSOLL] alluded to the case of St. Domingo. I beg him to remember that the French of that island were not overrun and massacred by the blacks, notwithstanding the immense disparity in numbers between the white and black population, until an English army assisted the slaves. Sir, that is all that we have to fear—an English army from the North! Already has a miscreant foreigner from Great Britain been recruiting his army of fanatics in the North. We scorn the crusade, but hold the constituted authorities of the North bound for the consequences of "blood and burial" which are to flow.

If an English army, sir, were actually to invade our shores, every sword would leap from its scabbard to repel the foe—it would be treason to aid and comfort the enemy in our borders. And, though all the fleets and armies of combined Europe could not so effectually attack and destroy this nation and its institutions as George Thompson and his northern recruits, yet this worst of enemies is not only tolerated in our borders, unwhipped of justice, unpunished by penal laws of protection, but he is left to that omnipotent guardian, "public sentiment"—"public sentiment" in the North—which not only countenances, but aids and comforts and encourages him and his followers—ay, pampered and petted him with all the soothing and succor of the hospitality and kindness and assistance of some of the most powerful, influential, and wealthy citizens! Strange and sad infatuation, at war with every obligation of duty and patriotism! I do trust there is still left patriotism enough, and sober sense enough, to avert the calamities which are threatened from this portentous quarter, and that this House will take measures to quiet the public mind on this subject. If we pass a declaratory resolution, we shall then hear of no more motions to reject these petitions or to lay them on the table. Our only wish is to be plainly understood. Sir, it is not for our lives or our property that we are so anxious. No, sir. As our fathers pledged their lives, their property, and their sacred honor, to each other for the establishment of free institutions, so are we ready now and always to pledge our lives, our property, and our sacred honor, to our brethren of the North to preserve forever the blood-bought common inheritance which our fathers, who were brothers in truth, in compromise, in the spirit of conciliation, have left us. We beg of our brethren to be governed by their spirit. We invoke their spirit! Were they here in our seats, would they be continually risking all so dear to us, for a good so questionable if attainable? Would they not give up this contested power of legislation, if they possessed it, sooner than risk the whole of this fair structure—this their handiwork—this free Government—for an imaginary and vain scheme of folly and madness? We will stand by the constitution, and fear only for it! We will keep the faith of the covenant on our part, and repeat: "upon your skirts, not upon ours, be its blood!"

I hope, sir, I have had a higher and nobler object in view, in thus addressing the House, than any party object. If those who have disclaimed the imputation of bad motives to me and my friends, meant thereby to do what they disclaimed, I have only to say, sir, I hold the imputations and their authors in contempt. My motive is not agitation, but tranquillity—to teach forbearance to the agitators of the North—to say "hold off," to all who will rudely touch this tender point—and to give permanent peace and safety to the South. I now beg the House to speak peace and safety to the country through a resolution which I shall take the opportunity to move, declaring that "Congress has no power, under the constitution, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia." Give us this, and it is all we ask.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, said he did not rise to discuss the merits of the proposition, which would be necessarily presented by the petition now offered to the House; that was what he not only did not desire to do, but it was what he dare not do. He designed briefly to assign the reasons which would induce him to reconsider the vote by which, in a moment of inadvertence, that petition had been sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia; and also to reply to the objections urged by gentlemen to the course now proposed to be adopted in reference to that, and, he hoped, all other petitions of the same character. He expressed himself grateful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] for the remarks he had made this morning. But while he rendered this tribute to the good feelings and sympathies of the gentleman, he hoped his own motives would be duly appreciated by him, when he said he could never consent to entertain or discuss here the right by which the people of the South held title to their slaves. The great object he desired was to obtain a direct vote upon these petitions, which continued daily to come in; and that the solicitude he felt on the subject arose from a conviction upon his own mind, that nothing but a direct vote would satisfy the members from the South, or quiet the apprehensions of their constituents; and deeply as he lamented the necessity which rendered it proper, in the opinion of honorable gentlemen, to go into this debate—unwilling as he had always been, so far to countenance the views of those misguided, deluded, and infatuated men, who for years past had been scattering firebrands among the people of the South, and who, to accomplish their base purposes, were willing not only to aim a deadly blow at their prosperity as a people, but to peril the lives of millions, and to endanger the perpetuity of the Union—he felt as though he should be unfaithful to the high trust confided to him, if he did not contribute his aid in obtaining a direct vote upon this all-absorbing question.

But a few days ago there seemed to exist a unanimity of sentiment upon this deeply interesting subject, which had very seldom manifested itself upon any important question which had come up for consideration before the Representatives of the people. There was then heard from all sides of the House a wish expressed, not only to put down the abolitionists, but to do it in the most effectual possible manner; and the great point of difficulty was to determine upon the mode by which it could be most effectually done.

With one of the modes, Mr. J. said he should be satisfied. Promptly to reject these petitions as they were presented, he believed, would meet the approbation of southern gentlemen; and if they, who were more deeply interested than all others, regarded that mode of disposing of them as effectual to the accomplishment of the great object they had in view, and the people of the East and the North really intended, in good faith, to co-operate with them, (as he believed they did,) he could perceive no good reason why the proposition to reject should not be sustained.

It had been said that gentlemen from the South were over sensitive, and disposed to act with too much precipitation on this subject. It had also been contended that this course of proceeding was calculated to abridge the great right of petition; and others there were, who thought the only proper course was to refer them to a committee. The intimation that this was a subject upon which the people of the South were sensitive, was just. The fact could not be disguised, that there existed throughout the slaveholding States an excitement which had never been witnessed at any former period of their history; and strangely indeed must he be constituted, who could look upon the conduct of the abolitionists, and witness the scenes to which it had given rise in the South, and not have his sensibility wrought up to the very highest pitch. Was it not known to every gentleman upon this floor, that numerous abolition societies had been formed in the eastern and northern States, frowned upon, indignantly frowned upon, he believed, by the intelligent, the well-informed, and respectable portions of these communities? But could they shut their eyes to the fact, that these societies existed; that they had gone on to collect large sums of money, and had put into operation printing presses, which were worked by steam? Yes, sir, worked by steam, with the open and avowed object of effecting the immediate abolition of slavery in the southern States. That by means of these two great revolutionizers of the world—he meant steam power and the press—they had caused to be printed, and, by means of the public mails, circulated throughout the slaveholding States, large numbers of newspapers, pamphlets, tracts, and pictures, calculated, in an eminent degree, to rouse and inflame the passions of the slaves against their masters, to urge them on to deeds of death, and to involve them in all the horrors of a servile war—productions which, Mr. J. said he would take upon himself to say, were as foul libels upon the people of the South as were ever printed. And, as if to add insult to injury, there were those here who had the charity to believe that they were influenced in their conduct by humane and religious motives. If, indeed, (said Mr. J.) this most uncalled for, officious, and dangerous intermeddling with the rights of others, be dictated by religion, he would say it was not the religion which was inculcated by the Saviour of the world, or taught by his disciples.

Mr. J. said he hoped it would not be understood, by any thing he had said, that he was in favor of abridging either the freedom of the press or freedom of speech: far from it; he regarded them as the great safeguards to our republican institutions. There was, however, a difference between the freedom and licentiousness of the press, and what he objected to was the right of these misguided and deluded men to propagate slander, to instigate murder, to disturb the peace of States, and to endanger this Union; and, if persisted in by them, he called upon the representatives of the people to interpose, and stamp their conduct with the seal of their disapprobation.

But (said Mr. J.) we have been told by the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts, [Mr. BEARDSLEY and Mr. ADAMS,] that to vote to reject this petition would be to abridge the right of the people to petition Congress. He admitted that to be a right, the free exercise of which was secured to the people by the constitution, and he would be among the last, he hoped the very last, to lay violent hands upon that sacred instrument. He had sworn to support it, and, as a Representative of the people, support it he would, at every hazard, for upon it depended the last hope of freedom throughout the world; and if he could be satisfied that any constitutional right of the people was to be invaded by the course he proposed in disposing of that petition, he would be the first to abandon the position he then occupied; but (said Mr. J.) in what consists the right of petition, if it be not to set forth, in written form, the grievances complained of, with a view to procure upon them the action of Congress? And had not these petitioners already enjoyed that right? Did not the proceedings which had taken place upon this petition furnish the affirmative answer to the inquiry? Had they not petitioned, had not their petition been presented by a member in his place, received by the House, read by the Clerk; and was Congress not then engaged in endeavoring to dispose of it in conformity with rules which had been made and adopted for the government of the House? And if it should ever be disposed of, would not this petition have been so fully considered as it could have been, had any other form of proceeding been adopted? Mr. J. said, that when a petition had been presented to the House, received, and read by the Clerk, (unless it should be afterwards withdrawn by the consent of the House,) it became the property of the Representatives of the people: they might refuse to consider it, lay it on the table, postpone it to a day certain, refer it to the committee, or, what they had in vain attempted here, they might reject it. Here, then, were five several ways in which this petition might legally and properly be disposed of; and how it was that the disposition of it in one of these modes, in preference to another, (all of which were prescribed by the rules of the House,) was in any possible way to affect the right of the people to petition Congress, he was wholly at a loss to comprehend.

But they were told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that, if these petitions were sent to a committee, they would there be allowed "to sleep the sleep of death;" and that thereafter we should be troubled with no others of like character. Would to God that this assurance of the honorable gentleman could be realized; but they had only to look to the past history of their legislation upon that subject to be satisfied that the expected consummation to which he looked forward, had existence nowhere except in the fertile imagination of him who conceived it. It would then be seen that that course had been tried again and again; still these petitions continued to flow in upon them, and would continue to do so, so long as they were received and referred to committees. What, he inquired, was the object in referring subjects to a committee? It was to collect information, which, in the ordinary course of legislation, could not conveniently be collected in any other way. But did this House stand in need of information upon the subject sought to be brought to its notice by that petition? Certainly not. It was well understood that it was a subject to which public attention had been long turned, with the most intense interest; that from the river St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, the best talents of the country had been almost every where engaged in its consideration, and in communicating information to the people. So soon as the excitement over the country commenced, meeting after meeting was called in the southern States, in almost every town and county; discussion after discussion was had before the people; resolution after resolution adopted, until, like a wave from the ocean, it swept over the whole southern country. It resulted in strong appeals to our brethren of the North, to step forth and aid us in putting down these base attempts upon our rights, our property, and our lives. And it was with mingled emotions of pride and pleasure he referred to the fact that these appeals were not made in vain. They too called the people together; meetings were held throughout the whole eastern and northern countries; and the measures adopted by those meetings for a time gave quiet, and, to some extent, allayed the excitement in the South; and it was for gentlemen from the North to say whether we may still rely upon their assurances, by heartily co-operating with us in putting this subject to rest by a direct and decisive vote upon the question.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. J. said it must be obvious that there could be no need of further information on the subject, to enable gentlemen to vote understandingly upon it. Why, then, send it to a committee? Was it believed that the report of a committee was to produce any effect upon the abolitionists? Did gentlemen flatter themselves that the spirit of fanaticism could be checked by a calm, dispassionate, and logical argument? To such he would recommend to read the reports of committees which have been already made on like petitions; and he doubted not but that gentlemen would be satisfied that no benefit was likely to result from the adoption of the same course in reference to the petition before them. So far from that course of proceeding having had a tendency to check the wild spirit of fanaticism now abroad in the land, the reverse was true; for the tables of gentlemen were now groaning under the weight of similar petitions.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has referred to his own course, on a former occasion, in reference to this subject. This was commenced in a tone, and in a spirit, which seemed to Mr. J. to bespeak the deep anxiety which he felt to allay the very unpleasant excitement which had begun to show itself in the House, and to reconcile, if he could, the causes of discontent which continued to agitate and disturb the people of the South. He viewed the remarks of that gentleman as oil poured out upon the troubled waters. It was, however, but the calm which precedes the storm. At length, lashing himself up to a state of high excitement, he asked what it was the South desired? Was it, said he, to discuss the "sublime merits of slavery?" That was a subject which Mr. J. could not discuss with that gentleman; and, taunted them as he might with their slaves, whose condition they had no agency in producing, and no means of changing, he would take that occasion to say to him that the people of the South held their slaves by a title as secure, by an authority as high and as sacred, as that by which that gentleman held title to his horse, his house, or, to use his own language, "his place upon that floor." They held them under the constitution and laws of the land.

That gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] had also taken occasion to refer the members from the South to Mason and Dixon's line: warning them that every member to the north of that line, who should discuss this subject, would send forth to the world an incendiary pamphlet; and, although that gentleman seemed to speak as one "having authority," he had seen too many evidences not to be satisfied of the error into which he had fallen. He saw assembled here, from every quarter of this widely extended Union, patriots prepared to make every sacrifice upon the altar of their country's good. He lamented to hear what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts upon that subject; he believed that gentleman himself, in his calmer moments, would lament it. The people had cause to lament it. But if that be the course determined upon by gentlemen, the sooner we had it acted out the better. This he would take occasion to say to him: let those threatened pamphlets come when they might, they would be received by the people of the South as it became freemen who knew their rights, and, knowing, dared maintain them.

Mr. J. remarked, in conclusion, that he had felt himself called upon to say thus much in explanation of his own views, with an earnest desire that a direct vote on the subject might be obtained.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said the proposition before the House was simply to reconsider the reference of a paper to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It would seem very obvious, looking to what had been the express sense of the House, and what was known to be the public and general feeling of the people throughout the country; looking also to the particular circumstances under which this paper had been referred to that committee, that there could be no doubt that when the House should come to decide upon this proposition, it would be carried in the affirmative by an overwhelming vote. They all knew, so far as they knew any thing upon this subject, that the reference which the paper took was by misapprehension, or without the understanding of the House; they all knew it, unless the House might be charged with abandoning the ground it had assumed upon this subject—a charge which was derogatory to its high character, and which he would not make or intimate. It was but a week since that the House, by a decided vote of about 180 to 30, had determined it would not act upon petitions of this character, but would lay them upon the table, with a view that they should sleep the sleep of death. To Mr. B. it was inconceivable that, after that vote, the House would entertain a proposition to give these petitions a different direction. It was clear that the reference given to this petition was by mistake and surprise; and when the House should be able to vote upon it, then the error would be corrected. Bring the paper before the House for its immediate direction, and when thus brought properly before them, we shall see what the House will do with it? And here he would beg leave to suggest to the consideration of the House what was to him most clear. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] fell into a mistake in his recollection of what had been the course of the House heretofore. That gentleman referred to a debate, if the speech of a single member made in the course of the last session, on a petition of a similar character, might be so termed; and Mr. B. understood the gentleman to state, as most undoubtedly was his recollection, that the House, on that occasion, had referred the paper to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Mr. B. had turned to the journal of that day, and he found that on that occasion an honorable member from Virginia, not now a member of that House, [MR. CHINN,] moved that the paper should be laid upon the table. The yeas and nays were called for, and ordered, and there the paper was placed by a decided majority of the House. There were then none of the scruples which exist now; no pretence that the vote was evasive. That decision was then taken as the clear, distinct, unequivocal sense of the House, against the propriety of acting upon petitions of that character. The same course had likewise been pursued before the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia to which he had referred, when previous papers of a like character had been repeatedly presented to the House. They had passed on to the table of the Speaker by the silent vote of the House, without having, on any occasion, for the last three or four years, (save on the occasion to which he had referred, and that was a speech by a single member last session,) elicited a debate. And here let him again advert to what must be within the knowledge of every gentleman there, that these votes of the House, thus placing upon the table papers of this character, had at all times been regarded, in the House and out of it, universally, as an expression of the House against the propriety of acting on petitions of this character. Until within the last few days no one had ever thrown a doubt upon the subject. Now, for the first time, they had been told that to put a paper on the table, where it would sleep the sleep of death, was an evasion of the question? Nobody before ever heard of such an evasion! Every one regarded it, as in his estimation they had a right to regard it, as a most decided and unequivocal decision of the House not to entertain and act upon questions of that character. The character of this House could not be mistaken. There were not fifty gentlemen in that body, judging from the votes given, who desired to agitate this subject, or to act upon petitions of this character. The sense of the House had been unequivocally, fairly, and fully expressed by the vote first given, to put the first petition upon the table, and the character of the House had since undergone no change.

H. or R.]

Efforts, however, seemed to be making to change the real question to be decided by the House. It was now said that they must come up and give a vote of a different character; that they must either vote that they would not receive petitions of this character, or that, having received them, they would put them out of doors; or they must come to another question, and vote that the House had no constitutional authority to receive and act upon the petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. These, said Mr. B., were new inventions. Let him warn the gentlemen of the South, who stood firm on the vote of 180 to 30, against considering the first petition, not to change the real question, by permitting themselves to be drawn into the controverted position of the powers of that House; or into the controverted and debatable grounds whether they ought to reject petitions of this character; or, having received them, ought to turn them out of doors. If gentlemen from the South, who sincerely desired, as he knew they did, the harmony and peace of the whole Union, if they permitted this question to be changed, they might see from the votes of Friday last, and from the votes of Monday, that no man could decide, or undertake to predict, what in a few days would be the true character of that House. Upon the one subject, and upon the one ground, they stood firm, by a decided vote of 180 or 190 against 30 or 40 or 50; but, upon the other, they would open so wide a field of debate that ultimately, if he judged correctly of the sense of the House, his honest conviction was, they would find themselves in the minority.

Sir, said Mr. B., we go with the South (I speak for myself) against all agitation on this subject, and to put down the fanatics of the North. But, sir, (I give it as my own opinion,) I do not believe the freemen of the North or the freemen of the South ought to, or will, tolerate the idea that they should not be permitted to present their petitions to this body; or that, having presented them, in decent and respectful language, they shall be driven with scorn from our doors.

Mr. B. appealed particularly to the gentlemen from the South. There was no necessity to change their position; they stood firm on the ground already taken. Why should they change it? For what good purpose could they desire to change the character of the question, and involve the House in a difficulty about the right of petition, or in questions of a debatable and exciting character, when such a clear sentiment and feeling, both in and out of the House, and throughout the whole country, had been elicited? Why would gentlemen permit themselves to be drawn into other questions, when the one already assumed and acted upon was a decisive expression of the true feeling of the House? He would warn them that, if they permitted themselves to be put in that new position, they would involve themselves in difficulties they scarcely dream of, and which, in his humble judgment, they ought seriously to deprecate. It was remarked by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [MR. ADAMS,] that if this question were gone into, every speech made in that House by gentlemen north of Mason and Dixon's line, would furnish an incendiary pamphlet for the South. In one sense, Mr. B. could believe that remark a just one, and in one sense only. It was, because every speech made under such circumstances, by gentlemen residing north of Mason and Dixon's line, would be perverted, and misinterpreted, and misquoted, by factious and incendiary prints. It was not that every gentleman residing north of that line would desire to make a speech of that character; for he knew that many, a vast proportion of them, almost in the proportion in which the votes of the House had been given, he believed, would deprecate such a result. But they would be so misinterpreted and misquoted by the press that no one could undertake to say that every speech made in that House would not be truly a firebrand thrown into the South. In no other sense could he agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts on that subject.

Mr. B. said it had been a matter of sincere astonishment and regret on his part, that efforts should have been made, undoubtedly under a strong sense of duty, and under a strong belief that it would tend to tranquilize the South, to procure direct votes of the House upon two propositions, upon both of which the debate might be interminable. And would that expression of the House more operate to tranquilize the South, even if it were obtained, than the one already adopted?

It was said that a direct vote of the House that it would not receive such petitions, or that, having received them, it would drive them out of doors, or a direct vote of the House that Congress had no power to legislate on the subject of slavery within the District of Columbia, would go far to tranquilize the South. But what would that vote be? The opinion of gentlemen sent there for two years. And was it certain that that would be the opinion of the next House? Would it furnish any sort of assurance on that subject? It was asking too much. It was enough to ask of that House, and enough for the House to declare, that it would not act upon the subject. That was reasonable; that was unquestionably the sense of the House; and it ought to content gentlemen in every quarter.

The proposition submitted or suggested by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [MR. OWENS,] did not affirm either point to which he had referred. It did not affirm that Congress had not the power—it did not affirm that that House would not receive the petitions, but merely and directly and explicitly, that the House was averse, and would not act upon any such subject. That was reasonable, and was precisely equivalent to laying such petitions on the table. Mr. B. believed that those resolutions would meet the cordial and universal approbation of the gentlemen of the North, except those, if any there were, who would be disposed to encourage the getting up of these petitions. The resolutions did not touch the power of the House. It was unquestionable that there was a strong and fixed sentiment of that House and of the whole country on this question. Why, then, permit themselves to change the position they had taken, and involve themselves in the examination of controverted and debatable ground, and thereby lose the high character the House had certainly occupied upon this subject? He did hope sincerely that the motion to reconsider the reference of the petition would be at once adopted, and that they should either lay it on the table, or apply the resolutions of the gentleman from Georgia to it. Pass those resolutions, and they will furnish a clear, direct, and unequivocal expression of the sense of the House that it will in no event act upon the subject.

Mr. SLADE rose to address the House; but, stating that he was much exhausted by the long sitting, asked the House to indulge him with an adjournment, in order that he might express his views.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, by leave of the House, offered the following amended bill, for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in New York, stating that the committee, after consultation, had determined upon some alterations, which they thought would render it more acceptable to the House.

The following is the bill as amended:

A BILL for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause to be extended (with the assent of the sureties thereon, to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the late conflagration at that place) the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given for duties as aforesaid, to periods not exceeding an average of three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively payable in average periods of three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled as aforesaid. And the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up or cancel all such bonds upon the receipt of others described in this act; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 17th day of the present month.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to such banks as he may select, as safe depositories of the public treasure, any surplus moneys of the Government, or any part thereof, which may not be required for the public service, and to permit the same to remain in such banks for a period not exceeding twelve months from the passage of this act. Provided that this section shall not interfere with any further regulation of Congress concerning the collection, deposit, distribution, or disbursement of the public moneys.

On motion of Mr. SLADE, the House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23.

OHIO BOUNDARY.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS called the attention of the House to the subject of the President's message in relation to the northern boundary of Ohio. It would be recollected, he said, that the subject was referred, ten days ago, to a select committee, at his instance, and the Chair had done him the honor to appoint him chairman of that committee. Subsequently, a motion was made to reconsider the reference of the subject to a select committee. His object in rising was to give notice that, unless the question of reconsideration should be taken up and disposed of to-day, he should feel it his duty to call the committee together, for the purpose of proceeding to consider the subject referred to them.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. PATTON, to reconsider the vote referring to the Committee on the District of Columbia, a petition presented by Mr. BRIGGS, from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SLADE, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said he had been charged by a large and respectable portion of his constituents with the duty of presenting memorials of similar import to that under discussion; and for that reason, if for no other, he felt bound to ask the indulgence of the House to a few remarks.

He approached the subject, he said, with an oppressive sense of its magnitude, and knowing its exciting character, of the great danger of being betrayed, in the progress of its discussion, into a state of feeling, unsuited to the place and the occasion. It was a subject on which he, as well as his constituents, felt most deeply; and he could neither represent their feelings, nor express his own, without a plainness and directness which might give offence. He begged gentlemen to believe, however, that he should say nothing intended to give the slightest personal offence to any; though he should, without fear of any, vindicate the petitioners, and assert the claims of those in whose behalf they plead. He regretted to hear the memorialists spoken of in debate as intruders, and their respectful petitions upon a subject of great national importance treated as a vexatious intermeddling with concerns in which they have no interest. Gentlemen must have patience. These petitioners, as far as he was acquainted with them, were among the most intelligent and respectable of the community in which they reside; while the subject of their petitions was one of which it well became them to speak, and the Congress of the United States to hear.

The great purpose (said Mr. S.) of most of those who have hitherto spoken upon this subject seems to be to get rid of the petitions. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] wishes to have them all laid on the table, as fast as presented, and "nailed" there; and yet he is exceedingly regardful of the "sacred right of petitioning," which must on no account whatever be impaired. The gentlemen from South Carolina [Messrs. HAMMOND, PICKENS, and THOMPSON] are more consistent. They profess to regard the petitions as disrespectful, and the petitioners as officious meddlers with that which does not concern them. They, therefore, would have the petitions rejected. There is in this the merit at least of consistency, and the gentlemen have my thanks for evincing a disposition to meet the question fairly. Another gentleman, my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Anans,] would have the petitions committed to the Committee on the District of Columbia; in other words, to use his own significant, and, in this case, appropriate language, to have them consigned to the "family vault of all the Capulets;" and yet he, too, is jealous of the "sacred right" of petition! The sacred right of petition!—that is to say, the "sacred right" of being "nailed to the table," by the gentleman from New York, or the "sacred right" of being gathered by the gentleman from Massachusetts into the "family vault of all the Capulets."

Sir, the petitioners well understand the nature of both these rights. The last they have long enjoyed, and desire to enjoy it no longer. They want the action of Congress on the subject, which, judging from the past, they are sure not to have, if it is to depend upon the decisive action of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I intend no disrespect to that committee. To continue to do what has been done—that is, to do nothing—would follow of course a commitment to them, with an express understanding that the petitions were consigned to the tomb, without the hope of a resurrection.

I, sir, (said Mr. S.,) am in favor of the prayer of the petitioners. I believe that Congress has a right to legislate on the subject, and that the time has come when it ought to legislate. Something has been suggested with regard to political objects connected with the presenting of these petitions. Sir, I have no such object, nor do I believe that any such purpose exists in the minds of the petitioners. They are moved by a spirit of philanthropy, and deprecate the mingling of any considerations with this question which may tend to divert attention from its real merits.

Gentlemen, I regret to say, seem willing to overlook the real object of the petitioners, and to go off into denunciations of "abolitionists," to the end that the odium which has been attached to their measures for effecting the abolition of slavery in the States may be transferred to the exercise of an acknowledged right of asking Congress to abolish it in this District. But what do the petitioners ask at our hands? Why, sir, simply that measures may be taken to put an end to slavery here, and especially that here, where the flag of freedom floats over the Capitol of this great republic, and where the authority of that republic is supreme, the trade in human flesh may be abolished. These are the questions which gentlemen are called on to meet, but which they do not meet, either by calling the petitioners "ignorant fanatics," or denouncing them as "murderers and incendiaries." If, in the fervor of their philanthropy, any have adopted measures of more than doubtful expediency, for the purpose of acting on the public sentiment in the slave States, in favor of immediate emancipation, it surely furnishes no reason why we should obstinately shut our eyes to the evils which are within our control, and which call loudly for our interposition.

I have said, sir, that I am in favor of the prayer of the petitioners. Let me not be misunderstood. The abolition of slavery which I would advocate is a gradual abolition. I believe the immediate and unqualified abolition of slavery to be inconsistent with a just regard, both to the best interests of the community, and the highest welfare of the slave. The philanthropy which aims at such an abolition, whatever I may think of its purity, I cannot commend for its intelligence or discretion. But though I would have abolition advance by a gradual progress towards its final consummation, I would have the work begin immediately. Sir, I cannot stand here as a freeman, and the representative of freemen, without declaring, in the face of this House and of the world, that the right to hold men as goods and chattels, subject to sale and transfer, at the will of a master, should cease and be discontinued instantly and forever.

But while I say this, I would not render worse the condition of the slave, by conferring upon him rights which he is not fitted to enjoy, and which would become to him a curse rather than a blessing. I would not, at once, entirely emancipate him from the control of his master. But it should not be, as now, an arbitrary, unqualified control. For that control I would substitute the authority of law, which should be supreme. In saying this, sir, I do but carry out a principle which has long been dear to me as an anti-mason. I have maintained, and still maintain, and shall continue to maintain, as a cardinal principle in my political creed, that, in opposition to all individual, and all associated, self-constituted authority, the laws should be maintained in full and uncontrolled supremacy. There is no being, entitled to the appellation of man, who should not find shelter under the ægis of their broad and ample protection. In applying this principle to the case of the slave, however, I would not confer upon him the same rights which are possessed by his master; and for the obvious reason that he is not fitted to enjoy them. But I would place him under the supervision of laws made for his special benefit, and adapted to his new condition—laws which should essentially qualify the control of the master over him—laws which should protect him in all the rights which he is fitted to enjoy, and prepare him for the enjoyment of those to which it would be but a suicidal philanthropy immediately to admit him. Sir, we owe it to this degraded race of men to prepare them for freedom; to communicate to them moral and religious and literary instruction; to restore and protect the domestic relations among them; to teach them the duties which they owe to God, and to us, and to one another; and to build upon the foundation of a conscious responsibility to the government of Heaven, and the authority of righteous human laws, a social structure which it shall be our glory to rear, and their highest earthly happiness to enjoy.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I thus repudiate the doctrine of the immediate and unqualified abolition of slavery, I maintain the duty of immediately and absolutely abolishing the slave trade within the limits of this District. And here I come to a part of the subject which gentlemen do not choose to approach, but manifestly desire to avoid. In this I commend their prudence. The slave trade is an evil for which they well know there is no defence, and no palliation. I regret, sir, that I have not the means of ascertaining its extent and character within this District. But the fact that I have no such means furnishes a strong argument for referring the petitions to a select committee, raised for the purpose of going into a full investigation, and making a full report of the facts connected with this traffic. I can at present only say, I am well assured that the trade is actively carried on in the cities both of Washington and Alexandria,* especially in the latter, where there is a large receptacle for the securing of slaves purchased in this District and the surrounding country; from which they are, from time to time, shipped to supply the markets in the southern and southwestern ports of the United States. I need not say that, what is usually connected with the slave trade elsewhere is connected with it here—the forced and final separation of parents and children, of brothers and sisters, of husbands and wives—the utter annihilation of all the endearing relations of human life, and the substitution of the single relation which property bears to its absolute proprietor.

Sir, shall this trade in human flesh be permitted to continue in the very heart of this republic? Shall the law remain upon our statute book, which solemnly pronounces the citizen of the United States who is found engaged in the slave trade upon the high seas “a pirate,” and dooms him to “suffer death,” while here, in sight of this very Capitol, the same trade is carried on with impunity? Shall our citizens, who make merchandise of men upon the ocean, be hunted as outlaws, while here, the same offenders against the human race are suffered to pursue the guilty traffic unmolested? Sir, this subject demands a searching investigation. Will gentlemen deny such investigation? Shall the petitions which ask for it be “nailed to the table,” or “buried in the tomb of all the Capulets?” I trust they will not be thus disposed of, and that no fear of “excitement” will deter us from probing the subject to the bottom, and administering a prompt and effectual remedy.

I have, Mr. Speaker, spoken plainly and decidedly, because it is due to the people whom I have the honor to represent, that I should thus speak. It seems to me, sir, that the sentiments of the people of the North are not fairly understood here on this subject.

An honorable gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] has said that not one in five hundred of his constituents were in favor of the object of these petitions; and other gentlemen have been understood to assert that the great mass of the northern people are opposed to any action of Congress upon the subject. To sustain this view of the matter, the resolutions of public meetings at the North, disapproving certain measures of the abolitionists, have been adverted to. I am well aware, sir, of the import of those resolutions, and think I understand something of the nature of that public sentiment which they indicate. And I must be permitted to say, that I believe gentlemen are much mistaken in supposing that they furnish evidence that the general sentiment at the North is opposed to the favorable action of Congress upon the memorials which are now on your table. No, sir; the meetings which adopted the resolutions in question were got up with no reference to this subject. What are the facts? The southern country had been suddenly flooded from the North: with anti-slavery publications; and northern meetings were, thereupon, convened to disavow a participation in the obnoxious measure, and to express their disapprobation of it. This they did, indeed, in strong, decided language. But let not gentlemen mistake the import of all this. It was the measure to which I have alluded which brought into existence these meetings, and it was this against which their proceedings were mainly directed. The question of the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in this District was not agitated. It is not so much as alluded to in the resolutions of the Philadelphia, New York, or Boston meetings; but the doctrine of immediate abolition, and the “extravagant proceedings” (to use the language of the New York resolutions) of the abolitionists, constitute the burden of them all.

Sir, there are very many of those who are disposed to press upon Congress the duty of granting the prayer of these petitions, who did not and do not approve the views and measures to which I have adverted; and it is due to frankness to say, sir, that I am among that number. I have never been able to perceive the expediency or propriety of attempting to inundate the South with even unexceptionable publications on this subject, much less those having a direct tendency to excite the passions of the slave, and tempt him to force the bondage which it is not for him to break, but for others to unloose. I admire, indeed, the purity of the philanthropy which seeks to abolish the institution of slavery, and elevate the degraded children of Africa from the condition of property to the privileges of men; but I deplore its often misdirected zeal, and deprecate the reaction which it is calculated to produce. The abolition of slavery in the States must be their own work. To convince them that the whole system is ruinous and wrong, is not the labor of a day or a year. All the questions connected with this subject are eminently practical questions, and nothing can be more obvious than the danger of failing to accomplish any thing by a premature effort to accomplish at once all that an ardent philanthropy may desire.

I have said that the public sentiment at the North is not understood on this subject. I believe, sir, it is greatly misunderstood. A large majority of the people are opposed to certain views and measures, connected with the proposed abolition of slavery in the States; but they entertain, at the same time, an irreconcilable aversion to the institution of slavery, in all its forms. The most conclusive evidence of this is furnished in all the proceedings at the North, which have been adverted to in this debate, as an index of public sentiment there. Thus the preamble to the Boston resolutions declares, “We hold this truth to be indisputable, that the condition of slavery finds no advocates among our citizens. Our laws do not authorize it; our principles revolt against it; our citizens will not tolerate its existence among them.”

This, sir, expresses, I believe, the universal sentiment at the North on this subject. It is a sentiment which is not the production of a momentary excitement, but is deeply seated in the sober and settled convictions of the public mind. And, sir, let me assure gentlemen that no expressions of disapprobation in regard to the measures of “abolitionists,” or doubts as to the practicability of immediate emancipation, are to be taken as evidence that the “principles” of the northern people have ceased to “revolt against” slavery; or that they will not avail themselves of every suitable occasion to discuss it, as well as of all reasonable and constitutional means of remedying the evil. The slavery of the States they know they cannot reach, but by moral influence; and that influence they think can be made most effectual through kind and respectful, though earnest and urgent appeals to the southern interest and the southern conscience. But slavery here they regard as within the competency of national legislation, and hold themselves, in common with the whole country, directly responsible for its continuance. And I need hardly say that there is a very general desire that measures may be immediately taken, looking to its final abolition; and especially that what has, by almost the whole civilized world, come to be doors below Lloyd’s tavern, opposite the Centre market. All communications promptly attended to.

accounted piracy upon the high seas, shall no longer be suffered to go unpunished and unmolested in the capital of this republic.

The venerable member from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] has said, and said truly, that opposition to slavery is, with the people of the North, a religious principle. An honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Jones] replies, by asking, with emphasis, whether it is the religion of the Saviour of men? Sir, I did not expect to hear such a question seriously propounded here. I was not prepared for an intimation that that religion justified the holding of human beings as property. Why, sir, what is the great, leading, moral precept put forth by that Saviour, whose name is thus invoked to sanction the practice of slavery?

"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

Sir, I will attempt no commentary on this precept. It needs none. I will only say that it contains the seminal principle of the pure and elevated morality of the Christian system—a morality so congenial with the spirit, and so constantly enforced by the example of its Divine author while upon earth.

Now, sir, let gentlemen show me that Africans are not "men," and I will give up the argument. But until this is done, until the declaration is blotted from the Book of Revelation, that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men, to dwell on all the face of the earth," and until this great truth ceases to find a response in every human bosom, shall slavery stand rebuked by this all-comprehensive and sublime precept of the Saviour of men.

But, sir, the religion which contains this precept, also enjoins submission to the "powers that be." The same mouth which uttered it said, "render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's"—a precept coincident with that which exhorts—"servants, be obedient to your own masters; not answering again; not purloining, but showing all good fidelity." The Saviour made it no part of his business, while upon earth, to subvert the existing order of things, or to prescribe specific regulations for the administration of civil government. But he came to redeem men from sin—to write the law of love upon their hearts—to establish principles and proclaim precepts, before whose searching and all-pervading influence the time-honored systems of injustice and oppression shall melt away.

Permit me now, Mr. Speaker, to examine, for a few moments, some of the objections which are urged against the legislation of Congress on this subject.

We are told, in the first place, that this is a question which concerns exclusively the people of this District; that the petitioners have no interest in it, and have no more right to ask Congress to abolish slavery here than they have to petition the Legislature of Virginia to abolish it within her limits.

Sir, the people who have signed these petitions regard themselves as citizens, not alone of the particular States in which they reside, but of the republic. Every interest within the scope of the legislation of Congress is their interest. Every thing which concerns this territory concerns them: its police; the value and security of the public property within its limits; and the safety of the representative bodies annually assembled here. This is the growing capital of a great republic. What may be the absolute or relative increase of its slave population, or how much it may affect the future condition of this District, cannot easily be foreseen. That population amounted, in 1830, to more than 6,000. The time may come when it will amount to ten times that number. And is it of no importance to our country whether its Capitol shall be surrounded by a mass of hardy, independent freemen, ready to peril their lives in defending it, as well as themselves, from the invasion of a foreign power, or whether it shall be guarded by 60,000 slaves, who, instead of rallying in its defence, may hail the invader as an angel of deliverance from their bondage? And is not this subject invested with additional interest, when it is considered that the Congress of the United States will be surrounded by such an amount of such a population? Have the petitioners, then, as a part of the American people, no interest in this question?

And then, too, there is the character of the country, as it may be affected by the institutions within the territory, where the legislative power of that country is supreme. Is slavery tolerated in this District?—the petitioners feel themselves, in some sense, responsible for it. Is merchandise made of men, within sight of the Capitol in which their Representatives are assembled, and on whose summit wave the stripes and the stars of freedom?—as Americans, they keenly feel the reproach, and instinctively reach forth their hands to wipe out the stain from the escutcheon of their country.

But, in the second place, it is asserted that Congress has no right to legislate on this subject; that, however great may be the evil of slavery or the slave trade within this District, it is an evil which must be borne, since authority to remedy it is not to be found among the powers granted in the constitution.

And what are the powers of Congress touching this subject? Is it true that Congress is authorized to extend its legislation to the high seas, even to the very coast of Africa, and to prohibit the traffic in slaves, under the penalty of death, while it is powerless to reach the same evil in the very heart of the republic? If the grant of powers must be so construed—if there is clearly no authority by which the Government can act in this matter, then must we submit to the evil, and wait an amendment of the constitution, which shall make it consistent with itself, and save the country from reproach.

But, sir, fortunately for the country, the constitution, through which we derive our powers, is not thus defective. The power to legislate upon this subject is granted; and that, not by remote implication, but in terms of obvious and familiar import. The 8th section of the first article gives to Congress authority "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

In the first place, let it be observed, the power of Congress to legislate in this District is exclusive. There is no other jurisdiction, either concurrent or conflicting. The jurisdiction of Virginia and Maryland, from which this territory was acquired by cession, is as perfectly excluded as is the authority and jurisdiction of the Emperor of all the Russias.

The exclusive character of the jurisdiction being apparent, the next question is, what is its extent? The answer is in the language of the grant, that it extends to "all cases whatsoever." The framers of the constitution could have employed no language of more comprehensive import than this—"all cases whatsoever." But are there no limitations to this? Certainly. The grant is subject to the limitations which are incident to all legislative power. There are many things which no Legislature can rightfully do. It cannot pass an ex post facto law. It cannot, by a mere act of legislation, transfer the property of one individual to another. It cannot authorize the commission of crime. These, and such like limitations, exist in the present case; not because of any thing in the language of the grant, but because they are inherent in the very nature of all legislative power.

Now, will it be seriously contended that the abolition of slavery and the slave trade is embraced within these implied limitations of legislative power? Is it not within the competency of ordinary legislation? Have not slavery and the slave trade been abolished by many States of this Union; and that not upon the ground, as has been suggested in debate, of interest merely, but because, when thoroughly examined, the pretended right to hold and transfer men as property has been found to rest on no substantial foundation? Indeed, the opposers of these petitions themselves, by laboring as they do to derive a prohibition to legislate on this subject from the constitution, and from the reservations in the cessions of this territory, manifestly betray an unwillingness to trust the claim to exemption from congressional legislation to the natural limitation of legislative power.

Dec. 23, 1835.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

It is said, indeed, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] that the States which have abolished slavery have not violated the great principle of vested rights, by taking slave property against the consent of the owners and without compensation; but that they have merely "adopted the post nati principle, and declared that rights which did not exist at the time should never exist;" that is, that the issue of slaves, born after a certain future time, should be free. Without stopping to inquire into the correctness of this, in point of fact, but, for the purposes of this argument, admitting it, let me ask what is the difference in principle between depriving an individual of his slave by act of legislation, and of the right to the issue of that slave by the same act? Upon common principles, an absolute right to the one, as property, necessarily carries with it a right to the other; and a farmer would resist, as equal infringements of his rights, an attempt to take away his cattle, and a claim to deprive him of their future progeny.

It would be appropriate here to go into an examination of the right which is claimed to hold men as property, and of the rightful extent of legislation on this subject. But it opens too broad a field for the present discussion, and I will not enter it.

It thus appears that the right to legislate on the subjects of these petitions, which is manifestly included within the terms of the grant of power to Congress, is not excluded by operation of the principles which form the basis of ordinary exceptions to the power of legislation. What is there, then, to exclude from the sweeping grant of power to legislate "in all cases whatsoever," the power in question?

An honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] finds various grounds of implied exclusion in the constitution. He says there are certain admitted exceptions to the legislative power of Congress in regard to this District, which he enumerates; and thereupon proceeds to infer from the fact of these exceptions, that the power in question is also excepted.

Thus, he says that Congress is prohibited by the constitution from suspending the writ of habeas corpus, from passing a law respecting the establishment of religion, and from abridging the freedom of speech and of the press, or the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, &c.; and asks if these prohibitions do not extend to the power of Congress to legislate for this District. Most certainly they do; but it is for the obvious reasons that they are unlimited in their terms, and of course necessarily extend to the whole legislation of Congress. Is there any such limitation of the power in question? Why, when the convention was in the act of providing limitations to the powers which had been granted to Congress, in the 8th section of the first article of the constitution, did they omit to limit specifically the power of legislation "in all cases whatsoever," which had been granted to Congress in reference to this District?

Again: The gentleman from Virginia says, if I rightly understand his argument, that the provision of the constitution, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," necessarily extends to the District of Columbia, and that Congress must be understood to be prohibited from disfranchising here the citizens of the several States; that is, that it cannot deprive them of the privileges of citizens of the District whenever they come into it. It is true it cannot, because there would be a gross and glaring absurdity in securing, as the constitution does, the rights of citizenship in each State, to citizens of every other State, and, at the same time, denying the rights of citizenship in this District—the common property of all the States—to the citizens of those States. And, besides, the very act of constituting this ten miles square a District of the United States necessarily gives to the citizens of each and all the States common rights in it; not the rights which they each enjoy in their respective States—as the terms in which the gentleman states his argument would seem to imply—because that would constitute twenty-four different rules of action; but the right of each resident and sojourner here, of being protected by the laws made for the District, and the whole District.

The exception, then, of a right to disfranchise a citizen of Virginia who may come here, rests upon a principle having no possible relation to the case in question.

But further: The gentleman from Virginia says that no person held to service or labor in a State, under the laws thereof, escaping into this District, can be discharged from such service or labor, but must be delivered up to the party to whom such service or labor may be due; and that this constitutes an exception from the general power to legislate "in all cases whatsoever" for this District. I admit it does; and why? Plainly because the constitution having expressly secured the right to the slave-owner to reclaim his slave in any and every State of this Union, it would be a clear evasion of it, as well as a manifest absurdity, to deny him that right in a District which is the common property of the very States within which his right of reclamation is secured by the constitution. The exception in this case rests, therefore, substantially upon an express provision of the constitution, which by no possibility of construction can sustain the exception in question.

Again: The constitution provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties, in another." And the gentleman from Virginia contends that this prohibition must be regarded as extending to the commerce and the ports of the District of Columbia; and if so, his inference is, that an implied prohibition of the abolition by Congress of slavery and the slave trade in the States must also be taken to extend to this District.

The first clause of the provision of the constitution just referred to was designed to exempt the exports of the country from taxation, and must, of necessity, be taken to extend to all the ports within it; otherwise, the entire object of the clause might be directly defeated. The remaining clauses of the provision, it will be observed, have exclusive reference to the equality of privileges of the several States, which they aim to preserve, by prohibiting Congress from favoring the commerce, or the ports, or navigation of one, at the expense of another. This it might do, in effect, if the ports, and commerce, and navigation of this District might be exempted from the operation of the clauses in question. Thus a preference of the port of Alexandria over that of Baltimore would disturb the equality of privilege which the constitution intended to preserve between Virginia and Maryland.

But what has all this to do with the subject under discussion? The provisions with regard to commerce, &c., do not specifically reach it; and it is only, therefore, from the supposed analogy between the implied limitation of the power of Congress in the cases cited, and the limitation sought to be established in the present case, that an argument can be drawn in favor of the latter. But where is the analogy between an implied prohibition to abolish slavery in the States, and an express prohibition of a preference of the ports of one State over those of another State? There is, indeed, a prohibition in both cases; but here the analogy ceases. If this is sufficient to establish the position of gentlemen, let us see what other positions it may establish. Upon the same ground that Congress is prohibited from abolishing slavery in the State of Virginia, for example, is it also prohibited from forbidding in that State the sale of lottery tickets, and the practice of gambling, and the crime of kidnapping? But could it not have enacted a prohibition of these practices in the city of Alexandria the moment it was ceded to the United States? Could it not, in fact, have rendered valueless establishments for gaming, and receptacles for the kidnapped, which had been erected under the sanction of the laws of Virginia, if those laws had permitted such practices? Would the gentleman from Virginia have exclaimed against the invasion of vested rights, the taking of private property for public use, without compensation?

Again: The gentleman from Virginia says the "local Legislature of this District cannot enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money," &c.; and infers, if I understand him, that because this disability results, as he supposes, by implication, from the inhibition to the States of the exercise of these powers, therefore the assumed disability of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District may, in like manner, result from its want of power to put an end to these evils in the States.

The whole of this argument rests on a false supposition with regard to the source of the inability of Congress, as a Legislature for this District, to make treaties, grant letters of marque, and coin money; and falls to the ground when it is perceived that that inability results, not from the inhibition to the States of the exercise of such powers, but from their utter inconsistency with both the purposes for which the power to legislate over this District was granted, and the relation which the District evidently bears to the Union.

The gentleman from Virginia next proceeds to lay down the following general rules to restrain legislation over this District:

1. "That nothing which Congress is expressly prohibited by the constitution from doing as a national Legislature, can it do as a local Legislature for the District of Columbia."

2. "That all the duties and obligations which the States are bound by the constitution to discharge and observe, from one to the other, the District of Columbia, or its Legislature, is bound to discharge and observe towards the States, respectively."

3. "That the local Legislature of the District of Columbia can do no act, or pass no law, which the States are prohibited from doing or passing, by the constitution."

And how, let it be asked, do these rules affect the present question? No express prohibition to legislate on the subject of State slavery is found in the constitution, unless it be in the amendment which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." But if Congress cannot legislate on the subject of slavery in this District, because the right to legislate upon it in the States is "reserved to the States," how is it to legislate for the District at all? The subjects of every-day legislation for the District are subjects upon which Congress has no power to legislate for the States, and are, therefore, according to the gentleman's argument, subjects on which it has no right to legislate here.

And how does the gentleman's second rule touch this subject? Are the States bound, by their "duties and obligations" towards each other, to refrain from abolishing slavery and the slave trade within their respective limits? Nobody pretends this.

Many States have done it, and many more may yet do it, for any thing that can be found to the contrary in the constitution. And can any greater evil result to any of the slave States from the exercise of a power by Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade within the limits of this District, than would result from the exercise, by the States, of their admitted power of doing the same thing within their limits? May not Maryland, for example, if she chooses, put an end to these evils within her limits? And would not the exercise of the power be as dangerous to the peace of the South, as would be the exercise of the same power by Congress in regard to this District?

And has the gentleman's third rule a more appropriate application to the present question than either of the others? To what purpose, in reference to this argument, is it to say that Congress can pass no law in reference to this District which the States are prohibited from passing? Are the States prohibited from passing laws abolishing slavery and the slave trade within their respective limits?

The gentleman from Virginia says the constitution declares that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." Supposing this to have any application to the present case, it only involves the inquiry, whether slaves can be rightfully emancipated by legislative authority, without providing a just compensation for their masters. This touches a question which I will not now discuss, namely: what is the foundation of the right to the slave, which is said to be vested in the master? Congress, however, are not asked to take private property for public use; but to free the African from the unnatural condition of being the property of another, to the end, not that he may become the property of the public, but the proprietor of himself. But this is not all that we are called on to do. We are asked to prohibit men from making merchandise of their fellow-men; from buying and selling them "to get gain." Do gentlemen talk of a compensation to the slave merchant for the loss of such a privilege? Do they even touch the subject of the slave trade within this District? Dare they do it? Are there any "vested rights" in the way of legislation on this subject? Is there any question about "compensation" involved?—any limitation growing out of "the nature of society, and of government," to which the gentleman from Virginia refers?—any express or implied infringement of the rights of the States?—any kind of obstacle, in short, but the want of a will in those who have the power to put down this abominable traffic?

Having thus attempted to show that the power of Congress to legislate on the subjects of these petitions, obviously included in the power to "exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," is not restrained by any natural limitations of legislative power, nor by any express or implied limitations to be found in the constitution, the question arises, Where is the limitation to be found, for which gentlemen so earnestly contend? I am answered, in the acts of cession, by which the States of Virginia and Maryland ceded the territory which forms this District to the United States. These acts, say gentlemen, are conclusive upon the subject. Let us see, then, if these States did, in making the cessions, actually impose restrictions at variance with the plain language of the constitution; and whether Congress accepted grants thus restricted.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

The cession from Virginia was made by act of the Legislature of that State, on the 3d of December, 1789, in the following words:*

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That a tract of country, not exceeding ten miles square, or any lesser quantity, to be located within the limits of the State, and in any part thereof, as Congress may by law direct, shall be, and the same is hereby, forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the Government of the United States."

This grant, it will be perceived, transfers to the United States "exclusive jurisdiction of soil and persons residing or to reside thereon;" and adds, "pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the Government of the United States;" that is, pursuant to that part of the constitution which, as we have seen, expressly grants to Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever." Here, then, instead of a restriction of the jurisdiction contemplated in the constitution, there is, both in direct terms and by reference to that instrument, an express and clear confirmation of it.

But, say gentlemen, there is a proviso, which follows this grant, that contains the limitation contended for. Let us see. The proviso is as follows: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States." Now, sir, is it not apparent, upon the slightest inspection of this proviso, that it limits the grant only so far as it extends to the soil, and was designed merely to protect the rights of individuals therein (that is, in the soil) from the operation of that part of the cession which grants "the tract of country" to the United States "in full and absolute right?" It seems to me, indeed, that, so far from limiting the grant in reference to the subject-matter now under consideration, this very proviso does, in effect, confirm it; since an express exception of one species of right from the operation of the grant, and one only, would seem to imply an exclusion of all other exceptions. It is, indeed, altogether incredible that the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland should have intended to restrict the United States in their power over the subject of slavery, without using language which would directly, or by clear implication, reach the case.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] gives additional force to this argument by asking—"Why was the cession required? Why was their [the ceding States] consent to the purchase of places required by the constitution, if it was not to give the States the power of imposing condition and restraint upon your legislation over the ceded territory?"

"The power of imposing condition and restraint!" Very well. If this was the purpose, the States of Virginia and Maryland of course understood it, and would take care to impose, in their grants, all the conditions and restraints upon the legislation of Congress which they thought proper; and to do it so plainly that even the wayfaring man need not err in regard to them. Now, where are the conditions and restraints on which gentlemen rely? I have recited the whole; and who will say that they embrace any restraint upon the power of Congress touching the subject under consideration? Is not the omission, upon the gentleman's own view of the subject, decisive of the question?

But the gentleman, having looked into the grant, and seeing that no such "condition and restraint" was imposed there, seeks to find it in "the nature of society and government in Maryland and Virginia;" which he says is "of itself, independent of conditions expressed in the acts of cession, sufficient to restrain your power of legislation over this subject." Thus, at one moment, a cession was provided for in the constitution, to the end that the ceding States might impose condition and restraint upon the legislation of Congress; and, at the next, "the nature of society and government in Maryland and Virginia is of itself a sufficient restraint," without any thing expressed in the grant!

But, Mr. Speaker, what is the condition of the people of this District in regard to this important subject, if the power contended for is not granted to Congress? Maryland and Virginia, possessing the power to abolish slavery and the slave trade within their respective limits, had the power of doing it within the territory which now composes this District. But they possess it no longer. Their jurisdiction here is extinguished. The inhabitants of the territory are transferred to the United States, entirely divested of all civil jurisdiction, with no power to legislate on this or any other subject, but subjected to the "exclusive legislation" of Congress in "all cases whatsoever." However much they may, at any time, desire to free the territory from the curse of slavery and the slave trade, they are powerless. For any thing that they can do, by the force of law, they and their children, and their children's children, to the latest time, must be doomed to see among them a traffic which makes merchandise of the bodies and the souls of their fellow-men; which marches through their streets, chained together, companies of human beings destined to the slave prison and the slave ship; and which agonizes their moral sensibilities by a severance of all the ties which bind man to his fellow-man, in the most valued and endeared relations of human life.

I have thus shown that the power given to Congress over this subject, by the general grant in the constitution, is affected, neither by the natural limitations to the exercise of legislative power, nor by any limitation, express or implied, in the constitution itself, nor by any contained in the cessions of this territory by the States of Maryland and Virginia.

But the petitioners are here met with another objection to granting the prayer of these petitions. It is made a question of public safety. To begin the work of abolishing slavery, and to banish the detestable traffic in human flesh from this District, will, we are told, tend to excite a spirit of insurrection in the southern States; and gentlemen give full rein to their imaginations in depicting the horrors of rape, rapine, and murder, which will follow. I do not permit myself to doubt the perfect sincerity of gentlemen in these gloomy forebodings. I know they are in a position to see what I cannot see, and feel what I cannot feel. I will not allow myself to trifle with their views or feelings on this subject, though I must be permitted to doubt the correctness of the one, and the justness of the other.

And may I not well doubt? It is true I do not profess a very familiar acquaintance with the disposition of the slave population, or the probable influence upon them of a discussion of, and action upon, this subject. And while I would hesitate to oppose my own individual opinion to the assertions of honorable gentlemen, so confidently made, they must permit me to confront them, not altogether with my own opinions, but with the authority of intelligent and respectable slaveholders themselves.

I hold in my hand a petition presented to this House in the year 1828, signed by more than eleven hundred citizens of this District, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade within its limits. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and remained unacted on until the last session, when it was called up, on motion of an honorable member from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD,] and ordered to be printed, with the names of the signers. I send it to the Chair, and ask that it may be read by the Clerk.

Here Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, interposed, and said he should object to the reading of that and all other petitions on the subject, unless the gentleman used it as a part of his argument.

Mr. SLADE replied that he intended so to use it, and should read it himself, but, being exhausted, he wished it read by the Clerk.

Mr. GARLAND withdrew his objection, and consented to the reading, as an act of courtesy to Mr. S.

The petition was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

"We, the undersigned, citizens of the counties of Washington and Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, beg leave to call the attention of your honorable body to an evil of serious magnitude, which greatly impairs the prosperity and happiness of this District, and casts the reproach of inconsistency upon the free institutions established among us.

"While the laws of the United States denounce the foreign slave trade as piracy, and punish with death those who are found engaged in its perpetration, there exists in this District, the seat of the National Government, a domestic slave trade scarcely less disgraceful in its character, and even more demoralizing in its influence. For this is not, like the former, carried on against a barbarous nation; its victims are reared up among the people of this country, educated in the precepts of the same religion, and imbued with similar domestic attachments.

"These people are, without their consent, torn from their homes; husband and wife are frequently separated and sold into distant parts; children are taken from their parents, without regard to the ties of nature; and the most endearing bonds of affection are broken forever.

"Nor is this traffic confined to those who are legally slaves for life. Some who are entitled to freedom, and many who have a limited time to serve, are sold into unconditional slavery; and, owing to the defectiveness of our laws, they are generally carried out of the District before the necessary steps can be taken for their release.

"We behold these scenes continually taking place among us, and lament our inability to prevent them. The people of this District have, within themselves, no means of legislative redress, and we therefore appeal to your honorable body, as the only one invested by the American constitution with the power to relieve us.

"Nor is it only from the rapacity of slave traders that the colored race in this District are doomed to suffer. Even the laws which govern us sanction and direct, in certain cases, a procedure that we believe is unparalleled, in glaring injustice, by any thing at present known among the Governments of Christendom. An instance of the operation of these laws, which occurred during the last summer, we will briefly relate.

"A colored man, who stated that he was entitled to freedom, was taken up as a runaway slave, and lodged in the jail of Washington city. He was advertised, but no one appearing to claim him, he was, according to law, put up at public auction for the payment of his jail fees, and sold as a slave for life! He was purchased by a slave trader, who was not required to give security for his remaining in the District, and he was, soon after, shipped at Alexandria for one of the southern States. An attempt was made by some benevolent individuals to have the sale postponed until his claim to freedom could be investigated; but their efforts were unavailing; and thus was a human being sold into perpetual bondage, at the capital of the freest Government on earth, without even a pretence of trial or an allegation of crime.

"We blush for our country while we relate this disgraceful transaction, and we would fain conceal it from the world, did not its very enormity inspire us with the hope that it will rouse the philanthropist and the patriot to exertion. We have no hesitation in believing your honorable body never intended that this odious law should be enforced: it was adopted with the old code of Maryland, from which, we believe, it has been expunged since the District was ceded to the General Government.

"The fact of its having been so recently executed, shows the necessity of this subject being investigated by a power which we confidently hope will be ready to correct it.

"We are aware of the difficulties that would attend any attempt to relieve us from these grievances by a sudden emancipation of the slaves in this District, and we would, therefore, be far from recommending so rash a measure. But the course pursued by many of the States of this confederacy, that have happily succeeded in relieving themselves from a similar burden, together with the bright example which has been set us by the South American republics, proves, most conclusively, that a course of gradual emancipation, to commence at some fixed period, and to take effect only upon those who may thereafter be born or removed into the District, might be pursued without detriment to the present proprietors, and would greatly redound to the prosperity and honor of our country.

"The existence among us of a distinct class of people, who, by their condition as slaves, are deprived of almost every incentive to virtue and industry, and shut out from many of the sources of light and knowledge, has an evident tendency to corrupt the morals of the people, and to damp the spirit of enterprise, by accustoming the rising generation to look with contempt upon honest labor, and to depend for support too much upon the labor of others. It prevents a useful and industrious class of people from settling among us, by rendering the means of subsistence more precarious to the laboring class of whites.

"It diminishes the resources of the community, by throwing the earnings of the poor into the coffers of the rich; thus rendering the former dependant, servile, and improvident; while the latter are tempted to become, in the same proportion, luxurious and prodigal.

"That these disastrous results flow from the existence of slavery among us, is sufficiently conspicuous, when we contrast the languishing condition of this District, and the surrounding country, with the prosperity of those parts of the Union which are less favored in point of climate and location, but blessed with a free and industrious population.

"We would, therefore, respectfully pray that these grievances may claim the attention of your honorable body, that a law of Congress may be enacted, declaring that all children of slaves, born in the District of Columbia after the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, shall be free at the age of twenty-five years; and that those laws, which authorize the selling of supposed runaways for their prison fees or maintenance, may be repealed.

"And, also, that laws may be enacted to prevent slaves from being removed into this District, or brought in for sale, hire, or transportation; without, however, preventing members of Congress, resident strangers, or travellers, from bringing and taking away with them their domestic servants."

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTON inquired whether the gentleman from Vermont could inform him how many of the signers were slaveholders.

Mr. GARLAND made a further inquiry whether the gentleman from Vermont knew if they were all inhabitants of the District.

Mr. SLADE replied, he could not inform the gentleman how many of the signers were slaveholders. He personally knew some of them, and knew them to be owners of slaves. The list of names, some of which he read, embraced men of all the professions and employments in the District—judges, lawyers, physicians, merchants, mechanics, and laborers.

As to the question, (said Mr. S.,) whether all the signers were inhabitants of this District, I cannot, of course, answer it. I can only say that the petition was presented to this House seven years ago, and has remained on file in the Clerk's office ever since, open to inspection; and that it has been, during the past year, among the published documents of this House; and, moreover, that it purports on its face to be a petition of inhabitants of this District. Under these circumstances, I submit whether there is not a sufficient presumption that it is what it purports to be, to put gentlemen upon proof of the contrary.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me entreat gentlemen to look into this petition. I do this the more earnestly, because they will find the names of many there, whom, I am persuaded, they will not be inclined to charge either with ignorance or fanaticism; but on whose truth and intelligence and judgment they will place the most confident reliance. They state facts which they are in a condition to know, and advanced opinions, the soundness of which is not liable to be affected by "northern prejudices" on this subject. They are, in the midst of slavery, and understand what it is. They have witnessed the slave trade, and know something of its horrors; and without any of the doubts of gentlemen in regard to the power of Congress on this subject, and without any of the apprehensions with regard to the effect of its discussion upon the public peace and safety, which has been made the subject of such glowing descriptions and gloomy anticipations, here and elsewhere, they fearlessly announce the truth in regard both to slavery and the slave trade, and urgently appeal to Congress, "as the only body invested by the American constitution with power to relieve them."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not time that these petitioners, sustained as they are by the concurrent supplications of their northern brethren, should be heard and regarded; and whether the fact that eleven hundred citizens of this District have signed the petition which has just been read, is not a sufficient reply to the argument which has been drawn from considerations connected with a regard to the public safety.

But further: The subject of the abolition of slavery, it is well known, was fully debated in the Legislature of Virginia in the year 1832, when the "injustice, tyranny, and oppression" of the slave system were openly and boldly maintained,* and an effort was seriously made to commence a system of abolition which should look to the final, and not distant, extinction of slavery in that State. And did that discussion produce any symptoms of insurrection among the slaves? No, sir. And why, indeed, should it? If you, sir, were the owner of one hundred slaves, and should seriously set about measures to give them the boon of freedom, do you think the first intimation of it would beget in them a spirit of rebellion, and that it would rise in proportion as you should advance your benevolent plans towards their consummation? To suppose this, is to suppose—what I want evidence to believe of the African race—that they are so lost to gratitude as to find no inducement to its exercise in such a manifestation of benevolent regard for them as this.

Suffer me, sir, to dwell a few moments longer on the indications of opinion in Virginia on this subject, pending the agitation of the question in the Legislature of that State. While the subject was before a committee of the Legislature, the editor of the Richmond Enquirer, a well known leading public journal at the seat of Government of Virginia, said:

"It is probable, from what we hear, that the committee on the colored population will report some plan for getting rid of the free people of color. But is this all that can be done? Are we forever to suffer the greatest evil which can scourge our land not only to remain, but to increase in its dimensions? 'We may shut our eyes and avert our faces, if we please,' (writes an eloquent South Carolinian, on his return from the North a few weeks ago,) 'but there it is, the dark and growing evil, at our doors; and meet the question we must at no distant day. God only knows what it is the part of wise men to do on that momentous and appalling subject. Of this I am very sure, that the difference—nothing short of frightful—between all that exists on one side of the Potomac, and all on the other, is owing to that cause alone. The disease is deep seated; it is at the heart's core; it is consuming, and has all along been consuming, our vitals; and I could laugh, if I could laugh on such a subject, at the ignorance and folly of the politician who ascribes that to an act of the Government, which is the inevitable effect of the eternal laws of nature. What is to be done? Oh! my God! I don't know, but something must be done.'

"Yes, something must be done; and it is the part of no honest man to deny it; of no free press to affect to conceal it. When this dark population is growing upon us; when every new census is but gathering its appalling number upon us; when within a period equal to that in which this federal constitution has been in existence, those numbers will increase to more than 2,000,000 within Virginia; when our sister States are closing their doors upon our blacks for sale; and when our whites are moving westwardly in greater numbers than we like to hear of; when this, the fairest land on all this continent, for soil and climate and situation combined, might become a sort of garden-spot if it were worked by the hands of white men alone, can we, ought we to sit quietly down, fold our arms, and say to each other, 'well, well, this thing will not come to the worst in our day? We will leave it to our children and our grandchildren and great grandchildren to take care of themselves, and to brave the storm? Is this to act like wise men? Heaven knows we are no fanatics. We detest the madness which actuated the Amis des Noirs. But some-

* The gentleman who opened the debate on the side of abolition, said: "It was a truth held sacred by every American and by every republican throughout the world, and he presumed it could not be denied in that hall, as a general principle, that it is an act of injustice, tyranny, and oppression, to hold any part of the human race in bondage against their consent. That circumstances may exist which may put it out of the power of the owners, for a time, to grant their slaves liberty, he admitted to be possible; and if they do exist in any case, it may excuse, but not justify, the owner in holding them. The right to the enjoyment of liberty is one of the most precious, inherent, inalienable rights which pertain to the whole human race, and of which they can never be divested, except by an act of gross injustice."

thing ought to be done. Means, sure but gradual, systematic but discreet, ought to be adopted for reducing the mass of evil which is pressing upon the South, and will still more press upon her the longer it is put off. We ought not to shut our eyes nor avert faces. And though we speak almost without a hope that the committee or the Legislature will do any thing at the present session to meet this question, yet we say now, in the utmost sincerity of our hearts, that our wisest men cannot give too much of their attention to this subject, nor can they give it too soon."

The honorable gentleman from Virginia will suffer me to commend this expression of sentiment to the deliberate attention which the high standing and responsible position of its author, and the peculiar circumstances under which he wrote, eminently entitle it. Especially would I commend to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina the declaration of the "eloquent South Carolinian," embodied in the article I have just read. The able editor of the Richmond Enquirer, and his eloquent correspondent, both had a near view of the evils of slavery, and describe them in a language which at once attests their sincerity, and commands assent to the correctness of their views upon this "momentous and appalling subject."

I will add, that the other leading paper at the capital of Virginia, the Richmond Whig, made about the same time the following declaration:

"We affirm that the great mass of Virginia herself triumphs that the slavery question has been agitated, and reckons it glorious that the spirit of her sons did not shrink from grappling with the monster. We affirm that, in the heaviest slave districts of the State, thousands have hailed the discussion with delight, and contemplate the distant but ardently desired result, as the supreme good which a benevolent Providence could vouchsafe to their country."

Mr. Speaker, if it was "glorious" and safe for Virginia to "grapple with the monster" in 1832, is it glorious and unsafe for the Congress of the United States to grapple with the same monster now?

Suffer me, Mr. Speaker, to present one more expression of opinion on this subject. I leave Virginia, and go over the mountains into the valley of the Mississippi; and I there find the following recent resolution of the Synod of Kentucky upon the subject of emancipation:

"Resolved, That a committee of ten be appointed, to consist of an equal number of ministers and elders, whose business it shall be to digest and prepare a plan for the moral and religious instruction of our slaves, and for their future emancipation, and to report such plan to the several Presbyteries within our bounds, for their consideration and approval."

The committee appointed under this resolution, of whom John Brown, Esq. was chairman, and the Rev. John C. Young, President of Danville College, secretary, made a report, in which, among other things, they say:

"1. A part of our system of slavery consists in depriving human beings of the right to acquire property. 2. The deprivation of personal liberty forms another part of our system of slavery. 3. The deprivation of personal security is the remaining constituent of our system of slavery." Its effects are said to be: "1. To deprave and degrade its subjects, by removing from them the strongest natural checks to human corruption. 2. It dooms thousands of human beings to hopeless ignorance. 3. It deprives its subjects, in a great measure, of the privileges of the gospel. 4. This system licenses and produces great cruelty. 5. It produces general licentiousness among the slaves. 6. This system demoralizes the whites as well as the blacks. 7. This system draws down upon us the vengeance of Heaven."

These several points, in their order, are illustrated and enforced at length. Then follow confutations of the various arguments of the defenders of the system. Then—

"As the conclusion of all that has been advanced, we assert it to be the unquestionable duty of every Christian to use vigorous and immediate measures for the destruction of this whole system, and for the removal of all its unhappy effects. Both these objects should be contemplated in his efforts."

Mr. Speaker, is it regarded by good and intelligent men in Kentucky as safe openly to recommend a "destruction of the whole system of slavery?" and shall we be quailing before the dangers of doing it in the District of Columbia?

But, sir, I have another authority on this subject. I return from the valley of the Mississippi to this District, and looking into the United States Telegraph of the 4th of September last, I find the following: Speaking in the name of the southern people, the editor says:

"We hold that our sole reliance is on ourselves: that we have most to fear from the gradual operation on public opinion among ourselves, and that those are the most insidious and dangerous invaders of our rights and interests, who, coming to us in the guise of friendship, endeavor to persuade us that slavery is a sin, a curse, an evil. It is not true that the South sleeps on a volcano—that we are afraid to go to bed at night—that we are fearful of murder and pillage. Our greatest cause of apprehension is from the operation of the morbid sensibility which appeals to the consciences of our own people, and would make them the voluntary instruments of their own ruin."

So, then, the fears are not of insurrection, but of conscience; not of the physical force of the slaves, but of the power of "public opinion!"

Need I, Mr. Speaker, repeat the expression of my sincere conviction that the fears expressed by gentlemen on this floor are groundless? And is it not apparent that the true ground of fear on this subject is to be found in a continuance of the "dark and growing evil," so well described by the "eloquent South Carolinian," to which our attention has been directed? Permit me to add, in the language of the Richmond Enquirer, in the article I have read, that "our wisest men cannot give too much attention to this subject, nor can they give it too soon."

But there is another objection sometimes urged against legislating on the subject of slavery, which must not be overlooked in this discussion. Every attempt to disturb the existing relation of master and slave, it is said, tends to disturb the balance of the constitution, inasmuch as it was among the compromises which entered into the formation of that instrument, that three fifths of the slaves should be represented in this body.

Now, sir, in the first place, let it be observed that we are not asked to legislate on the abolition of slavery in Virginia or South Carolina, but in the District of Columbia; and that our legislation disturbs the balance of the constitution only by the influence of its example upon the slaveholding States.

In the second place, I contend that a just exercise of all the powers granted in the constitution can never disturb its true balance, but is itself the preservation of that balance.

If the constitution authorizes Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and the tendency of the exercise of that power should be to abolish slavery in the slave States, and thus reduce their representation in this body, it is a constitutional result, of which no State has a right to complain. As well might we complain of the abolition of slavery in the West India islands by Great Britain, because its tendency is to produce the same result in the United States. Neither Congress, in the one case, nor Great Britain, in the other, is under any responsibility for the consequences of a rightful exercise of power—I mean a responsibility to the constitution in the one case, and the law of nations in the other.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

But, sir, the balance of the constitution is already disturbed in the other direction. When the constitution was adopted, the Mississippi on the west, and Florida on the south, formed the limits of the confederated republic. For any thing contemplated in the constitution, these boundaries formed impassable limits, beyond which a slave population could not bring into Congress a representation upon that basis. The purchases of Louisiana and Florida have added two additional slave States, and will probably, ere long, add two more. And do gentlemen reflect how much this has disturbed the balance of the constitution?

But this is not all. The balance, in point of fact, has been disturbed, and must be more so, by the great relative increase of the slave population of the South, and the diminution, almost the extinction, of it at the North. And although this is not, of course, an unconstitutional increase, yet it is obvious that the enormous and alarming relative increase of the slave population, compared with that of the whites, was not within the contemplation of the men who formed the constitution.

Thus, in the four Atlantic States south of the Potomac, the increase of the whites from 1790 to 1830 was 84 per cent.; while that of the slaves was, during the same period, 136 per cent. In South Carolina the disproportion was still greater; the increase of the whites, during the same period, having been 94 per cent., while that of the slaves was 194 per cent.

To what results, Mr. Speaker, are the principles which produce such a disproportionate increase of population to lead us? What will, in the progress of fifty years, become of the balance of the constitution? These are questions which deeply concern the free States.

But there is another question which comes home to the slave States with tremendous and appalling interest. What will be their condition half a century hence in reference to this subject? That period will roll away; and the principles which govern the advance of the slave population will continue to operate! And yet gentlemen say, “hands off”—let us alone. “We will leave it to our children, and our grandchildren, and our great-grandchildren, to take care of themselves, and to brave the storm!”

But, sir, I will pursue this train of thought no farther. I leave it, and with it the subject which the House has so kindly indulged me in discussing.

Deeply convinced, sir, that the petitioners have a right to ask us to abolish slavery and the slave trade within this District, and that we have not only the right, but that it is our bounden duty forthwith to commence the one, and to begin and finish the other, I must ask, when the proper time shall come, that the petitions shall be referred to a select committee, to the end that they may have the speedy and decisive action of this body. It seems to me to be due to the great importance of the subject that they should be thus disposed of. Sir, we must not bury these petitions. And let me say to gentlemen, that such a policy will certainly defeat itself. You cannot smother investigation of this subject. Sir, the spirit of free inquiry is the master spirit of the age. It bows to the authority of truth and reason and revelation, but it bows to nothing else. It must have free course, and it will have it; giving life and soul and energy to the march of liberal principles, and destined to shake every institution on earth which does not recognise the “inalienable rights” of man, and bow to the supremacy of just and equal laws. And, sir, it shall move onward, and onward, and onward, until every kindred, and tongue, and people under heaven shall acknowledge and glory in the great truth that “all men are created equal.”

When Mr. SLADE had concluded—

Mr. J. GARLAND said he rose under deep and painful feelings. I had hoped, said he, that the violent and pernicious designs of a few disaffected fanatics of the North would have been long since silenced, and the recent votes of this House had inspired me with the fond hope that, upon this floor at least, I never should have been called upon to vindicate my fellow-citizens of the South against the false and foul charges of piracy and man stealing, so repeatedly and lavishly made against them. But, sir, this question has assumed an aspect that forbids me to be silent; and I should be recreant to the feelings and interests of the people who have confided to me the duty of representing their feelings and interests upon this floor, if I could stand by patiently, quietly, and submissively, and not repel the strong insinuations, unfounded aspersions, and foul calumnies, cast upon them, and roll back the waves of calumny upon those who have attempted to cast them upon us.

Sir, the honorable gentleman who last addressed the House [Mr. SLADE] has, in effect, by giving a direct contradiction to the representations of other gentlemen in relation to the number and feelings of the abolitionists of the North, done much to unhinge and loosen every feeling of confidence which I heretofore felt on this subject, in consequence of the action of the northern people during the last summer and fall, and the declaration of other of their representatives on this floor, in relation to this agitating, this dangerous subject. Honorable gentlemen from that section of the Union tell us there is a strong feeling of sympathy in the North for the people of the South. Ay, while some of them tell us, and assure us, too, that not one in five hundred among the people there favor the abolitionists or their schemes, another gentleman (the honorable member from Vermont) from that section of country tells us that those gentlemen have grossly mistaken the feelings of their own people. This gentleman [Mr. SLADE] tells us he speaks not only the sentiments and feelings of the people of his own district, but of the whole people of the North; and that they are strongly in favor of the schemes of these memorialists. Is it so, Mr. Speaker? Is it true, then, sir, that those honorable gentlemen have disguised and misrepresented the true sense and feelings of the people of the North, and that the gentleman from Vermont is better acquainted with their true character and true feelings upon this question than their own representatives, and has fairly developed them? If he is, sir, and if he does speak truly, and if the people of the North do maintain these opinions, I, sir, thank the gentleman, in the name of the southern people, that he has frankly disclosed to us the fact, and has disclosed it in seasonable time. I thank him that he has prepared us for the assault that awaits us, by warning us of its approach. I thank him that he has undeceived our confidence, and aroused our jealousy. But, Mr. Speaker, I do venture to hope, however, and believe, that the gentleman has deceived himself, (although I do not doubt his sincerity,) and has mistaken the true feelings of the northern people. I still confide in the declarations of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] and others who agree with him, and shall not abandon my hopes till further developments satisfy me that my confidence is misplaced. I cannot but express my admiration of the peculiar adroitness and skill with which the gentleman from Vermont approached this subject. But while I give the gentleman full credit for the skill and adroitness he used in contriving to bring this whole question before us, I must confess, and I mean it in no offensive sense, I dislike the disingenuous avowal of sympathy under which he commenced his attack, and the attempted concealment of the real views of these petitioners. The honorable gentleman professes great kindness for us—his benevolence for us is very expanded! He means no offence! He does not mean to call us land pirates and man stealers! Oh, no! But then, says the gentleman, that system among you is a system of land piracy—a merchandise in human flesh! The gentleman does not mean to hurt us; oh, no; but he means to assail our rights, and destroy our property, out of mere benevolence, mere kindness to us! While he smiles in our faces, he drives the dagger to our hearts! You, he says, are not pirates and man stealers; but your system of slavery is, in every mien and every form, a system of piracy and man stealing—accompanying the charge with every opprobrious epithet which the honorable member could string together. This, sir, is kindness with a vengeance, for which we have no thanks to return to the honorable member from Vermont.

I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, before entering further upon the subject before me, to make a single remark in relation to what fell from the venerable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman said he had no wish to be forced into a discussion on the “sublime merits of slavery.” Let me ask the gentleman, when he speaks of the “sublime merits of slavery” in the ironical sense he intended the remark, to cast his eyes upon that picture [pointing to the portrait of General Washington] of the Father of his Country, and stand rebuked by the recollection of his virtues and his deeds. When the people of the North were weak, and assailed by a cruel and unrelenting enemy, and struggling for their rights and their liberties, that man, at the head of a determined and resolute band of slaveholders, rushed to their rescue. He and his companions in arms left their wives, their children, their domestic firesides, their farms, their all, risked every thing they possessed, hazarded all they held dear, and periled their lives and fortunes, to espouse the cause of the North, and in defence of northern liberty. Sir, that man was a slaveholder, and his southern companions were slaveholders. I ask the gentleman to cast his retrospection back to the eventful period of '76, when that man, with some seventeen hundred or two thousand patriots, were retreating before a large and victorious army through New Jersey, their very footsteps imprinted in the snow with their blood; and to look back again at the conduct of that little band at Trenton and Princeton, immediately after. Sir, a few of these slaveholders were there; many of these slaveholders were the compatriots and companions of the honorable gentleman's patriotic sire, in the cabinet and in the field, and were not deemed unworthy. I ask that gentleman, then, to take back the calumny. I ask him to recall it. It was wrong, it was unjust, it was unkind, it was illiberal. I do venture to express a sincere hope that the venerable gentleman's feelings upon this occasion have been treacherous to the true feelings of his heart. I hope he has not meant the full import which this term of reproach expresses. With these few remarks in relation to the imputation of the honorable gentleman, I will approach the subject before us. In doing so, I will assure the House that it is not my intention to follow the honorable gentleman from Vermont through all his mazes, and turnings, and windings; nor shall I attempt to repel all his calumnies and insinuations, nor endeavor to satisfy his religious scruples, nor criticise his moral lecturing, nor to notice every thing he has said on this occasion in a vein and a manner better suited to the pulpit than the floor of a legislative assembly. The merits of slavery, and the constitutional power of Congress to interfere with it in the States, are questions which I will not and cannot condescend to discuss here. I deny your right to interfere with them in any form, without a faithless violation of the federal compact, and utter disregard of the duties which you owe to it.

Mr. Speaker, the question before the House has assumed a variety of aspects. But, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont this morning, I had thought, as doubtless many others did, that the only difference of opinion that existed in the House was as to the form and manner in which its sense should be expressed, or in which a very large majority of its members should indicate their sentiments, which I understand to be almost unanimously opposed to any legislation whatever upon the subject of these memorials; some are for rejecting all petitions and memorials of this character; some are for laying them on the table; some propose one form and some another; but until we were favored with the views of the member from Vermont, who has, to his credit, marched boldly up to the battery's jaw, and made an open attack, none, no, not one, gave an unqualified approbation to the object of these petitions. Permit me, sir, to make one further remark on this subject, before I approach the question itself; and that is, who are these petitioners? The honorable member from New York who addressed the House this morning, [Mr. GRANGER,] of whose acquaintance I have not the honor or the pleasure, but hope to have before we part from the discharge of our duties here, has endorsed (and he is a very good endorser) the character of one portion of these petitioners—the females; I beg pardon—the ladies. Now, sir, there is no man on this floor who has a higher admiration of the female character than I have; but I must confess I do not like to see them madly shooting out of their proper sphere, and undertaking to control national politics. I do not like to see them become politicians. Sir, I was very much interested and amused at the sublime and beautiful description of the character and virtues of these ladies, with which the gentleman entertained the House. They are all gentleness, all kindness, all benevolence. Oh, yes, sir; and their objects are all designed for good; and so absorbed are they in their benevolent designs, that they have not brought themselves to contemplate the awful consequences of their rash proceedings. Now, sir, I have one single recommendation for the gentleman. It would seem, from his remarks, that one of the peculiar virtues of these females is, to disturb his slumbers; and, as I understand the gentleman is a bachelor, and these female petitioners are, I do not doubt, old maids, not exceeding twenty-five—for they never get beyond that age—I would recommend him to take one of these interesting, charming ladies for his wife; and, in so doing, I have no doubt he would lessen the ranks of the abolitionists one, at least, and secure himself against any further disturbance of his midnight slumbers; for, be assured, Mr. Speaker, it is a most powerful soporific, and a very pleasant one into the bargain, as you and I can testify.

Mr. Speaker, as a representative from a portion of the people of the South, I would, sir, have been perfectly satisfied with the disposition made of the memorials of this character, when they were first presented in the beginning of the present session, of laying them on the table, not again to be taken up or considered; but the result of that vote has not had the desired effect of putting to rest this question. By an overwhelming vote, this House determined to lay these memorials on the table, there to sleep, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] “the sleep of death.” More than this: the House, by a decided vote, refused even to honor these memorials with the customary respect of ordering them to be printed. And what has been the result? Why, sir, the very next moment comes another memorial, and then another, till at length they came so thick that the attention of the House could not keep pace with them; and the very memorial now before us was presented, and got a reference to one of the standing committees, without attracting the attention of the House—an honor which, I am quite sure, the House never designed. Nor is this all. Why, sir, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SLANE] tells us he is charged with numerous petitions of the same character. Sir, when are we to have an end of them? This House has decided they will not print them; it has decided it will not consider them further than to lay them on the table; and yet they come and are to come in shoals upon us. Sir, it is time that this House should take a more decisive stand, should adopt a more definitive course, should decisively rebuke these intermeddlers with the property of others, and disturbers of the tranquillity of the nation. What now will be the utility of laying these papers on the table, when we may be met by a motion to-morrow, or the next week, to take them up and reconsider them. Sir, the laying a paper on the table is not a final disposition of it, although a majority of the House may again and again make this disposition; for on the very question to take up and consider, or on a question to reconsider, as well as on the original presentation, we may have debates that will be interminable, and all the mischief desired by the fanatics effected.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Sir, there is another reason why the action of Congress should be more decisive now than at any former period, and why the people of the South should call for a more direct expression of the sentiments of this House than heretofore. On former occasions there was no extraordinary feeling of alarm, no excitement, no apprehension of danger, spread throughout that section of the country. The spirit of insurrection and insubordination was not then abroad. It was reserved for the last summer's campaign of a few fanatics; my colleague called them blood-hounds, but the term is too mild. I call them fiends of hell, associating themselves into societies, receiving subscriptions of more than $20,000 or $30,000 for the purpose of printing and circulating among us incendiary pamphlets and such beautiful hieroglyphical calumnies as the one I now hold in my hand, pictures and cuts representing the southern men and southern women in the most odious and disgusting form which it is possible for human ingenuity and devilish purpose to invent. [The paper Mr. G. held in his hand was a large sheet, printed on one side, and illustrated with cuts representing the pretended cruelties inflicted on the negroes of the South.] The authors of such papers are cold-hearted, base, and malignant libellers and calumniators, and deserve the bitterest execrations of every good and patriotic heart—they should be scouted from society.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are called upon to distinguish between these petitioners for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia, and the abolitionists who are members of the societies. Sir, I cannot distinguish between them; I wish I could honestly. I know not one of these abolitionists. I know nothing about them, and cannot, therefore, say any thing against their personal character. But in relation to the schemes of the abolitionists, and the designs of these petitioners, I have this remark to make, that I cannot distinguish between the devil and those who do his works. They are all equally seeking abolition; they are all seeking to subvert the rights of the southern people. They have the same common object, and, mark me, if these petitioners should receive countenance by this House, we shall find many of them—ay, sir, I fear, all of them—soon ranking in the same association and pursuing the same reckless schemes together. They had a common object and common purpose to effect. Did not the gentleman from Vermont himself preach to us about the evils of slavery, and the universal rights of man, and our duties to the African race? Did he not openly avow himself an abolitionist to a greater extent than asked for in this memorial? Did he not declare slavery a sin against Heaven, the effect of which would be, although not avowed, to send every slaveholder to perdition, your Washington among the rest? I listened to the gentleman, and I cannot think I mistook the purport of his language. Sir, these abolitionists (I class them all together) have excited a feeling of alarm in the South which cannot easily be quieted. The safety of our wives and our children is endangered by their mischievous and incendiary attempts to produce a servile insurrection among our slaves. But oh, says the gentleman from Vermont, you are in no danger: all will be effected peaceably and quietly! Sir, will the gentleman permit us to judge for ourselves. We are in the very midst of the slave population, while he is securely sheltered behind the ramparts of the Green Mountains of the North. He can neither see nor hear nor feel the danger with which we are beset, because he knows and feels he is secure from the effects of it, come how and when it may. The gentleman, therefore, will excuse us when we express our own apprehensions and feelings on this subject, because we best know our own situation; we cannot requite his kindness, and admit him to be our guide in such a matter.

But, sir, these beautiful prints, and these devilish pamphlets, are not the only firebrands attempted to be circulated among us. These very memorials themselves, coming here in the midst of all this excitement and alarm, hypocritically canting about the piracy and tyranny of slave-owners have the very same tendency. Gentlemen may conceal it from themselves, but I tell them the tendency is the same—ay, and the design is the same. Why, sir, the abolitionists, from whom gentlemen seem so anxious to separate these petitioners, are now laughing in their sleeves, and openly, too, that they have allies who, by a different route, are indirectly laboring to achieve the same object with themselves, and who give respectability to their designs. Yes, the aid they receive in this way stimulates them to exertion, and animates them to hasten the approach of the final catastrophe they are themselves seeking to bring about. Every movement made in this House for the abolition of slavery within the District is a stepping-stone to the abolitionists to mount up to their work, and encourages them to seek the accomplishment of their purposes; they who tell us that these memorials only look to the District of Columbia, tell us what cannot be credited. If their object was to be limited to the District alone, to the few slaves here, the success would not be worth the trouble, and we should hear nothing about it.

There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, why the House should adopt a more direct and decisive course now than heretofore, growing out of the reasons I have just offered; and it is this: The continuance of debate on this subject is calculated to encourage, if not to excite, the slaves themselves to insubordination and insurrection. Do what you will to prevent it, these things find their way, through some channel or other, into the midst of the slave population. They know every thing that transpires here. They are aware of every thing going on in the North; and there is a spirit of insubordination in some places almost amounting to insurrection among them already. They believe the whole North to be favorable to their emancipation, and they are thus encouraged to exertion; they but little doubt, if they can once organize and commence the attack, the northern people will fly to their succor, and second their efforts. Then I say, sir, these memorials and their presentation are improperly timed; and however I might be disposed at other times to discuss the merits of these petitions, I will not do it now. I appeal, then, to our friends in the North, and to the people of the North, to rescue us, by decisive action upon their part, from these influences, which are thus mischievously operating upon our slave population and our own safety. We do not ask our friends of the North to come personally to our aid in the conflict with which we are threatened. No, sir; come when it may, victory is ours; but we appeal to our brethren of the North in behalf of our wives and our children, and for their protection and security against the instigators of midnight murder and assassination. Our northern friends cannot truly sympathize with our feelings; they cannot realize our true situation; they are distantly removed from our slave population, and know but little of their character and disposition; we are in the midst, and can therefore know and feel the extent and true character of the danger which the efforts of the fanatics are bringing upon us; hence, knowing our danger, and feeling it, too, we appeal (we do not supplicate—supplication is a plant that does not flourish in the South) to the North to do their duty to the South, and to the Union, by discharging their obligations to the constitution, and that speedily.

Mr. Speaker, how ought this question, as it is now presented to us, to be settled? One mode has been attempted, and it failed. Then the only way is to withdraw from these deluded and misguided fanatics all inducements, all hope of aid from the North. Let the northern people themselves tell them, your scheme shall not be carried out. Why is it necessary for us to appeal to the gentlemen of the North? These fanatics are in the northern States, which are sovereign and independent as to their domestic relations, beyond the reach of our laws, and we cannot reach them by any legislation of ours; but the northern people can and ought to do it. However, we have had some specimen of the sincerity with which this scheme has been put down in one part of the North, which I will mention for the credit of the parties concerned. I understand there has been a celebrated Anglo-Scotch vagabond travelling through a certain section of the North, by the name of Thompson, preaching abolition; and I hope I shall not be regarded as uncourteous or ungallant in again referring to the females of the North. Well, this felon, for he deserves no better name, and would disgrace that if it were possible, has been holding forth in the churches and public meeting-houses of the North, lecturing and propagating his incendiarism, to the great horror and indignation of the people. But, what is most singular, the charming influence of the females, those blessed, pious old maids, has protected him from all the rage of the indignant citizens! Ay, sir, even at the very moment when the people surrounded him, breathing threatenings and denunciations, determined to suppress his doings and chastise his insolence, his charming female followers and admirers exercised so powerful a charm over him, that they carried him away unseen, as in the midst of a cloud; whether in their pockets, or how, no one can tell; but so it is, he was carried out unseen, and escaped untouched, entirely through female intervention. How potent the charm, thus to paralyze indignant patriotism and fraternal affection!

Mr. SLADE said Thompson had never been in Vermont.

Mr. GARLAND. Well, I am very glad to hear that Vermont has not been cursed with his presence, and I wish I could say that his principles had never been there; but, somehow or other, all his doctrines have reached there, have apparently taken pretty deep root in some of its soil, and are broached here in their very odious and detestable form and shape. I will, therefore, say to the people of the North, give us your aid in this thing; prove to us the sincerity of your attachment to the Union, and the fidelity with which you will discharge your obligations to the constitutional compact, by suppressing these fanatical, exciting, and dangerous associations against that property which you stand pledged to protect. We love you as brethren, we love the Union; we ask you, as citizens having the power by force of law, which we have not, to put down these abolition schemes, and their aiders and abettors in your midst, and to protect us against these incendiary attempts to bring war and desolation into our very domicils. This, sir, is a national consideration, deeply affecting the southern country, and the Union itself; and I should despise myself if I could allow any other feelings to enter into my consideration, where the property, the lives, or the liberties of my fellow-citizens are at stake.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I need scarcely remark that I do not include all the people of the North with the abolitionists.—God forbid! I believe better of them. Sir, I know them to be incapable of the designs of these midnight murderers; for so I call the abolitionists. They are not open and manly murderers; for they do not dare to show their faces in the South and propagate their schemes, but stand at a distance, safely moored behind the laws and institutions of independent States, artfully exciting, insinuating, and stimulating our slaves to the work of destruction. Sir, they are murderers, in the most obnoxious sense of the term. I could have some respect for the man who boldly marches up and assaults me openly; but I abhor and detest the dastardly fiend who approaches me by stealth, or fires at me behind the bush. I repeat, sir, their object is murderous, and I can prove it out of their own mouths. Is it not notorious that, but a short time ago, one of them boldly avowed that every southern slaveholder ought to be executed? And yet that very fellow walks in broad day, unmolested by men and caressed by ladies, in the streets of a northern city of this Union! Have they not declared, in print, that they would pull down and destroy the very arch of the Union, rather than they would fail to effect their purposes? Sir, is this language, in the midst of our northern friends, to be tolerated? Is this the way the North intends to discharge its duty of protection to the rights of the South, secured by compact? I hope, I trust not. Are these the pious actions of these benevolent servants of God? Sir, they are actions, but they are not those of the holy and peaceful religion of the Saviour of the world, whom they hypocritically profess to follow, and whose religion they profess to propagate. He did not effect, nor seek to effect, the grand object of his mission by violence. No, sir; the religion of the Saviour is of a different order; its object is peace, its works are peace, and its ends are peace. Not so these fanatics. Theirs is the religion which seeks the attainment of its designs by fire and sword, and would drag heretics to the stake, burn them with fagots, or torture them with the rack and the inquisition, to compel obedience to their fanatical notions of religion. The real Christian is never stimulated to, and never incites to, murder and midnight assassination; and I regret the name of Christian should ever have been connected with this unhallowed, detestable association. It is a desecration to the name. Sir, these people must be put down, and that speedily, or dire consequences, which I dread to contemplate, will ensue. The time has arrived when the people of the South must insist upon it. Security, liberty, life, all are involved in this question; and they will never surrender their rights. They may be driven from them, but abandon or surrender them they never will. It may be matter of no serious concern to these meddlers with our domestic rights, with those instigators to the murder of our wives and children, to contemplate our plains drenched with blood in a servile war; they are absent and secure. But to us, who are husbands and fathers, who must be in the midst of it, it is with no slight concern, no ordinary emotion, that we can contemplate or could see the blood reeking from the bosoms of our wives and children, pouring from wounds inflicted through the instigation of these disturbers of our peace, and enemies of our lives and liberties. We should feel, and that acutely, too; we should revenge to the utmost their blood upon the heads of those who shed it. Mr. Speaker, we may suffer much in the conflict with which we are threatened; but be assured that, unless God in his providence has determined our fate otherwise, we shall drive back the storm; we will maintain our property, keep our slaves in subjection, and drive back, with a signal overthrow, these intruders upon our rights.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not, upon this occasion, enter the lists with the gentleman from Massachusetts, to discuss the "sublime merits of slavery," nor with the gentleman from Vermont, into a religious controversy, to prove that slavery is in conformity with holy writ. The latter gentleman may find, if he search his Bible, that the patriarchs of old held their bondmen, as well as their free servants; and both sacred and profane history will teach him that slavery has existed, in one form or another, from the foundation of the world; and by not a few pious and learned divines it is supposed to be a curse pronounced upon the descendants of one of the sons of Noah. But into the philosophy or discussion of these matters I design not to enter. If it be a stain in our escutcheon, I wish to distribute the honor to whom the honor is due, and let our former mother, England, who bequeathed it to us, take her full share. But, sir, who for a long time carried on the African slave trade? The merchants of the North. Who navigated the slave ships? The seamen of the North. Yet they reproach us, having no further profits to derive from the prosecution of the slave trade.

The able and patriotic gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. INGERSOLL] has told us that slavery had been abolished in the North, because the nature of the soil and its productions did not longer justify their employment. A very good and sufficient reason, and withal true; and when we are in that situation that we cannot benefit ourselves by holding slaves, why, we will endeavor to imitate the noble example of our northern brethren, and emancipate too! Interest will certainly induce us to believe that slavery is an evil, as it did our northern brethren. When it is not our interest to hold slaves, then we will emancipate them, too, in imitation of this example.

Mr. Speaker, this question has not been brought upon us by ourselves. We have not interfered with the institutions of the North; and why should they meddle with ours? I will here ask the honorable member from Vermont one question. Will he inform us what we are to do with our slaves, if we abolish slavery in Virginia? Is it intended to let them loose upon us, and to be located among us, upon terms of equality? If not, where have these benevolent schemers provided an asylum for them? But I will make one proposition to him, and to the abolitionists; and it is this: open your purse strings; give the best test of your benevolence; come among us, and buy our slaves, and you may emancipate them at your will, so you remove them from among us. That will be a better test of your sincerity and purity of motive than all your speeches and writings. Till you do this, I emphatically say, let us alone.

Sir, there is another reason why we should not meddle with this subject. What was the condition of things at the formation of the confederacy? During the arduous struggle of the Revolution, you were willing, gentlemen, to fight the battles of freedom side by side with slaveholders. Together the blood of our fathers was shed, and together their bones bleached the battle-field. You were willing to erect this Union in conjunction with the slaveholder, and with him to cement it together.

To bring about so desirable an event, you agreed to restrict the powers of Congress, and prohibit their interference with slavery, and even for a time with the African slave trade. But now it is all wrong. New-fangled doctrines have thrown new lights upon this subject, and you now reproach us with that very thing you have sworn to protect. Generous-minded people of the North! I again appeal to northern members, and emphatically ask, will you violate your plighted faith? Will you reproach those who confided in you, and in their confidence entered into a solemn league with you, and destroy those rights which you have pledged your faith to protect? I hope, I believe not.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended, in the outset of my remarks, to have said so much in relation to these fanatics; but I trust the House will pardon my feelings on this occasion. I will now, sir, as briefly as possible, recur to the constitutional power of this House to legislate on the subject of slavery within the District of Columbia. I shall pass over the Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky, merely remarking that, judging from this resolution, they seem to be fit companions for the abolition priests of the North, who have led some pious females so unwarily into their schemes. As to the article quoted from the Richmond Enquirer, I have only to say that the benevolence of its editor betrayed him into an error, of which I do not doubt he has long since repented. As to the quotation from the Richmond Whig, I have only the same thing to say. In either case, however, I will remark that they were urging the State Government, which they supposed had the constitutional right to interpose. As to the article signed "A South Carolinian," I do not believe it was written by a South Carolinian, but by some individual who assumed that name, for the purpose of giving more force to his remarks, South Carolina being an extensive slaveholding State.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, approach the constitutional question, and would solemnly ask if it is to be seriously argued that the sages of the Revolution, understanding liberty as they understood it, would have manifested so much caution in the framing of the constitution, by salutary restrictions upon this subject, and yet have been so incautious as to leave Congress in possession of this power any where? Where is it found? It is neither expressed directly or indirectly in any one of the provisions of the constitution. Again, sir, is it to be believed, for one moment, that the States of Virginia and Maryland, the foremost in the ranks of those who restricted the power of the Federal Government, would have given up a portion of their citizens, in order that there might be inflicted upon them an unlimited, unmitigated, and unrestricted despotism, reserving not even the right of representation?—for, if the argument of the gentleman from Vermont be true, this Government, within these ten miles square, is as despotic as that of Russia or the Grand Turk. Would the people of Virginia and Maryland have consented to pass off a portion of their citizens, like herds of swine, without one solitary act of restriction and restraint upon the power of the Federal Government over them? Would they have been willing to have erected a despotism in the midst of this Union? Sir, I cannot believe it. This very idea is preposterous. Fortunately for us, however, there is no proof positive on this subject. The language of the act of the Virginia session is clear, unequivocal, and decisive upon the point, and it will be found to answer every argument urged by the gentleman from Vermont.

The proviso to the act of cession by the State of Virginia is in these words: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than as the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States." By this clause no right of soil passes. Congress cannot affect the right of individuals to the soil, only so far as individuals may convey to the United States. The reversion of the soil is in the State of Virginia. Is it not, therefore, most manifest that, with these reservations and restrictions, Virginia regarded the rights of the citizens of the District as effectually secured and guaranteed as they were under her own constitution and laws previous to the cession? Congress cannot declare any thing designated and held as property not to be property, without express grant. In relation to slaves, the constitution regards them as property, and guarantees its security. If the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia exists, then the people of the District, although American citizens, stand on a footing of gross inequality; for Congress is restricted as to all other citizens. I then emphatically ask if Virginia and Maryland did so disfranchise this portion of their former citizens? The language of the act of cession by Maryland is rather more equivocal, but yet the spirit and design were the same. When the objects of the cession expressed in the preamble to the act, the reference to the constitution, and the restricted character of the cession as to property in the said District, are seen, it seems to me there can be no doubt upon this question.

Sir, there is another reason why the States of Virginia and Maryland would not have been guilty of the excess of folly of making the cession unrestricted, and which proves the character of the proviso referred to; and it is this: Maryland was a large slaveholding State, and Virginia the largest in the Union; and they both provided that their citizens should return to their respective Governments whenever the ceded territory should cease to be used as the seat of the Federal Government. Now, sir, extinguish slavery here, and what do you do? You make a rallying point for free negroes in the very centre of slavery itself. Here might be gathered all the disaffected and insubordinate spirits among the slave population of the surrounding States, who might resort here in such hordes that the citizens of the District would be unable to control or check them. I say, sir, the Legislatures of those two States would not, and could not, have been guilty of the folly of making such an unrestricted cession.

Those who contend that Congress has the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia attempt to derive it from these words in the 1st article and 8th section of the constitution, having reference to an anticipated cession of territory to the Federal Government, for a seat of Government: "To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District." The cession of this District was not made until some time after the adoption of the constitution; of course it had no direct reference to this District, or to the question of slavery, because it would not then have been known whether the cession would be made by slaveholding or non-slaveholding States. Any interference with slavery, in any form, by Congress, was expressly restricted; yet it is contended that this clause, making no direct or indirect reference to the subject, conveys this power, so totally at war with the principles of the constitution, and the explicit restriction upon this subject. A very satisfactory interpretation of what was intended by the words "to exercise exclusive legislation" is to be found in the fact that without such a cession of territory, and the right of exclusive legislation, the Federal Government would have had no territory upon which to erect her public buildings, or its Legislature to conduct its deliberations, but would have been at the mercy of State authorities, liable to be disturbed and interrupted at the pleasure of State authorities. It was necessary, then, for safety and security, that the Federal Government should have a territory of its own, and exclusive legislation over that territory, to prevent interruption or disturbance. The necessity will be sufficiently illustrated by the recollection of the fact, that during the sittings of Congress at Philadelphia, previous to the adoption of the constitution, it was surrounded by a mob, and kept in duress during a whole day; and that it finally adjourned to meet at Trenton, in New Jersey. Having territory and exclusive jurisdiction of its own, the Federal Government, by its own laws, protects itself; but without it, it would depend on State authorities for its protection, which would not, probably, always be afforded, and the legislation of the whole nation arrested. The following remarks of Mr. Madison, in the convention of Virginia, will prove the correctness of this view: "He next objects (speaking of Mr. Henry) to the exclusive legislation over the District where the seat of the Government may be fixed. Would he submit that the Representatives of this State should carry on their deliberations under the control of any one of the members of the Union? If every State had the power of legislation over the place where Congress should fix the General Government, this would impair the dignity and hazard the safety of Congress. If the safety of the Union were under the control of any particular State, would not foreign corruption probably prevail in such a State, to induce it to exert its controlling influence over the members of the General Government. Gentlemen cannot have forgotten the disgraceful insults which Congress received some years ago. When we also reflect that the previous cession of particular States is necessary, before Congress can legislate exclusively any where, we must, instead of being alarmed at this part, heartily approve of it."

The words "in all cases whatsoever" cannot be regarded as conveying any independent power, or conferring, contrary to the whole scope and intention of the framers of the constitution, and every principle upon which it is based, all powers of legislation not expressly prohibited. I cannot think the constitution can claim to itself a principle of inherent powers, when all its powers are derivative and restricted. These words must be interpreted to mean all powers of legislation authorized by the principles upon which the constitution is framed, and conferred by that instrument.

With these very few remarks, therefore, I leave this branch of the subject, not deeming it necessary to repeat the able and perspicuous views of my colleague, [Mr. WISE,] so forcibly expressed.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question now seems to be, how is this matter to be decided? It has come up before us, and, in the language of gentlemen, it must be met. We all admit this property is guaranteed to us by the constitution, and that Congress has no power to legislate in relation to it in any of the States. The constitutional power to do so is denied by every member upon this floor. Why, then, was the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States restricted in relation this subject? Because it is property over which we, individually, have control; was interwoven into our system; and the constitution has determined that jurisdiction over it shall not be transferred from the domestic control of the State Governments to that of the Federal, because, in their domestic rights and relations, they are sovereign and independent of the Federal Government, and of each other. How, then, is this question to be decided? I do not wish to avoid a vote upon it in the most direct manner. I am prepared, sir, to meet it, come when it will, whence it will, and in whatever shape it may. But, while I am thus prepared to give my own vote, I am willing to make every concession that gentlemen can ask, reasonably, in the form in which the decision of the House shall be expressed, so that it be decisive and effectual. But I cannot go so far as to record my vote to affirm that slavery is an evil, because I will make no concession whatever to the abolitionists, who are not affected with it, and have nothing to do with it. This is a subject with which we have nothing to do, and my individual opinion need not be expressed. I say, sir, I am willing to make the most liberal concession that the nature of the case will admit. Now, let us investigate the true character of the question under consideration. Our brethren of the North have no direct interest in this question, but our interest is directly at stake; our lives, liberty, property, all are in danger. It has not originated in the South; nothing was heard of it until this abolition society awakened our fears, and alarmed us for our safety. The question, then, is, will you quiet the people of the South? Will you decide this question in such a form as to tranquillize their fears? We are all brethren of the great American family, and have been associated together for upwards of fifty years; let us, then, continue in the same bonds of fraternal love. The southern people tell you we wish to continue in fraternization and union with you; but their march is impeded, and their prospects blighted, by these harassing interferences with their rights. It creates a feeling of insecurity on the stability of our property. We ask, then, our brethren of the North to quiet us in the most decisive form they can, consistent with their duties. If they cannot sustain all the propositions that have been presented, they can either submit or vote for some one that shall be considered decisive. I have disposed of the question of laying these petitions on the table; that course is not decisive, and not adequate to the emergencies of the occasion. Many gentlemen are unwilling to reject any petitions, on the ground that it is the constitutional right of the citizen to petition. I myself, Mr. Speaker, have no objection to that course; but am prepared to vote not only that such petitions be not received, but, if I could do so, I would vote that they should be all thrown together into the midst of the Potomac.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine the proposition to reject, which will likely follow a reconsideration of the reference. In the course of this debate, reference was had to the example of the Senate during the first session of the last Congress, to show that the rejection of this memorial would be disrespectful. Sir, the cases are not analogous. If my recollection be right, the vote of the Senate, in that case, was not upon a proposition to reject, but upon a proposition not to receive the paper. That was more disrespectful than to reject, because the motion to reject is necessarily made after the paper has been presented—after it has been in the hands of the Speaker, and read to the House; but the motion not to receive is in priority of all these formalities, and is therefore a more decisive expression of the disrespect of the body to whom it is offered. The motion to reject means, simply, to reject the application, that is, the prayer of the petitioners or memorialists, and nothing more. But it is contended that even this, as well as the motion not to receive, is at war with the right of petition. Now, sir, what is this right of petition? Gentlemen bring petitions here, present them, and ask reference to some committee of the House. Committees are not organized by law or by the constitution, but by a rule of the House, for its own convenience, and for the convenience of having that brought to its consideration which could not be conveniently done by the whole House. A committee sometimes reports, or passes over sub silentio, or asks leave of the House to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and cannot the whole House do at once what it may do on the recommendation of one of its own committees? Suppose the committee, to whom a petition may be referred, report that it should be rejected, where is the want of power or the disrespect on the part of the House to do the same thing without the reference? If the House confirms the report of the committee, it all amounts to the same thing—to rejection; and the only question is, whether the same thing shall be done directly without reference, or indirectly by reference and report, the House having determined its course before a reference is asked. Now, these petitioners know nothing about the formula of proceeding here, and it is the same thing to them whether their petition be rejected by a direct vote of the House, without going to a committee; or whether it go to a committee, who may report that it be rejected, and the House confirm that report.

But, say gentlemen, it conflicts with the right of petition—a sacred right, guarantied by the constitution. Sir, there is no man on this floor who respects the right of petition more than I do; but yet, with all this regard for the right of petition, there is some respect due to ourselves, and it must always be understood with some restrictions. The right of petition is the right to petition for a redress of grievances affecting the petitioners themselves; but when pious and godly-given ladies, in some few portions of the North, are petitioning to redress my grievances, when I feel no grievance, when I know of no grievance at all, I humbly conceive it to be an improper and impertinent interference with my rights. Now, sir, pray, how are these good and godly and pious and Christian-like ladies affected by slavery in the District of Columbia? They are not living in the District of Columbia, but in Vermont or Massachusetts. They are not affected by slavery in the District of Columbia. They are not stained by its guilt. They are not affected by its sins. Its blood is not upon their skirts. Why, then, should they ask a redress of the grievances of the people of the District of Columbia? Are not the people of the District themselves the best judges of their own grievances; are they not adequate to judge for themselves and to apply for redress of grievances, if they have any; and do they come here, or to their own Legislature, to ask redress? Sir, I must say I respect no petition coming from people who are not interested, directly or indirectly, on the subject about which they petition; and less so when its object is to interfere with the rights of others. When petitions come from those who feel and suffer grievance, couched in respectful language, I will then respect and hear them in the most respectful manner. Then, sir, why not come up directly to the question, and reject this petition, and all petitions of a similar character, instantly? I have referred to what has taken place heretofore in relation to petitions of this character, which I then thought sufficiently decisive—laying them on the table; but that was when the country was quiet, and had not been disturbed by the circulation of pamphlets and vile wood cuts among the slaves of the South. Then we were satisfied, because there was nothing serious to apprehend; the demon of discord had not then been stalking through the land; but now, sir, we see the danger, and all we ask is an express declaration on the part of our brethren of the North of their determination not to legislate upon this subject; this we have a right to ask and to expect. If we had the power, as they have, we would not ask even this of them. No, sir; we could manage these fanatics exceedingly well, if we had them among us, but we cannot reach them as long as they confine themselves within the limits of other sovereign and independent States; we cannot, we will not, violate the jurisdiction of other States.

But, say gentlemen, why press the constitutional question now? I reply, we press it from the most urgent and imperative necessity. It is due to our safety, to our quiet, that we press it. Every other form in which this question has been presented has failed to secure us against the repetition of these memorials and petitions, exciting our passions, and endangering our safety. Nothing, it seems to me, short of a declaration, on the part of Congress, of their want of constitutional power, will restrain these fanatical crusaders from seeking the intervention of Congress in aid of their diabolical schemes, and perpetually harassing the country. I do not ask gentlemen to vote contrary to their sense of right. If they believe Congress has not the power, then this agitating subject will be put to rest, so far as Congress is concerned. If gentlemen think Congress has the constitutional power, let them say so; we shall not, if they decisively refuse all legislation upon the subject, upon grounds of expediency, complain of their opinions upon the mere question of power—a power which they do not intend to exercise, and sever the Union on that account. No, sir, we value it too highly, and love it too dearly. But if the power exists, this House cannot pledge its successors—the South has no security for the future. The constitution provides for its own amendment, by reference to the source of all power—the people. It will be our duty to seek through the people an amendment to the constitution, restricting the power of Congress upon this subject. Such an amendment must and will prevail, if the northern people are sincere, which I do not doubt, in their professions of attachment to the Union, and respect for our rights—seeing, as they must do, the infinite danger to our rights and our safety which would result from the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. This would test the true feelings of the North, and quiet the apprehensions of the South, and secure the Union against the most formidable enemy by which its integrity could be assailed.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Sir, I am anxious to see this distracting question put to rest, and that we may be able to say, with new feelings of national pride, in the language of the poet,

"Where e'er beneath the sun, by sea winds fanned,
There floats the banner of my native land."

Not, sir, the banner of a northern empire, not the banner of a southern empire, but the banner of the Union—the banner which conducted the heroes of the Revolution to victory in the cause of freedom, and which has now waved in triumph for upwards of half a century, untarnished and unscathed. Sir, I hope this question will now end; that our northern brethren will meet it in the most decisive form, and give such an explicit expression of their sentiments as will tranquillize the South on the one hand, and silence the fanatics on the other.

As to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] for whose patriotic feelings, exhibited upon this occasion, I cannot withhold the expression of my highest admiration, I can only say that it is true; but it does not meet the present case; the question before the House relates to the District of Columbia alone. The proposition of the honorable gentleman refers to slavery in the States. The proposition that Congress has no constitutional power to abolish slavery in either of the States of the Union need not be decided, because none assert it; and a decision of that question would in no wise decide the question arising upon this petition.

The only way in which the question can be presented so as to procure the definitive and speedy action of the House, will be by reconsidering the vote of reference, now sought to be reconsidered, which I earnestly hope will be done.

When Mr. GARLAND had finished his speech—

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the House, by a vote of 104 to 79.

The question being then taken, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 137, nays 71.

The CHAIR having stated the question to be whether the vote be reconsidered,

Mr. GLASCOCK asked, if it was carried in the affirmative, what would be the next question?

The CHAIR said it would be on the motion to commit.

Mr. LANE moved an adjournment, but withdrew it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question of reconsideration being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Bell, Bockee, Bouldin, Boyce, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, William K. Mr. OWENS said, in consequence of the wide range which the debate had taken, he had determined to move to lay the petition on the table, with a view to prevent the continuance of the discussion upon the motion to commit. The same course he should pursue in regard to every similar petition which might be presented. His resolutions on the subject, which he had indicated to the House, he would offer when the States were called for resolutions. He moved to lay the petition and the motion to commit on the table.

Mr. WISE made a point of order. Had not the motion to reject precedence of the motion to lay on the table?

The CHAIR said no motion to reject was before the House, and the motion to lay on the table was not debatable.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24.

CONSTITUTION OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked the unanimous con-sent of the House to take up and dispose of the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the constitution and other documents emanating from a convention in Michigan, in reference to the for-mation of a State Government of said Territory.

The unanimous consent of the House having been ob-tained,

Mr. M. remarked, when the subject was last before the House, there were three different propositions pre-sented to its consideration. He had moved that the message of the President of the United States, with the accompanying documents on this subject, be referred to a select committee; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HA-MER] had moved its reference to the select committee already raised on the subject of the northern boundary of Ohio; and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOW-ARD] moved its reference to the Committee on the Ter-ritories.

For himself, Mr. M. said, he had no disposition on the subject. He believed, however, that it was very important the subject be speedily acted upon by Congress. He had taken the trouble to examine the journals of the House in regard to former applications of a similar char-acter; and he had found, without exception, that the course had been to refer all such applications to a select committee. That was the reason which induced him to make the motion he had. He had the whole of the pre-cedents before him, including every State admitted into the Union from the foundation of the Government. He would again remark that he had himself no disposition on the subject; but he presumed there was a disinclina-tion on the part of the mover that the subject should go to a separate and select committee. Mr. M. then stated it as his belief that the two subjects ought to be kept separate and distinct if possible; but, if it met the pleasure of the House, he should be perfectly willing to refer it to the Committee on the Territories, merely remarking that such had been the usage of the House in former instances.

It was true that, in every other case, there had been no conflicting claims; and that circumstance, perhaps, might make an exception to the general rule heretofore pursued with regard to this subject. He hoped the House, however, would promptly refer it either to the one committee or the other, in order that the sense of the House might be speedily ascertained, and the ques-tion settled in a way satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. HAMER then withdrew his motion to refer the subject to the same committee to which the message and documents on the northern boundary of Ohio had been referred.

Mr. H. remarked that, in withdrawing his motion, his principal object was to present another question to the House. He desired that this whole subject should go to the Judiciary Committee, in order to arrive at a fair expression of the sense of the House. He therefore moved that this matter be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STORER said if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] would permit the pending question of reconsid-eration of the vote referring the President's message on the subject of the northern boundary of Ohio to be first disposed of, he would interpose no objection to the wishes of the gentleman in regard to the reference of the other document.

Mr. MASON said he would merely suggest to the House that the two subjects were distinct and indepen-dent questions.

The SPEAKER stated the motion first in order would be the reference to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. VINTON said he hoped the motion of his col-league, to refer this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, would prevail. He had no doubt but the gen-tleman from Virginia, who had moved its reference to a select committee, would bestow upon it an able and faithful examination. Nor did he know of any objection to the gentlemen who compose the Committee on the Territories. It, however, appeared to him that neither a select committee nor the Committee on the Territories was the appropriate committee to take charge of this subject. He believed it was true, as had been stated by the gentleman from Virginia, that on former occa-sions, when States had been admitted into the Union, the subject had been referred to a select committee; but as the case of Michigan was unlike those which had gone before it, they did not furnish a precedent for her's. In no instance, not even that of Tennessee, was there any dispute about boundaries. In every case the question of admission was one of expediency merely; there was nothing else to settle or decide. The subject of the ex-pediency of admitting new States into the Union does not belong to the powers and appropriate duties of any one of the standing committees of the House; and for this reason, in all former cases, a select committee had been raised for the occasion. Even in the case of Tennessee, the claim of right was denied; and, as is apparent from the journal of the proceedings attending her admission, she was received into the Union on the ground of expediency alone. In the present case, Michigan claims that she is a State, by virtue of certain laws and ordinances of Congress already passed. No act of Congress has expressly authorized her to form a constitution and erect herself into an independent State, as was done before the States of Ohio, Indiana, and the other new States since admitted, formed their constitutions. There being no act of Congress authorizing her to form a constitution, nor any in express terms recognising her right to become a State, she deduces that right by interpretation and construction of certain laws. The laws principally relied upon, as conferring upon her this right, are the ordinance of Congress of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory, and an act of Congress of 1805, erecting the Territory of Michigan into a territorial Government. She maintains that, by virtue of certain general terms, in which one of the sections of the latter act is expressed, she has a right to form a constitution and State Government whenever the Territory created by that act shall have sixty thousand inhabitants. Nothing is said in the act about the formation of a State Government; but by connecting it with the ordinance of 1787, and then by putting a construction on the ordinance, she raises the inference that she has a right to form a constitution, and demand admission into the Union, without further or other legislation on the part of Congress. The Michigan construction, both of the ordinance of 1787 and of the act of 1805, is seriously disputed; and Mr. V. said he was one of those who believed her construction of both of them to be wholly erroneous, and her pretensions groundless. Many other acts of Congress were connected with, and explanatory of, the two acts. Now, when laws are to be explained, and rights deduced from their interpretation, the Judiciary Committee, and it alone, would seem to be the appropriate committee to discharge that duty. So long as Michigan puts forth her claim to admission on the ground of right, and does not ask it as a favor, the question, and the only question, to be determined is, do these acts bear her out in her interpretation of them? For his part, he had no doubt that Congress had an absolute and plenary power over the Territory of Michigan, and could make a State of it or not, at its own pleasure and discretion, and with such boundaries as it might deem expedient, subject only to the qualification, that its southern boundary could not be extended into the territory of the States south of it.

Upon so grave a matter of interpretation as that set up by Michigan, it was important to bring to its decision the best legal talents of the House. The Judiciary Committee was always supposed to be composed of gentlemen of the highest legal attainments; and being selected with reference to those attainments, and without regard to this question in particular, its decision would be looked upon as an impartial exposition of the law; and, on this account, it would be entitled to and receive more of the respect of the House than would be given to the report of a select committee, organized for the occasion. An able gentleman from the State of New York presides over the Judiciary Committee, and no member of it being from those States beyond the Ohio, which have an interest in the question of boundary, (which is one of the legal questions involved in the claim of Michigan for admission, with the constitution she has formed,) an impartial decision upon these pretensions might be expected.

Mr. V. said he desired it to be understood that he knew no objection to the Committee on the Territories, so far as it respects the gentlemen composing it. He thought, however, it was not the appropriate committee, because the object of its creation was to attend to the business and interests of the Territories, as such, and did not contemplate its action or decision upon a question like the present. The rights of the adjacent States are involved in this question, and, for that reason, it would seem not to be the proper committee. The Committee on the Territories is presumed solely with a reference to the knowledge possessed by its members of the local wants and interests of the Territories, and without any regard to their legal attainments, which alone could fit them to decide the questions to which the pretensions of Michigan give rise. It would therefore be very proper to place on the Territorial Committee gentlemen of all professions, while it would be a matter of surprise if any other than lawyers, and those, too, of high legal attainments, were put upon the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, did not think the subject ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. He hoped the House would not at this time go into any examination of the merits of the controversy—a controversy he hoped to see adjusted to the satisfaction of all parties. Mr. M. then referred to the proceedings in the cases of Tennessee and Ohio, as recorded in the journals, in both of which select committees were appointed. Such had been the uniform practice of the House. It was true that the subject did not appropriately belong to any one of the committees of the House, for it was an extraordinary application. Taken altogether, if a select committee was not the appropriate one, it appeared to him the Committee on the Territories was the most appropriate. Still, he hoped the former course would be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD, having made the motion to refer this matter to the Committee on the Territories, would very briefly state his reasons. He thought so intricate a subject should be referred to one of the regular standing committees of the House, for the reasons he had stated when he made the motion. He was aware of the former usage of the House to refer applications for the admission of new States into the Union to a select committee, and that that long practice ought not lightly to be departed from; but, since the admission of the last State into the Union, the Committee on the Territories, whose peculiar province he thought this matter was, had been organized, namely, in 1825. Prior to that year, no such committee had existed in that House. [Mr. H. then desired the Clerk to read the resolution under which it was organized.] The non-existence of such a committee he believed to be the reason why this subject had been referred to a select committee. That reason, however, no longer existed, and he hoped the House would suffer it to take the reference he thought to be the only appropriate one. Mr. H. then referred to the proceedings of the last Congress on the same subject, to be found in Journal of the House, pages 33 and 398. For himself, he said, he was totally indifferent to what committee the House should send it, believing only that the whole subject should go the same committee. It was for that reason he had made the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House had departed from the practice settled by the last Congress, and referred the subject of the Ohio boundary line to a select committee, instead of to the Committee on the Territories. He hoped, therefore, both subjects would be sent to the latter committee.

Mr. STORER next addressed the House upon the question before it. Whatever difference of opinion, said Mr. S., may exist among the delegation of Ohio upon other points, it gives me pleasure, sir, to believe that we are united upon this question. It is not my wish to give the present debate a wider range than the motion of my colleague would properly embrace under the rules of the House, though the mode in which the subject has been heretofore discussed might seem to require a departure from the usual course of debate. Yet, sir, whenever the important matters connected with the message of the President, which are asked to be referred to a select committee, shall come before this House, and the field is fairly opened to argue the merits of her border controversy, as an humble Representative of Ohio, I shall not shrink from duty. Sir, it is not, as might be presumed from the manner in which the reference to a select committee, or to the Committee on the Territories, has been regarded by the gentlemen who have advocated these propositions, that the message of the President, with the documents attached to it, embraced the question, merely, whether the Territory of Michigan could be admitted into the Union or not; but the whole of the unfortunate dispute in relation to the northern boundary of Ohio is opened for consideration. The constitution of Michigan, which has been laid upon our tables, is predicated upon the hypothesis that the boundary between her and Ohio is established. And she insists, in the ordinance, by her convention, that her territorial limits are irrevocably determined. By these acts, sir, a valuable part of Ohio is taken from her jurisdiction, and, under the pretence of claiming admission into the Union, an attempt is made by the same movement to secure a recognition, if not the establishment of a boundary, that Ohio never will admit, if she is true to herself. If the question was one of admission as a State only, which could be examined and decided without reference to the rights of other members of the Union, I should, perhaps, have no objection to the reference asked by the honorable gentleman from Virginia; but when I am assured that the boundaries of three States are to be changed without their consent, and, sir, against their express protestations, I wish to inform the House that the subject assumes a graver character than it would seem many have attached to it.

Disguise the matter as we will, the decision of any committee to whom it will be referred must be upon the merits of the whole question; and it is not the least important consideration, that, as legal rights are claimed to be involved, they should be subjected to the scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary, whose appropriate function is to give construction to the laws of the Union, preparatory to the action of the House. It is asserted by Michigan, in her memorials and publications, and we have been favored with not a few, whether official or otherwise it is not for me to say, that her claim to admission into the Union depends upon the ordinance of 1787, and the law of 1805: to these she has referred as the foundation of her right, and by them she must be judged. Now, sir, upon so important, so responsible and delicate a matter as the increase of our Federal Union, depending not upon questions of policy or expediency, but the simple claim of mere right, I would ask, what committee is so appropriate as that of the Judiciary? An ordinance of Congress, under which three States have already been organized, and which, if I can confide in the periodicals of the day, has been pronounced, by high authority on this floor, as conferring upon Michigan a right as sacredly vested "as any compact ever ratified in heaven"—an ordinance, sir, the wisdom of whose provisions has been felt and acknowledged throughout our whole western valley—upon the faith of which Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have long confided; and if it is now to receive a construction where they are interested, they ask that the same measure of justice should be meted to them as is extended to the humblest individual in the Union.

Sir, upon every question where the citizen appeals to Congress, claiming indemnity for the consequence of any act which has been remotely caused by or depends upon a law of the land, his memorial is always referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; they, sir, have the appropriate control on all such questions, from the very nature of their organization. Selected for their legal acquirements and general knowledge of the interests of the Government as well as the rights of the citizen, taken from all portions of the country, and not knowing in advance what will be submitted to them, they can enter upon their duties with impartiality and without feeling. Not, sir, that I would detract at all from the ability of any special committee which might be appointed, nor distrust their candor, intelligence, or integrity; but I should feel that I had not done my duty, if I did not urge the reference to the committee designated by my colleague.

Sir, I have said the humblest individual is protected by that committee; and I ask for Ohio no other right than he, in his relative situation, could properly assert. We do not wish, sir, to vaunt; it is not for a State like ours, great and populous as she is, to arrogate any superior right, or ask any extraordinary interference. We place ourselves on a level with all our sister States; and, while claiming for ourselves no more than they honorably could, we shall insist upon all that is justly secured to us. It has been said that the powerful were waging war with the weak, and on this floor a picture has been drawn not very flattering to the dignity or the honor of our State. As I have already said, this is not the time to defend ourselves against such insinuations, or repel such charges: when the proper period shall arrive, I trust that the Representatives of Ohio will be prepared to silence every unmeaning sarcasm, and throw back every imputation, come from where it will, and when it will.

It is urged by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that it has been the usual course to refer all such memorials to select committees; and he instances the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Now, sir, there is a manifest distinction between these cases and that of Michigan. In those, a convention had been already held under the act of Congress; and when the constitutions they offered for approval were submitted to a select committee, it was only to ascertain whether, under the ordinance of 1787, they were republican in their character. All previous steps had been provided for by the laws authorizing the convention to be held. But Michigan comes before us demanding admittance, without previous consultation, and without asking our consent. She has formed her constitution, established her Government, and proclaimed it as already in full force. Not merely the question of the character of the constitution, but the right to admission, are involved. The gentleman has said that he supposes the preparatory steps to the passage of the several laws authorizing conventions to be held in Indiana, Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama, were referred to the Committee on the Territories; but it would seem that could not be the case, as all these States were admitted previous to 1825, and there was no standing Committee on the Territories until that year. But, sir, be the fact as is contended for, the present is an extraordinary case, full of delicacy and responsibility; and we who are deeply involved in the controversy would again repeat, let us have the opinion of our legal advisers.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland supports his motion for a reference to the Territorial Committee on the ground that the organization of that body embraces, most appropriately, the matters asked to be referred. The language of the 70th rule of the House is, that "It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Territories to examine into their legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings, and to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents." And, sir, with what propriety can the interests of a State be referred to a Committee on the Territories, whose only power it is to supervise their acts, regulate by law their internal police, and protect the interests of their inhabitants?

But, sir, we do not consider that the Territory of Michigan is a party to this controversy, so far as Ohio has a right to be regarded in the issue. We insist it is a question between the Government of the United States and the State whose interests are confided to our care. We hold that Government as responsible for all the acts of her Territories, while they are under her control, and while she has the power to regulate their proceedings. And, sir, if it shall ever become necessary to speak out on this point, in plainer language, I shall not hesitate to state my own convictions. Yes, sir, if any person in any part of this Government shall be found to have interfered with the interests of Ohio, and exerted his influence to her prejudice, I have no doubt the Legislature of our State will regard the subject as becomes her dignity and her honor; and, as one of her Representatives on this floor, I shall not shrink from urging the investigation.

I would ask, sir, before I conclude, if it has been fully understood by the House that Michigan already considers herself in the Union, though she is asking, it is said, to be admitted? She has her constitution, her Governor, and her whole State organization within the Territory, where similar officers are now acting under the laws of the United States. This, sir, is an "imperium in imperio"—a State within a Territory—independent, as she claims, and yet applying for the privilege of a sister republic. I should hail, sir, her admission into this glorious Union, when under the sanction of the law she makes her appeal; but if she can by this indirect mode become a State, I would ask, what can prevent her withdrawal from the Union whenever she might deem it expedient? If she can come into the Union without the previous action of Congress, the result is clear, there is no constitutional tie to bind her to the republic.

To the gentleman from Virginia, I would say that he must not be surprised at the warmth of my appeal. He can appreciate the motives which govern me. His attachment to his ancient State cannot be stronger than mine to that of which I am proud. I would assure the gentleman that Ohio, and her sister State, Kentucky, still claim the old Commonwealth as their common mother; and well may the parent be proud of her children.

Mr. LANE also advocated the motion to refer the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, in opposition to the former practice of the House, which he contended had never had a cause similar to the one at present under consideration.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, called the attention of the House to the fact that the hour had arrived assigned for the election of a chaplain.

The House proceeded to execute the order. Several nominations were made, and, after three unsuccessful balloting, the fourth stood as follows:

For Mr. Stockton,	-	-	96
Mr. Comstock,	-	-	83
Scattering,	-	-	10

So the Rev. Mr. STOCKTON was declared to be duly elected.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, by leave of the House, submitted a motion, that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday; which was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28.

CONSTITUTION OF MICHIGAN.

The House resumed the consideration of the message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the constitution and other documents, originating with a convention in the Territory of Michigan, with a view to the formation of a State Government out of said Territory.

The question pending being that of reference, a motion having been made to refer the subject to the Committee on the Territories, and also a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said he would avail himself of this opportunity to say a few words on this subject. He believed this to be an entirely new question. The House had never, on any former occasion, entertained one precisely similar to this. The general rule, he understood, was, that when a subject is proposed, although in some respects it may be new, yet, if it be referrible to the proper scope of duty of any of the standing committees, it ought to be referred to said committee. This he took to be the general rule of this House; and it struck him that this subject ought to go to some one or other of the standing committees. It seemed to be a question whether this subject ought to go to the Committee on the Territories, or to the Committee on the Judiciary. He thought it ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This question, in relation to the boundary of Michigan, had heretofore been submitted to the Committee on the Territories, and that committee, after an investigation of some days, would not take upon themselves the decision of it, because they considered it a judicial matter; and if it was a judicial matter then, it is certainly a judicial matter now. Whenever a question involving any point of law is to be examined, it is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. There are involved in this question various points of law.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. J. Y. MASON] said that all precedents were in favor of a select committee. He asked the gentleman where there was an instance precisely analogous to the present one? He knew of none. If, then, it be conceded that the Judicial Committee is the correct one to determine all matters of law, it certainly is the committee to which this subject should be appropriately referred.

Mr. JOHN Y. MASON said, as there seemed to be some confusion of the question under consideration, he would withdraw his motion to refer to a select committee. He said, in the cases heretofore of the admission of new States, there had been a law passed authorizing the people to meet in convention and form a constitution. At present, Michigan has established a constitution, and she claims it as her right to be admitted into the Union. He remembered that the Committee on the Territories had, at a former session, reported a bill authorizing the people to do the very thing they have now done; but it was not considered. The subject now to be investigated is this: Is Michigan entitled to be admitted as a State into the Union? He said the boundary question had already been referred to an able committee, and that he hoped the merits of the question, when they came to be discussed, would be met in a spirit of liberality and justice. In his mind, the judicial question could hardly be settled by this House. Michigan asks, as one of the States, to be admitted into the Union. That is the question. The boundary question ought to be kept separate and distinct. He was disposed to decide the question fairly and impartially. His impression was that the message ought to go to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, said he was much gratified that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] had withdrawn his motion to refer the President's message, and the copy of the constitution adopted by the people of Michigan for forming a State Government, to a select committee; and as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] had suggested to his colleague, [Mr. HAMER,] that the question might first be taken on referring the subjects to the Committee on the Judiciary, by moving to amend his [Mr. HOWARD's] motion, by striking out "Territories" and inserting "Judiciary," he would, if his colleague was in his seat, request him to move the amendment, instead of relying on his motion to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, which would be the second motion in order. He expressed the hope that, if the question was taken first on the motion to refer to the Committee on the Territories, it would be negatived, as he believed the Judiciary was the proper committee to investigate the subject.

Constitution of Michigan.

He regretted that the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] in rising to correct errors in others, should have fallen into them himself. He had stated to the House the question of boundary was only incidental, and ought not to affect the main question, which was, as the gentleman stated, "shall Michigan be admitted into the Union as one of the confederacy?"

The question of boundary, Mr. W. contended, was so intimately connected with the admission of Michigan, that it could not be separated without violating the rights of three States. To ascertain what territory Michigan claims, it is necessary to examine several documents; and it can be most satisfactorily demonstrated by them, that Michigan claims not only the land west of the Miami bay, between the lines run by Harris and Fulton, but a much larger extent of territory in the northeast part of Ohio, a part of which was within the district he represented, and a part of it in the district represented by his colleague, [Mr. SLOANE.]

The boundaries of the proposed State are declared by the convention to be established by the act of Congress of the 11th January, 1805, in conformity to the fifth article of the ordinance providing for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio.

The fifth article of said ordinance, so far as the boundary is concerned, is as follows: "There shall be formed in said Territory (the Northwestern Territory) not less than three nor more than five States; and the boundaries of the States, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows, to wit: The western State in the said Territory shall be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio, and Wabash rivers, a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Port Vincents, due north, to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, and by the said territorial line to the Lake of the Woods and Mississippi.

"The middle State shall be bounded by the said direct line, the Wabash, from Port Vincents to the Ohio, by the Ohio by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of Great Miami to the said territorial line, and by the said territorial line. The eastern State (which is now Ohio) shall be bounded by the last-mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennsylvania, and the said territorial line: Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered, that if Congress hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one in two States in that part of said Territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan."

This ordinance was adopted on the 13th of July, 1787; and at that time it was supposed, as evidenced by all the maps then extant, that the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan was so far north that a line drawn due east would strike the lake, or the territorial line, far north of the most northerly cape of the Miami bay. It has been said, here and elsewhere, that this ordinance "is as unalterable as the decrees of Heaven."

The Territory of Michigan is bounded, by the act of January 11, 1805, as follows: "All that part of the Indiana Territory which lies north of a line drawn east from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan, until it shall intersect Lake Erie, and east of a line drawn from the said southerly bend, through the middle of said lake, to its northern extremity, and thence due north to the northern boundary of the United States."

This ordinance and the act of the 11th of January, 1805, as the southern bend or extremity of Lake Michigan is now ascertained to be situate, conflict with the title of the Connecticut Western Reserve; and it will be seen that the ordinance, and the several cessions and acts connected with the question of boundary, involve important if not intricate questions of law, which can best be decided by the Judiciary Committee.

It is known to every member of the House, that the State of Connecticut, under the charter of Charles II., claimed to have a title to all the land which lay west of the Narragansett bay, south of Massachusetts, and north of the forty-first degree of north latitude, and extending west to the Pacific Ocean or South Sea. She contended with the colony of New York for that part of her territory which was embraced within the degrees of latitude by which she was bounded. This dispute was settled in the year 1733. She contended with Pennsylvania for a part of the territory embraced within her limits, which was decided by the federal court at Trenton.

The extensive tracts of western land engaged the early attention of those States whose charters did not embrace any portion of that region, and they required, inasmuch as these lands were uninhabited, and had been conquered in the common cause, that they be surrendered for the common benefit of all the States. The State of Connecticut was one of the States to cede a portion of her western territory.

The act authorizing the cession by her delegates in Congress, or any two of them, bears date the 14th of September, 1786, and authorized the conveyance of all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim, of the State of Connecticut, to certain western lands, beginning at the completion of the forty-first degree north latitude, one hundred and twenty miles west of the western boundary line of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as then claimed by said Commonwealth, and from thence by a line drawn north, parallel to and one hundred and twenty miles west of the said west line of Pennsylvania, and to continue north until it comes to forty-two degrees and two minutes north latitude. The State of Connecticut claimed all the land west of the State of Pennsylvania, north of the forty-first degree of north latitude, and south of latitude forty-two degrees two minutes. It will be perceived by the cession, that she reserved a tract of land lying between the degrees of latitude mentioned, and extending west from the Pennsylvania line one hundred and twenty miles. If the boundaries of Michigan, as they are given in her constitution, based on the ordinance of 1787, be established, then a part of the counties of Cuyahoga, Geauga, and Ashtabula, will be included within the State of Michigan. The number of citizens which must be affected by this decision is from twenty to thirty thousand. It is strictly a legal question, whether the State of Connecticut, being a party to the ordinance of 1787, waived or abandoned any portion of the reservation in her deed of cession in 1786. This question the Committee on the Judiciary is competent to decide; but the Committee on the Territories, not necessarily being composed of gentlemen of legal attainments, is not supposed to be competent to decide intricate law questions, arising from deeds of cession, ordinances, and laws.

Constitution of Michigan.

[DEC. 28, 1835.]

In accepting this cession from the United States, they did not confirm the title in the State of Connecticut in that part which she reserved. She had sold it to a company; but doubts existing whether her title under the charter of Charles the Second to the land lying west of the east line of New York was valid, Congress, by an act, approved on the 28th of April, 1800, ceded to the Governor of the State of Connecticut all the land within the Connecticut Reserve, for the use and benefit of all persons holding and claiming under the State of Connecticut, on condition that the State of Connecticut, within eight months, released all her right to all other lands lying westward, northwestward, and southwestward, of the eastern line of New York, and on the further condition that said State released, within said eight months, all judicial title to the said Connecticut Western Reserve. The conditions were complied with by the State of Connecticut, by a deed of cession executed on the 30th of May, 1800.

Michigan claims under the ordinance of 1787, and the act of Congress of January 11th, 1805.

The State of Ohio, as to the Reserve mentioned, claims under the cession of the State of Connecticut of 1786.

If Michigan shall contend that the State of Connecticut abandoned or waived her right by assenting to the ordinance, the State of Ohio will reply that the title to the State of Connecticut was affirmed by the United States in the act of April 28th, 1800.

The Connecticut Western Reserve has been supposed to form a part of the eastern State, according to the division of the Northwestern Territory prescribed by the ordinance; but if the ordinance abrogated the reservation of the State of Connecticut, and is unaltered, as contended by Governor Cass, in his letter of the 1st of November, 1817, and as has been said here, then all that lies north of a due east line, drawn through the southern extremity of Lake Michigan, is not within the jurisdiction of the State of Ohio, but within the present Territory of Michigan, and will, if the constitution be accepted, be a part of the new State.

He was unwilling to submit so many important legal questions, involving as they did the political rights of a large portion of his constituents, to any committee not qualified by legal learning to decide them.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] had exhorted the House to view the subjects calmly and dispassionately, in which he (Mr. W.) most cordially concurred.

Mr. CORWIN, of Ohio, rose and said: It was not his intention, at the opening of this discussion, to protract the debate a moment; but he was compelled, by a sense of imperative duty, to ask the attention of the House, for a few moments, to a view of this subject presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] who had just taken his seat. He had also a word to say (if he had rightly understood him) to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The gentlemen, said Mr. C., seemed both to consider the question of boundary between Ohio and the proposed State of Michigan as a judicial question. It is very clear that, if this be a judicial question purely, it will be difficult to establish the right of this House to adjudicate and determine it. It is of great importance, Mr. Speaker, that we should understand well, before we act, whether we are acting within the scope of our acknowledged constitutional powers. If there be a doubt, therefore, whether this question of boundary, or any other which may belong to the main proposition, (the admission of the new State,) be a question proper to be decided here, or referred to the judicial department, that doubt should be sufficient to send the whole to the Judiciary Committee—that committee being, both by the law of this House and its practice, our legal and constitutional advisers.

Gentlemen will see the propriety of bringing this subject, with all its attendant topics, to the notice of that committee, when it is once perceived that the question of boundary cannot be separated from the question of admission of the new State into the Union. It is incontrovertible that we have no power to alter, modify, or amend, the constitution of Michigan. This can only be done by a convention of the people of that Territory. They have sent us an entire instrument, under which they proposed to become one of the American confederacy. We must therefore admit them with the constitution of their choice, as it is here presented, or we must reject them, if there be any thing in that constitution which compels us to that course. If gentlemen will turn to the constitution of Michigan, it will be seen that it ordains as well the boundaries of the proposed State as the rights, civil and political, of its inhabitants. They propose to become a portion of the Union, in the new character of a sovereign State, with territorial limits which comprehend a large and most interesting portion of two other sovereign States, to wit: Indiana and Ohio. This is determined by a glance at the maps of the country. The committee, then, which shall be charged with the investigation of this subject, must either leave that part of the constitution of Michigan, which ordains the boundaries of the State, out of view altogether, and admit them to come into the Union, claiming, if you please, to impose her form of government on all the people and over all the territory of Ohio and Indiana, or they must decide whether that portion of disputed territory, comprehended within the limits of the new State, belongs in truth and by law to Michigan, or to Ohio and Indiana, according to their known claims, respectively.

Will any committee, or will this House, admit a State into this Union without ascertaining its territorial jurisdiction? Or will they, if it can be avoided, admit a State into this family of republics, with a license to sue one or two of her sisters? When she comes and knocks at your door, asking permission to come into your house, that she may thereby more easily fight for and dispossess two of its old inmates of a portion of their property, will you take her by the hand and spirit her on to litigation, or more probably to a contest of force? Sir, I am very sure no such fatuity will ever possess this House; It is certain that no such necessity is imposed on us. What, then, will your committee do? They will examine and determine whether the constitution of Michigan is consistent with the rights of Indiana and Ohio.

I ask the gentlemen, not merely of the legal profession, but those of every class in this House, to whom they would apply for an opinion on such a subject, were they personally interested? Michigan claims to extend her constitution over the citizens of other States, as now constituted, by virtue of a supposed compact, to that effect, in the ordinance of 1787. How is the force of that claim to be ascertained? Who shall say whether a particular clause in that ordinance rises above the changeable and repealable character of ordinary legislation, and assumes the more sacred and inviolable nature of a contract? No man, however elevated his general attainments, can be found vain enough to imagine himself competent to give an intelligent and safe answer to the question here involved, unless he be to some extent conversant with law as a science. Again, sir: The ordinance under which Michigan claims is but a law of Congress. Ohio and Indiana both claim under acts of Congress and compacts made with them as States. If these conflict, who is competent to determine which is paramount to the other? To what committee, in short, does this House refer questions of law? The answer given in every other case to this question has been uniform—"the standing Committee on the Judiciary." Gentlemen who look only to the isolated fact of admission into the Union will find that they can no more arrive at that point, without first meeting and deciding all the grave questions of law I have suggested, than they could transfer themselves from this hall to the northern lakes, without passing over the intermediate space.

I hope gentlemen will not deem it beneath the dignity of this House to consult in this matter a little the feelings and views of both parties to this question of boundary. With them it has always been viewed as mainly a question to be resolved by a right construction of the acts and laws of Congress. It has thus been contested on both sides. You are appealed to as a final arbiter. They will expect you to call to your aid that committee to whom the nation look for correct opinions when construction of law is the question. Who has ever heard, till now, of submitting a legal proposition to the Committee on the Territories? Sir, I disclaim all idea of drawing comparisons between the individuals composing either of these committees. I only insist that the laws of the House have assigned to each their appropriate function, and the Speaker is presumed to have arranged the talent of the House in reference to those laws. For the people of my own State I only ask a fair trial, and in the usual way. Give them these, and those fearful excitements, of which the gentleman from Virginia has spoken, will be at once subdued into acquiescence in the decision, whether friendly or adverse to their claims. But should this House, to whom the appeal, in a generous confidence, has been made, blunder in the dark upon a wrong and unusual course, and ultimately decide against them, we may then look for agitations, accompanied with more frightful violence than the gentleman has imagined.

I flatter myself that it is apparent to all, that now is the most propitious time to settle this unhappy controversy. I imagine all will agree that it is competent for this House to settle it. I entreat gentlemen not to think of leaving the question open. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia, whether he could take pleasure in seeing three sovereign States prostrate before the judicial tribunals, asking of your courts to determine whether they were States! or, if States, whether they had any territory, and how much! Sir, unbounded as my confidence has been, and is, in the federal courts, for their sakes, as well as the country, I do not wish to see questions which agitate great political communities brought frequently before them for decision. To avoid this, and to put forever beyond the power of contest this cause of discord and disunion, I entreat the House to send this subject to the only committee competent to analyze and present in a connected view all the questions that cluster round it; and, with such a report, I do not permit myself to doubt but the House will come to a conclusion as satisfactory to, as it will be obligatory upon, all concerned.

Mr. HOWARD said, understanding it to be the wish of the gentlemen from Ohio to get a vote on their motion for a reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, he would not impede that wish, though he should himself vote against it. He hoped it would be sent to the Territorial Committee, believing, as he did, that to be the proper course. The delegation from Ohio were said to be unanimous on this question; and if the House should consent to the motion of the gentleman from that State, [Mr. HAMER], it would perhaps create distrust in the minds of the people of Michigan. Besides, Mr. H. contended, this was not a judicial question. It was a question of expediency, entirely out of the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. There was no point of legality involved in it. He should vote against that reference; but, for the purpose of accommodating the gentleman from Ohio, would, for the present, waive his motion to refer the matter to the Committee on the Territories, pledging himself to renew it, should the House reject, as he hoped it would, the motion to refer the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, again advocated the question before the House, that the Committee on the Judiciary was the only proper tribunal to which this subject should be sent.

Mr. H. EVERETT hoped that both questions, that of the Ohio boundary line and the Michigan constitution, would be sent to the same committee; for the consideration of the one question necessarily embraced the other. If the question of boundary was the only one, he would have no objection to send it to the Committee on the Territories; but the other involved matters purely of a legal character, and of itself would go to the Judiciary Committee. Being of opinion that both should go to the same committee, he should vote in favor of the motion then before the House, to send the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was then taken on this motion, and decided as follows: Yeas 113, nays 77:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Beardsley, Bell, Bond, Boon, Boyd, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Childs, Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Darlington, Davis, Deberry, Denny, Evans, Everett, Farlin, Forester, French, Philo C. So the message of the President of the United States, and the accompanying documents, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWARD expressed his hope that the House would then take up the motion to reconsider the reference of the papers on the northern boundary line of Ohio to a select committee, and he moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose. The rules were suspended: Ayes 124, noes not counted.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS inquired what would be the effect if the motion to reconsider prevailed?

The CHAIR said it would place the subject in possession of the House, precisely as if no reference had ever been made.

Mr. BOND, of Ohio, said that, in common with all his colleagues, he felt a peculiar desire that the motion now under consideration might prevail. I will not (said Mr. B.) attempt to disguise the fact that I cherish a deep and abiding interest in the result. The subject which gives rise to this motion, sir, is one of universal and intense interest in Ohio, and the remark made the other day by one of my colleagues, expressive of the unanimity of our entire delegation in Congress, is equally true as to the whole population of our State. No matter what is or may have been the difference of opinion among us, touching many of the great questions which occasionally excite and agitate this nation, I take leave to say, sir, that the people of Ohio, in relation to the subject-matter of the President's message now under consideration, believing it to affect their sovereignty, are one and undivided. It must therefore be manifest to the House, that a subject which so suddenly unites both sections of two great parties, holding generally adverse opinions, must possess more than ordinary influence.

I appeal, then, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, if, in disposing of this motion, great care should not be taken to impress all the parties in interest with a conviction that the utmost fairness and impartiality have marked our deliberations and proceedings in regard to it. If it should appear that the question has been prejudged, or committed to a tribunal any member of which has already decided it, it is absolutely certain that you will fail in reconciling the losing party to your judgment, although its propriety and justice may be susceptible of easy demonstration. It is admitted to be most desirable to convince all the parties in a controversy, that they stand upon an equality before their triers. If they believe in the impartiality of the tribunal, they are the more ready to abide the judgment, though adverse to their wishes. But if a contrary impression is created, you can never appease those against whom you decide, and thus will defeat one of the great ends of government.

I have been induced to make these suggestions, Mr. Speaker, because of the ascertained and deliberate judgment and decision of the distinguished chairman of the select committee to whom this subject has been referred. I beg the worthy gentleman to pardon me in making this allusion to him. I assure him it is not done in any spirit of unkindness, nor from the slightest motive of disrespect. I have been an observer of a part of the long and distinguished public career of that gentleman, and have seen in it much to approve, and nothing that would occasion me, knowingly, to wound his feelings. I do not complain, sir, because the gentleman has examined the subject, nor because he has made up and publicly expressed an opinion against us. All this he had an unquestionable right to do, and, indeed, I believe was probably constrained to examine the subject from his official station in this House at a former session. But a high and solemn sense of duty enjoins it on me to say that, having done these things, the worthy gentleman is not an impartial trier, and that it would be but mockery to send this subject to him, under the pretence of his now investigating it, and reporting the result to this House. Sir, we already know his opinions and his judgment upon this matter; and I assimilate the case to that of a juror who, having once sat in a cause, is disqualified from being placed on the venire in any subsequent trial of the same matter.

Mr. Speaker, I am an entire stranger to the opinions of all the other gentlemen named on this committee. I am not sure that I have the honor of an acquaintance with any of them, but hope to have before our session closes. But, in pressing this motion, sir, it is due from me to say to them all, as I have already said to their chairman, and I do it with great pleasure, that it is far from my wish to offer the committee, collectively or individually, the slightest disrespect. An earnest desire, as you will recollect, Mr. Speaker, was felt and expressed by myself to you, in person, that this committee should not be named until this motion, which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] had then given notice he would make, should be disposed of. In this request, the gentleman from Maryland, to whom I have alluded, was kind enough to unite. I regret, sir, that your imperative sense of duty prevented a compliance with our request. No doubt the Chair was right; but could I have been indulged, I should have been relieved from performing this day what cannot but be esteemed a delicate and unpleasant duty.

But, Mr. Speaker, I ask the reconsideration of this motion on other grounds, which I esteem equally strong, and which happily involve no question of fastidious delicacy.

There are questions of high legal import involved in this dispute—matters for judicial inquiry. It is unnecessary now to press them. The construction, too, and legal interpretation of several acts of Congress, and of what, on a former occasion, was justly termed by the gentleman from Massachusetts the "matchless and irrepealable ordinance of 1787," all necessarily attend this investigation.

If, indeed, as has been said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] there are mixed questions of law and fact, coupled also with those of expediency, still greater is the necessity for having a trained legal mind to separate and decide them. By our rules we have a standing Committee on the Judiciary, composed, as it is presumed to be, of gentlemen eminent for their legal acquirements, and who may be said to be the legal advisers and counsellors of this House. It is to this committee, sir, that we should look for the investigation and determination of such questions as I have stated to be involved in this subject; and admitting that there are gentlemen of eminent legal acquirements on the select committee, and I am far from disputing it, still it would be productive of great confusion and irregularity to vary from what is, or ought to be, the settled practice of the House.

It is wrong to commit legal or judicial inquiries to any other than our standing committee on such subjects. It would be an encroachment on the province of that committee, and ought not to be indulged in for slight causes.

Before taking my seat, sir, I must be permitted to allude to a remark thrown out by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] at whose hands I have already received too much kindness to suppose he would knowingly press a fallacious argument against us.

In discussing a matter nearly connected with this now under consideration, my friend from Maryland thought that the House ought not to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, since it was known to be the unanimous wish of the delegation from Ohio that it should be so done, as it might therefore be charged that there was partiality, or an undue influence, by our undivided front. Now, so far from this being a just inference from such premises, I would ask if something is not fairly due to the joint request of any delegation, great or small, where it is respectfully made? But still greater is the propriety of complying with such request, where it is in itself reasonable; and, above all, where the committee to whom they ask a subject to be sent is impartial and uncommitted, and the matter fully within its appropriate sphere of inquiry.

We know, sir, that "in union there is strength;" and I should be very sorry that a virtue which is so essential to the duration of all our institutions should be urged against us as impairing our rights. But I most fondly cherish the hope, Mr. Speaker, that this motion to reconsider will receive the kind indulgence of the House.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said: I have very little to say against the reconsideration of this question; for, if it is the opinion of the House that it ought to be reconsidered and referred to another committee, it will certainly relieve me and my colleagues from an exceedingly laborious and painful duty. But, sir, the objection which has been made by the member from Ohio, [Mr. BOND,] against the confidence of this duty into the hands of this committee, is one which seems to require of me some reply.

It is, indeed, very true that at the last session of Congress, entirely without any foreknowledge of mine, either of the proposition or of the merits of this question, a bill from the Senate, establishing the boundary line of the State of Ohio, and, I believe also, of the States of Indiana and Illinois, came to this House, and was referred to a select committee, of which it was the pleasure of the Speaker to appoint me chairman. It is also true that the committee consisted then of seven members; six of whom concurred that the State of Ohio had no right whatsoever to the boundaries contested for by her; that six out of the seven were of opinion that the Territory of Michigan was entitled, by every law, human and divine, to the boundary which she claimed. Six out of seven!

Sir, since that time, transactions of great moment to the peace and welfare of this Union have occurred. The State of Ohio, by her legislative and executive authorities, has gone on to settle this question by main force. Armies have been arrayed by the State of Ohio, to settle this question by force; and that those armies have not been met by the adverse and hostile armies of the other party, had been more owing, probably, to the discretion of the President of the United States, than to the discretion of either of the parties to this controversy. Under these circumstances, the peace having been preserved between the two parties, (if my friend from Ohio will permit me to consider the Territory of Michigan as a party to this matter, however the State of Ohio may deny that she is so,) peace, I say, having been preserved, at the commencement of this session the President of the United States transmitted to Congress two messages; the one containing the constitution of the State of Michigan, formed by the people of that State, as they conceived, conformably to the rights secured to them as citizens of the United States by the constitution of the United States; and upon that constitution, formed with a boundary line given to that Territory by an act of Congress of the year 1805, under the irrevocable ordinance of 1787, constituting the same identical boundaries, the President of the United States had sent a message. The Representative of that State had presented himself here, and, under the claim of rights secured to him by the constitution, as a citizen of the United States, he claimed a seat here. In the other branch of the Legislature, two Senators, elected upon the same principles, and under the same claim of right, have presented themselves for admission to that body. Sir, to my regret, (and I speak only of what occurred in this body,) the Representative of the State of Michigan has not yet been admitted upon your floor, not even as a common spectator.

Sir, it becomes my duty to be perfectly explicit upon this subject. I pretend to no such thing as impartiality between the two parties; and if the sentiment of partiality, or the sentiment of justice, which I believe belongs to one of them, is to disqualify me as a member of this committee, I ask the House how they will qualify the twenty-nine members of this House, several of whom have shown such deep feeling in this controversy? There is not a question of partiality, but of the highest and deepest interest; a matter upon which, while on all other subjects they differ as widely as the poles, they have told you that they are all united as one man. Yes, sir, nineteen members from Ohio, seven from Indiana, and three from Illinois, are all united as one man. And why? Sir, I wish to say that I consider them all as men with a sense of justice at their hearts as full and entire as my own; but upon this question they are interested. This is not a question of partiality or impartiality with them; they cannot but have an opinion different from that which others entertain. With them, it is a question of interest, not of right, upon which they and their fellow-citizens held their arms in their hands to shed the blood of their fellow-citizens, and to sustain their rights, with the same unanimity with which they come here to speak, and sustain, and vote, for that interest. And, sir, because a member of the House, having no interest under heaven in this issue, not considering it as a measure of interest, but as a question of right and wrong, had heretofore, in the discharge of his duty to the House and the country, expressed an opinion that they have nothing but power, and no right on their side—when the subject comes here to go to a committee, not to decide, but merely to give counsel and advice—they get up and tell you that the member is disqualified. Sir, I cannot help admiring the sense of justice which enables these gentlemen to disqualify a member because he had an opinion not suited to their interests; and then to vote, twenty-nine of them, one after another, upon every question connected with this case.

Sir, I will say one word more. There are twenty-nine members on the one side, exercising the right to speak and to vote, and all of whom represent States which are directly interested in the question. On the other side, I look around, and I see only a single individual representing the Territory of Michigan. I have no doubt he is fully qualified to sustain the rights of his Territory upon this floor by all the power of speech which has been displayed by the adversaries of Michigan, but he has no vote; and I believe, in the general estimation of us all, a vote here is worth more than a speech, be the speech from whom it will.

Sir, one word more. I am afraid that, besides the twenty-nine votes depending here upon the issue of these questions, there are thirty-five votes of another description, which may unfortunately have more influence than they ought to have in the final decision of this subject in another place. But, sir, I have said it is my duty to be fair and explicit. I offered the resolution, referring these papers to a select committee, not on my own inclination, for no public duty that I ever discharged could come more ungraciously to me, but at the request of these gentlemen who are here knocking at your door, claiming to be Representatives like yourselves, and whom you have not yet admitted. I was well aware of the objection that could be taken to my having any concern with this matter, other than that of voting upon it when the yeas and nays were called upon any question in relation to it, on the ground that I had formed an opinion. But, really, when I considered the alternative part of the proposition, the number of votes upon the one side, with the solitary voice on the other, I thought I was not justified in refusing the request.

For what was it? I have said the subject was not to be decided by, but merely referred to, a committee, the duty of whose chairman would be to present a report to this House for its consideration, which should present the whole merits of this question before the House; which has not yet been done.

Constitution of Michigan.

The report of the committee of the Senate simply declares that the committee had no doubt of the right of Congress to settle the disputed boundary conformably to the claim of Ohio. That report I think I have seen qualified in one of the official documents from the State of Ohio, as a very able report—yes, sir, and this great ability consisted in a simple declaration that the committee had no doubt of the power of Congress, to settle the boundary; but not one iota of argument, nor one single allusion to any question of right between the parties, did it contain. Upon that report the Senate did pass a bill, which, when it came to us, was referred to a select committee of this House, of which I was appointed chairman. After hearing the parties on both sides, day after day, for a week; after hearing an able argument from one of the most intelligent members of the Ohio delegation on the one side, and from the delegate of the Territory of Michigan on the other, the committee came to the conclusion, which it then stated to the House, that the bill ought not to pass. They made no report, because there was no time to draw it up. Upon that expression of opinion a discussion arose in the House, towards the close of the session, when I gave my views upon the question generally. Now, sir, when those gentlemen came to me, and asked me to move the reference of the two messages to a select committee, I told them that I would move the reference of one subject (that of the boundary) to a select committee, and said that, for the full establishment of justice between the parties, I thought it was proper that the two messages should be referred to two distinct committees. If they concurred, the decision would be more harmonious; and if they differed, every thing then would be said on both sides of the question. I therefore moved to refer the one to a select committee, leaving the other to take such direction as the House should think proper.

Sir, I have stated to the House the course of my proceedings, and the character of my motives. I have been explicit—there is no doubt upon my opinion. I have nothing more to say. The House will decide as they shall think fit and consistent with justice. I shall feel myself relieved from one of the most painful public duties I have ever performed, if they should transfer the duties to be performed by the chairman of the select committee to the chairman of some other committee of the House.

Mr. STORER, of Ohio, said: It is with great pain, Mr. Speaker, that I feel compelled to object to the reference of the question under debate to the select committee, and of which the honorable and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts is the chairman. If, sir, in the course of my remarks, he should regard any sentiment I might utter as severe, I beg him to impute the necessity under which I am placed as a sufficient apology. Between that gentleman and myself there ought to be but the kindest feelings. In days that have gone by I have sustained him, sir, when few cried "God bless him!" and since that period, in every vicissitude of his eventful life, I have marked with intense interest his career. It is not when I object to his supervision over the interest of Ohio that I would, in the most remote degree, question his high qualifications to discharge his duties, wherever and whenever he may be called on to exert his great mind; but, sir, I wish that the sun of his fame should set in splendor: that, in the decline of his memorable life, no clouds or darkness should rest upon it.

My colleague, to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts has just replied, very properly excepted to the propriety of the reference, as the chairman of the select committee had already expressed his opinions in strong and decided terms. The reasons he has urged I do not consider have been answered, and I regard them as unanswerable.

It is said, sir, that there is no delicacy on our part to act as triers of this question, though we object to the chairman of the special committee, as having already decided against us. Suppose for a moment that the analogy between the cases was perfect, what does it prove? Why, sir, that the gentleman from Massachusetts excuses one act of indelicacy by the exhibition of another. This, sir, is not a sound mode of reasoning, as it admits the weakness of the one position, while it would expose that of the other. But there is a most palpable distinction between the two cases. Although the delegation of Ohio will pass upon the question by their votes, they have not asked to prepare the case, to find the indictment upon which the whole matter must be tried. If any one of my colleagues should have sought the reference of the President's message to a committee of which he was, or would by courtesy be, the chairman, then the cases alluded to would have been apposite. As we now stand, sir, the parallel does not hold, and the attempted display of wit is gratuitous.

We wish, sir, that the committee who are to act as the grand inquest in this whole matter, who are to prepare the issue we are to try, and in which such important interests are involved, should be without bias, uncommitted, impartial. Their report, for good or for ill, must have an influence upon the question. It will be published and read long before the ultimate principles it involves are decided, and long before its effects can be counteracted; for, sir, I assume it as true that ours is, in a most interesting sense, a Government of opinion; and, whatever may be our decisions here, they will be judged by the people upon their own view of the case. Now, the report of a committee furnishing all the facts upon which that opinion is to operate, it is the only criterion by which our acts are to be tested. How desirable, then, is it, sir, that those who make the presentment should come to the subject untrammelled by prejudice and uncontrolled by feeling.

If such is the result in ordinary cases, how strongly does the argument now apply? The whole force of a powerful, clear, and cultivated mind, the whole force of great political and moral character, are to be concentrated upon a subject which it is admitted has been already prejudged. Sir, I protest against the occurrence of such a contingency. I know full well the ability with which the honorable gentleman will prepare his report, and I know, also, the avidity with which every thing that comes from his pen is perused. I cannot, therefore, consent that he shall write us down, in the threshold of the question, as he has generally done all his antagonists. We wish to be heard, before the blow that decides our fate is struck, and courteously, yet firmly, would insist that it is our right, as we know it is our duty, to challenge for favor, if necessary, any one of the panel who has prejudged the cause. I would appeal, then, to the honorable gentleman, and entreat him, when there is so much at stake, to decline his opposition to the reference, and reserve his strength for the final struggle.

The honorable gentleman has said that there are twenty-nine members on this floor, who moved in solid column, while the Government of Michigan has no advocate here. Sir, the gentleman does himself great injustice; for I am satisfied, without any disparagement to any representative that might be selected to protect the rights of Michigan, they could not be more ably, zealously, and untiringly sustained than they have been, and I have no doubt will be, by that honorable gentleman. There is no fear, then, that the Territory will not have the most paternal care exerted in her behalf, and the most commanding eloquence invoked in her defence.

Constitution of Michigan.

It was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that Ohio had resorted to force, and that even blood would have been shed had it not been for the mediation of the President of the United States. Sir, the picture is exaggerated: whatever of war, or rumors of war, may have been heard this side the mountains, our peaceful valley has not yet been disturbed by such fanciful conflicts. In all the marchings and countermarchings of an armed force, we hold that Michigan has had the honor of the mêlée to herself. The battle ground has been hers only; and if there has been a conflict, she has sought it. Sir, if the chronicles of the times have exhibited the same facts to the gentleman that they have to me, he will find that the acting Governor of Michigan has been on the disputed territory, in the presence of his troops; and I am authorized to assert, also, that, in March last, on his requisition, the officer commanding the arsenal at Detroit issued one thousand stand of muskets, with seventy-five thousand ball cartridges, to maintain, as was said, the "integrity and laws of Michigan." Yes, sir, the arms of the United States were placed in the hands of the Executive of Michigan, by a federal officer, to be used against the people of Ohio. Sir, when the President was advised of this startling fact, he instructed the Secretary of War to direct that the arms and ammunition should be returned immediately, and intimidated, at the same time, that the requisition could not be approved.

It gives me pleasure, sir, to believe that the President has always discountenanced the conduct of the Executive of Michigan, and that he has exerted himself to quiet the difficulties on our border. He has appointed a commission of intelligent gentlemen, who repaired to the frontier, and, as they supposed, in good faith, had arranged, for a time at least, the cause of contention. He has expressed himself, in decided terms, that our boundary should be settled before the admission of Michigan into the Union, as I am assured by the letter of my honorable predecessor to the Governor of Ohio, heretofore communicated by him to the Legislature of that State. I agree with the gentleman, that the President has exerted himself to bring about an amicable settlement of the question; and, so far as Ohio is concerned, I feel constrained to say she has acted in strict accordance with every stipulation she has made.

Sir, it is unjust and ungenerous to assail Ohio in the manner and language we have witnessed upon this floor; and he is her recreant son who will not cast back the reproach, and stand forth as her champion.

I had hoped, sir, that the remembrance of the bloodless frays upon our frontier would have been known only in the border tales of the West; that they would not have received form and substance, too, from the plastic hand and poetic genius of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. But, sir, I am mistaken. The events in the Northwest are now matter of history, and will descend to future time in the glowing diction of him who has chronicled them in this day's debate.

Sir, I make a final appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The people of Ohio have, on more than one occasion, given him the strongest proofs of their regard, and they still cherish for the memory of his distinguished ancestor all the consideration that his eminent services in their behalf so justly have claimed. Sir, it cannot be unknown to this House, that, during the negotiation of the treaty of 1783, at Versailles, the British minister insisted that the river Ohio should be the boundary of the United States; and it was while thus narrowed down in her territory that her borders were not only extended, but finally carried to the lakes and the Mississippi, by the uncompromising firmness and unconquered vigilance of John Adams.

Sir, we cannot forget the past; and though we have witnessed to-day much to regret and much to disapprove, still I trust that the honorable gentleman will listen to my appeal, and withdraw his opposition to the reference. He cannot forget his speech in February last, on this floor, when he covered the whole ground of the present controversy, and where he has unalterably committed himself against Ohio—a speech that has been this morning recognised as his proper offspring, and all its leading arguments again reiterated.

Sir, I thank the House for their indulgence, and close with a confident hope that the motion to reconsider will prevail.

Mr. LANE next addressed the House, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and in opposition to the reference to a select committee. He was in favor of sending the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary—a committee which would do entire justice to all parties concerned.

Mr. VINTON said it was not his intention to enter into the debate on this motion; but the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] impelled him, from a sense of duty, to throw himself upon the attention of the House. Deeply as he felt on this subject, he would endeavor to avoid the indulgence of feeling which the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the course of his remarks, had manifested. The open avowal of that gentleman, that he did not pretend to be impartial, and that he had consented, at the instance of the agents of the Territory of Michigan, to take this question of disputed boundary into his hands, not for the purpose of deciding upon it according to its merits, but with the view of opposing and defeating the claim of the State of Ohio, brought the House directly up to the decision of the question, whether it would tolerate and sustain the gentleman in that attempt. If it would, he, as one of the Representatives of the State of Ohio, desired to know it; and the sooner that information went to the people and Legislature of the State, now in session, the better, as they would then know what sort of justice to expect here. The people of the State of Ohio, of all classes, are as thoroughly satisfied of the justice of their claim as the gentleman from Massachusetts is of its injustice. And a majority of the people of that State were firmly persuaded they were called upon to sustain the dignity and honor of the State against the repeated and unprovoked aggressions of the authorities of the Territory of Michigan, during the past season, upon the jurisdiction of the State, and to repel by force their lawless acts of military violence.

A portion of the community had used their endeavors to persuade the people to stay their hand, and to wait the action of Congress on this subject; they were assured they might rely on the justice and impartiality of Congress. He was one of those who had taken that course; and he stood pledged that, whatever might be the decision here, reliance might be placed on the justice and impartiality of this body. If, when the inflammatory speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his undisguised avowal of his intentions, shall go forth to the people of Ohio, already excited and smarting under a deep sense of outrage and injustice, the vote of this House, sustaining him in his attempt, shall accompany that avowal, there can be no mistaking its effect among them. They are not in a temper, sir, quietly to submit to a disregard here of even the appearance of justice and impartiality.

The gentleman, sir, discloses the fact that the agents of Michigan, now in this city, solicited him to take this subject into his charge, and that he promised to further their designs by moving a select committee, of which, by the courtesy of the House, he would be made the chairman, and that, too, with a settled determination to make up a report against the State of Ohio. I beg leave, sir, to contrast the course of the agents of Michigan, and of the gentleman from Massachusetts, with that heretofore pursued by the delegation from Ohio in the conduct of this question. The Senate of the United States, at each session of the last Congress, passed a bill to confirm the boundary of Ohio. It so happened that there was a member from the State of Ohio on the Committee on the Judiciary, and on the Committee on the Territories. A gentleman from the State of Ohio, not now a member of this House, had in both instances moved the commitment of the bill to a select committee, stating to the House, as his reason for so doing, that it was the desire of the Ohio delegation that the committee should be composed wholly from States having no interest in the question in dispute; and at the same time expressing a wish that he might not be named as chairman of the committee, at the head of which he would be entitled by courtesy to be placed, as the mover of the order. In both instances, the committee was organized according to the request of the mover. Now, sir, I leave the course of the delegation from Ohio to speak for itself, when contrasted with this attempt of the agents of Michigan to obtain a one-sided report.

Constitution of Michigan.

The gentleman seems to think that, because the members from Ohio may vote upon this question, he, as the avowed partisan of Michigan, may, with the same propriety, preside over the committee who shall report the facts and law to the House. If any member from the State of Ohio should attempt to take charge of the question as chairman of the committee, or to thrust himself into the committee as a member of it, then, and not till then, will the analogy between us and the gentleman's present position hold good; and no gentleman can deny that a member from Ohio might not be placed on the committee with as much propriety as the gentleman from Massachusetts can be permitted to retain his place on it.

The gentleman has informed you, and his statement is true, that at the last session a week was consumed in debating this question before the select committee. The statement itself must satisfy every member of this body of the impossibility of making the question, in all its details, understood in the House; and that, in coming to its decision, it must rely mainly upon the industry, impartiality, and cautious scrutiny of the committee. A right understanding of it involves the necessity of going back to the very foundation of the legislative and political history of the western country; of entering into a comparison of the early and modern geography of the country, and the true construction of a complicated series of laws and ordinances, through a period of half a century. Ancient and modern maps must be examined. The very number of the House renders it impracticable for each member, as the debate progresses, to obtain a personal inspection and explanation of them, while the committee, from the smallness of its number, can sit down and go through all the details and facts with the caution and accuracy of which the proceedings of a judicial tribunal are susceptible. To commit such a question, involving rights of vital importance to three States of the Union, into the charge of one who has already avowed his hostility to them, is worse than mockery.

Again, sir: this subject is brought here for the action of the House upon it. I cannot forget that the gentleman from Massachusetts, at the last session of Congress, declared it as his opinion that there ought to be no action of Congress upon this subject; and yet, sir, strange as it may seem, the gentleman comes forward and proffers to take it into his charge, while, at the same time, he gives us ample evidence that his opinion has undergone no change. Now, sir, I am for putting it in the charge of those who will bring it forward for the action and decision of the House. The gentleman, sir, from Massachusetts, has disqualified himself from taking this subject into his hands, not only by his declaration that there ought to be no action upon it, but also by his course last session, when it was under his charge. A speech of the gentleman, made at the last session, which went the rounds of the country, and has been several times referred to during this debate, would naturally lead all who did not know the facts to suppose the bill, then under his charge as chairman of the committee, had been under the consideration of Congress at the time it was delivered. Not so, sir. The gentleman, instead of asking the commitment of the bill when it was reported back from the select committee, or taking any order in reference to it, left it where, in the then state of business in the House, it was altogether impossible for its friends to bring it before the House. While the bill was thus situated, at a time when it was not before the House, the gentleman went out of his way, and beyond the pale of the rules of the House, to assail the bill, and to pronounce a violent philippic against it and the States interested in it. It was impossible to make any reply to the assertions then made by the gentleman, both because the merits of so complicated a subject could not be gone into in detail when the bill was not before the House, and because the state of its business would not justify the necessary consumption of time required to enter into the discussion.

The member [MR. BIXNEY] of the select committee who, as has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, dissented from the opinion of the other six, and who is not now a member of this House, said, in reply, that he would not be drawn into the discussion of the merits of the bill at that time; but that whenever it should come up for consideration, he was prepared to show that the construction put upon the ordinance of 1787, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, was wholly groundless and untenable. That gentleman, who, for legal attainments, has no superior in this House or in this nation, gave to the subject in all its details the fullest investigation, which brought him to believe in the justice of the claim of Ohio, as firmly as the gentleman from Massachusetts does in its injustice.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had gone out of his way to remark, upon the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate on the subject of the Ohio boundary, and had seen fit to throw out an intimation that their report was wanting in ability, from which we are to infer it is not entitled to our respect. Whether it be or be not in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts to introduce the proceedings of that body into this House, he (Mr. V.) would not undertake to decide; but he would state what he knew of their report, and gentlemen might decide for themselves how far their opinion is entitled to respect. That committee was composed of gentlemen, not only eminent for legal acquirements, but among the most eminent in the States from which they came. The question was most elaborately argued before that committee. Every thing that could be said in favor of the pretensions of Michigan was said—the opening argument for Michigan having occupied an entire day and a half. The committee gave the most scrupulous attention to every thing that was said, and investigated the subject in all its details with the most cautious scrutiny. He (Mr. V.) was able to state what occurred in the committee of the Senate, as he was deputed by the delegation from Ohio to argue the question on behalf of the State before the committee—a duty which he had performed. The result was, that committee came to the unanimous opinion that the State of Ohio was entitled to be confirmed in her claim, and so reported to the Senate. In that body this question has been twice debated, and a bill to confirm the boundary of Ohio has been twice passed by a vote of something like thirty to nine. This statement of facts, sir, may lead us to doubt whether the claim of Ohio is so totally groundless as the gentleman from Massachusetts asserts it to be; and we may justly entertain some suspicion of the soundness of the gentleman's own opinion, when he declares that Michigan is entitled to the country in dispute "by every law, human and divine." Mr. V. said that, when the bill came from the Senate to the House, by the direction of the delegation from his State, he had argued the question before the select committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts was chairman. He had endeavored to discharge his duty to his State faithfully; but with how little success the gentleman has already informed the House. Mr. V. said that he did not know that his colleagues would be disposed again to devolve upon him the discharge of so important a duty. But he would say that, after what had happened, and after the avowals which the gentleman had made to-day, he should be restrained by self-respect from going before that gentleman to argue the question. He said it had fallen to his lot to attempt in a court of justice to argue a question which the judge had already decided; but in a case like the present, he would not submit to the oppression of feeling attendant upon such an effort; nor would he, under existing circumstances, argue it before him, out of respect to his State; and when the gentleman's speech shall go to Ohio, he doubted not but the united voice of the people and of the Legislature would forbid the argument of their claim before him.

Mr. V. said the opinion had been expressed from different sides of the House, that the two questions of the admission of Michigan with the boundaries she has assumed for herself, and the question relating to the boundary of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, ought to be referred to the same committee, since both involve to the fullest extent the question of boundary in dispute. The House having already decided that the former should go to the Judiciary Committee, there seemed to be a peculiar fitness that the latter should accompany it. And he would again repeat, in conclusion, that the latter question cannot be left in the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts, after the declaration he has made of his motives, without marked disrespect, on the part of the House, to the States whose rights are involved in the reference.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the pending motion, and decided in the affirmative, 107 to 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Bailey, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Buchanan, Bunch, William B. So the House agreed to reconsider the vote referring the boundary question to a select committee.

The CHAIR stated that the question would be on the original motion, to refer the subject to a select committee.

Mr. ADAMS withdrew the motion of reference to a select committee.

Mr. HAMER moved that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and it was agreed to without a count.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 29.

Mr. ELY MOORE, one of the Representatives from New York, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rules of the House, to enable such committees as were ready to do so to report bills; but the motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to suspend the rules so far as to allow the Committee of Ways and Means to report sundry appropriation bills; but this motion was also negatived, (two-thirds of the number of members present being required to sustain it,) by the vote of ayes 50, noes 93.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS BY FIRE.

Amongst other petitions presented by the gentleman last named, was one from certain merchants who were sufferers from the recent destructive fire in the city of New York, in relation to which

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he should have pressed its immediate consideration, had it not been that further action was anticipated on this subject, such as might tend to meet the views of the petitioners. The subject was already before the House, but the arrival of a committee, deputed by the merchants of New York, was expected in this city on Monday next. The propositions contained in the petition he had presented, as to the laws of the land, were of the highest importance. He should therefore move that so much of the petition as related to subjects not comprised in the former petition should be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; the remainder to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

The remainder of the day was spent in the reception and disposing of petitions, bills, &c., till the hour of adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said it was within the recollection of the House that, a few days since, he had moved that the gentleman who had presented himself there as a Representative from what is called the State of Michigan, be permitted to occupy a seat on the floor during the sittings of the House. It seemed due from himself that he should ask the House to consider that motion; but, before doing so, he wished to suggest that he designed to modify his proposition, by merely asking the House to permit that gentleman to come within the hall during the sittings of the House in the character of a spectator; that, he trusted, would be acceptable to the whole House; and he had done it with reference to former precedents, particularly that of the State of Tennessee. Mr. B. then sent his modified proposition to the Chair, to be read from the Clerk's table for the information of the House, and was as follows:

Resolved, That Isaac E. Cray, who claims to have been duly elected a member of this House, be admitted as a spectator within the hall during the sittings of this House.

Objection being made,

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved to suspend the rules of the House to enable him to make the motion, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and which were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Bean, Beardsley, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Campbell, Chapman, Chapin, Childs, Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, P. So the House determined to suspend the rules.

Mr. BEARDSLEY then moved the foregoing resolution; which was agreed to.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the petitions presented yesterday by Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, from sundry banks in the District of Columbia, praying an extension of their charters.

A motion having been made to refer the petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia,

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, moved to send them to a select committee, with instructions. Mr. T. modified his proposition as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of the currency of the District of Columbia, to whom shall be referred all other memorials which may be presented to the present Congress, praying for an extension of the charters of the existing banks in said District of Columbia, or for the establishment of any other bank or banks in their stead, and to examine into the condition of the currency of said District, to inspect the books and to examine into the proceedings of said banks, to ascertain whether their charters have been violated or not, and whether any abuses or malpractices have existed in their management, to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses on oath, and to appoint a clerk to record their proceedings.

Mr. SHEPARD said that the present question was more a question of propriety and fitness than any thing else. It was for the House of Representatives to say whether they would take this matter from a standing committee, and refer it to a select committee. He said the House could judge of the propriety of doing that as well without argument as with it. It was not for him to say whether the Committee on the District could perform the duty as well as a select committee. To show the entire uselessness of the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] he held in his hand a letter from the president of one of the banks, requesting that the Committee on the District would appoint some of their members to investigate fully the affairs of the banks. It seemed to him that the gentleman could have obtained his object by moving instructions to the Committee on the District. If this was done, he would pledge himself to the House that any queries which the gentlemen would put to him should be put to the banks of the District, and answered; and then it would be for that gentleman to say whether they were answered properly or not. It was a question of propriety for this House to say whether it would take from the Committee on the District of Columbia that business which legitimately belonged to it, and send it to another committee. If the House has no confidence in the Committee on the District, let it say so. He, however, as a member of that committee, was willing to examine the banks of the District as scrupulously as he could.

Mr. THOMAS said that justice to himself made it proper to remind the House of an occurrence in the last Congress connected with this question. There were four banks in the District that stopped specie payments in 1834, two of which are now asking a recharter. In 1835, these banks memorialized this body for the passage of a law to recharter them. It was but justice to the city that we should act understandingly on this matter; that an inquiry should be instituted to ascertain the causes of these failures. But he said that, without objection from him, the memorials of the last session were referred to the Committee on the District; the subject was taken up by that committee, but no investigation was had. He said he then, under a deep sense of duty to his constituents, gave a promise that if this subject was put off to another session of Congress, he would make it his business to examine into the state of these banks. Now, if you send this matter to the Committee on the District, you send it to a committee which has prejudged the question. Under these circumstances, he felt it to be his duty to ask of the House a select committee. He said if it was proper for the House to refer matter in relation to the Territories to a select committee, it was proper, he thought, to refer this matter to a select committee. He said the Chief Magistrate had called the attention of Congress to the question of currency, and he therefore conceived it a very important one, and asked of the House a committee, whose especial duty it should be to make a thorough investigation of the matter.

Mr. BOULDIN said, as a member of the Committee on the District, he did not wish to take upon himself very arduous duties; but he was as willing to take up and go through with the investigation, as the gentleman. He said the committees were appointed by the Speaker, and he could not see the difference between them. The greatest objection is, that the chairman of the Committee on the District has had this matter before him at the last session. This he thought was a favorable circumstance, because that gentleman must have more knowledge of the business than he otherwise could have. He said that he was ready to go into an investigation without any prepossessions, and was willing to investigate the matter as thoroughly as the gentleman from Maryland or any other gentleman.

Banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he, as a member of the District Committee, cherished no pride of jurisdiction, and was therefore willing, for his part, to dispense with the pleasure and honor of making an investigation into the past doings of the banks in the District, which was contemplated by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] He did not believe that the proposition of that honorable gentleman was founded in a distrust of the capacity of the District Committee to make the necessary examination, nor upon any apprehension that they felt indisposed to do so. The duties of the District Committee were very onerous, and though willing, as a member of that committee, to perform, to the utmost of his humble ability, every duty that might be imposed upon him, yet, as he could, as he thought, be otherwise more profitably employed in his public capacity, he would for his part rather be excused from the labor of inquiring into the details of the past operations of the District banks. He thought that a select committee could be raised, every way competent to execute this duty; and that the Committee on the District, pressing, important, and multifarious as were the calls upon its attention, could spend its time in the execution of duties in a manner better calculated to subserve the public interest, than would be the duty or task of wading for days and weeks, if not for months, through the books and ledgers of the banks within the District.

It would be recollected that some of those banks suspended payment and closed their doors, two years ago. Yes, when the tocsin of alarm and distress and panic was sounded from one extreme of the country to the other, it had been insinuated by some that these banks had lent their still small voices to aid that momentous occasion. He (Mr. V.) would not undertake to state, or even insinuate this. The banks may have had most justifiable reasons for suspending specie payments; but, after what had occurred, it was most emphatically proper that a strict scrutiny should be made into the past doings of these institutions, before we gave them any renewed pledge of our confidence. Should the result prove that the banks in this District should have been improvidently rechartered, the constituents of the gentleman from Maryland, from their proximity to these banks, and from their constant business intercourse with the region where they would operate, would be more exposed to loss than the constituents of those gentlemen who resided at a greater distance; and since the gentleman from Maryland, from a sense of duty to his constituents, seems to be anxious to look into the past doings of the banks within this district, he (Mr. V.) thought it but just and reasonable that he should be gratified.

Mr. V. had stated that the District Committee would have a great deal to do. Yes. He was justified in saying so, when he stated that the District was reeling and staggering under a debt, to the subjects of a foreign potentate, of nearly two millions of dollars! And he confidently asserted that that committee would be obliged to put in requisition all its industry, and all its inventive powers, to devise ways and means to save this great nation the degradation of having their Capitol sold to the countrymen of his forefathers. They were, to be sure, the countrymen of his (Mr. V.'s) ancestors; but still his American feeling was very much disturbed at the idea of being sold out to foreigners. In further proof of the assertion, that the duties of the District Committee were heavy enough to engross all their time and attention, he would state that, a few years ago, a special committee was appointed to revise the laws of the District. They had sat during the recess of Congress, and have reported a code of laws which filled a pretty large volume, and which was not yet acted upon by the House. A few days ago a special committee was raised in relation to that part of the President's message, which relates to the bequest of an English gentleman, made to this District. For these reasons, he would vote to refer this matter to a select committee.

Mr. McKENNAN said he wished to make a few remarks, for the purpose of correcting a mistake into which the gentleman from Maryland had fallen, and into which the gentleman from New York appeared willing to fall also, respecting the course pursued by the Committee on the District of Columbia at the last session of Congress. Mr. McK. had the honor of being a member of that committee, and he had in charge the bills reported by that committee for rechartering certain banks in the District. The gentleman from New York appeared to yield to the charge that that committee had acted precipitately on the subject. To this Mr. McK. did not assent. The charge was not properly founded; there was no precipitancy; and the bill itself would satisfy the House that there was no intention on the part of the committee to recharter these banks without the most searching inquiry into their situation and their conduct. It would be recollected that the charters of the Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Patriotic Bank, and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, expired in March, 1836; and there being no time during the last session to give this subject a full investigation, the committee had reported a bill to recharter those banks for one year only, for the convenience of those cities, and to afford an opportunity to the present Congress to make the most searching investigation. That was all that was done by the Committee on the District, and he begged permission of the House to have that bill read by the Clerk, in order that this matter might be set right. [The bill in question was then read from the Clerk's table.]

As to whether this subject should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia or to a select committee, if the members of the former were willing to yield, Mr. McK. had no objection. He believed it, however, a legitimate subject of examination for the former committee; and unless the members of that committee, like the gentleman from New York, yielded, he should feel himself bound to vote that the subject should have that reference, and none other.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD begged the indulgence of the House to make a few remarks in reply. The gentleman from Maryland said that Mr. S. had prejudged this question. Now, he was at a loss to know how he had prejudged this question. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, during the last session, he could not have prejudged the question, because nobody asked them to make these investigations. How, then, could he prejudice the question, when he had neither made, nor been asked to make, any investigation? Why did not the gentleman himself, as vigilant as he seemed to be, submit instructions to that committee then? Mr. S. really thought that the gentleman was laboring under a serious mistake in making that charge upon him. Certainly, Mr. S. did not pretend to the skill in banking the gentleman himself avowedly did; for the gentleman had had opportunities which had fallen to the lot of few members on that floor. Mr. S. remembered very well the gentleman was a member of two committees on the subject of banking, and then saw and examined the "great monster" himself; and he also remembered that one of those committees reported to that House a very voluminous document; and he had no sort of doubt that, if the members of the House had thought proper to read that very voluminous document, they would have been very much enlightened on the subject of banking. He should be sorry to obscure the slightest ray the gentleman shed upon the subject.

Mr. S. said, for himself, he had no interest in the question, nor did he care one farthing about it in any point of view; but so long as he was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, he would assert upon that floor what he believed to be the rights and privileges of that District, and the rights and privileges of the Committee on that District. It was for the House to say whether that committee was as fit, had as much time, as much knowledge, and as much interest in the welfare and prosperity of the District, as the gentleman from Maryland. Mr. S. could not pretend to as much interest, perhaps, as the gentleman from Maryland, in one point of view. The gentleman tells us that he had a peculiar interest in the question, because the people of his district came down to the District of Columbia to trade, and the money of the District circulated among them. Why, the people of the gentleman's district, when they came down there, sometimes staid at the taverns, and, for the same reason, the House ought to raise a select committee, and put the dram shops under its charge; for it was as much a matter of interest to them. Why not put every matter that touched the gentleman's district under his special charge? However, Mr. S. would only remark that it was a mere matter of fitness and propriety, of which the House was the judge, and which needed no argument from him.

Mr. LANE was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and he believed no person would charge him with any particular partiality for these banks, or any other banks in the United States. He must, however, object to the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] for taking the subject from the committee to which it legitimately belonged, and sending it to a select committee. The gentleman might disguise his sentiments as he pleased, but it was evident that he had not only reflected, but had made a direct imputation upon the District Committee.

The gentleman had charged the committee with having prejudged the question. He was mistaken. There were five new members upon this committee, and he could assure him that, so far as he was concerned, he was in favor of a speedy and critical investigation into the affairs of these institutions. It had been contended that the Committee on the District was not the legitimate one, because the subject was one of general concern. These banks were local, and the people of the District were more interested in them than those who resided at a distance.

But the gentleman had asked, if this subject was sent to the District Committee, when would the investigation take place, and when would it close? He would answer, as soon and as speedily as the untiring industry of the committee would permit. Could more be expected of a select committee? The gentleman from Maryland was a member of four important committees, while the members of the Committee on the District were on no other committee. The gentleman must therefore have four times the ability and four times the industry of himself and associates, if he could perform this duty more promptly.

It had further been charged, that the committee, although it had been in existence for several weeks, had not taken up this subject. Mr. L. remarked, that it had not been referred to them, except informally; that the committee had met but twice; and when it should be ascertained that they had neglected their duty, it would be time enough to charge them with a direct omission to do so.

The gentleman had referred to the opportunities which he had to investigate banking institutions, and had urged an objection to the District Committee, because some of its members resided at a distance. If this argument was good, the gentleman might draw under his immediate charge almost every other question which should be presented for consideration.

Reference had been made to the fact that the Michigan question had the other day been sent to the Judicial Committee, instead of the Committee on the Territories.

The reason of this was obvious. Legal questions were involved, and that committee was composed of able lawyers, who were more competent to investigate it. The gentleman from Maryland was a member of the Judiciary Committee. Did the gentleman draw an inference from the case, that because his honorable self, and those who might be associated with him upon the select committee, were more competent, that therefore his motion ought to prevail? For one, if the subject should be referred to the Committee on the District, he should be disposed to spare neither time nor labor to discharge his duty with fidelity.

Mr. L. alluded to the remarks which had been made in reference to the course and the solvency of the banks in the District. He was opposed to prejudging the institutions, and in favor of the strictest scrutiny into their operations. If they had acted improperly, let it be ascertained before they were condemned. He, for one, would not attempt to screen them, nor to sanction any abuse which might be fixed upon them.

Mr. BOULDIN again addressed the House, in reply to the last remarks of the gentleman from Maryland. In conclusion, he moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. W. B. SHEPARD,] by adding the following instructions to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to wit:

To examine into the condition of the currency of the said District; to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings of said banks; to ascertain whether their charters have been violated or not, and whether any abuses or malpractices have existed in their management; to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses on oath, and to appoint a clerk to record their proceedings.

Mr. MERCER said that it was the duty of the Speaker of the House to appoint the committees, and to distribute the business of the House among the members as equally as possible; and, for that reason, he rose to call the attention of the House to this fact, that if the business was taken from one committee and transferred to another, the labors of the House would be unequally divided; and if you continued to pursue that course you would take from the District Committee all its duties. It was in vain for the gentleman from Virginia to say that he had no feeling in this matter. He had supposed the whole country felt an interest in it. The people in his district felt an interest in this question, and he would say that he felt the fullest confidence in the Committee on the District, and would be pleased to have the matter referred to that committee. He said that the failure of certain banks in the District was an unfortunate occurrence, and ought not to be reflected upon by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MANN said he had but a word to say on the subject. It should be remembered that the Committee on the District had all the legislation of this body, in relation to the District, in their own hands; and certainly that committee had as much business as they could attend to, independently of the matter under consideration. It therefore seemed to him to be proper that this proposition should be sent to a special committee. It was highly important that an investigation should be made, and thoroughly made. It was important to the people of the District that this investigation should be made, and he therefore hoped that it would be sent to a select committee, and let it be the special duty of that committee to investigate this matter.

Mr. LANE said he would inform the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] and the House, that the committee, so far from having more business than they were able to perform, had met again and again without having any business before them, and they would be obliged to gentlemen if they would give them something to occupy them. The Committee on the District has as much zeal, and as much disposition to investigate into the affairs of the banks, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] had, but that gentleman seemed to want the whole management of the currency of the District himself. Perhaps he is afraid the currency of the District would overwhelm and supersede that of Maryland.

Mr. THOMAS said that gentlemen misunderstood him. He did not wish to reflect upon any committee, or any member of the House. He said his constituents were more interested in this matter than those of many gentlemen; therefore, they wished it investigated. They wished to have a sound currency in a District with which they were so closely connected.

Mr. LANE read the following rule:

Rule 62. It shall be the duty of the Committee for the District of Columbia to take into consideration all such petitions, matters, or things, touching the said District, as shall be presented, or shall come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he was very happy indeed to perceive, and he could not forego the opportunity of congratulating the House and the country upon it, that there appeared now to be a universal and concurrent sentiment on the propriety of making the examination contemplated by one or the other committee of the House. As those banks came there to ask favors at the hands of that House, and as the character of the House, and the interest of the country at large, were deeply embarked in the applications made by these banks, it was only fit and proper towards the House itself, and towards the country at large, that they should know, and that the country should know, the condition and circumstances and past conduct of these petitioners. Every body there seemed now to agree to the correctness of that proposition. He recollected the time when another institution, when another bank, came there for a similar purpose, to seek for an extension of its charter; and when one class of personages in that House thought proper to propose that an investigation should be had into the circumstances and condition of that institution; then he well recollected that the unanimity of sentiment, now prevailing in the minds of members of that House, if they might infer that sentiment from what had passed in the present debate, was all discord. Then the battle was continued upon the policy, and propriety, and justice, of making a similar examination. It was ultimately carried that investigation should be had; and the results of that, and a subsequent investigation, so far as there was any subsequent investigation, were before the country. Now, however, all doubts and difficulties upon the propriety of examination are dissipated, and it was admitted on all sides that there should be a thorough investigation into the condition and circumstances of all these institutions, before the House should act on an application for the renewal of their charters.

The inquiry now was, by what organ the House should make the proposed examination. By many gentlemen it was supposed that this matter was one of especial reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the rule of the House had been read for the purpose of showing that that would ordinarily be the course. But the 62d rule, as it appeared to him, even if construed in the strictest manner, or in the most liberal manner, could not be supposed to embrace subjects of this character. The rule said it should be the duty of that committee "to take into consideration all petitions, matters, or things, touching the said District," &c. This referred to matters and things that per se related wholly to the District, and to nothing out of it, and were within the range of its ordinary affairs. But was this petition from the District, or relating to the District as a District? In no sense whatever. It was a petition, it was true, for the recharter of certain banks within the District, but in no sense concerned the rights of the citizens at large; for the citizens of the District and adjacent country, and the whole community, were equally interested in the subject. It was not a petition of the District, within the words or the spirit of the rule; subjects of daily occurrence which sprung up, touching matters in which the District alone was concerned, were properly referrible to this committee, within the spirit and words of the rule. This, he repeated, was not a matter affecting the District, in any sense whatever, for it affected the citizens there in common with those of the country adjacent, and was not referrible, necessarily referrible, to its committee.

But even if it was within the terms of the rule, it would not be within its fair spirit or intent; for the rule was intended only for ordinary cases of daily or annual occurrence, not for extraordinary occurrences, such as the location of a bank, or the renewal of a bank charter already located, within the limits of the District.

Mr. B. would make another suggestion. Many gentlemen thought it was inexpedient to establish in this place a large bank, wielding millions and millions of capital, with power to diffuse its branches throughout the Union, with or without the concurrence of the States in which they might be located. Let them suppose a petition to come there with that object, would it be referrible to the Committee on the District? Would it not with more propriety be a fit subject for the Committee of Ways and Means? Yet it would be located in the District; and, upon the idea that the Committee on the District of Columbia was to grasp every thing within that location, such an application must of consequence go to that committee. Would not such an application, within the fair spirit of the rule, and pursuant to the course heretofore pursued, go to the Committee of Ways and Means, or perhaps to a select committee? Why, if the Committee on the District of Columbia were to take charge of every thing located within the District, the House would have to abolish the Committee on Public Buildings. It would seem to him, therefore, that this subject did not belong to the former committee, and that it should be sent to some other standing committee of the House, or to a select committee.

Mr. B. did not design to cast the slightest reflection upon the Committee on the District. He had no doubt that if the duty devolved upon them it would be most promptly, ably, and impartially executed, yet the duties they had already to perform were such as to take up much of the time that should be devoted to an investigation of this subject. Mr. B. then referred to precedents on similar subjects, and the committees appointed by the House on the Bank of the United States in 1819, and the session 1832-'3; and, after some further remarks, concluded by stating that he should vote in favor of Mr. THOMAS's motion, in which he trusted he should be sustained by the House.

Mr. EVERETT rose to correct the gentleman from New York in a matter of fact. The gentleman congratulated the House at discovering so great a unanimity in the House on the subject of investigating these banks; and, referring to the proceedings of the House on the subject of the Bank of the United States, seemed to think there was nothing like unanimity on that occasion. The gentleman was mistaken; for so great was the unanimity on the occasion referred to, that the yeas and nays were not even called for, and not a particle of dissent was heard when the motion was put from the Chair. In reference to the motion then before the House, Mr. E. said he should vote to refer it to the Committee on the District of Columbia; for he thought the remarks made by the gentleman from Maryland himself had disqualified him from acting on any committee which might have this subject under its investigation.

Mr. SHEPARD accepted the amendment offered by Mr. BOULDIN, as a modification of his motion.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Claiborne, Clark, Coffee, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Dickerson, Evans, Everett, Forester, Rice Garland, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hammond, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Hazeltine, Hiester, Hoar, Howell, Wm. Jackson, James, Richard M. Johnson, Lane, Laporte, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Samson Mason, Maury, McKennan, Mercer, Morris, Parker, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Rogers, Russell, Schenck, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Talaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, French, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gillet, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Haynes, Henderson, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Klingensmith, Lansing, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, John Y. Mason, William Mason, May, McCarty, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Franklin Pierce, Dutce J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Roane, Seymour, Shields, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turner, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks—113.

So the motion to refer the petitions to the Committee on the District was negatived.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. THOMAS to refer the petitions to a select committee, with instructions.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, withdrew the call for the yeas and nays on his motion, inasmuch as the House had, by the vote just taken, indicated a decided opinion on it.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out that part of the instructions which provided that the committee should act in conjunction with any similar committee which might be appointed by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS accepted the amendment, as a modification of his motion.

Mr. BOULDIN moved to amend the motion, by striking out so much as provided that all future memorials on this or similar objects be referred to the same committee. If this part of the motion of the gentleman from Maryland should prevail, it would preclude the possibility of a report during the present session, before which time not only the charters of these banks, but also that of the Bank of the United States, would expire, which would leave the District entirely without a banking institution. Under this state of the case, he was persuaded that the gentleman from Maryland would accede to the amendment he had proposed.

Before the question was taken on the amendment, Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment; which was carried; when

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31.

MESSRS. CLAIBORNE and DICKSON, Representatives from the State of Mississippi, appeared, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. WARDWELL moved to suspend the rule, in order to enable him to offer a resolution prohibiting, in future, the use of the hall of Representatives on the sabbath as a place of public worship; and the motion was rejected.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of the currency of the District of Columbia, to whom shall be referred all other memorials which may be presented to the present Congress, praying for an extension of the charters of the existing banks in said District of Columbia, or for the establishment of any other bank or banks in their stead; and to examine into the condition of the currency of said District; to inspect the books and to examine into the proceedings of said banks, to ascertain whether their charters have been violated or not, and whether any abuses or malpractices have existed in their management; to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses on oath, and to appoint a clerk to record their proceedings.

Mr. BOULDIN said that, on looking carefully over the instructions moved by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] it did not appear to follow necessarily that all memorials and petitions should be presented to the committee before their final action on the subject. Although it did appear, from the general context, that all memorials and petitions should be laid before the committee before their final action; and although there might be, and probably was, a propriety in the committee having every thing before them in relation to the subject, still it did not necessarily follow that the committee should make no report until the whole time had expired during which they had the right to receive them. Believing the committee would report as soon as possible, and that all the memorials, petitions, and views, in regard to this matter, would be laid before them as soon as possible, he would withdraw his motion to strike out. He did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of immediate and efficient action upon this subject.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, desired to be informed whether the House had the power, under the charters of these banks, to make the proposed investigation? His vote would depend on the answer which might be given to this inquiry.

Banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS said that the banks of the District were applying to Congress for an extension of their charters, and it was not to be expected that they could obtain their object unless they submitted to a reasonable examination. On the other hand, if the committee transcend their powers, the directors of the banks, knowing their rights, would not submit to it. From the fact that these corporations are asking privileges, they would not restrain the committee in any reasonable examination, and the House itself has the power to adjudicate between the committee and the banks.

Mr. McKENNAN offered the following amendment, as an additional instruction to the committee:

And that the said committee be instructed to report to this House the names and persons, dates and amounts of all loans made by the District banks to members of Congress or other officers of the Government, since the 1st day of October, 1833.

Mr. McKENNAN said, in offering the amendment, it was not his intention to detain the House with any detailed reasons in its support. Its object was plain on the face of it. It would be recollected that, in the investigation which was made some years since into the affairs of the Bank of the United States, such an inquiry as he now proposed by his amendment was made, and, as the result of that inquiry, the names of many distinguished men were held up to the scorn of the public as being under the corrupt influence of the bank. His object was to have the inquiry as broad, as thorough, and searching, as it was on the former occasion; and he would content himself with submitting it to the decision of the House, merely asking the favor to grant him the eyes and noses on the question.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his call for the yeas and nays, as no one, he presumed, would oppose the proposition.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, entertained, he said, a somewhat different view of the proposition, and could not support it, unless it was so modified as to give the committee discretionary power to report the names or not. This was what was done in the case of the Bank of the United States. The committee were furnished by the president of the bank with a list of the members who had had transactions with the institution; but that list never saw the light. It was not made a part of the report of the committee.

For one, he was unwilling to consent to that investigation, for the reason that there was no law prohibiting a member of Congress from borrowing of the United States Bank. Unless there was good reason to suspect some illegality or impropriety in private transactions, he was unwilling to give them publicity. He was willing that the gross amount loaned by the deposite bank to members and other public functionaries should be stated, and that individual transactions should be reported, in cases marked by any impropriety. He would ask the gentleman to modify his motion so as to give the committee discretionary power to disclose private transactions, where there was any ground for a disclosure. He knew no instance of any transaction of the kind, nor had he the slightest apprehension that any had taken place which could, in the slightest degree, impeach the conduct of any member on this floor, or of any officer of the Government. Should any such case be discovered, however, the individual concerned, whether friend or foe, would meet with no protection from him. He was only desirous that the instruction should not impose on the committee the necessity of making public private transactions of a nature with which the public had no concern.

Mr. BEARDSLEY asked the reading of the amendment, and, after it was read, remarked that he cared very little whether it was adopted or not. He did not think it of any sort of moment whether they ascertained the names of all the public officers of the Government, or of all the members of Congress, who might have borrowed money of one or other of the banks of the District, since one of the local banks became the depository of the public money. Let those who were interested in the inquiry take the consequences, if any should follow.

Mr. B. rose principally, he said, to notice something that fell from the honorable gentleman from Maryland, about an examination that took place, of a similar character to the present, in relation to the debtors of the Bank of the United States. He understood that gentleman to say that a list of members of Congress, indebted to the Bank of the United States and its branches, had been furnished by the officers of that institution to the committee of investigation in 1832, and that that list had not, from that time to this, seen the light. Now, Mr. B. himself recollected to have seen that list during the session of 1832, and he was very glad to learn on the present occasion, in a public way, from one of the committee, as he heard it before stated by common report at that time, that the list possessed by the committee had been furnished by the officers of that institution; for he could state one fact within his own knowledge, touching the accuracy, or the gross inaccuracy, rather, of that statement. That list set forth, among other things, that a particular individual, then a member of Congress, who never borrowed a farthing of the bank or its branches in his life, was indebted to it in the sum of three, four, five, or six thousand dollars. That statement, so far as that individual was concerned, was in no sense true, and never was true, and those who furnished that list must have known it was not true at the time they furnished it. The list called for was of those who were indebted to the bank. The individual referred to, it was true, had endorsed for other persons, who were his friends, and who were themselves indebted to the bank, but the paper was never protested, and yet he was held up by the officers of that institution as an original debtor to the bank, and as one who had taken and used its money. The object must have been, as the effect would have been if the list had been published, to induce the public to believe that that individual was under the same obligations as others were. He could well imagine that those who furnished that list were utterly ashamed that it should have shown its face, for the statement referred to he knew to be untrue, both in spirit and in fact. It was very well it did not see the light, for he believed it was full of misrepresentations in other respects also.

With regard to the present inquiry, Mr. B. said, limited as it was, he did not see that it imposed a very burdensome duty upon the committee that should be appointed to make the investigation; nor did he know that it would be doing injustice to members of Congress, if such there were, who might have borrowed money of the local banks in that District, nor to officers of the Government, if they should have done so, as they might have done, for aught he knew. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman from Maryland would assent to the proposition, and agree that the examination might be made.

Mr. THOMAS said, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] that he rose simply to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his amendment so as to make it conform to the instructions to the committee in 1832. He was not to be understood as opposing the amendment. He merely rose to ask the gentleman to modify it.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD said he was very sorry that the other associates of the gentleman from Maryland on the committee which investigated the concerns of the Bank of the United States in 1832 were not here to repel the charge brought against the institution by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY.] It was extremely to be regretted that a grave charge of falsehood against so respectable an institution as the Bank of the United States should pass without notice, if the individual making it was himself worthy of any notice. He regretted that the subject could not undergo an investigation at once, in order that it might be seen upon whom would rest the charge of falsehood. He did not know all the officers of the Bank of the United States, but he knew them well enough to know that they were quite as incapable of falsehood as the gentleman from New York, and he believed them to be as pure as any member of this House. Yes, said Mr. S., as pure as any body of men in the world. He hoped the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be adopted, in the exact words in which it was offered. He did not think it discreditable to borrow money of banks, and there was no reason why borrowers should be ashamed to let their names go before the public. He felt no shame when his name was published in his district as a borrower from the bank. He did borrow, and give ample security for the loan, and repaid the loan. He saw no reason why any transaction of the sort should be kept secret, and he was in favor of publishing the amount of the loans, and the names of those to whom they were made.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he should not say that there were not gentlemen engaged in conducting the affairs of the Bank of the United States, as pure as any gentleman in that House, or elsewhere. Upon that he formed no opinion. He spoke of a particular transaction. * They were now informed, by a gentleman who had the means of knowing, that a list of members stated to be debtors to the bank had been furnished by the bank, or rather by the officers of that institution; and Mr. B. having seen that list, and knowing one of its statements to be untrue, he was willing to state a fact to the House that was within his own knowledge. He did not say that being indebted to the Bank of the United States was disreputable; and if the individual referred to had been indebted to the bank, Mr. B. had no doubt he would have been as willing that the House and the country should know it as was the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS wished the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] to inform him where, when, and by whom, the document which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] had stated had not been reported by the committee of 1832 to the House, had been communicated to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] and what evidence he had that the document communicated to him was the same which the committee had withheld from the House.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was just as ready to answer that question as any thing else. The paper in question was shown to Mr. B. in that hall, by one who, he believed, was a member of the committee, although he was not able to recollect the gentleman's name. Mr. B. saw the entry; the paper was represented to him as the original paper furnished by the bank, and, for that reason, he believed it to be a genuine paper.

Mr. McKENNAN said that the fact stated by the gentleman from New York, that a list of the debtors to the Bank of the United States was in the possession of the committee of investigation, and submitted to him and his friends for inspection, furnished the best reason for his declining to accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland so to modify his amendment as to leave it discretionary with the committee to report such names and cases as they should think proper. He wanted no secret lists, to which the gentleman from New York and his friends might have access, and from which selections might be made, so as to hold up to the public the names of particular individuals, as under the corrupt influence of any of the banks. Nor did he wish to put it in the power of the committee to be appointed to select the persons and transactions which they would report to the House. All the evidence they take, all the information they receive, ought to be submitted to the House, which is to judge of the propriety or impropriety of the management of the institutions whose affairs are to be investigated. He had no doubt the committee to be appointed by the Chair would do its duty; but he did not wish it placed in such a situation as to be exposed even to the charge of partiality. He therefore wished in this matter to give them no discretion. He wished a deep, thorough investigation to be made, and the result of that investigation reported to the House, so that each and every member could have an opportunity of seeing it, and drawing his own inference from the facts disclosed.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I shall be under the necessity of voting against the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNAN,] and against the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS;] and that upon grounds which I have assumed, from the time that this examination into the affairs of banks was first brought before this House.

At the first session of the twenty-second Congress, sir, when the first investigation into the affairs of the United States Bank was determined upon by the House of Representatives, and a committee was appointed for that purpose, I distinctly took the ground that no examination into the private accounts of individuals with the bank was a proper subject of investigation; and, after a considerable debate, which lasted for several days, such was the determination of the House at that time, and the powers of the committee of investigation were, by the resolution which authorized that investigation, so limited and confined. I, sir, had the honor of being a member of that committee; and, upon their arrival in Philadelphia, upon their commencing the duties of their office, among the propositions and demands made by the committee was one to this effect: a list of the debtors of the United States Bank, being members of Congress. Sir, I resisted and opposed the motion in the committee: I opposed it to the utmost extent of my power. I contended that it was not in the authority given to the committee by the House; that it had not been the intention of the House that such power should be exercised by that committee. The majority of the committee, however, determined otherwise. The question was put. And at that time, sir, precisely the same ground was taken as is now taken—that it was not with the intention of exposing the private transactions of members of Congress with the bank—that it was not for the purpose of being able to point at this man, and say, “there is a man who has been bought by the bank,” and at the same time to suppress the name of another man who was equally liable to that objection; but that it was a discretionary power, to be exercised by the committee for the public interest, in order that they might determine whether it would be a proper thing for them to report to this House or not. Sir, the question was put to the officers of the bank to furnish such a list. At that time, and to that committee, the president and directors of the United States Bank unfolded every thing; they did it voluntarily; and if I am not mistaken, it was accompanied, at the same time, by a notice, from the president of the institution, that the bank did not wish to exercise any reserved power of withholding evidence which the president and directors might be justified in denying, but that they were desirous to lay open every thing to the view of the committee. Nothing that was asked was denied; and, in consequence of that request, a long list of members of Congress, and of officers of the Government, was furnished; and letters from persons high in office, soliciting loans for a long period of time, for a series of years, was exhibited to the committee. Sir, it was a two-edged sword, for it cut on both sides; and when the committee got it, they determined to keep it to themselves. They did this against my opinion; for I was as strenuous and as earnest to have that paper reported here, as I had been against calling for it from the bank. And it may be within the memory of a portion of the members of this House, that, in a report which I separately made upon this subject, I brought before the House, upon my own authority, a list of the members of Congress who had received favors from the bank. Sir, this also was a two-edged sword, which cut both ways; for it cut in such a way that I did not know whether I should be suffered to remain a member of this House for having presented it. This is in the memory of members of this House, who were also members of that. Let us, then, have no discretionary powers. If the committee must grope into secret transactions, in order that they may point at A, B, and C, and keep back the names of D, E, and F, I, at least, am opposed to such a state of facts. I say, fair play is a jewel; let us have both sides of the question. And still more do I desire that these things may be done in a fair and open manner, so that four or five years hence no base accusations against the United States Bank may be made of false returns, when they have not the means to prove that the returns were not false; that no separate, and private, and secret communications of documents before the committee, true or false, may be produced against the president and directors of the United States Bank, when they have not the means to defend themselves against it.

Now, sir, I say that, upon the opinion I have uniformly entertained, I cannot vote for the amendment of the member from Pennsylvania. I do not wish to know what notes, bonds, or obligations, whether as principals or endorsers, gentlemen around me, all of whom I esteem as men of honor, have with these banks. I say this: that in the list which was presented to the committee before, of all the transactions which were exhibited of members of Congress, as well as of officers of the Government, there was no transaction whatever which, in my opinion, could affect the character of any one man upon either side of the House, in any disadvantageous way. There was nothing dishonorable; nothing which any man implicated need to have been ashamed of. But there were things in relation to members of this House which probably might have been pointed out to their constituents at the next election, and made the instruments of party zeal or personal malignity, to injure them. There might have been things of that sort then, and there may be now. I know not whether there were or not; for, as to myself, having heretofore taken a deep interest in the proceedings of the House in relation to banks, and particularly of the Bank of the United States, and standing here, as I have stood before, to vindicate the honor of those absent high and honorable men, the officers of that institution, from slander, I think it necessary to say, that never, since I have had a seat in this House, have I, in any sense, had a personal interest of any kind in that bank, either as a stockholder or a debtor.

Upon these grounds, sir, I shall, as I have stated, although reluctantly, vote against the proposition of my friend from Pennsylvania, and I shall vote also against the instructions proposed by the member from Maryland, because I conceive those instructions to be far too extensive—far more than this House of honorable men ought to authorize any committee to inquire into. And I shall give this vote the more readily, sir, because the member from New York yesterday congratulated the House that now gentlemen were more ready to go into an inquiry, and that in former times there had been a great struggle against the inquiry. Sir, I struggle now for what I have always struggled. I cannot consent to any examination which shall go into the private affairs of others who are not present to defend themselves. I cannot consent to justify any thing which bears the appearance of doubt in relation to any transactions of private individuals with banks. I have the same objection now which I always had, and I have another objection to the instructions of the gentleman from Maryland. They propose to refer not only the memorial now before the House, but all possible memorials that can come here praying for the recharter of the present banks, or for the charter of any new banks in the District of Columbia, during the whole session of Congress, to the same select committee. To refer papers to come hereafter! It is contrary to all the rules of the House to make them a standing committee for every thing, to prejudice a question which has not yet been even presented. Who knows but that to-morrow a memorial may come here for the establishment of a new bank in the District of Columbia, not connected with any one of the present banks? Well, by these instructions, you will refer the memorial beforehand, because here are certain gentlemen appointed to keep watch over it. Not that I distrust those who may be appointed the committee, for I believe that they will be all honorable men, but this resolution proposes that the House shall intrust all memorials to this committee for six months to come. Sir, I believe that this is an unexampled trust; I do not know any instance of it that has ever happened. But the original proposition went further, and authorized the committee of the House to enter into private consultation with any committee of the Senate which might be appointed for making a similar investigation; not a joint committee, such as is usually appointed; but it authorized this private committee of discretion to enter into private consultation with any committee of the Senate which might be appointed for a similar purpose—a proceeding utterly repugnant to every rule and principle of intercourse between the two Houses. I do not know but that we might as well add that every memorial, public or private, which shall be presented here for the next six months—from now to the end of the session—shall be confided to this committee, with discretion to do just what they please with it.

It appears to me, sir, that these instructions transcend all the powers usually given to committees. For myself, I am not willing that any such committee should be appointed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, having differed in his views on this question, in 1832, from the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would state his reasons for it. Some gentlemen on this floor brought strong allegations against the Bank of the United States, and, so far from resisting an investigation of those charges, the friends of the institution owed it to themselves and it to afford every opportunity to probe them to the bottom. When the committee was organized and met, the president of the bank took a course precisely opposite to that taken by the friends of the institution on this floor, and challenged the most rigid scrutiny. The rule adopted on that occasion by the committee was one which, he hoped, would govern this and every similar committee. It was this: that no private transaction, unless it was supposed to be of a corrupt nature, should be dragged before the public. This rule applied to the transactions of merchants and bankers as well as to members of Congress, &c. He hoped the House would see the propriety of this course. There was no question as to the correctness of the course taken on the occasion which he referred to by the president of the Bank of the United States. He tendered unreserved communications, and they were made in such a shape as was desired by the committee. He did not believe that the president had any design, in making them, to impose any misstatement on the committee. The papers presented were merely transcripts from the books of the bank, made by the clerks. He did not think any charge could be made against the officers of the institution, in relation to the paper alluded to. The committee thought it unnecessary to lay it before the House or give it any publicity, for the reason that it related to private transactions of an unimportant character. As to the amendment now offered, he would prefer that it should be so modified as to leave it discretionary with the committee to report private transactions or not; but he should vote for the proposition in any shape in which it might be offered, believing, as he did, that it was improper in any public functionary to deal with banks and receive favors from them.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he agreed perfectly with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, in reproaching every thing like slander, in whatever form it might be presented; and it was because he reprobated slander so much as he did, that he thought the occasion that offered that morning warranted him, nay, more, required of him, that he should make the explanation he did. The charge, as it appeared on the paper Mr. B. saw, was calculated, if he might judge from the face of the paper, to produce an impression that the individual referred to had borrowed the sum of four, five, or six thousand dollars, or whatever the amount was, of the Bank of the United States, immediately before the time the investigation took place, or within some few months of it. He was not indicted as an endorser, but as one directly indebted to the bank. Now, knowing that to be utterly untrue, and knowing it on its face calculated to produce a slanderous impression, Mr. B. had thought, and still thought, it his duty to expose it. He was, he said, against all slanders, whether they came from the Bank of the United States, or from any other quarter, and was as ready to denounce them as the gentleman himself.

There was one remark of the gentleman to which Mr. B. would particularly recur. He understood the gentleman to say that this was either a base charge in its nature, on account of transactions to which Mr. B. had pointed, or else that it was base to make the charge. If the gentleman desired to be understood in the former sense, Mr. B. agreed with him, and was willing to let it be judged by the public. He had not, and should not characterize more strongly than the gentleman himself had done. But if the gentleman meant that it was base for a man, who was himself slandered, to expose the charge, Mr. B. would tell the gentleman that it did not comport with what he considered a proper self-respect. He held it right to speak out in such cases, in all places, in public and before the world, fall where it might. Mr. B. did not say who was guilty. The gentleman from Maryland had said the information was furnished by the bank, and Mr. B. said the statement was untrue. Surely it was not base to state the fact! The original fabrication might be base, but the exposure of it could not be so held. He would forbear to say any more on the subject. He had said thus much, because he deemed it due to the occasion and to himself.

With regard to the views entertained by the committee of investigation at that time, Mr. B. had no concern about it. He was not on the committee, and he cared little whether the inquiry was published or withheld. If some members of the committee thought the inquiry proper, and others reprobated it as improper, they might adjust the matter as they pleased. And if, after obtaining the information, they choose to suppress it, he was equally as indifferent as he was to the subject of inquiry itself. But if the honorable member meant to have it understood that this paper was exhibited to Mr. B. in a secret and clandestine way, or that it was shown to him only, and not to others, the gentleman was mistaken. It came to Mr. B. in no such light, and in no such manner. He supposed at the time it was to have been published entire, though he cared not whether it was or not; and he never dreamed that this statement was omitted, until some time afterwards, on looking into the report, he found it had been left out. What became of it he knew not, nor ever heard till to-day; or, if he did, it escaped his memory. He was not able to say from recollection whether the minority report of the honorable member from Massachusetts named all the members of Congress or not, or whether the individual he referred to was named in it.

Mr. ADAMS briefly explained. He had referred to the names of all who had received favors from the bank, by having their payments as members made before the appropriation was made for it.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he had misapprehended the remark of the gentleman, but was satisfied by the explanation. The honorable gentleman and himself seemed to entertain the same opinion of the real character of the transaction which he had referred to; they differed only upon the propriety of speaking of it. Gentlemen might suppose it base and slanderous to speak of it, because it pointed to the president and directors of a large moneyed institution; and such seemed to be the view of the honorable member from Massachusetts. Mr. B. thought the transaction not the less reprehensible on that score. If those who conducted the affairs of the bank, as was now ascertained from two or three members of the committee, did furnish information he knew to be untrue, he held that he was at all times at perfect liberty to expose it before the world, and should always feel it his duty to do so, be the parties who they might.

Mr. HOWARD called for the reading of the amendment, and said that his object was to inquire from the mover whether he intended the period in the latter clause to be the time when public money was first deposited in any District bank, or the time when the change took place over the country. He remembered a document in which it was stated that the public money had always been deposited in one or more of the District banks. If that were the time to which the inquiry was proposed to be extended, he had no objection; but if it were intended to limit the investigation to the last two years, he would sooner that the limitation should be stricken out. It might be that the gentleman from Pennsylvania intended to show that these loans to officers of the Government and the members of Congress were useful to the public, and necessary, in consequence of the great delay in passing the annual appropriation bills, whereby it was sometimes absolutely necessary to anticipate salaries. Mr. H. said that he remembered a document in which he, in common with every other member of the House, was reported as a debtor to the Bank of the United States, when, in fact, he had never owed the bank a dollar in his life. This circumstance arose from the bank's charging every member of Congress with his per diem as he drew it from time to time, not deeming itself at liberty, until after the passage of the appropriation bill, to transfer a portion of the public money to the credit of the proper officer of the House. If it were intended to draw an inference from these loans that those corporations were useful, the inquiry might as well be pushed further back than the last two years. But it might also happen that the object of the limitation might be to show that these corporations had recently made these loans, contrary to their former practice, and, by so doing, interfered with the money concerns of the Government. It seemed to be probable that the business of some of these banks might have become more extensive lately, in consequence of the contraction of the business of the Bank of the United States; but it was also probable that a portion of their business had always been that of furnishing facilities to persons connected with the Government, from the cause abovementioned; and if the House should limit its inquiry to a very moderate date, the inference would necessarily be, that all this was fresh business, arising from some recent cause, whereas it might be nothing more than a continuation of their customary proceedings. He did not like to vote for any amendment which would prevent access to this information, and would be obliged to move to strike out the latter clause of it.

Mr. GRENNELL, of Massachusetts, rose and said the reasons for this amendment to the instructions had not been stated by the mover with sufficient distinctness to enable him to comprehend them, and none had occurred to his mind of sufficient weight to command his vote for the present proposition. The object of the original resolution, said Mr. G., was perfectly justifiable, namely, to inquire into the past conduct and present condition of the banks in this District; and for a twofold purpose: first, to guide the judgment of this House on the question of recharter; and, secondly, to show to this community the causes and the authors of their embarrassments or sufferings in the matter of the bank currency of this District. Mismanagement and abuse of powers have been charged against several of the District banks to such extent as to work a forfeiture of their charters. Of the justice of these charges I pretend not now to judge. But we have witnessed enough to justify a rigid investigation of their concerns and conduct; it is due to this community, and to this Legislature, from whence these corporations emanated.

But, sir, is the inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania at all germane to this original object? It seems to me not. What is it? Why, sir, hardly less than an arraignment or trial of members of Congress and officers of the Government. It would be to raise injurious suspicions against them, most of whom may have been members of a past Congress, and who cannot be here to protect themselves, or explain their transactions with the banks. Yes, sir, we are to inquire, first, into mismanagement committed by the banks, fraudulent and corrupt, as is alleged; and then, by the same committee, at the same time and by the same inquest, to ascertain what members of Congress have taken loans; as if they had been participating in such mismanagement, or in some bad way connected with these institutions. Now, sir, if this branch of the instructions pass, who does not see that some portion of the public may connect the motives and actions of members and officers of the Government with the improper proceedings of the banks thus accused? Who does not see that odium may be cast upon honorable gentlemen for money transactions as innocent and fair as any that take place in the dealings of men? If you adopt this amendment, the public may suppose, and with some reason, that your commission is not only an inquest against doubtful banks, but against gentlemen as honest and honorable as any in the country. Sir, I do not know any member of Congress, the present or past, who has been a borrower at the banks of the District. If there have been such, I doubt not their transactions, and the motives that influenced them, have been fair and upright. And I will not allow myself to inquire or to suspect what member or what officer of the Government has had loans at these institutions, nor what party in this House or country may be affected by the proposed inquiry. I am opposed on principle to searching into, and displaying before the world, the private transactions of individuals with banks; and so have uniformly been my votes in this House whenever such questions have been tried. Especially am I opposed to an inquiry which, without light or reason, presupposes improper connexions of members of Congress with the accused institutions. I can imagine no benefit to result from the amendment proposed to the instructions, but much evil and injustice.

One word, said Mr. G., as to the duration of this commission proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. He proposes to extend it through this Congress. I should be better satisfied if he would limit it to the present session.

Mr. HOWARD again asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would accept his amendment as a modification.

Mr. McKENNAN could not, he said, accept the amendment, and the House would therefore pass upon it. He had himself a distinct object in view, which was, to ascertain the loans made during a certain period.

Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont, remarked that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would, he hoped, be understood as having been offered on his individual responsibility, and not that of the party with which the gentleman usually acted. He considered the proposition as totally wrong in principle, and should therefore vote against it. Mr. E. made some few remarks in opposition to the motion, which the reporter did not hear.

Mr. HOWARD said that, after what had fallen from the gentleman from Vermont, he would, for the present, withdraw his motion, to see what form the amendment might ultimately assume.

Mr. THOMAS rose, he said, to say a few words to put himself right before the House in regard to a subject which had been alluded to. Before the committee of investigation proceeded to act, the question of power was mooted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams.] At the very first meeting of the committee at the United States hotel, the gentleman from Massachusetts assumed the position just stated by him, that it was improper and incompetent for the committee to investigate any transactions between the bank and its debtors, and the gentleman was particularly opposed to singling out for publication the transactions between the bank and members of Congress. The committee decided against the position of the gentleman, on the ground that unless they examined every transaction, and became acquainted with the nature of the security given for loans, they could not execute their instructions, nor report whether the bank, in their opinion, was solvent or not. As to the publication of the documents obtained, he (Mr. T.) reserved to himself the exercise of his discretion; and he would not consent now to report private transactions of a nature unimportant to the public, unless expressly so commanded by the House. He was furthermore opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because it was confined to the loans of one bank. There were other banks in the District which had at various times been depositories of the Government money, besides the bank referred to in the proposed amendment. Before he sat down he would modify his resolution by inserting the words "at the present session" after the word Congress, which words were omitted in transcribing the resolution, so that the committee might take charge of the memorials in relation to the renewal of charters or creation of new banks in the District, which might be offered during the present session.

Mr. KINNARD here moved to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And to make the same inquiry, as far as practicable, in its application to loans made by the United States Bank and branches to members of Congress and officers of Government, since the veto of the bill to recharter said bank; and also to loans made to members of Congress by all the deposit banks.

Mr. PARKER moved the postponement of the further consideration of the resolution and amendments till Monday next, to give time for printing the various amendments.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. PARKER opposed the amendments, and also the original proposition, in the form in which it was presented.

Mr. MANN said he was at this time opposed to the amendment, and would ask leave briefly to assign his reasons.

The amendment (said Mr. M.) proposes to instruct the committee, as far as may be practicable, to inquire into and report the pecuniary relations of the officers of the Government, and the members of this House, with the Bank of the United States and branches. It would, he said, be recollected, by all the gentlemen who were members of the last Congress, that a committee was appointed in the spring of 1834, from that body, and instructed to make similar inquiries, and an investigation of the affairs of the Bank of the United States generally, in pursuance of a power expressly reserved in its charter. Of that committee, Mr. M. said he had the honor of having been a member; and as such had endeavored, in conjunction with his colleagues, to perform the duty enjoined by the House. In that endeavor, the committee had proceeded to Philadelphia, under the belief that the directors and officers of the bank, professing their love and favor to "the constitution and laws," would not be among those who would "derogate" from the former, nor condemn and defy the latter. But (said Mr. M.) what was then the treatment which that committee, that House, and, through them, the nation, received at the hands of the great moneyed power? Sir, (said Mr. M.) they were defied, contemned, insulted, by those who proclaim the "supremacy of the laws at the gates of their citadel." If you adopt this amendment, sir, what assurance have you that your committee, and this House, and their constituents, will not again be insulted by this contumacious and illegitimate offspring of your creation and power? Why, sir, are you not sure that, unless you send professors, who proclaim by heralds preceding them, not only their love of the constitution and laws, but their love of "golden relations to the bank, and their fealty to its power," you are certain to be defied and insulted by resistance, and by reasons similar to those you may find upon your record for that resistance? I wish (said Mr. M.) to recur to a few of those reasons on this occasion. That committee were authorized to send for persons and papers, under the powers of the House of Representatives in its constitutional legislative capacity, as is now proposed by the resolution under consideration. Believing themselves thus authorized, and having exhausted in their efforts, to execute the important duty devolved upon them, all the means depending upon the provisions of the charter, they were reluctantly and unwillingly driven to this dernier and last resort. That committee, sir, accordingly summoned the president of the bank, and their ten directors, to appear before them, and to submit certain books of the bank to the inspection of the committee. They appeared according to the exigency of the subpoena, and submitted a written document, which had been previously proposed and signed by them, "as the answer of each to the requirement of the summons." In that document they declared "that they did not admit any obligation by appearing, but attended to 'manifest their respect to the committee; that they did not produce the books designated and required,' because they are not in the custody of either of us, but of the board." They declared, further, that "considering that, as corporators, and as directors, we are parties to the proceeding, we do not consider ourselves bound to testify, and therefore respectfully decline to do so." Sir, (said Mr. M.) this will be your answer again if you send this committee, unless it be of that "sacred confidence" kind which seemed to be subsequently more successful, from the other end of your Capitol. I select the terms "sacred confidence" from one of the replies made by the organs or oracles of the bank, to the committee of which I was a member, and in which they declare it to be their duty "to protect the rights and sacred confidence intrusted to their keeping." They must here have forgotten the provisions of their charter, or have lost their admiration for "the laws." It will scarcely fail (said Mr. M.) to occur to the House that the reasons assigned by those gentlemen for not producing the books according to the exigency of the summons, is one of first impression, and proceeds upon the idea of the impersonality of corporations, or, in the quaint language of Lord Coke, "that corporations have no souls, albeit they have immortality." The president and directors consult together in the strong castle of their corporate residence, shielded by the panoply of corporate power, upon the exigencies of their corporate situation and its political and golden relations, in order, as they say, "that they may be assisted by the judgment of each other as to the course they were individually to pursue; and agree that when they emerge forth from the mysterious oracle which protects and guides their corporate destiny, they will appear in the garb of humble citizens, to manifest their respect, but not to admit any obligation," refusing to bring forth the mysterious records of transactions of "sacred confidence" which they are bound to protect, "because they are not in the custody of either of us, but of the board;" thus attempting to conceal and mystify their resistance to the lawful exercise of the power of this House by confounding together the ideas of corporate and corporal existence; of corporate and personal obligations. Let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. M.) that the theory by which social compacts under Governments exist is, that each individual surrenders to the authority of the laws such portion of his natural rights as may be necessary for the orderly welfare of the whole, in consideration of the protection afforded to rights not surrendered; as, for example, the rights of life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness; thus creating political obligations to submission on the one hand, and conferring political security on the other. The theory of the existence of impersonal and irresponsible beings, called corporations, makes them depend upon express, defined contract with the sovereign power. These corporate existences, with many heads and no soul, with no volition except through the medium of paper, wax, and seal, do not, I admit, owe the same duties to the State which are devolved upon natural and visible citizens; yet it is difficult, (said Mr. M.) in applying these distinctions to the transactions under consideration, to perceive how it could be maintained that the same persons, assembled together, can transmute themselves with such magic facility from one existence to the other; and, between the two, escape the censure of the laws in either. Their argument is, that when they are assembled on one side of the table, they have the control of the books and papers of the bank, but when silently transferred to the other, their mystic union is dissolved, and instead of wearing the "insignia of the order, they wear the mantle of humble citizens, 'to manifest their respect, but not to admit any obligations.'"

Their reasons, sir, (said Mr. M.,) for their refusal to give testimony then, will be the same now, if you again make the attempt to procure it by the exertion of your powers. Those reasons, Mr. Speaker, were surprising to the committee, the House, and the country. The application of the principle of magic transformation from personality to impersonality was again resorted to by considering "themselves as corporators, directors, and parties to the proceeding," and therefore not bound to give testimony. They availed themselves of that wise maxim in the rules of criminal evidence which declares that no man is bound to criminate or dishonor himself; but Mr. M. said that he had not before then contemplated that a public corporation, established professedly as a necessary public agent, without personality, or the corporate capacity to be guilty of criminal offences, and amenable to the laws as such, could undertake to shield the mysteries of "its sacred confidence," under a rule of criminal evidence which can only be applicable to those who have personality, and "have souls." It seemed to have been forgotten then, and probably will not be remembered now, that the attempt to shield the bank from examination, under the principle stated, that it was a part of the very contract or charter of its existence, that "its proceedings may be examined by a committee of either House of Congress," and that when its agents and servants, by its corporate command, refuse such examination, and to give testimony necessary to unfold those proceedings, the very principles of such existence are violated. If, however, the directors in their refusal then, acted in their individual and natural capacity, and meant to avail themselves, as citizens amenable to the laws, of the protection of this obvious and merciful rule of criminal evidence to screen their own actions, in their own agency as directors and officers, from the scrutiny and examination of the public authorities, proceeding according to the forms of law, to vindicate the justice of that law, then I cannot but admit, Mr. Speaker, their right to do so when arraigned before the judicial tribunals of the country, in its fullest legal extent. It is a right secured alike to the most humble as well as the most exalted citizen. It should, however, be recollected that the duties of a committee of this House are not judicial. They cannot arraign, condemn, nor punish, but simply inquire and report the result of those inquiries to the body from whom they emanate. To conduct those inquiries, they are authorized to examine witnesses on oath. In their first step, they are told by the witnesses that they claim to be parties to the proceeding, as if they were arraigned by that proceeding before the bar of a judicial tribunal, and prepared to respond, "guilty or not guilty," and therefore not bound to respond to any other question. Sir, said Mr. M., if you send a committee to the bank, with the purposes indicated by this amendment, you will meet with the resistance to your authority which has been opposed to your inquiries before, and with such reasons for that resistance as were met before, to some of which I have alluded and commented upon, as well to show their existence as their futility and effrontery. It can, in my judgment, said Mr. M., be of no service, therefore, to renew the effort, unless the House are now prepared to vindicate their authority.

In respect to the main questions now under consideration, the resolution to commit the petitions from the banks of this District to a select committee, with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNA], to inquire into their pecuniary relations to the officers of the Government, I am, said Mr. M., in favor of both propositions. It is well known to the other members of this House that the Committee on the affairs of this District, standing in the place of its local Legislature, is burdened, and sometimes almost overwhelmed, with its business. The renewal of these bank charters is not ordinary business before that committee, and does not occur oftener than once in twenty years. It is conceded to be requisite that the affairs of these banks and their management and conduct of late, more particularly, because they have stopped payment, should be thoroughly probed and examined. The Committee on the District of Columbia, with great deference and respect I say it, will probably find more subjects of business for their action than will be convenient to them. It is, sir, for the interest of the banks themselves, if they expect a renewal of their charters at our hands, to submit their affairs to a thorough examination. There can be no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to examine the dealings of the public officers, or Representatives on this floor, with these banks; because, sir, I venture to believe that there is no honorable gentleman here who has such relations with them as will subject him to suspicion or censure. True, sir, I should prefer to leave the matter of the publication of those relations to the discretion of the committee, because I would not, said Mr. M., bring the private transactions of any gentleman before this House unnecessarily. But, sir, as it is intimated that there is something "rotten in the State of Denmark," let it be found out, promulged, and corrected.

Mr. WARDWELL had hoped that this question would have been sooner disposed of, and that an opportunity would have been afforded to present petitions, this being the last day that the House would sit this week. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana had nothing to do with the original proposition. Certain banks had applied for a renewal of their charters, and an inquiry into the propriety of acceding to these applications was entirely proper. The gentleman from Indiana had, however, offered an amendment foreign to the subject, and he trusted it would be withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, would not consent, he said, to commit a discretionary power to the committee, in regard to the proposed inquiry and report. He hoped the inquiry and report would be made full and ample, and then the House would judge of the propriety of making the facts reported public or not. He did not know what this subject had to do with the Bank of the United States. Did that institution seek a renewal of its charter? On the contrary, we were told that it was quietly winding up its affairs, and its charter would expire before this investigation could be completed.

Mr. McKENNA said he was reluctant again to trespass on the attention of the House, but felt constrained to say to the gentleman from Indiana, and to the persons (if any) with whom he had advised or consulted, that he had a distinct object in view, which was explicitly set forth in the amendment he had offered, and that he would not be driven from his purpose by any parliamentary management or manoeuvre which they might think proper to adopt. Let the gentleman persist in his amendment, and let the House, if they think proper, adopt it. Let the examination be as deep and as broad and as extended as a majority of the House should think proper to direct. He had no objections; but inasmuch as the gentleman's proposition was totally irrelevant to the subject-matter before the House, he, therefore, could not vote for it. The banks, into whose concerns it was proposed to make an examination, were petitioning for an extension of their charters. The Bank of the United States had presented no such application, and he could see no propriety in directing an inquiry into its affairs or its loans. But if the House think proper to adopt the amendment, let them do it. He presumed there was no one who had any thing to fear from any disclosures which could be made. Already had the names of many individuals, selected from the list obtained by the committee on a former occasion appointed to in-investigate its concerns, been laid before the public, as corrupted and bought up by that bank. The fair business transactions of those individuals had been characterized as the corrupt means of purchasing their influence. They had nothing to fear from any further disclosures; but whether or not, was not a consideration for him. He knew, and he took this occasion to say, that he had no connexion in any one way, either as stockholder or borrower, either as drawer or endorser, with the Bank of the United States or any of the banks in the District, and therefore had nothing to dread from any facts which could be brought out by the most enlarged scrutiny which the House might think proper to direct.

To his friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] whom he was sorry to say, from his position in the House, he could not hear, and to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] and others who still wished him to modify his amendment, he would say that his principal object in offering that amendment was to deprive the committee of the power of exercising any discretion in the case. He had no idea of vesting in any committee of the House an arbitrary discretion to select such borrowers as they may think proper to present to the House as having a corrupt and improper connexion with any of those institutions. He wished the committee so instructed as to constrain them to pursue an impartial and unprejudiced course. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland gives them the power, if they think proper to exercise it, of laying before the House and the nation the names of A and B, as having a corrupt connexion with those banks, and of suppressing the names of C and D, whose transactions may be as improper and censurable. He deprecated the idea of vesting any such arbitrary power or discretion in the committee, and therefore wished it made their duty to present a list of the names of all the members of Congress and officers of Government who had received accommodations, in order that a fair view of the case might be exhibited. He therefore declined making any modification of his proposition.

Mr. McKIM moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded by a vote of 87 to 83.

The question then being, "shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, as the effect of the previous question would be to cut off the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he would call for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question was determined in the affirmative: Yeas 100, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Bovee, Brown, Bynum, John Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Dickerson, Doubleday, Efner, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, Glascock, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Samuel S. Harrison, Haynes, Henderson, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, William Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Seymour, Shields, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turner, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Deberry, Denny, Dromgoole, Evans, French, Philo C. Fuller, James Garland, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hammond, Harlan, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hiester, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Jones, John W. Jones, Kinnard, Lane, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lincoln, Love, Lucas, Lyon, John Y. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, McCarty, McKay, McKennan, McKeon, Morris, Owens, Parker, James A. Shepperd, Sloane, Spangler, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—96.

So the House determined that the main question should be now put.

Mr. TALIAFERRO asked a division of the question, so as to obtain a separate decision upon that part of the resolution which refers to the select committee petitions which may hereafter be presented in relation to the banks of the District.

The CHAIR stated that the division pointed out was in order.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS inquired if it was in order to adopt a resolution referring petitions to be hereafter presented to a committee.

The CHAIR decided that it was in order, but that the House could, at any time, reverse the order.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, asked the unanimous consent of the House to modify his resolution, so as to omit that part objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIR inquired if there was any objection.

Mr. WISE said, I object, unless we can all have a chance to modify.

The question was taken first on the commitment of the subject to a select committee, and decided in the affirmative, without a count.

The question was then taken on the instructions, omitting the following clause: "to whom shall be referred all other memorials which may be presented to the present Congress," and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

The question was then taken on the instructions, omitting that portion of them which relates to future petitions, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

Mr. AUGUSTINE H. SHEPPERD asked whether the second branch of the resolution, relating to the reference of future petitions, did not rescind a rule of the House; whether, if it was adopted, it would not require a vote of two thirds to refer to any other committee any petition on the subject.

The CHAIR stated that it was not required of the Chair to decide that question until the case should present itself.

The question was then taken on that part of the instructions which refers to the committee petitions to be presented hereafter, and decided in the negative, without a division.

The House then adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4.

Mr. MANNING, of South Carolina, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of the State of Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and remarked that, in conformity with the course heretofore adopted, he should move that the petition, without reading, be laid on the table. Mr. A. was here interrupted by Mr. PATTON, who asked whether the petition had been received.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. GLASCOCK moved that the petition be not received.

The CHAIR stated that, upon looking into the authorities, he had formed the opinion that the first question to be decided upon the motion of a member was, whether the petition be received or not.

Mr. GLASCOCK felt it his duty, he said, notwithstanding the great discussion which had taken place on the subject, again to bring before the House, for its decision, the question of the reception of these petitions. He contended that, according to Mr. Jefferson's authority, which he cited, the motion was a proper one, and did not conflict with the right of petition; and, moreover, that it was expedient for the House to sustain the motion, if they wished to avoid the consideration of the question.

The CHAIR here stated that the discussion must be confined strictly to the question of the reception of the petition.

Mr. GLASCOCK resumed his remarks in support of the motion not to receive the petition.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS rose to a point of order. The 45th rule, he said, required that no petition should be debated or decided on the day of its presentation. If the rule was not observed, the question might be debated the whole day, and members deprived of an opportunity of presenting their petitions. He appealed to that rule of order, and demanded, he said, that the question, if it was debated, should be postponed to a day certain.

The CHAIR decided that the 45th rule could not apply to a petition until it had been received; and, therefore, that it was in order to debate the motion not to receive it.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS appealed from this decision, and thereon asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The CHAIR stated the ground of his decision, and the question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand?"

A long discussion arose, in which Messrs. MERCER, SUTHERLAND, CRAIG, REED, BRIGGS, BELL, GLASCOCK, BEARDSLEY, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, PATTON, MANN, UNDERWOOD, THOMAS of Maryland, HAMER, EVERETT of Vermont, and J. Q. ADAMS, took part.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he did not profess to be very deeply learned in rules and orders; but the attention he had paid to what honorable gentlemen had already said upon this question of appeal, and the little reflection he had bestowed upon it this morning, had brought his mind to the conclusion that the Speaker was wrong; and he would very briefly state his reasons for the conclusion which his mind had attained.

Mr. V. said it had been remarked by the Speaker, and by his honorable colleague, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] that the rules had not provided for such a case as was presented by the motion "not to receive the petition," made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK.] It was, then, he supposed, a casus omissus, according to the views of certain gentlemen. Suppose it were so what was the question? And did it not come at least within the spirit of one of the rules of the House? The question was, whether the motion of the honorable gentleman from Georgia could be debated to-day? He humbly apprehended that this question was reached by the spirit of the forty-fifth rule of this House, which provides that petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, "shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read." These rules were the laws of this House; those who enacted these rules were the law-makers, who enacted this little code for the government of our deliberations here. All gentlemen who had spoken seemed to concur in the opinion, that the object of the provision "that petitions or memorials shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read," was to prevent debate upon a single petition, which might consume the day provided by the rules for presenting petitions, and thus prevent all other petitioners from bringing their petitions before the House. We all agreed as to the spirit of the rule. If we sustained the Speaker, and permitted the debate upon the motion to reject the petition to occupy the day, would we not entirely frustrate the object of the rule, as to which all concurred? That object was to secure to all gentlemen, at least for one day, an equal right to present their petitions to the House; and here we would defeat that object, by permitting one gentleman, on the first hour of the first day, to enter upon a debate in relation to this petition, that would, if not arrested, most certainly consume the day. If we sustained the Chair, (said Mr. V.,) that portion of the rule which intended to guard against debate on the first day of the presentation of a petition would be entirely nugatory. Yes, it would be worse than a nullity; for it was competent for any gentleman, the moment a petition was introduced, to rise in his place and move that that petition should not be received. If it be true that such a motion must be forthwith disposed of, and may be debated the same day the petition to which it applies is presented, then a single member might, at all times, prevent all other members from introducing their petitions; because it was very obvious that the author of such a motion, in order to sustain it, would naturally go, and would surely be permitted to go, into the whole subject-matter of the petition. He would, perhaps, undertake to show that it called upon the House to grant an unconstitutional request; and we have already had experience enough to convince us that speeches about constitutional doctrines were never distinguished for brevity. Gentlemen who entertain adverse views would then undertake to show that the object of the petitioners was right, reasonable, and constitutional; and we would thus, before the petition reached the Speaker's table—nay, before it passed out of the hands of the gentleman who presented it—launch forth into a discussion, in extenso, upon the relative merits and demerits of the subject-matter of the petition; and this, not only to the exclusion of all other petitioners, but at a stage of the matter so early, that it was very unreasonable to ask gentlemen to vote as to the merits or demerits of the object of the petition. It was well known to the House that he (Mr. V.) was opposed to the object of this petition, but he felt himself called upon to say that he could not sustain the Speaker consistently with what he thought was the spirit of the forty-fifth rule, and consistently with the fair exercise of that equal right of petition which he supposed belonged to all the citizens of this confederacy.

Mr. BYNUM said he entered on the discussion of this subject with a mingled sense of pain and pleasure. He had ever been opposed to the agitation of this subject, here or elsewhere, and he denounced now and protested against the discussion of abolition within the walls of this House. But he had said that he rose with a sense of mingled pain and pleasure—he was pleased to see gentlemen show their hands on this subject. He thereby was enabled to tell those who favored this unholy agitation which threatened so imminently the dissolution of this blessed Union. He had said that he disdained to debate this question in this place; this was not the proper place to settle it; and he took the occasion to assure gentlemen who thought differently, that that question could never be settled within the walls of Congress hall. It involved rights that this House had nothing to do with, nor would his constituents permit him in this place to call them in question. He repeated it, that he was not sent here to pass on and settle the rights of his people, or constituents, to their property. Whenever that was invaded, it would not be settled here, but on the battle field.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[JAN. 5, 1836.]

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. B. that he could not debate the merits of the question on an appeal.

Mr. BYNUM said he was aware of that. He was going on in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who seemed not to know the spirit and feelings of the southern people on that subject. That honorable gentleman had said, as well as others who preceded him on the same side of the question, that it should and ought to be met. He was the last man, he hoped, in or out of the House, that would blink this or any other question; but he had said he disdained to meet the question here, and discuss it here, because it was not, nor could it be, settled by Congress; and gentlemen who thought so deceived themselves most egregiously, and he was determined that they should know it on the first and every occasion that presented itself.

The SPEAKER again informed Mr. B. that he must confine himself to the motion before the House, and was not to discuss the main question.

Then, (said Mr. B.) the illustrious framers of this body were reputed to be men of intelligence; and, if so, they would hardly have organized a body, such as this House is, without giving it power to protect itself. In fact, a contrary supposition would be a reflection on their illustrious memories; and how could that be effected without the power of rejecting an offensive petition or memorial, the very entertaining of which struck both at their dignity and very existence? The cases alluded to by his honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] he thought perfectly analogous—the gentleman from Massachusetts to the contrary notwithstanding. If the House had not the right to reject, on the first blush, an offensive communication on its presentation, it was subject, at all times, to the insults and impudent abuse of every miserable, contemptible combination of wretches that might choose to reflect on and bring it into disrepute. Mr. B. said he had thought that, after the precedent just read by the honorable Speaker, there would not have been any further doubt entertained by any gentleman on the propriety of the decision of the Chair, or of the course that the petition should take. But the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts had objected to the similitude or analogy of the two cases; to prove which, he undertook to discuss the characters of the memorialists—one he said was a foreigner. He (Mr. B.) would not say that the characters of the memorialists, whose petition the gentleman had presented, were worse than foreigners. From the respect which he entertained for the honorable gentleman, and for others of the House, he did not wish to discuss the characters of those wicked, infamous petitioners, nor would he at that time, though there might be a time and an occasion when he would speak freely of those wretches that were throwing firebrands in this House, that might light up a flame, not to be quenched with water, but with blood; and the only way, in his judgment, to avoid it was to stifle every attempt at excitement on the occasion, by putting an early stop to the consideration of all such memorials by an immediate rejection.

He was sorry that he differed most widely from the opinions of two honorable gentlemen, for whom he entertained the greatest respect—the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PATTON,] and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] They had said that they thought it unimportant how this question was decided. He (Mr. B.) thought otherwise. He thought it a subject of the first magnitude, and an object of the greatest importance, to settle a precedent whether this House had the right to reject an offensive petition whenever it was presented. He hoped the House would never consent to bind up its own hands, so as to be incapable of defending itself, by refusing to consider any insulting or otherwise dangerous communication, that might be incompatible with either its dignity or safety.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had said something about the want of precedents on this subject, and that the Speaker had quoted a precedent of eighteen years' standing to justify his decision. He (Mr. B.) would call the gentleman's attention to the conduct of the Senate for a precedent or precedents, during that ever-memorable session, called the panic session, and ask him how many memorials were rejected, and refused to be considered by that body, and on the same day, too, that they were presented? I ask if the gentleman's colleagues in the Senate—yes, both of them—did not vote to refuse to consider objectionable and offensive memorials and petitions? Mr. B. recollected various occasions when it had been done by that body, during the session alluded to; and why should this House be less sensitive, or tenacious of its dignity or safety, than the Senate? For his part he could see none; and, for himself, he would be the last to acknowledge it. He hoped the House, therefore, would sustain the Chair in the decision it had made, and refuse at once a consideration of the obnoxious petition. Here the matter could not, and would not, be settled.

Mr. VINTON rose, he said, not to take a part in the discussion, but to endeavor to put an end to it. The whole question debated was, whether the motion not to receive should be debated to-day or to-morrow; and this day being already spent in the discussion, if the House adjourned, they should settle the question, and to-morrow the motion would be in order for debate.

On motion of Mr. VINTON,

The House then adjourned, at four o'clock.

The following gentlemen were appointed the select committee on the banks of the District of Columbia, under the resolution offered by Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland:

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland; Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire; Mr. REED, of Massachusetts; Mr. MAY, of Illinois; Mr. BEAUMONT, of Pennsylvania; Mr. HUNTERMAN, of Tennessee; Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina; Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia; Mr. CLAIRBORNE, of Mississippi.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS BY FIRE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following amendment to the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in New York, as a substitute for the second section of the bill reported:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all the bonds given for duties at the port of New York prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds. Provided, however, that nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 17th day of December last.

Public Lands—Captain Nathan Hale.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. C. said the substitute would, he hoped, meet the approbation of the House, as it did that of the committee of the sufferers; and he gave notice that he should ask the House to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the bill.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to graduate the price of public lands, make provision for actual settlers, and cede the refuse lands to the States in which they lie. Read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said the bill and report just made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CASEY,] related to a very important subject; and it was desirable that information should be distributed as to the nature and object of the measure proposed. He therefore moved the printing of 3,000 extra copies of the bill and report; which motion, by consent, was considered and agreed to.

MICHIGAN MEMORIAL.

Mr. BEARDSLEY asked leave to present a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan.

An objection being made,

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved the suspension of the rule.

Mr. BOND said he should move that the memorial be not received.

Mr. KINNARD called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY inquired what was the character of the memorial.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said it related to the general boundary question.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rule, and it was determined in the negative: Yeas 110, nays 101.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CRAIG asked the unanimous consent of the House to the postponement of the question of order before the House at the last sitting, for the purpose of calling the States for petitions; which was objected to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved the postponement of the question of order before the House till Tuesday next.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS asked what was the question before the House when it adjourned.

The journal was read, and Mr. A. expressed his assent to the postponement.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

MICHIGAN MEMORIAL.

Mr. BEARDSLEY presented the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan, and moved its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HANNEGAN called for the reading of the memorial.

The Clerk proceeded to read it.

On motion of Mr. HANNEGAN, the reading was suspended; and

Mr. HANNEGAN moved the rejection of the memorial.

The CHAIR decided that the motion and the subject to which it related must lie over till to-morrow.

PRINTING DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WISE rose and said, that on the 8th day of December, it was, on his motion, ordered that 15,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents, and 5,000 copies of the message without the documents, be printed for the use of this House. By the law of 1819, it was provided that, in case of inconvenient delay in the printing of documents by the printer to the House, it should be the duty of the Clerk to employ another printer, and charge the excess of cost to the printer guilty of such delay. He had risen to ask the Clerk if he could inform the House what was the cause of the delay and gross negligence which had occurred in the execution of the order of the House? The message and documents were annually ready in ten days; and now a month had passed, and but a few copies had been laid on our tables.

The CHAIR said he could not entertain the discussion without the assent of the House.

Mr. GILLET offered to give the explanations requested.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved an adjournment; which was agreed to; and

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6.

CAPTAIN NATHAN HALE.

Mr. WARD from the Committee on Military Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of sundry citizens of the town of Coventry, State of Connecticut, praying the erection of a monument to the memory of Captain Nathan Hale, of the revolutionary army. Mr. W. stated that the committee were of the opinion that they possessed no jurisdiction of the matter referred.

Mr. JUDSON moved that the petition of the citizens of the town of Coventry be committed to a select committee; and, in support of that motion, proceeded to remark that this petition came from nearly five hundred of his fellow-citizens, who were honest in purpose and respectable in character. It had been heretofore referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee had come to the result that the subject of the memorial did not necessarily fall within their jurisdiction. The motion was now made to refer the memorial to a select committee, upon the idea that there was no standing committee organized by the House to whom the same could be appropriately referred. It was, indeed, matter of surprise that, to a request so reasonable, there should be one objection heard; when the question should be understood, he was sure all such objections would be withdrawn.

Captain Nathan Hale, of the State of Connecticut, a brave young man, stimulated by his ardent patriotism, entered the army, and was intrusted with a captain's commission; and, during that glorious struggle, General Washington requested the services of some officer to ascertain the condition of the invading army, when a knowledge of the movements of that army were essential to the existence of the American army. No officer could be found to perform this delicate and hazardous service, until Captain Hale became a volunteer, and, in that service, he died a martyr in the cause.

No notice had ever been taken of that event by the Government. It was due to the honor of the nation that it should now be done; and this was the object of the reference moved. This was not without precedent. Congress had ordered a monument to be erected over the remains of the lamented General Brown, at the expense of the United States. Every American approved the course; and it might now be asked, was not this a case of equal moment? Should the reference be made, it would be competent for the committee to report on the specific prayer, or they might report that suitable measures be taken to remove to the sepulchre of his fathers the remains of Captain Hale, or to extend to his heirs at law the benefits of the resolution of 1780.

The House should not be now detained further on the mere question of reference; but when the committee should have reported, it should then be his business to show this House that these petitions must not be sent away unheard.

After a few remarks of an explanatory character, and in reference to the meritorious services of Captain Hale, by Messrs. JUDSON, WARD, PEARCE of Rhode Island, ADAMS, and TOUCEY, the memorial was referred to a select committee of five, and, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, ordered to be printed.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The CHAIR proceeded, under the rule, to call for resolutions by States, commencing with the State of Maine.

Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And be it further resolved, that, in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

Mr. JARVIS said the resolution which he had just submitted was precisely similar to the one which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OWENS] had endeavored to bring before the House without success, and he now offered it at his request; but he was not doing so out of mere courtesy to that gentleman, but from a desire that this subject might be settled in such a manner as might be satisfactory to the southern people.

Mr. ADAMS requested that this resolution might be postponed until the States were called through for resolutions.

Mr. JARVIS resumed. He said if he thought there was any probability of keeping off a discussion of the subject, he would not object to having it postponed; but, as it was, he thought we might as well take it up now as at any other time. He did not mean to enter into a discussion of the subject, but merely to state, in a few words, that, from all he had seen for the last month, he entertained no doubt that not only a large majority of the House, but also a large majority of the Representatives of the non-slaveholding States, were decidedly averse to any action on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia by Congress. His constituents deprecated the agitation of the question. They consider that it belongs exclusively to the southern States, and that any interference by us would be unwise and unwarrantable. He thought he was fully justified in making this assertion, by what took place in Maine during the last summer. In the meetings which were then held party spirit was lost sight of, and men who had never acted together before were found uniting, like a band of brothers, to avert a catastrophe which impended over us. Then, without distinction of party, the most prominent in station, in private worth, in wealth and intelligence, attended these meetings; and resolutions were adopted at them which spoke but one language, and that was a reprobation of the abolitionists. By permission of the House he would read a resolution which was unanimously adopted at the meeting which was held at Augusta, the seat of Government of the State of Maine:

"Resolved, That any interference by the non-slaveholding States on the subject of slavery is incompatible with the preservation of the Union; we view with regret and alarm all attempts to excite such interference or to disturb the peace of the country by the fruitless agitation of that exciting subject; and we hold it to be the duty of every patriot to 'frown upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now bind together its various parts.'"

Mr. J. said that comment on this resolution was useless. It was not his intention to enter further into this discussion; nor would he have said thus much, had it not been for misrepresentations (no doubt unintentionally) which had been made upon this floor, with regard to the feelings of the people of the eastern States, which, at the time, there was no opportunity to repel.

When Mr. J. concluded his remarks,

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. GLASCOCK asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MILLER asked for the reading of the resolutions; which being done, the question was taken on laying the resolutions on the table, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Beaumont, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Carr, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Davis, Denny, Evans, Philo C. Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. WISE, who pledged himself to renew it.

Mr. WISE then moved the following amendment:

Amend by striking out after "Resolved," and insert, "That there is no power of legislation granted by the constitution to the Congress of the United States to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and that any attempt by Congress to legislate upon the subject of slavery will be not only unauthorized, but dangerous to the Union of the States."

Mr. WISE said, before he renewed the motion of the gentleman from New York, he would take that opportunity to say that he hoped his amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Maine would bring the direct question before the House. The war was now commenced between evasive and direct propositions upon this subject, for he regarded the propositions of the gentleman from Maine as entirely evasive. He regarded them as unsatisfactory to the South, and nothing could satisfy them but a bold, direct, and manly vote upon this question. Let it be settled. That was all they asked. He wished now to see who would vote for the one proposition, and who for the other. He wished to see now who would move the previous question to cut off this amendment. He wished the whole South to mark it, if the previous question to this amendment should be put upon them. Let them toe it, and let the South be undeceived, or let the South be guaranteed in her rights. Mr. W. moved to print the original resolution and the amendment, and then renewed the motion for the orders of the day.

Mr. GLASCOCK rose to request the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his motion, as he simply wished to offer an amendment to the resolution also.

Mr. WISE said it lay with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CAMBRELENG assented.

Mr. GLASCOCK moved the following, as an additional resolution:

Resolved, That any attempt to agitate the question of slavery in this House is calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy, by a servile war, the peace and prosperity of the country.

The CHAIR said the gentleman must move it as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GLASCOCK then made that motion.

Mr. WISE accepted it as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. GLASCOCK wished, he said, his amendment to be offered as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Virginia, so that the whole question, in some form or other, would be presented to the consideration of the House.

The CHAIR said that could only be done by moving to strike out from the amendment all after a certain word. It would be competent for the gentleman from Georgia to move to strike out all after the word "that," and insert his amendment.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he would make that motion. His object was, as expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, to come to some understanding, and, by some direct and decisive vote, ascertain how far their northern brethren were disposed to go with those of the South on this question; and he was gratified to find that, for the first time, it began to assume some tangible shape.

Mr. G. said he wished it distinctly understood that, so far as the resolutions of the gentleman from Maine went, they met his approbation; but that they did not go far enough was perfectly clear to himself, and evident upon the very face of them. Whatever might be the constitutional difference of opinion as to the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, it was expected by the South, if such a right be recognised, (which he would not for a moment believe,) that something definite should be done, and that we should be placed in possession of their views on this important subject; and he believed they would be such as to quiet all fears, and sooth the feelings of a now agitated people. If, however, he was mistaken, in the language of his resolution, further attempts to agitate this question here would be calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, and endanger this Union. The simple act of laying petitions of the character of those presented here, and expected to be presented, on the table, was not calculated to allay the feelings of the South, and if such a result was anticipated, gentlemen were indeed mistaken. But he did believe that if, on the present occasion, there could be a clear expression of opinion against the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in this District, coupled with the sentiments of the public meetings held throughout the different States of the North, that it would tranquillize the "troubled waters," and have the tendency to quiet and satisfy the South. But if it be not done, these fond anticipations would never be realized. Now, said Mr. G., was the proffered time for his northern brethren to come forth, the crisis had arrived when they should speak out, and if they spoke and acted as he expected, then all would be well.

Mr. G. said he had no objections that a direct resolution, or series of resolutions, should be offered, declaring that it was a violation of the constitution for Congress to interfere with slavery here; that he had satisfied himself it was unconstitutional, and should vote for any such resolution. But, whilst he was disposed to do this himself, he was not prepared to censure those, or impugn the motives of such as might differ with him. And he felt it to be his duty in candor to state that, so far as the abstract question of the constitutional right was concerned as to this District, there were various and conflicting opinions, among the best jurists as well as constitutional lawyers of the country, and he regretted that some of these were to be found even in the South. And even here, in this House, said Mr. G., he knew several who would vote against any resolution declaring it unconstitutional in Congress to interfere with slavery in the District, but who would go heart and hand with the southern members against any such interference, and against the reading and even printing of the petitions of the abolitionists, or furthering their views, either directly or indirectly. And, from what had taken place, he looked with great confidence for a warm and cordial support of the resolution which he had the honor to offer. He thought it the least the South ought to expect, and what they had a right to require, from their brethren of the North.

Mr. HOLSEY then rose, and, after proceeding a few moments, gave way to

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who moved the orders of the day; which motion was agreed to.

SEMINOLE HOSTILITIES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee proceeded to consider the following bill:

A bill making an appropriation for repressing hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $80,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses attending the repression of hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians in Florida.

A communication from the Secretary of War on the subject was read; when

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly adverted to the depredations committed by the Seminoles, their having laid waste and desolated the country for eighty miles, &c.

Mr. VINTON inquired whether the gentleman from New York was in possession of any information as to the cause of this war, or who commenced it?

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had in his possession a package of documents containing the desired information. The disturbance had grown out of a treaty with the Seminoles, the execution of which had been postponed from time to time by them; and when a portion of these Indians had determined to remove, two of their own chiefs had been murdered by themselves, &c. The gentleman from Ohio could examine the correspondence in his possession, and he would be able to satisfy himself on the subject.

Mr. VINTON inquired when the treaty alluded to was made? He did not wish to delay the passage of the bill; but if it was the treaty of 1823, or 1824, it was his intention to move to amend it by making it obligatory on the United States to carry that treaty into effect.

Mr. CAMBRELENG adverted to the necessity of speedy action upon this subject. The war was progressing. Fifteen hundred Indians were in the field, and they were opposed by only about two hundred troops. Unless speedily repressed, they would probably make inroads upon the State of Georgia. If the gentleman from Ohio desired to raise a question or a debate upon the treaty, he could select another opportunity, without embarrassing the present measure.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the bill; which having been read,

Mr. A. rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I propose to amend this bill, by introducing after the words "to be expended," the words "under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to law." My objection to the bill as it now stands is, that it is an appropriation rather too indefinite; and I make this motion now, more with a view to anticipate what I presume will be an amendment proposed in another place, than for any other consideration. And I make it now the more readily, because at the close of the last session of Congress in the case of a similar appropriation, not only the appropriation itself failed, but the whole bill to which it was annexed (and an extremely important one it was) failed entirely, as I understood, in consequence of the indefinite nature of the appropriation.

Here, sir, is an appropriation for eighty thousand dollars only—that was an appropriation for three millions; but the principle is the same. Here is an appropriation for the suppression of a war with the Seminole Indians. Well, sir, under whose direction is the money to be expended? Is it to raise an army? The constitution of the United States says that Congress shall have exclusive power to raise an army. In what manner is it to be expended? Is it intended by this appropriation of eighty thousand dollars to give to the Executive of the United States power to raise men—to raise a force? Is it intended to confer upon him the power of exercising that which the constitution has exclusively reserved to Congress? If this is the intention, I shall be most reluctantly compelled to vote against it. If it is not the intention, I ask that something or other should be introduced into the bill which shall explicitly state under whose direction, and in what manner, this money is to be disposed of; so far, at least, as that it shall be expended according to law.

When the appropriation of last year, to which I have referred, was introduced to this House by the same gentleman, I believe, who proposes this, I voted for it, indefinite as the terms in which it was expressed were; but I did so under a principle which I have always understood to prevail, and which I never considered as doubtful, until it was made a question on that occasion; and that was, that, make your appropriations ever so indefinite, grant to the Executive a hundred millions of money to be expended, you give him no power to expend one dollar without the authority of law, separate from, and independent of, your appropriation. Well, sir, when that bill went to the other branch of the Legislature, this appropriation for three millions of dollars was not only negatived and rejected, but, when it came back to this House, and the House had insisted on the appropriation, the Senate immediately adhered to their rejection; and, as I understood, (for I do not know officially the grounds and principles upon which the Senate rejected the appropriation,) but it was understood to be upon the ground that this was an indefinite throwing of three millions of dollars into the lap of the Executive, entirely at his discretion, and without being circumscribed even by any specified limits. The immediate consequence of this was, that the bill came down to this House; a committee of conference was demanded and was held, and a compromise was made, by which the appropriation was reduced, I think, to eight hundred thousand dollars, and something of a limitation of the terms in which it was expressed was introduced: the terms were not quite so indefinite as in the original bill. This serves to show that the real objection which was taken in the other branch of the Legislature was to the indefinite terms in which the appropriation was made; and that there is some plausibility at least in the suggestion, I infer from the fact of the committee having agreed to make it more definite in its terms, as well as to reduce the amount. Sir, it so happened that this compromise was too late; and, in consequence, not only the appropriation, but the whole bill, failed, to the very great injury, in my humble opinion, of the interests of the country. I believe the appropriation itself would have been a most profitable and useful one at that time. I believe that the bill was one of the most important that was introduced during the session, and that the country is now suffering in consequence of its failure.

I ask the gentleman, therefore, to assent to the introduction of something like these terms: "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to law."

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly replied to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had no objection to the amendment which had been proposed.

Mr. EVERETT made a few remarks, which were wholly inaudible.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill laid aside.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS BY FIRE.

The committee proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York.

Mr. CAMBRELENG made several verbal amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. C. then offered a substitute for the second section, (being the same which was contained in the proceedings of yesterday;) which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained briefly the provisions of the bill; stated the various acts, from 1790 to 1801, for remission of duty in cases of fire; and, from 1803 to 1824, for extension of credits in similar cases. He reminded the committee that the question was not now of remission of duty on goods destroyed by the fire, but one which concerned Government quite as much as its debtors. On the question of remission, when it came before them, he should submit his views; and he hoped a majority of the House would concur with him. To the bill now submitted he anticipated little opposition. The first section was in conformity to the usage of Government in cases far less important; the second would apply to debtors of Government equally unfortunate, but not provided for in the first section.

Mr. C. then went into an argument to show that, while under the old laws and long credits, the merchants had enjoyed the use of the public money; under the late revision, by substituting cash duties on woollens, and three and six months on all other goods, the merchant was compelled to advance the duties to Government; and that those debtors for whose relief the bill was designed had actually advanced to the Government, in 1835, near twelve millions of dollars, independent of the three or four millions now due. So far from Government being a lender to its debtors, the city of New York was actually a lender to Government of millions beyond the amount now deposited in that city, which had been advanced, and was now loaned to the East, West, North, and South. The extension of the bonds was merely to restore temporarily that which they had advanced. The extension of credit on bonds for duties on goods, all of which had been imported within three months, and some of which had been entered within a week—some even on the day of the fire. The second section of the bill in fact merely contemplated extending the payment of the bonds to a period which, under the old credit laws, they would have been entitled to. It simply proposed to allow our debtors time, as one of the committee had expressed himself, to "clear away the ruins, before we demanded the payment of our bonds." The Government would save money by the extension proposed, while it would lose by insisting upon the payment of its bonds during the first quarter of the present year, which he thought would be a period of pressure not surpassed by any since 1825. The Government should act upon the principle of every other creditor—it must, like banks and capitalists, extend credit to its debtors, or take the chance of losing its debts. He could not anticipate opposition to such a measure, and should wait for objections to it to answer them.

Mr. HARDIN said he had the bill before him, and he could not find a gentleman who understood the amendments. He found in the bill, as originally printed, that the first section extended a credit of three, four, or five years, making the credit equal to four years, while there was no provision that these petitioners should pay interest. This was giving the merchants twenty-four per cent., while there was no relief extended to insurance offices, none to holders of real estate, none to those who had buildings on ground rent, but all to the merchants. He wished to call attention to the subjects. Credits ought never to be extended, upon the mere assent of security. If there was to be an extension made, it ought only to be made when the principal and security both came forward and gave new bonds. But unless there could be a satisfactory reason assigned, he could never vote for the second section of the bill. What does that section propose? It proposes to give away all the surplus revenue. West of the Alleghany mountains, some eight or ten millions were collected for lands. Was this all to be given away, for the benefit of the merchants of New York? Mr. H. concluded by moving that the committee rise and report the first two bills, and ask leave to sit again on the bill before the committee; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who said the gentleman had fallen into an error. The second section had been amended by striking out the part the gentleman took exception to.

The bill was then passed over.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the committee proceeded to consider the bill providing for carrying into effect the convention with Spain.

After a brief explanation by Mr. MASON, and a few remarks by Mr. ADAMS, the latter suggested the propriety of looking further into the subject, and for that purpose he moved that the committee rise; which was agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported to the House the bill making partial appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1836, and the bill making an appropriation for repressing hostilities on the part of the Seminole Indians.

The amendment to the latter bill was concurred in, and the two bills were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS rose, he said, to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the subject of the relations between this Government and that of Mexico. He adverted to some statements on the subject, which appeared in the National Intelligencer of this morning, and which, at his request, were read by the Clerk. Mr. A. said the question which he wished to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, whether the committee had received any communication from the State Department on the subject of the relations, political or commercial, between the United States and Mexico. If they had not, he concluded that they might receive such information to-day or on Monday, for a motion would probably be made to adjourn over till Monday.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations,) said, in reply, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had received no communication from the State Department on the subject of the relations of the United States with Mexico, whether commercial or political; and that they had no information on that subject other than that contained in the message of the President of the United States, delivered at the commencement of this session.

Having seen a statement in a newspaper of yesterday's date, founded on a commercial letter, that the arbitrary measure alluded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts had been adopted by the Mexican Government, he (Mr. M.) had called at the State Department, and was informed that no intelligence had been received on that subject. He (Mr. M.) had no doubt that, if the rumor proved to be true, information would be promptly communicated to Congress.

Mr. ADAMS said he would give notice that, unless, to-day or on Monday, information on the subject should be received by the House, he would submit a proposition in regard to it.

Mr. HARDIN moved that the rule be suspended, in order to receive petitions, beginning where the House left off on a former day. He saw no reason, he said, why the green valleys of the Ohio should not be heard from as well as the green mountains of Vermont. The motion was agreed to.

MICHIGAN MINING COMPANY.

Mr. VINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution offered, on leave, by Mr. JONES, of Michigan, was agreed to.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting and extending the right of pre-emption to the miners or diggers of the Mining Company, situated in the Territory of Michigan."

Mr. VINTON spoke in support of the motion, and stated that the Government had been defrauded under the pre-emption acts out of a million of dollars. He wished these people distinctly to understand that the proceeding will not be countenanced by the Government, and he therefore opposed the resolution even in the form of an inquiry.

Mr. JONES, of Michigan, briefly replied to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RIPLEY said the experience which the Government had had of the operation of the pre-emption acts ought to satisfy the House that the system ought not to be carried any further. In one case, to which he referred, in Louisiana, ten millions of dollars' worth of public lands were covered by pre-emption rights—not of actual settlers, but by fraudulent settlements made by capitalists from New York and New Orleans. He had himself drawn up a resolution proposing an inquiry on this subject, with a view to detect and punish such frauds.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said the facts disclosed went certainly to prove that Congress ought to be exceedingly guarded in relation to acts of this kind. Even if no fraud nor abuse had been practised in relation to them, still he thought the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan ought not to pass, because it introduced a new kind of pre-emption not heretofore recognised by the Government. It had been heretofore granted only to actual settlers who cultivated their lands, but this proposition went to give the right to individuals who lived by digging lead. The principle, he thought, was wrong, and he was opposed to the inquiry, because it encouraged an expectation in the parties concerned, which would never be realized.

Mr. ASHLEY said there would be no objection to a resolution of inquiry. It was perfectly proper to make an inquiry in regard to the rights of those who were located near lead mines. It was conceded that frauds had been practised under the pre-emption system, but this was no argument against the extension of the system, under proper guards. Pre-emption was one of the privileges which the Government ought to extend to settlers of public lands; and, in regard to the lead mines, it could be shown that the proceeds arising to the Government from renting them did not pay the expenses of collection, and the settlers near them were as much entitled as any other class of settlers to the privilege. He was happy to believe that the State which he in part represented, though a large portion of the land there belonged to the Government, furnished an exception to charges of fraud practised under the pre-emption acts. He had never heard of an instance of the kind as having occurred there.

The class of settlers to whom the pre-emption acts applied were the very poorest persons who emigrated from the old States. If they were not allowed this privilege, they must become slaves, and labor for others until they could acquire a sufficient sum to purchase at the land sales. There was many a family which had gone to the West poor, and had there been made comfortable and respectable by means of this privilege. Those who settled the western country, who were the pioneers of civilization there, who cut the roads, established schools, and erected mills, for those who followed them, were the people of this class, the settlers—some gentlemen might call them the intruders—on the public lands. He was well convinced that the Government had lost nothing by the pre-emption laws, except by some fraudulent acts, and it was no reason why the system should be abolished because some abuses had been practised under it. The committee could guard the law in such a way that no abuses could be practised hereafter. To reject the application of these individuals, after the system had been so generally extended heretofore, would be, he conceived, unjust. The State of Ohio had received the full benefit of the system, and from that quarter there ought to be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. LANE spoke in favor of continuing the pre-emption system, which, he said, was as old as the land laws themselves, and was one of the most valuable principles adopted in relation to the public lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said he held in his hand a resolution on the subject of the frauds under the pre-emption acts, which had been referred to, and moved the suspension of the rule in order to offer it.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved a general suspension of the rules in order to offer resolutions of inquiry; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the different acts of Congress granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, so as to protect the rights of the settlers, and prevent fraud against the United States.

Mr. DAVIS made some remarks on the subject, and moved the following amendment to the resolution:

And also into the expediency of extending to the actual settler on all lands that have been in market for five years, which pre-emption privilege shall extend for four years from and after the 19th of June next.

Mr. MAY opposed the amendment.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the further consideration of the resolution and amendment be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, stated that the subject of the pre-emption laws was now before that committee.

After some remarks from Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina,

Mr. HAMER moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, 81 to 54.

The main question was then ordered, and the resolution was agreed to.

SEMINOLE HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, moved to suspend the rules in order to proceed to the orders of the day. It was his purpose, he explained, to call up the bill making appropriations for repressing the hostilities of the Seminole Indians in Florida. He said very distressing news had been received this morning in regard to the progress of the Indians. They were now on their way to the seat of Government of Florida. The President was anxious to take immediate steps for checking them; and, in order to do so, it would be necessary to call upon the Governor of Georgia for a militia force.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill appropriating eighty thousand dollars for the repression of the hostilities of the Seminole Indians was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. CONNOR moved that the rules of the House be suspended in order to submit a motion that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to: Yeas 99, nays 38.

Mr. CONNOR moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to amend the motion by striking out Monday and inserting Saturday, and thereupon asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The question was taken on the motion, and determined in the negative.

Mr. WEBSTER asked the yeas and nays on the original motion, and they were refused.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CONNOR to adjourn to Monday, it was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS had given notice, he said, that, on this day, he would make a proposition in reference to some reported proceedings of the Government of Mexico. He had since called at the State Department, and had ascertained not only that the Government had received no official information on the subject of the articles published in the newspapers, but that those articles were, probably, without any foundation in fact. He had therefore no proposition to make at present. He, however, had seen two articles, which exhibited our relations in such a state as to make it necessary both for Congress and the Executive to keep a watchful eye to that quarter. The one was, that eleven citizens of the United States had been taken by the Mexican forces, and shot by order of a court martial. The other was a remonstrance from the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of Mexico to this Government, in relation to the interference of American citizens in the affairs of Texas. He could not say whether the remonstrance was a genuine paper, but, if it was, he presumed a communication would be sent to the House on the subject at a proper time.

Michigan.

Mr. GIDEON LEE inquired whether the Committee of Ways and Means was ready to call up the bills making appropriations for the army and navy and fortifications. He thought it highly important that those bills should be brought speedily before the House. The bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York would not, he hoped, be separated from those bills, and that all of them would be acted on without delay. He had risen to ask the committee when they would be ready to call up these several bills.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated, in reply, that he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to call up for consideration the army and navy bills at one o'clock to-morrow. They would be called up to-day, but another communication in reference to them was expected this day from one of the Departments. In respect to the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in New York, it was his intention to call it up to-day, after the presentation of petitions.

Mr. LEE said he was perfectly satisfied. His only object was to call the attention of the House to matters of infinitely more importance, as he considered, than any other before it.

MICHIGAN.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. HANNEGAN to reject the memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan, in relation to the boundary disputed between Michigan and Ohio.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, said that the memorial was of a harmless character, and, in courtesy to the individuals who sent it, ought to be received. He asked the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his motion.

Mr. HANNEGAN declined the withdrawal of the motion, and insisted that, if one official act of Michigan, as a State, could be recognised, every act might be. To sanction the pretensions of Michigan would be to sanction a revolutionary movement of a strong and decided character. He went on at some length to advocate his motion.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, when he presented this memorial, he did not suppose, he could not have supposed, that it would have elicited the debate which had occurred on its presentation. The memorial purported to be a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives, or Legislature, of what was named in it as the State of Michigan. Now, an inquiry had been made, where was the State of Michigan? Mr. B. should not say that Michigan was rightfully a State; much less should he say that Michigan was one of the States of this Union; nor should he undertake to say, for to do so would be prejudging the question, that Michigan was in any sense a State. But they all knew from public report, and from documents presented to that House, what had been doing in the Territory of Michigan. They knew that the inhabitants of that Territory had convened in the form of a convention, for the purpose of organizing a State constitution; that they had agreed upon a State constitution, and had referred that constitution to the people of the Territory of Michigan for their adoption, and the people had adopted it. That constitution had been sent to that House, and referred to one of its committees to act upon, and advise the House of their opinion upon it. Now, all this was known to have occurred. The Territory of Michigan had thus assumed the form of a State, had proceeded to elect Senators to Congress, and had chosen a member to represent what was designated as the State of Michigan to that House. All this they knew, and still he should not say, for he ought not to say, that Michigan, in all or any part of its course, had acted according to the constitution, or in conformity with her rights. She had not, however, professed to act in hostility to this Union, but had been seeking, and was then seeking, either by right or wrong, to become a member of this confederacy. Thus seeking to become one of the States of this Union, it seemed to him that liberality and fair dealing, and a spirit of harmony and good will, should have induced them to receive a communication from what purported to be the Legislature of that State. His object was to send this memorial to the same committee to which the matter had already been referred, and not to invite discussion. He had presented it at the request of the gentleman who had been chosen to represent Michigan on that floor.

Mr. B. would not say one word whether Michigan was right or not, but he might be permitted to say this much: that those persons who had convened as the Legislature of Michigan, and sought to bring that State into the Union, were not acting in hostility, but in subordination to the Union, and that their memorial should be treated in a respectful manner, even if the House should not agree with their views. The motion then was not to receive that paper.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman that the motion was that the petition be rejected.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, well, sir, the motions are identical. While he was up he wished to say a word or two upon the general proposition of rejecting petitions of this nature. Was it pretended that there was anything offensive in this petition, anything reflecting on the dignity and character of that House, or any member of it? It stood free from that difficulty, and the objection now taken to it was, that there was no such person known to that House as the Legislature of Michigan. Now, (said Mr. B.,) if these memorialists had misnamed themselves, but had chosen to address that House in a respectful manner, it did seem to him an objection against receiving their petition that was hardly a good one.

But on the general right of petition. How did that right stand in England, a country from which we derived some of our notions of liberty? In England, as they all very well knew, the legislative power was supposed to reside inherently in the Crown; by the Crown all laws were enacted, by and with the consent and advice of the two Houses of Parliament. Petitions, therefore, upon legislative subjects, were addressed to the Crown, and not to the Parliament. They all knew that, before the revolution of 1688, it was no uncommon exercise of the kingly prerogative for the Crown to repel petitioners, and even to imprison them for assuming the right to lay their grievances at the foot of the throne; but in the bill of rights of 1688, the subjects of Great Britain had taken care to guard this right to petition, and to guard it much more effectually than it was guarded here, if that House were to drive out petitions as they had been asked to do. As the British bill of rights was peculiarly applicable at the present time, since so much new light was coming in upon us, he would beg leave to refer the House to a single clause of it. Mr. B. then read the clause setting forth that it was the right of the subject to petition the King, &c. Well, then, (said Mr. B.) it was their right to petition, and the King was bound to hear them, and receive petitions, whether he chose to grant the prayer of them or not. This was the right of Englishmen. Now, what were the rights of citizens of the United States? If honorable gentlemen would take the trouble to look into their own State constitutions, they would find, without, he believed, any exception, that this right of petition was most sacredly and carefully guarded in each and all of these constitutions. The idea of driving petitioners out of doors had never before been heard of. It was a new invention of the present day, which no one ever dreamed of before, except under the arbitrary Crowns of England, before the revolution of 1688; certainly never heard of in this country before the present session. It was true that the constitution of the United States contained no bill of rights when first adopted, but an amendment of it contained a similar provision to the one he had read from the English bill of rights. It would be recollected that when that constitution was submitted to the Virginia convention for adoption, one of the objections on the part of Virginia was, that it contained no bill of rights; and that convention recommended to the people of the several States the adoption of certain clauses specifying what were the rights of citizens of the United States, and one of those very clauses was this amendment: "That the people had the right peaceably to assemble together to consult for the common good, and instruct their representatives; and that every freeman had the right to petition the Legislature for a redress of grievances." Virginia recommended the incorporation of this clause into the constitution of the United States, and it was substantially the same with the English bill of rights. Petitions, on all matters, whether grievances or not, if the people held them to be so, they had the right to present, and had the right to assemble together, and to instruct their representatives. But, in these latter days, when the right of instruction, if not in theory disregarded, was, in practice, treated with contempt, it might not be a matter of any surprise that gentlemen should be disposed to treat with a little ceremony the right to petition.

Mr. B. said clauses of this kind were in all the State constitutions, and essentially the same in the constitution of the United States; the principle was in conformity with the notions of liberty acted up to in England, and with what was the declared will of the people of Virginia. He thought the House should receive all petitions from citizens of the country, which were respectful in their terms, and not reflecting upon the body, or some of its members. This was his unqualified opinion. It was not because the prayer of a petition might be deemed unconstitutional, that the petition should be rejected, or the petitioners treated with contempt. Many held it unconstitutional for Congress to make appropriations for objects of internal improvement, yet others believed the General Government possessed the power. But who ever heard of rejecting a petition which pointed to some local improvement? Who ever heard of rejecting such petition, from any quarter of that House, and driving them out of doors, because the petitioners asked for an appropriation for an object some gentlemen believed to be unconstitutional? A large proportion of the members of that House believed a Bank of the United States to be unconstitutional; but had they not received, year after year, petition after petition for a Bank of the United States; and had these gentlemen, who believed the object unconstitutional, ever dreamed of rejecting those petitions? Another mischievous question had been brought there, and he had done in that case, as he had in this, what he conceived to be right. He repeated, that the House was, in his opinion, bound to receive every petition from citizens of the United States, when they were couched in respectful and proper terms.

With regard to the memorial then under consideration, Mr. B. said if they conceived that Michigan was an inchoate State, and that the citizens of that Territory had chosen to denominate themselves the Legislature of Michigan, surely there was nothing offensive in that. He did trust that, unless the new doctrine to which he had referred should prevail, the House would receive this paper, order its reference and printing, so that, if any thing contained in it could throw any light upon the subject, the committee and the House might have the benefit of it. Whether it contained any or not, he did not know; he had read but a small part of it; but as it was a paper emanating from citizens of Michigan, he could see no reason for refusing to refer it.

Mr. BOND said he felt constrained to address the House for a few moments, and give the reasons which would induce him to vote for the rejection of the petition. I differ, sir, and I regret it, from my worthy colleague, [Mr. THOMSON,] in the request which he made for the withdrawal of the motion now under consideration; thus leaving the petition, as a supposed harmless affair, to be referred sub silentio; and if my colleague had read the petition, I doubt if he would have made the request.

But, in the few remarks which I now have the honor to submit, I utterly disclaim all idea of disrespect towards the petitioners, or the people of Michigan. I cherish no unkind feelings towards them, collectively or individually; so also, sir, I must premise, that no gentleman on this floor entertains a higher sense of regard for the right of petition than I do—it is a constitutional and solemn right, and no one will go farther to maintain it than I will, as it is guaranteed by that sacred compact. But we must be guarded, Mr. Speaker, lest, in our zeal for this great privilege, we trench on the constitution itself. Sir, this right of petition is sacred; but to whom does it belong? Has any and every person, State or sovereignty, at home or abroad, whether owing us allegiance or not, this right? I humbly think not, sir. The citizens of any of our States or Territories may petition; and if their petitions are decorous and respectful towards the House, when offered, it is our bounden duty to receive them. The same may be said of all the institutions or corporations, created and recognised by our laws. As they are bound to obey, so they are entitled to all the rights and privileges of our constitution and laws; and, among these, that of petition is perhaps the most sacred. I would strive to be the last to abridge this right.

But, sir, who are the petitioners named in this memorial, and from whom does it purport to come? Are they known to this House, or to the constitution and laws of the country? I answer, no. This petition expressly purports to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan. When, where, and by whom was this State, and this Senate and House of Representatives, created and authorized? If, indeed, Michigan be a State, and have these appendages of sovereignty, she is at this time unknown as such to our constitution and laws, and must be a foreign State. As such, the right of petitioning Congress does not belong to her.

But if it is claimed, as it seems to be, that she is one of the United States, I call for the authority under which she became such. In former instances of States being admitted into our Union, some ceremony, some legislation, some important primitive measures, were found not only expedient, but absolutely necessary and prerequisite, on the part of the elder sisters. I will name a law for taking a census, to test the true number of the population; another, regulating the elective franchise; the bounds of the Territory to be embraced within the new State; and, in fine, all needful provisions to the regular accomplishment of such a great and important change.

All or many of these measures have heretofore been found indispensable for the admission of new States, and I can see no reason, founded on expediency or law, for creating a new rule in the present instance. Have any of these measures preceded the formation of the constitution of Michigan, under which a Senate and House of Representatives now claim to act? Not one, that I am aware of. And yet, sir, it is but a short time since they were deemed necessary by the proper authorities of that Territory and her own people, as may be seen on a reference to some of the former journals of this House. But because Congress would not, or, from the pressure of business, could not, comply with the wish then expressed, it would seem that Michigan becomes impatient, and assumes that she has all these rights, without the intervention of any other power! Gentlemen are of course at liberty to adapt their opinions to any emergency, but I, for one, am not prepared to admit this new position. In taking this stand, I hope I need not say that the pending conflict of boundary, in which Ohio is interested, has no connexion with my feelings or opinions on the subject. I act from higher and more important motives—from considerations which, in my judgment, seriously involve the constitution and laws of the land.

I would not, if I could, unnecessarily retard the admission of Michigan into the Union; but I am unwilling, even with the new lustre and strength which she would give to that chain, to prostrate any of our great and long-established landmarks to attain that end.

In opposing the present reference of this petition, I do not necessarily deprive the parties of the right of petition, nor of any of the benefits which it asks. The citizens and legally constituted authorities of Michigan have that right in its most comprehensive sense, and I seek not to restrain or limit it except as the constitution and our usages require. Let them approach as citizens, or in some other known, legal, and admitted capacity or right, and we are bound to hear them. But we cannot, and, for the sake of order and a due administration of our Government, ought not to receive their petitions, when sent in a capacity as yet unknown to our laws, and tending, by indirection, to accomplish that which, if openly avowed, would not be admitted. That Territory has a Delegate on this floor, and we know that she has other citizens and agents here for the express purpose of urging all her pretensions. Why not, then, leave it for these gentlemen to adopt this memorial, and send it to us in their own names, and thereby take from it the objectionable character? This would secure to the Territory the benefit of every legitimate purpose of such a paper. Mr. Speaker, this may seem, at first view, to be a small matter, but I think that more portentous consequences may follow it than some gentlemen seem to be aware of. What arguments or influence may hereafter be drawn from the admission and reference of this memorial, purporting, as it does, to come from a sovereign State unknown to our laws, it is not for me to conjecture. But I know, sir, precedents are dangerous as well as wholesome things. We should be circumspect when entering on a case somewhat, if not wholly, new in its character, and which may produce or afford a precedent fraught with dangerous consequences. Harmless and innocent as this matter is thought by some to be, we well know how prone we all are to avail ourselves of precedents which aid us in favorite measures; and this House may, and probably will, have this case placed on their journal for future reference, when there will be more occasion, but greater difficulty, to escape from it. Why should we run any risk? Nothing will be lost to the petitioners if the memorial be rejected on the ground stated by me. All its benefits are placed within their reach, and it is not imposing any unreasonable duty to require parties to come by petition in some capacity or right known to our laws. I never deem it expedient to attain a good end by wrong means.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] by way of illustrating the propriety of our receiving this memorial, informs us that all the subjects of the English Crown have the right of petition, and has also referred to the constitution of the United States, and of the States generally, to prove the great extent of this right in this country. Now, sir, I do not deny this right in any of the instances the gentleman has referred to. The citizens of the United States, and of all our Territories, have the undoubted right of petition, and we are bound to give them a respectful and impartial consideration. The people of England claim and have the right of petitioning their King. This right of petitioning among us, too, is still more sacred; but to whom is it secured? Does it belong to a foreign State or people? No; but to all of our own people, without distinction, whether citizens of States or Territories, and to all the States and Territories of the Union, when preferred in some name or right recognised and bound by our laws.

The gentleman from New York has also, for the same purpose, referred to the several petitions presented to Congress by the Bank of the United States for a renewal of its charter, and says these petitions were received and referred, although many members of the House entertained the opinion that this institution was unconstitutional. I do not think this an apt illustration. The Bank of the United States claimed its existence under an act of Congress, duly passed and approved as the constitution directs, and afterwards solemnly adjudicated on by the Supreme Court of the United States. Twice had such an institution been created by law, and more than twice had our Supreme Court deliberately and solemnly adjudged such law to be constitutional. It is certainly for the peace and interest of our country that these great questions should, after such a lapse of time and passing such ordeals, be considered as settled. But, after such repeated action by Congress and the Supreme Court, the gentleman surely will not contend for the new doctrine that, because he does not so understand the constitution, the petitions of the bank might be treated as from a source unknown to our laws. Sir, when the gentleman from New York shall present to us a petition from the State of Michigan, and be able to direct our attention to an act of Congress authorizing such a State, or even when he shall, without such an act, show us a solemn decision of the Supreme Court, holding such State to have been formed in accordance with the constitution and the general laws of the Union, I shall be ready to receive such petition. But, unless the most important and needful of these primitive measures are complied with, I cannot consent to recognise the right of Michigan to petition in the name of a sovereign State. Until Congress pass a law authorizing such a State, I trust that the House will take care lest they vote to establish so alarming a precedent as the one now proposed.

Mr. KENNON said it would be found, by reference to the memorial, that the memorialists did not assume to be a State, but declared their object to be to become a State. He asked for the reading of the prayer of the petition, and it was read. The memorial, Mr. K. continued, did not represent Michigan as a State. Why, then, should it be rejected? Upon bare technicalities

Michigan.

it was proposed to reject it. For his own part, so far as Ohio, and Indiana, and Illinois, were concerned, he thought too much sensitiveness had been manifested on this subject. He had never felt much excitement in regard to it. He expected that Ohio would have her rights; and, when the question came up for consideration, he should express his opinion in regard to her claims. But he did not see that any thing could be gained by the rejection of this memorial.

Mr. LANE said it was true that no such State as Michigan did exist. It was also true that the citizens of Michigan have a right to petition Congress, and that Congress ought to receive their petitions. It was, however, his intention, if an opportunity offered, to submit a motion to obviate the difficulty; which motion was, that the petition be received and referred as from the people of the Territory of Michigan.

Mr. PINCKNEY desired to explain the reasons which would govern his vote. He wished it to be distinctly understood that they had no reference whatever to the boundary controversy. Upon that question he was entirely uncommitted, and open to conviction. A good deal had been said respecting the right of the people to petition. No one had a more profound respect than himself for the citizens of Michigan, or held in greater veneration than he did the right of the people to memorialize the Government. No one, therefore, could be more willing to receive the memorial, if it could be done consistently with the constitution. But how could such a memorial as that be received by the House? What did it purport on its face to be? Why, it was entitled a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan. Was there any such Legislature known to the House? Has any such State been admitted into the Union? Clearly and unquestionably not. How, then, could a legislative document be received from a political body utterly unknown to the constitution and laws, and not only unknown, but that actually has no existence—a political nonentity? It appeared to him that the application was preposterous. Either Michigan is a Territory, or she is a State. She cannot be both. If she is a State, how is it that she is represented on this floor by a territorial Delegate? If she is a Territory, how can she address this House in the tone and attitude of an independent State? But, though these two characters were utterly incompatible, Mr. P. said he would not hesitate to receive the memorial, were it not that it might be attended with serious consequences. Michigan claimed admission to the Union, and she also claimed a disputed territory. If this memorial should be received, would it not virtually prejudice those questions? Would it not be tantamount to a recognition of her claim to sovereignty? Would it not authorize her to throw off her Territorial Government, to set at naught the laws of the Union and the authority of Congress, and to go on acting in her alleged capacity as a sovereign State? Whatever others might think, he could not vote to receive the memorial, seeing the tendency it had, not only to justify Michigan in forming a constitution without the assent of Congress, but to authorize her to act as a State, and to abrogate all federal supremacy within her limits. Mr. P. repeated that he had nothing to do with the boundary dispute in making these remarks. His vote was governed entirely by the fact that Michigan is a Territory, and not a State; and that the House could not properly receive a communication from her, in the capacity of a State, until she shall be regularly admitted into the confederacy by an act of Congress.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, said that, from the remarks which had been made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] as well as the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. BONN,] who had just resumed his seat, he thought it necessary for him to make a short explanation to the House, as well as to his constituents, lest he might be misunderstood by either as to the motives which governed him in making the request of the gentleman from Indiana he had made. In order, therefore, that he should not be considered as yielding any of the rights of Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois, to all the territory which they claim, he would preface the few remarks he intended to make on the motion to reject the petition, by stating, both to the House and to the people of those States, that, as to their right to all the territory which they claim, he had not the shadow of a doubt, and those rights he would never yield, but would ever maintain while there was the slightest hope of obtaining them; but hoped that, when they contended for their rights, they would be regulated in their struggle by the constitution and laws.

Mr. T. said that when the motion was first made by the gentleman from Indiana to reject the petition, he thought at the moment it was right and proper, and that he should vote for it, because it purported to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan; but when he thought more maturely on the subject, and considered of the right of petition secured by the constitution to the people of this country, and that a vote to reject the petition now presented to this House might be an infringement of that sacred instrument, he had some misgivings and some doubts as to the propriety of giving such a vote, and finally came to the conclusion that it would absolutely be lunacy to give it; and this was the main reason why he had requested the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his motion to reject, that he (Mr. T.) and the House might be relieved from the necessity of voting to reject a petition; for he never had, and, so long as he might be honored with a seat on that floor, he never would, vote to reject a petition, no matter from whence it came, or from whom it came—whether it was from the humblest individual that treads your soil, Mr. Speaker, or from the highest in authority in the land; but, having received the petition, and attended to its prayer, I would afterwards consider of the expediency, propriety, and constitutionality, of granting that prayer.

Mr. T. said he had heard much said in this House about its dignity, and our dignity as its members, and that petitions ought to be in respectful language; but he would ask, if we have any dignity, where did we acquire it? from whom did we derive it? Was it not from the people who sent us here as their servants? And shall we now turn round to them and say, we are no longer your servants—we have become your lords, and you must come to us with your hats under your arms when you approach our dignity. Sir, this is not my doctrine, this is not my creed.

We have been taunted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and others who advocated the claims of the Territory, with our great numbers and power on this floor, compared with poor little Michigan; then why, in this preliminary step of the presentation of a petition, attack her?

No, sir, let her be heard; yes, let her have a fair, a full hearing, not only through a petition from her citizens, by a petition from her Legislative Council, and even by a petition from what she regards as a Senate and House of Representatives, that she and her advocates, on this floor or elsewhere, may have no reason to complain; for I have no fear as to the result of a thorough investigation of this matter, so far as Ohio is concerned; for I am perfectly satisfied the more the subject of boundary between Ohio and Michigan shall be scrutinized and examined, the more apparent will be the right of that State to the territory she claims.

Mr. KINNARD said that he would be happy to have it in his power to pursue that course, with regard to the question before the House, which might be generous to the people of Michigan, and at the same time just to the State which he in part represented. From all the deliberation which he had given to the subject, he felt it his duty to sustain the motion of his colleague, and regretted that it was a case in which his feelings of respect for the people of Michigan, and his sense of justice to his own State, were in collision.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] has been careful to impress the House with the opinion that all the merits of the claims of Michigan, and of the controversy which she seeks with her neighbors, are already known to the House. What, then, is intended by the introduction of this paper? It cannot be for the purpose of shedding new light on the subject in general, for the gentleman says we know all about it. Believing, as he did, that Michigan intends, by the introduction of this paper, to gain a point in her case, and, after its reception, and the consequent reference to the committee, that she will contend that a virtual recognition is given, not only that she is constitutionally and legally a State of the Union, but that she is a State with the limits and boundaries to which she is clearly not entitled—boundaries which Congress cannot sanction. We are thus required to acknowledge that Michigan is a free, sovereign, and independent State. The completest evidence on record of such an admission on our part would be to receive her legislative enactments as such State, and to accredit them according to her wishes. If this were not the point intended, if it were not thus designed to pre-judge favorably the question as to the admission of the State into the Union, with her present extraordinary demands, the most unexceptionable means of making herself heard would have been adopted. In all probability, the Territory, not the State, as in other instances, would have petitioned through the proper medium, her Delegate on this floor. If this paper had been thus presented, he would consider the object of its introduction far less questionable, and the effect less injurious.

Mr. K. professed himself as much attached to the interests of Michigan, and to her legitimate demands, when properly presented, as the gentleman from New York, but was surprised that the honorable gentleman had not manifested quite as much regard for the interests of Indiana as for those of the Territory.

Mr. K. considered the introduction of the paper at this time, and in its present shape, as peculiarly unfortunate and inexpedient. He hoped the House would reflect upon the deep anxiety and excitement which would be produced in a portion of the West, if the doctrine is to be openly and deliberately avowed in this House that Michigan is a State—a State entitled to embrace within her limits a large portion of Indiana. For one, he was prepared to say that the State of Indiana would, under all circumstances, adhere to her own constitution—to the soil within her just and constitutional limits. This duty and right on her part, and the want of constitutional power on the part of Congress, or any State, to coerce her from her position, were so clearly self-evident, that he would not enter into the discussion of those points.

Mr. K. said he felt as ardent an attachment to the right of petition as any other member. He would not surrender, in behalf of his own constituents, its fair and constitutional exercise; and he would not vote to deny the same sacred privilege to any portion of the American people. But, in behalf of his constituents, he claimed the authority to distinguish between the petitions of the people of the Territory of Michigan, and the illegal, unconstitutional demands of the self-styled Senate and House of Representatives of Michigan, particularly, as in the present case, when those demands are not only in contempt of the authority of the Union, in derogation of the independence and vested rights of the State of Indiana, but altogether mischievous and inexpedient.

Mr. K. said the rule of comity or courtesy, which was principally relied on by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] did not seem to apply to the question. If that argument justifies the introduction of this paper, and consequently its reference to the committee, and the action of the House upon it, there was no extent to which the House might not go. If, through comity, according to the argument of the honorable gentleman, we must admit these illegal and unconstitutional demands from a self-existent, legislative power, unknown to the House, claiming what Congress has never conceded, in the next place we shall be called upon to admit the member who is waiting at your door; that accomplished, the admission of the State would follow. He denied the constitutional power of Congress to admit a State into the Union, proposing to dismember a State already formed; and he thought it very extraordinary that the House was disposed to entertain such a question.

Mr. K. desired the House to observe that the paper to which the question refers alleges a fact which has no existence. It purports to come from a State embracing certain limits. Those limits embrace a portion of the people of Indiana; and the inference is intended to follow, that those people were represented in the General Assembly of Michigan, and had an agency in sending this obnoxious paper, which he took occasion to deny.

Mr. SPANGLER regretted that his indisposition prevented him from doing that full justice to the subject he should otherwise have felt it his duty to have done. He had listened attentively to the remarks of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] and would neither yield to him, nor to any other gentleman, in his support of the abstract doctrine of the sacred right of petition. He had no idea that the people were to come to this House with their hats under their arms; for, in this country, sovereignty resides entirely in the people, and public agents are but the servants of the people. Mr. S. said there were three classes of petitioners, all of whom are unquestionably entitled to memorialize this House; and he would have no objection to receive this paper, if it came within the description of either class. The first class consisted of private American citizens, praying for individual relief, whose applications we are in the daily habit of receiving. The second consisted of private or public corporations, such as banks, insurance and railroad companies, and incorporated towns or cities. The third consisted of the States of this Union, in their separate and independent capacity of States. This memorial did not come before us either from individuals or corporations, nor even from Michigan as a Territory of the Government; but it came from her in the assumed and unauthorized character of a State. He could not recognise her, and he did not know her, in that capacity. He had often read the names of all the States, but had never seen hers included in the catalogue. When or where did she become a State? Allusion had been made to the case of Tennessee. He saw no analogy between the cases. Tennessee never acted as a State, or approached this House in that character, until she had been formally admitted into the Union. But Michigan, without any federal authority, has formed a State constitution, and organized a State Government, and now addresses us in a sovereign capacity. He could not recognise her right to do so. Mr. S. made some further remarks, to show that there was no analogy between the case of Tennessee and that of Michigan. He did not regard the vote upon this question as of any importance, in relation to the question of disputed territory. It had nothing to do with that question; and he had no apprehension that any gentleman could feel himself committed on that question.

by any vote he might give upon this. That matter stood upon its own merits, and would be decided accordingly.

Mr. HOLSEY had, he said, bestowed some reflection on this subject, and, entertaining a desire to preserve the good faith of the Government in its constitutional compacts, he had risen to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Indiana. The rights of Michigan were based upon the ordinance of 1787, which would be found to contain the offensive word "State," which was made the ground of the motion to reject. That ordinance declares that there "shall be formed in the said Territory not less than three nor more than five States;" and the boundaries of these States are then described. It gives Congress the authority to form one or two States in that part of said Territory lying north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan; and it provides that, "whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such States shall be admitted" into the Union. This was the language of the ordinance, which, if any faith was to be kept by the Government, was decisive in favor of the rights of Michigan. There was another aspect in which this subject might be viewed. By the terms of the compact, the States were to be admitted when they contained sixty thousand free inhabitants. Was it a fact that Michigan had the required number of inhabitants? If she had, she was entitled to be admitted into the Union. The petitioners, he thought, could come into this House with strong claims of right, based on a solemn compact, which, as had been said in this House, was unalterable by any law, human or divine. The petitioners were at least entitled to be heard with respect, and he hoped the whole matter would be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCARTY, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to members to present memorials, petitions, &c., moved a postponement of the question until to-morrow week.

The motion was lost: Ayes 67, noes 72.

Mr. BEARDSLEY begged leave to say a word or two in explanation. In reply to the question put from one of the gentlemen from Indiana, [Mr. KINNARD,] how it happened that this petition had not been presented by the Delegate from Michigan, instead of being presented by himself, the reason was, as Mr. B. had been told since the question was put, that the Delegate was not in the city at the time, and hence it was handed to Mr. B. for presentation. This was the only reason, as far as he knew, for the paper being handed to him.

Mr. B. wished to make a remark upon an objection urged by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY.] That gentleman said that Michigan, which was only a Territory, had, in this paper, assumed to be a State. Hence he drew the inference that it would be unconstitutional to receive this petition, or give it any sort of countenance, and hence he would vote it out of doors. Now, sir, said Mr. B., we have before heard of instances of attempts to nullify, in order to get out of the Union; but this seems to be an effort to nullify, in order to get into the Union! Michigan, as I understand the gentleman, is now attempting to violate the laws of the United States—in other words, to nullify them—in order to become a member of the Union. Mr. B. said that he did not so understand the memorial; for it urged that Congress should acquiesce, and receive Michigan as a sister State. But the argument of the gentleman himself was, that this movement by Michigan was in derogation of the laws of the Union. This, upon the argument of the gentleman, was the first instance of an effort by a Territory to break into the Union, although they all knew that efforts had been heretofore made to break out of it!

Mr. B. made some further remarks, to show that the case of Tennessee was analogous to the present one, except in reference to the boundary question; and said the mere receiving and referring the memorial under consideration in no way committed the House, or any member who so voted.

Mr. HARDIN did not want to see any State come into this Union by a violation of the territorial law. Now, if Congress recognised Michigan as a State, what then? Why, the power of Congress over this subject ceased; it became a dead letter, and the national Legislature would be prevented from settling the question of boundary existing between Michigan and Ohio. If the people of Michigan memorialized that House—nay, if the Territorial Government of Michigan were to do so—then he would freely concede that their memorial should be received. But, on the contrary, if the House of Representatives were memorialized by Michigan, calling itself a State Government, he would say to the memorialists, "I know you not; I cannot recognise your title, nor can I recognise your claim." Mr. H., after some remarks in relation to the boundary question, expressed his hope that the question would be postponed until the committee who have in charge all the documents relative to the claim of Michigan to be admitted into the Union report on the subject.

Mr. STORER, of Ohio, said that when the petition before the House was presented, he distinctly understood that it came from the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan; and, if that was the case, he had no objection to its reference. But, sir, some misgivings as to the fact induced my colleague to ask that the memorial should be read, when it was discovered, for the first time, that the State of Michigan, as a member of the confederacy, and in her sovereign capacity, appealed to this House, not to ask admission into the Union, but to argue the question of the northern boundary of Ohio.

Sir, I should have been satisfied with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] and with his modification, I should vote that the petition be received; but as I am admonished that the motion to reject will not be withdrawn, I shall vote to sustain the original motion. I, sir, will not yield to any gentleman on this floor in my respect for the right of petition, when the claim is made in a constitutional manner, and no point of State sovereignty is involved; but I shall always feel it to be my duty to resist every attempt, no matter in what manner or under what circumstances it may be made, to assert a right which does not exist, and is not sanctioned by the letter or the spirit of the constitution. The distinction between the right assumed by the State of Michigan, and that secured to the citizen, has already been so ably and clearly stated by the gentlemen who have preceded me, that I shall not further discuss it. I shall confine my remarks to what has fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HOLSEY.]

I was surprised, sir, to hear the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the whole subject involved in this memorial, express his opinion so decidedly as to the propriety of admitting Michigan into the Union, without the previous action of Congress.

[Here Mr. BEARDSLEY rose to explain, and stated his remarks were intended to apply to the abstract right of Michigan to claim admission as a State, disconnected from the boundary question.]

Sir, I did not misunderstand the honorable gentleman. His opinion is clear that the State of Michigan ought to compose a part of this Union; and he has referred to the proceedings in Congress in 1796, on the application of Tennessee to be admitted as a State.

Michigan.

With great deference to the superior experience and research of that gentleman, I must, sir, insist that the case of Tennessee is not analogous. I have attentively examined the journals of the Senate, and find that the claim of Tennessee was resisted with great pertinacity. One of the ablest reports, from one of the most able committees of that body, furnishes, to my apprehension, an irresistible argument against the assumption of Michigan. This report was discussed at great length, and the principle it involved, though modified, was not denied on the final vote. And, sir, even that modification was passed by a majority of one only, in consequence of the absence of Mr. King, who had been appointed minister to England. Now, sir, I ask the honorable chairman, if such a doubtful precedent, on so momentous a subject as is involved in this day's discussion, should be regarded as worthy of solemn consideration. I appeal to him as a legal man, if the decision of the court of errors of his own State, which has truly been said to be sometimes a literal court of error, where the point has been determined by a bare majority, are ever relied on as safe and satisfactory. I think, sir, I can anticipate his answer. But, unfortunately for the value of the precedent, let me tell the gentleman, it has never been adhered to in any subsequent legislation, where Territories have applied for admission.

Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama, whose rights depended upon the same principle as that which is contained in the ordinance of 1787, disregarded the example of Tennessee, and applied to Congress for its previous action, in the passage of a law to authorize a convention, preparatory to their final admission. It may be said that, so far as Ohio, Illinois, and Mississippi, were concerned, they were admitted before the Territories out of which they were taken numbered a population of sixty thousand; and so far there is some plausibility in the idea that the precedent is analogous; but, sir, in the case of Indiana the same question was directly involved as that which must be discussed whenever a bill is reported for the admission of Michigan. I have examined the files in the office of the Clerk of this House, and have found the original memorial of the Legislative Council of Indiana; and I find, sir, that more than sixty thousand people were residents of that Territory when Congress was invoked to admit her as a State. I find, also, that no pretence is set up of an abstract right for admission into the Union, on the ground that her population was sufficient to authorize it. In that memorial I also find, sir, that the petitioners applied for the action of Congress, conceiving, as they very properly expressed themselves, that no mode was designated in the ordinance of 1787, by which their preparatory course should be governed. This petition was referred at once; a bill was reported, authorizing a convention; the convention met, formed a constitution, and at the next session of Congress the State was admitted. And such, sir, was the course of Alabama. So much, then, for the precedent of Tennessee; which, if it was available, had been many years in force when the States I have just referred to were admitted; and yet we find it was not then relied upon or referred to. Sir, Indiana was then, as she always has been, the modest yet firm and decided advocate of her own rights and the respect that is due to the confederacy.

Sir, the right of Michigan to become a State has been discussed at large on the question to reject; and I have been compelled to follow the gentleman from New York, though I had determined not to trouble the House until he had entered into the debate, and opened the whole field.

Before I sit down, sir, I will reply to the gentleman from Georgia. He, sir, has referred to the ordinance of 1787, and emphatically insists that the right of Michigan to be admitted into the Union is a matter of solemn compact. He points to the provisions of the section requiring Congress to organize not less than three nor more than five States in the Northwestern Territory.

Sir, I beg leave to except to his construction of that instrument. If he will examine its provisions carefully, he will find that three States were definitely marked out in the ordinance, the northern boundary of which was the territorial line between the United States and Canada. These States are organized; and it depends upon the discretion of Congress whether more States shall be organized within that Territory. The right is reserved, in the act erecting the Territory of Michigan, to annex all the country north of the boundary line of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to those States, if hereafter it should be deemed expedient; and the jurisdiction of the General Government has been exercised in reference to that power.

The duty of organizing those States was unqualified; it, sir, was perfect; and it has been performed. There is now no legal obligation, on the part of Congress, to admit a new State in the Northwest; though I am satisfied, sir, it is our duty, and the public interest requires, that Michigan should be admitted whenever the proper steps have been taken. It is in vain, then, sir, to assume the right, as granted by this ordinance.

Sir, I feel that the debate has taken a wide range, and the general question has been prematurely discussed. I am satisfied that I have been compelled to be discursive: it is a necessary consequence of the great latitude allowed in debate.

It may be, sir, that I have discovered too much feeling in the earnest manner in which I have presented my remarks. The only apology I offer is the nature of the controversy in which the State I represent is engaged. Sir, we may be opposed by the North and the East, and a new State may be viewed with a more favorable eye than the elder members of the confederacy; but, sir, if we are left even in a hopeless minority, I trust we shall not be deterred, while we have the power and the occasion, from expressing our sentiments, and speaking out in no measured phrase on the great, the momentous interests that are involved in the present question.

[Mr. BEARDSLEY explained, and said that the gentleman [Mr. STORER] must have misunderstood him. He had expressly stated that, upon the boundary questions, and every thing connected with those questions, he gave no opinion; indeed, he had come to no result upon these questions. He hoped and expected that the gentleman would in this respect neither misapprehend nor misrepresent him, and he confidently believed he should not in this respect be mistaken.]

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARRIS] had thought proper to rebuke him for having expressed the opinion he had done; yet that honorable member had gone much further, and announced his own opinion upon the boundary question in all its aspects and bearings. This he had not done; he had only said that, independent of the boundary questions, the case of Tennessee was a precedent for the present application of Michigan. He, however, made no complaint that his colleague on the committee had made up a full opinion upon all matters; that was a matter for him alone to decide.]

Mr. STORER resumed. He did not mean to say that the gentleman had expressed an opinion on the boundary question. But he (Mr. S.) did say, that upon the isolated question, whether Michigan ought to be admitted—not taking into consideration the boundary controversy—there was no doubt. Mr. S. next adverted to the reception of Tennessee and Mississippi into the Union, and remarked that he could not admit that the course taken by Tennessee for admission into the Union was at all analogous to the present case. He concluded by repeating his determination to vote for the rejection of the memorial.

Mr. DAVIS was as much in favor of the right of petition as any one could be; but, under the circumstances connected with this memorial, he should vote against its reception. It was proper that he should tell his constituents that Michigan was claiming a part of the State of Indiana. The memorialists urged, in round and unequivocal terms, that they have a right to take a part of it. He would ask if there was a gentleman present who was willing to support them in that claim? He hoped not. If that House admitted the facts stated in the memorial, or admitted that a new State had a right to take a part of the lands within the boundary of an old State, they would be setting a dangerous precedent.

Mr. HAWES moved the previous question.

Mr. LANE hoped the gentleman would withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. HAWES said he would do so most willingly, but that at least fifty speeches were in a state of preparation on the subject.

The previous question was seconded: 76 to 59.

The House then determined that the main question should be now put.

Mr. HANNEGAN asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bond, Boon, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Crane, Davis, Evans, Rice Garland, Graves, Griffin, Hamer, Hammond, Hannegan, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Howell, Huntsman, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lay, Luke Lea, Lucas, Samson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McLene, Mercer, Milligan, Moore, Patterson, Pettigrew, Pinckney, Rencher, John Reynolds, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Vinton, Washington, Webster, White, Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Wise—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, George Chambers, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, Philo C. Shepperd, Shinn, Smith, Sprague, Steele, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Wardwell, Weeks, Lewis Williams—137.

So the motion to reject the petition was determined in the negative.

Mr. LANE moved to amend the motion to refer the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, by adding that "it be considered as a memorial from the citizens of the Territory of Michigan." He was desirous that the petition should go to the committee in its true garb, and not in one which it had no right to assume.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend the amendment, by adding the following: "This House, in receiving the memorial purporting to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan, regard the same in no other light than as the voluntary act of private individuals, who have, without authority, assumed a corporate capacity and name."

Mr. SLADE proposed to strike out the words of the amendment printed in italics.

Mr. HANNEGAN accepted the amendment, as a modification of his motion.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. HANNEGAN, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bean, Bell, Bond, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Coles, Corwin, Crane, Davis, Denny, Everett, Farlin, Forester, Philo C. So the amendment was agreed to, and the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. JARVIS moved the suspension of the rule, in order to enable the Committee on Naval Affairs to report and offer for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the naval force in commission.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not rise to oppose the motion. He was glad that it had been offered. But he entertained the impression that an increase of the heads of appropriation in the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means would answer the purpose.

Mr. WISE rose, he said, to oppose this resolution. It was his duty to state that the Committee on Naval Affairs had already determined that they would not, without a call from the Navy Department, increase or recommend the increase of the naval appropriations. The Committee on Naval Affairs would be called upon by the Navy Department for an increase of appropriations, should they be required. He had no idea that the committees of this House should be over zealous and over active in recommending and urging the increase of the appropriations. If there was any necessity for an increase, it ought to be made known by the executive Departments, and they should take the responsibility of recommending the measure. If the appropriations should not be found necessary, it would be said by the Departments, we did not recommend them to you. He believed that some of the Departments were anxious that this House should take the responsibility of measures at the present time.

Mr. JARVIS remarked that seven out of nine of the committee united in the recommendation of the resolution proposed. The gentleman from Virginia seemed to think that this House ought not to take any responsibility upon itself, but merely to act as the organ of the will of the Executive. He dissented from this doctrine. If we found the Executive going too fast, it was our duty to check him; and, if he was going too slow, to spur him on.

Mr. WISE put it, he said, to the honorable chairman to say whether he had called on the Secretary of the Navy to ask whether the additional appropriations contemplated in the resolution were required. If the gentleman would not answer, he would state that this call had been made upon the Department, and had not yet been answered. He (Mr. W.) would not take action on this subject until it was answered. However much he might seem to think that the House ought to be merely the organ of the Executive, he was, in fact, utterly opposed to such a doctrine. He did not wish to be the organ of the Executive, nor the tool of the Executive. When the Executive was afraid to call for money, he did not wish him to make tools of us to make the call for him. He wished to know why this resolution was introduced here in anticipation of any information on the subject. The gentleman had said that, when the President was too tardy, it was necessary to spur him up. General Jackson never needed a spur in his life, but some of the Departments needed it, with the rowels struck in very deeply. He wanted to know what danger was now in prospect for which preparation should be made. At the commencement of the session, the Secretary of the Navy proposed to fit out two new frigates and two sloops of war; a most ridiculous preparation, indeed, if it was intended to get into a war with France. If there was danger, the call upon us for appropriations should be made by the President himself—not in a whisper, but in a bold and direct way, in a message. He wanted the responsibility of the measures of preparation to rest where it belonged.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, if the gentleman would look at the resolution, he would see that it was not liable to the objections which he had urged against it. That there should be some action in reference to the increase of the naval force, was agreed by the committee. They had proposed this resolution, not from the idea that there existed any disposition on the part of the Departments to shrink from responsibility. But this House was not to be told that it could act only as the creature of the Executive. The House, as well as the Departments, must share in the responsibilities of public measures, and they should act in union. Perhaps the views of the Department would be made known to the House to-morrow. If we looked to the preparations made by a foreign nation, and which, it was evident, had reference to hostilities with us, we would not hesitate to adopt some means of defence, without waiting to hear from the Department or the President. He was not afraid to take the responsibility of making the proposed inquiry, without waiting for the opinion of the Executive. No injury could result from it, and he thought it highly proper to invest the committee with the power of making the inquiry.

Mr. HAMMOND, of South Carolina, said this was an extraordinary resolution, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] had supported it with most extraordinary arguments. He had said that, on the evidences around us, he was for the immediate action of this House. I understand him to be for putting the country in a state of hostile preparation upon this subject. To what evidences does the gentleman allude? Were they the paragraphs of foreign newspapers with which the country had been lately inundated? Did the gentleman call upon this House to legislate upon this kind of information? If, sir, we are to have a war, let the proposition come to us from the proper quarter, and let us not be smuggled into one by resolutions such as this, predicated on the idle rumors of the newspapers. Had a resolution been offered calling for information from the Executive, he would have voted for it cheerfully; but without that information he could not consent to act.

The question of war was a great question. It involved vast interests. It should not be entertained in any shape without all the information which the Executive could give, and then fully discussed and deliberately decided. For his part, he could see nothing that had happened to change materially the relations of this country with France since the opening of the session. The French Government have refused to pay the indemnity to Mr. Barton. It was not the first refusal. No man in this House, or in this country, could have expected its payment on his demand, under the circumstances. The President himself could not have looked for it when he instructed him to make the demand. Gentlemen spoke of the tardy movements of the Government, and that it required spurring. He hoped the House would not suffer itself to be booted and spurred, for the purpose of kicking this country into a war. There had been irritation enough already. The resolution was calculated to have that effect. There had been messages and correspondences, diplomatic and undiplomatic, sufficient for that purpose; and he hoped this House would be disposed to allay rather than increase the excitement. He saw no cause for war. He believed a war would be entirely unnecessary; and, were it not for the serious consequences it involved, he should say it would be utterly ridiculous in both parties. He looked upon this resolution as the commencement of a series of war measures. He should not therefore vote for it, nor would he at this time support any measure looking towards a war.

Mr. HAWES was deeply mortified, he said, at the speeches which he had heard. He believed it had been by such speeches as these that the country had been prevented from receiving redress, before this, from France. The nation, he believed, had been robbed of its rights by factious speeches and essays. Are we (said Mr. H.) to stand here making speeches, which will be hailed abroad as evidence that the country will not insist upon its rights, while the French are making hostile preparations against us? He cared not through what channel the proposition might come; he would support any measure for putting the country in a state of defence. It was evident that France was making hostile preparations; and even if she was not, what objection could there be to the proposed inquiry into the expediency of increasing our naval force? In what a situation would the constituents of the gentleman from Virginia stand, in case of a war? The whole seaboard of Virginia would be exposed to the enemy, unless we had a sufficient naval force to defend it. As a member of this Congress, and as an American citizen, he hoped this proposition would be adopted.

Mr. McKEON would ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments. It was well known that he was not in the habit of intruding himself; and, but for the circumstances in which he found himself placed, he should have remained a silent observer of the discussion. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] informed us that he was mortified to hear the language of the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, [Messrs. WISE and HAMMOND,] who addressed the House in opposition to the resolution upon the table. He was not only mortified, but also astonished, at their arguments at such a period—at such a crisis as that in which we find the country now placed. Representing as he did, in part, a portion of the Union deeply interested in the question which now engrosses the public mind, he (Mr. McK.) could not but endeavor to give an impulse to an investigation which had for its object the defence of our sea-coast and the protection of our commerce. Well might he be astonished to hear opposition to a measure of this nature, with regard to the increase of our naval force, when the rumor is abroad that we have a squadron approaching our very borders. When the noise is actually ringing in our ears of the armaments in hostile array, while every thing portends difficulty, and points out the propriety and necessity of preparation, we must pause and discuss the expediency of inquiry into the propriety of moving forward in a work which relates to the public defence. We must debate the question by whom the first step ought to be taken—on whom the responsibility ought to rest. For one, he was willing to assume the responsibility. Why, sir, said Mr. McK., I was sent here to take responsibility like that now under consideration. Every member of this House was bound to take the similar responsibility. We are bound to our constituents, to the country, by every tie which can unite us to the honor and safety of the country, not to hesitate. The present situation of our foreign affairs required the patriotism and action of every member of the Government. While around all was activity, we ought not to be passive. It was well known that the Executive, as the head of the Government, had been alive to the importance of this question. To the Executive the country, throughout the long and difficult negotiations to which gentlemen had alluded, looked with anxiety, and thus far the movements of his patriotic administration had received the grateful applause of the country. The Chief Magistrate had thrown into the whole question the powers of his mighty intellect; had called into action his wonderful foresight; and with sleepless vigilance had endeavored to obtain the rights of our citizens, and to maintain the dignity of the country. With an Executive identified as he is with the history of the most brilliant periods of the country, he had no fears but that in his hands the interest and character of our country would be entirely secure. While other branches of the Government were zealously engaged, must we hesitate to execute our portion of the task imposed upon us by the peculiar state of things? It did not become us, said Mr. McK., to hesitate about directing an inquiry into the expediency of putting the country into a state of preparation against aggression. It cannot result in producing trouble; it cannot throw us into difficulty. The resolution should have been adopted without a question; but, sir, it appears obstacles must be thrown in the way, impediments interposed before us, to operate upon our minds, and deter us from an attempt to overcome them. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] threw out the suggestion that a war into which this country was about to be plunged, would be a ridiculous war, and fatal to the liberties of the country. Who talks of war? Who has sounded the tocsin which is to give the alarm throughout the country, to disturb the quiet of the land, and conjure up into timid minds the dire apparitions of desolation and destruction, the concomitants of a belligerent state? No one but the gentleman himself. If war must come, it was a question to be settled hereafter. That was not the question then under consideration, but merely whether it was expedient to inquire if the country should be put in a state of preparation. The inquiry may be necessary in other points totally separated from our present difficulties. The gentleman from South Carolina tells us we are to be driven into—spurred into—a war with France, which he, if it should happen, would term a ridiculous war. Sir, I deprecate as much as he does a state of hostility. I regret that he has used the term ridiculous. Much as I regret war, I prefer it to dishonorable peace. Ridiculous he may consider the war, if it must come; but there may be a peace which cannot be otherwise than degrading. With robberies committed years ago upon our unoffending citizens, and presenting in the acts a gross violation of the code of civilized nations; with years of patient negotiation; with a treaty solemnly ratified; added to all these injuries, the insult of demanding from the American people explanations (and those with a fleet before our harbors—with the rod hanging over our heads) which are incompatible with their self-respect and character as an independent people. If, under such circumstances, compelled to assume a hostile attitude, I, said Mr. McK., cannot consider that attitude ridiculous.

He regretted that this discussion had taken place. To our divided councils many of our difficulties may be attributed. They give confidence to those who deny us justice. It is time these divisions should be healed. He had hoped that, on an occasion like the present, but one feeling pervaded their body, as was certain but one feeling animated the entire people of the country. To refuse the inquiry would look like an indisposition on the part of the House to sustain the country. He could not believe that one would object to a course which was demanded by the exigency of the times, or that we should present, when the slightest speck was visible in the horizon portending the approaching storm, a divided people. On the question which had given rise to this debate, let us, whether it continues to retain its present aspect, or assume any other character, rally around the altar of our country, and be true to our motto; let us be, in fact, E pluribus unum. Let us be true to ourselves and to our own character, and present to the world but one front. Coming, as he before remarked, from a section of country, the lives and property of the citizens of which were most exposed, he (Mr. McK.) felt compelled to address those remarks to the House on this occasion, and ask the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, observed that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. JARVIS] had stated that seven out of nine of the committee had instructed him to present the resolution he had just offered.

Being one of the committee, I beg to state to the House the part I have taken. The chairman, a few hours ago, handed me in my seat the resolution now under consideration, and asked me, as one of the committee, to give my consent that he should offer it to the House. After I had read it, I replied that I did not know that I had any objection. On further reflection, apprehending that the resolution might lead to an exciting debate, I called upon the chairman, and expressed my fear to him, and retracted my approbation of presenting it.

I feared it might lead to a debate which might be injurious to the country. I do not consider the resolution itself as one of great moment. I admit the importance of the subject. But the resolution does not instruct the committee; it is one of inquiry only. I consider the whole subject now before the Committee on Naval Affairs. They have power at any time, whether the resolution be adopted or not, to report a bill to increase or any way improve the navy, and of course the appropriation of money to carry those objects into effect. The subject of increasing and improving our naval force is one that deserves the deliberate consideration of the committee and of this House. Our commerce needs protection, and this is stated by the Executive in his message; and new difficulties may arise with Mexico, which may require a part of our navy in that quarter.

I regret that, upon a subject of inquiry merely, gentlemen should indulge themselves in debating upon the danger and probability of a war with France. I regret that the debate should assume a tone and manner calculated to produce mischief. It is calculated, unnecessarily and unjustly, to alarm the country. It seems to me we are precipitate. The debate is assuming a most unfavorable character. We are debating upon the all-important subject of peace and war with France. I hope and trust we shall have more light and knowledge upon this momentous subject, before we seriously debate it. The debate seems to me ill-judged and unadvised, and calculated to produce the evil which I am quite sure a great majority of this House and nation deprecate, and hope to avoid. I do not propose to engage in such; it is altogether premature. I beg the House to be calm and deliberate, and to avoid excitement, which may be injurious, but cannot be useful to the country.

Mr. MILLER asked for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT, of Vermont, said he should vote for the resolution. He could not disregard the signs of the times; he thought it high time that the country should prepare for defence. From assurances in the annual message, the House had reason to expect a special message on the arrival of the final answer of France to our demand for payment. It was now known that the Executive had been in possession of that answer for more than five days; yet the promised special message had not been received. It was also known that a French fleet had been ordered to the West Indies. This, however, was only procured through the papers. Yet, in the absence of all official information, the course of the Executive is no secret. The result of a cabinet council is no secret. In the course of this debate, a gentleman of high standing, and in the confidence of the administration, had stated that he was prepared to anticipate the course of the Executive. He begged the House to mark the expression, taken in connexion with his support of this resolution, and not what that course will be. If the Executive had neglected its duty to the House, he trusted the House would not neglect its duty to the country. Why the special message was delayed, he would not undertake to say; he referred the question to those more immediately in the confidence of the Executive. He was prepared to go for every proper measure for defence.

Mr. LANE rose, he said, with no intention of discussing this subject, but merely to state, for the information of the House, what his understanding was in relation to the course of the Executive on this occasion. He believed it was only on Saturday or Sunday that Mr. Barton arrived in Washington. [Several voices: "that is not correct; he has not yet arrived."] Well, said Mr. L., there was such a report, and he made no inquiries as to its foundation. He would observe that he was well assured that the President would communicate all the information in his possession, at as early a period as possible. Of this Mr. L. had no doubt, and he could see no cause thus to arraign the Executive for want of vigilance, industry, or patriotism.

Mr. L. well recollected what had taken place on a former occasion. He recollected that complaints, long and loud, were made, that the proposed measure of preparing the country for defence at the last Congress was intrusting the President with too much power. Mr. L. would now say that he rested under the firm conviction, and he would proclaim it here and elsewhere, that if the last Congress had sustained the President of the United States, by making appropriations to put the country in a reasonable state of defence, the provisions of the treaty with France would all have been complied with, and the money paid, and this dark and lowering cloud, now hanging around us, would never have been seen. It was the maxim of the Father of his Country, "in peace prepare for war." What was the situation of this country, compared with France? She had been actively preparing and fitting out her fleets and armaments, which were hourly expected upon our coasts. What was the situation of the American people? Scarce a ship in a condition to defend them! Not a solitary regiment, perhaps, full! The very omitting to make that appropriation might involve this country in war, cost hundreds of millions of money, and tens of thousands of lives, all of which might have been averted. Had this appropriation been adopted, we should have had no war, no apprehension of war, with a powerful and ancient ally. Mr. L. said he was in favor of the resolution, though, if he had been consulted, he would have preferred waiting for a communication from the President, who, he had no doubt, would, at as early a period as possible, communicate all the information of which he was possessed; and then the House may be called upon to act in a very different manner and form.

Mr. GRENNELL said, if he felt all the alarm that seemed to oppress the minds of some gentlemen, he might vote for the resolution of the member from Maine. But he believed these alarms unnecessary, and the declaration of them uncalled for and unwise. If the public dangers resulting from our relations with a foreign Power were so imminent as gentlemen imagine, we should hear from the Executive, and in twenty-four hours we may have information from him that will make us act intelligently on the subject. It was certain the President had received communications from France; but he (Mr. G.) was disposed not to anticipate their character, and should regret the expression of sentiments of horror and alarm here, which might make a false and injurious impression upon the country. They were not to suppose that the Executive had neglected his duty, or that he was slumbering over it. No; Mr. G. would not for a moment entertain such a suspicion. It had been said this was a very important resolution; that it was demanded by the exigency of the times; and it was also said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] that if, at the last session of Congress, an appropriation had been made for the navy and fortifications, there would exist no necessity for calling upon Congress now.

We hear it said, sir, (said Mr. G.,) in a way of complaint, that Congress did not sustain the President at the last session; by which, I suppose, the gentleman from Indiana intends that the Senate did not vote the three millions to his discretion, in the fortification bill. And, moreover, the blame of losing the entire bill is intended to be cast upon that body. Sir, (said Mr. G.,) what was the action of this House on that important bill, and what of the Senate? It originated and passed here, and was sent to the Senate. That branch, deeming our appropriations too low for the repair and preservation of the great seaboard defences of the country, raised them, by amendment, if recollection serves me, by about 400,000 dollars; and thus the bill was sent to the House for concurrence and adoption, several days before the close of the session. On the last evening of the session, the House agreed to the increased appropriation, and added, with unwarrantable haste, the sum of three millions of dollars by way of amendment, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President, for the military and naval service, fortifications, and increase of the navy. And those who voted against the monstrous proposition, and the Senate too, because they saw danger in placing that great amount of treasure at the President's discretion, and almost without specification or restriction, are to be charged with leaving the fortifications of the country, and the navy too, in an unprepared and ruinous state—with not sustaining the President! Sir, (said Mr. G.,) did the President ask the appropriation? No. Did any of the Departments ask for this amount, or any thing like it, or any committee of the House? No, sir, none. It was moved by a gentleman of the House, on his own responsibility, and adopted. A majority was found here to take three millions, and lay them at the feet of the Executive. The Senate wisely disagreed to the precipitate measure; and subsequent proceedings showed that the Senate was ready and anxious to save the bill, and instead of the three millions, in such general, unlimited form, to appropriate $500,000 for the refitting and equipments of ships of war, and $300,000 for fortifications. If this proposition had been adopted by the House, the bill might have been saved, and the result would have been, that it might have passed into a law making appropriations for the defences of the country, greater by about $1,200,000 than had originally been proposed by the House of Representatives. Such (said Mr. G.) is my general recollection of the facts, as they transpired about the last midnight hour of the last session of Congress. If I am incorrect, there are many gentlemen present who can set me right, and some who had no very obscure agency in the matter.

Now, Mr. G. was neither disposed to be too hasty nor too slow; he believed, and had long believed, the navy ought to be increased and the fortifications repaired. Indeed, he believed both to be in a worse condition than at the beginning of the last war. Yet alarming haste, he trusted, was not required; and there was something in the idea that each department should sustain its own appropriate responsibility. And when a proposition should come from the Executive, or from any of the Departments, relating to the increase of either arm of the public defence, giving this House the requisite information, he would be found ready to consider the exigency under which it was brought forward, and act with promptness and liberality. He deprecated the voting and speaking as if war was surely impending. And he must hear, from those who know, of the state of our relations with France, and in regard to the public danger, before he voted for this or any other resolution which looks to a great increase of our naval or military force, in the trembling apprehension of war with a foreign Power.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, protested, he said, against the doctrine that we could not act without hearing from the Executive or the Departments. He was not disposed to wait for the recommendations of the one or the other before he acted, on any question. He did not wish to enter into an argument on this subject. In ordinary times not a voice would be raised against this proposition. It was but a simple inquiry, was proper now, and would be proper at any time. He moved the previous question.

Mr. HOWELL moved an adjournment: negatived, 80 to 96.

The motion for the previous question was seconded by the House, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WARD said, as there was a bill before the House for the relief the sufferers by fire in New York, which it was necessary should be acted on, he would move that the further consideration of the memorial praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS], be postponed to Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the gentleman would allow the vote to be taken on the point of order. The question was upon the appeal which he took from the decision of the Speaker. If the House would come to a decision on the appeal, he would be willing to let the consideration of the memorial lie over, and he would be glad if the discussion of these memorials would also lie over, at least on the day appropriated for the receiving of petitions. Gentlemen had not an opportunity of getting in their petitions, on account of these discussions. There was a great many obstacles thrown in the way of petitions—motions were made to reject them—that they be not received. He should rather see a multiplication of modes for getting in petitions than for getting rid of them. Petitions appeared to be in bad odor; and when he heard a gentleman commence a speech by saying that he was very much attached to the Union, he took it for granted he was going to end by a motion to exclude petitions. Petitions had been presented on other subjects than abolition, which took up much time to debate, and motions were made to reject them. He concluded by expressing a wish that the House might decide on the appeal, and he would acquiesce in the motion to postpone the consideration of the memorial.

Mr. WARD said he would be glad to withdraw his motion, if he thought this memorial would have preference over all others; but he thought it would not, and there would be much time spent in the discussion of them, and he was very anxious that the House should proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in New York.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he was willing the question should be postponed; and his reasons were, that resolutions were in possession of the House, which, if passed, as he hoped they would be, would put this question to rest. He thought the House had the right to say that it would not receive these petitions. The right was recognised by Mr. Jefferson; and certainly he would not have recognised it if it was unconstitutional. It would be for the House to say whether it would receive them.

Mr. PATTON said he regretted very much that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] had expressed a readiness to acquiesce in the motion to postpone. It was very evident that the effect would be to give the matter the go-by. The gentleman is mistaken, if he thinks he is to get a speedy and direct vote. Our time is to be taken up by discussing this matter every morning on which an opportunity offers. There was no way of getting a vote, unless we make it the special order until it is decided. One gentleman will ask it to be postponed for one purpose—another for another purpose; and by this means the question would be evaded.

Mr. BOULDIN. I do not wish to say much, Mr. Speaker, on this subject, but wish to say a word or two, particularly as to the manner in which this matter has come before the House, and how I have been compelled to vote upon it. It comes up upon various points of order, blended in some degree with the merits of the question: whether the petition should be rejected before it is read, and you know what is in it; whether the language in which it is couched is such as ought to be received by the House. I have been compelled to give votes seemingly contradictory in relation to the merits, owing to this blending and entwining of questions of order with the most momentous matter that can come before the House or the nation.

Mr. Speaker, the North and East are not acquainted with the effects of what they are doing. They do not know what is the feeling of the South. Sir, if they did, their conduct would be different. Far be it from me to do or say any thing, or give any vote, that will endanger this Union. Sir, I love the Union as I love my life, and this makes me anxious that this matter should be understood.

[The SPEAKER said the point was, Shall the subject be postponed?]

I know that, sir; I am endeavoring to show the propriety of coming to an understanding on this subject now, in preference to then. Sir, the question I wish to come to is this: do you mean to take measures to endanger our property or our lives—liberate our slaves, directly or indirectly, now or hereafter? Sir, I have no doubt the liberation of the slaves of this District by Congress is unconstitutional, and will, on any vote, say so. But this is not what I care for. He that is willing, professing to be friendly, to use means, directly or indirectly, to endanger my life or rob me of my property, has little regard to constitutional scruples or difficulties.

Sir, I am not disposed to weaken the tie of love that exists, or did exist, between all the members of this Union; but, sir, I wish as soon as possible to inform the North and East with what a tender hand they ought to touch this subject. There are individuals in this Union who I know love their country, and this Union is dear to them as the heart's blood of the dearest, tenderest, object of their affections, in whose bosom a thorn has been planted by another project from the same quarter—I mean the tribute of protecting duties. Sir, this thorn pained and wounded at the time, and has rankled and festered, and the wound is now in a festering state; and this is not the time to open it and plant another more fatal still, and more galling.

It is this, sir, which causes me to urge that we come to a full understanding of this matter between North and South, East and West; for, sir, I know that northern and eastern gentlemen do not know that there are feelings existing in the South upon this subject that cannot be further agitated or pressed upon. Sir, let me not be misunderstood; I do not charge the whole fault of the agitation on this subject on the North, nor would I wish to say any thing unkind or intemperate, calculated to wound the feeling of any member of this House or this Union. Far from it. I think I know that, if they were apprized of what they were doing, or likely to produce, they would act differently. They love the Union. And did I intimate that the South did not equally? Sir, they love the Union equally; but insulted, injured love, is the mother of the purest hate; and I wish all the members of the Union to be apprized of what is likely to be the effect of pressing this matter on us. Sir, they are not advised; I know they cannot be. Sir, I know our own conduct ought to be revised by us at home on this subject; let us inquire whether our societies and fourth of July speeches on emancipation and other things in relation to negroes and negro slavery have not invited strangers to meddle, and have not led to a misunderstanding on this subject.

I am sure that, on reflection, our northern brethren will admit of repentance on seeing error. I am equally satisfied that the attention of the South having been drawn to what they have themselves done, they will retrace some of their steps, and all will be willing to leave this subject, too mysterious, deep, and dangerous for man's management, (or that of woman either,) to the operation of time, and the providence of God, in whose hands alone this subject must at last be left. Sir, it is impossible that gentlemen should be sensible of what they are doing, or I do know, by looking into my own bosom, (a place I find the safest of all to look when I know that passion is absent,) to find what others will do on any given point—I know, sir, by what I find in my own bosom, that if gentlemen knew what was, or would be, the effect of pushing this thing upon us, they would, with all courtesy and humility to their constituents, return their numberless petitions, and tell them that dangers, of which they were not advised, awaited the passing of this matter, and that, if it was still insisted on, they would at last offer them. I know this would be their course as certainly as I can know any thing depending on observation and familiar acquaintance with the common practice of man, and their ordinary actions and motives in the common business of life. Sir, they cannot be fully sensible of what effects they are likely to produce. Look to the sources of their information. They rely in a great measure on the representations of the ladies, who appear to be the principal petitioners. Sir, let me cast no slur over any portion of the fair sex; I wish them every good wish, if they be single, which I believe is generally their condition; if they had husbands and children, they would find something else to do; I wish them all good husbands, and something better to do, and that they may spend their days and their nights in some employment more like to give them pleasure, and do the world a benefit drawing their petitions, so well calculated to produce effects so little likely to give them satisfaction or comfort after they are produced.

Sir, whether they be married, maids, or widows, I wish not to wound them; and they must be very different from any of their sex of any class that I have been acquainted with, if they would persevere in any course that went to hazard every thing dear to their sex. Sir, were they informed in what a situation they would place the maiden pride of their sex—if they were informed that they would hazard the life and safety of the dear and tender offspring clinging to the bosoms of their own sisterhood, sympathizing with them in all the tender ties that bind the mother to her tender infant, who draws its vital being from her breast, I am sure they would stay their hands. Sir, could they be informed what effect they had produced upon the helpless, defenceless objects of their blind charity, they, being Christians, (as all women are, or should be,) would leave the thing to God.

Sir, it is immaterial whether you mean to do this thing by this means or that—whether immediately or indirectly, now or hereafter, the object is the same, and the consequences to us are the same; and it is obvious that this subject is pressed upon us of the South, in some form or other, by societies formed, religious associations, political combinations, male and female, private and public, from day to day, and from week to week. Sir, let us alone to ourselves in this matter.

[Here the SPEAKER said the question was whether this subject should be postponed until Monday, and the gentleman was going into the whole merits.]

I think, Mr. Speaker, that these reflections are directly in point, to show that we should come to an immediate understanding on this matter. However, I will not urge any other remarks at this time; but when the main question comes up, if we should ever be able to get to it, I will claim the attention of the House while I give to them and to my constituents my views on its merits. I will simply add that, if the materials of civil war and discord are matured in this nation, it will be a matter of little consequence at which end of the confederacy the flame commences. The consequences to the whole Union will be the same. Ay, sir, and the horrors and the alarms of southern maids and matrons can only be equalled by the terrors and alarms, the horrors and calamities, of the maids and matrons of the North—Rachels weeping for their children who are not.

Mr. CRAIG said, that in postponing this matter, it was not giving the subject the go-by. It would come up in a better shape when the resolutions were under consideration. When the resolutions came up, let us march as one man to the point, and the matter will be decided, and decided satisfactorily, he hoped, both to the South and to the North.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON said he did not rise to debate the question. He thought that if we were to vote, and not to speak so much, we would be enabled to get through the business much more advantageously than at present. So far as the States were concerned we all agreed, and he would not say it was expedient to touch this matter even in the District of Columbia. Mr. J. had risen for the purpose of asking the consent of the House to report several bills from the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made,

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bills, which were committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which, together with the reports and documents accompanying the same, were ordered to be printed:

A bill making an appropriation for collecting materials preparatory to the commencement of certain fortifications;

A bill for the better organization of the corps of topographical engineers; and

A bill authorizing the chief engineer to employ clerks and a messenger.

Mr. J. gave notice that he would call up the first-named bill on Thursday next.

Mr. PEYTON then rose and said he had not intended to say one word upon the subject before the House at that time. However, if he understood the honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON] aright, and Mr. P. wished, if he misunderstood the gentleman, that he would correct him; he understood the gentleman to say, substantially, that, so far as the question of slavery was concerned in the States, he (Mr. J.) thought it agreed on all hands that that House had no power to interfere; but that, so far as the District of Columbia was concerned, it was a mere matter of expediency.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, explained. What he said was, that he had much rather that the House should at once vote upon the question than discuss it. And that if the House would come to a vote, he thought there was no member in the House who would vote that they had the power to interfere, so far as the States were concerned, nor a single member in the House who would say it was expedient to touch it even in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIR said further remarks must be arrested. The question before the House was merely one of time, whether the subject should be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. PEYTON said he had nothing to say on that subject.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed a hope that the motion would prevail, as he wished to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the memorial, and the motion to reject it, were then agreed to.

PARTIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

An engrossed bill, making appropriations, in part, for the support of the Government for the year 1836, was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, said he wished this bill amended, so as to reduce the contingent expenses of the House to the standard of 1832; and he hoped the House would afford its unanimous consent for the purpose of enabling him to make the motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed the same wish.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, should move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, or to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of making the retrenchments suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee. In that way the bill could be amended, and they could have the benefit of a full discussion on the subject. He made the former motion.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed a hope that the gentleman would withdraw the motion. The object was to reduce the appropriations to the standard of four years ago, and he trusted the bill would not be delayed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, would assent to the request, but he wished the inquiry to go further than the gentleman proposed, and to inquire whether the amount of 1832 was itself not too large.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said it made little difference whether this bill was amended or not; for if it were, there would be a supplemental bill to the general appropriation bill. Mr. A. opposed the bill.

Mr. HARDIN entered into a statement to show the expenses for printing, &c., for 1833, '34, and '35, and read a table which he had himself made out.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the bill be recommended to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Mr. C. intimated his intention shortly to propose a bill to make the appropriation year, in regard to all the officers of the Government, commence on March 31, if no other gentleman did so.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then withdrew his motion to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the motion, for the reason, he said, of instructing the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of mileage. Mr. U. said this matter ought to be settled. Some of his own predecessors, coming from his own immediate neighborhood, had charged 1,100, 1,200, 1,300 miles, and others 600, 700, and 800; and it was time this matter was looked into.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would suggest that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would be the proper committee to refer this subject to, and not the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said, to send the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means would greatly embarrass it. He thought it should go either to the committee indicated by the gentleman from New York, or to a select committee.

Mr. W. went on to show that the contingent expenses for printing were easily accounted for, by the fact of the extra number of copies ordered by the House, for which many members had voted, who expressed themselves in favor of reform and economy. The former practice of the House was to print no more than 5,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents; now, 10, 15, and 20,000 were printed.

Mr. CRAIG preferred referring the bill to another committee than the Committee on the state of the Union. The great inequality in the mileage of the members, though it might seem a small matter, involved an important principle.

Mr. WISE said: Sir, it was far from me to say a word on this subject, but I am called up, against my will, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY.] His remarks are so true, and so just, and so just a rebuke to me, that I am compelled to make confession of the error of my ways. He is right, and I was wrong. It was I, sir, it was I who made, inadvertently made, the motion to print the twenty thousand copies of the President's message. God forgive me! and, if the country will forgive me for this one time, I promise never to be caught so offending again.

But I have been paid as I deserved for assisting the Globe to this lucrative job. The "glove" was thrown down to me the other day in that print, and I hope the House will permit me to take it up now. Like as a Kentuckian or Old Virginian brags of his "double-barrel gun, his pointer dog, and his sweetheart," so did Blair & Rives meet my charge of gross negligence and delay in the public printing. I charged "gross negligence and delay in the execution of the order of this House;" and they brag that they have "the best-arranged office, the best-provided office, the most unremittingly laborious office, in the city." That plea, sir, did not tender an issue, and did not respond to the charge. The Globe office may have "executed more work since the commencement of the present session of Congress than was ever performed in the same length of time;" but, sir, it has not done that work for us; it did not execute our order in due time; and I repeat the charge of gross delay in the printing of the President's message. The President's message was stale, had been printed in every village newspaper, and read by every body; had gone to our remotest boundaries, and nearly come back again, before a half dozen copies of it had been put on our tables; a month had nearly elapsed before my call on the Clerk piled up any considerable number on our tables. Why was this delay? No sufficient reason has been or can be assigned for it. No want of materials can be pleaded; for this well-provided office had plenty of materials to furnish thousands of copies to members who purchased them. Would not the same materials have done to execute the order of the House? Or were the ordered copies kept back until the whole number of those for sale was exhausted?

Sir, I shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to recommit this bill, with instructions; not so much with a view to the mileage of members, as to reduce the printing bill of the House down from its present enormous sum to the old standard. I wish, above all things, to see the amount of "the Government" patronage to the public press reduced—to see "the Government" patronage divorced from the public press. The patronage which the Globe alone received from the executive Departments, in less time than the last two years, amounts to more than forty thousand dollars! The cost of the printing of the House alone, in the last Congress, was more than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars! Judging of the future by the past—and the probability of an increase, in fact, being greater than that of a diminution of printing—the printing of the House for this Congress will not be short of that for the last, and Blair & Rives will, for the next two years, enjoy an undivided patronage from "the Government" of little short of two hundred thousand dollars! A hundred thousand a year! How can the public press be pure? Is it a wonder that it is degraded and corrupt? That it is no longer a faithful sentinel, and must not be, cannot be, relied on? Is there no remedy? Yes, sir, a plain one. Give me a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, and I will show you that the public printing can be done thirty per cent. cheaper than it now is. Purchase your own press, sir, and employ a superintendent, with a regular and liberal salary; give employment to the working men to do job work alone; and remove this corruption, this stinking bribery, from the fountain of political information. Let the political press depend upon the patronage of the people alone for its support, and it will be more faithful to them and to truth. If it costs you double what corruption does, buy purity in the press at any price. The entire amount of Executive, Senate, and House printing in this District alone is little short of half a million of dollars, according to the new edition of the Blue Book; and from this place go forth the "winged messengers" of information, to enlighten or deceive the public mind. The bribe is too great, too strong, for poor human nature and for our safety. With the power of appointment to and removal from office, with the power of appointment of members of Congress to office, with the Post Office and custom-houses, with the public money and the pet banks, and with this enormous power of patronage to the public press, "the Government" can do any thing! We are a consolidated unit!

Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] asks if we will take up this bill to pay ourselves first? I say yes, by all means. I, for one, will never consent to postpone the Commons, the immediate Representatives of the people, the House of Representatives, to pay the President, much less his menials, first. I will wait on this House first, and attend to them afterwards. I will do this from no selfish motive, but from a jealous and high-toned sense of independence and dignity, as a Representative of the people.

Mr. GILLET made a brief explanation of the causes of the delay that had taken place. It was in no way assignable to the present printers, for the delay had not arisen from them.

Partial Appropriation Bill.

Mr. LANE said the only remedy that could be applied was to pass a law that the mileage of each member should be published to the world, in a manner to be seen and read by the people, by the constituents of each member.

Mr. L. voted for the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to print an extra number of the President's message, and he neither regretted nor felt it his duty to confess his error for giving that vote. The extra numbers were not printed for the benefit of the members of the House, but for the people, their constituents. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] complained of the extra printing and the Government patronage to the public printer. When, said Mr. L., did we ever hear of this complaint? Now that an American born citizen, one of the free born sons of Columbia, has the printing—otherwise when the same favors were showered upon a foreigner.

Mr. PARKER drew the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITLESSEY] to the Post Office minority report, twenty-five thousand copies of which were ordered, at his instance, to be printed last session, which cost a vast deal more than printing the President's message; and which contained a large body of undigested evidence, that few ever read, and no one could understand. Mr. P. then referred to the mass of memorials, petitions, speeches, &c., of members of Congress, during the "panic" session, which fairly blocked up the avenues in the Capitol, employed some score or two of persons to fold, and the very folding paper to one speech, he was credibly informed, cost the country upwards of four hundred dollars. Mr. P. said it would be found that, for years past, the balance of public printing had been in favor of the House.

Mr. WARDWELL was surprised that the gentleman from Ohio could put his hand on no other document than the President's message, the very one, of all others, that ought to be distributed. Mr. W. had always strenuously opposed the extra printing by that House. He would ask, who ever read the gentleman's report, of which twenty-five thousand copies were printed? It was strange that nothing had been said by gentleman, of the expense of printing, before the present session, when, for the first time, a printer had been elected favorable to the administration. He hoped this bill would not be encumbered with the subject of mileage, but if the gentleman wished an alteration in the law, let him move the customary resolution.

Mr. WISE again rose and said: Sir, I am compelled to say that the explanations given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILLET] of the delay of the public printing is not satisfactory; not at all. The gentleman says the delay was owing to the fact that the printer was not elected by the last Congress, and that necessarily the public printer had to procure his materials after he was elected this session. Now, this is too bad—too disingenuous. I put it to the candor of the honorable gentleman, did not Blair, did not "the party" know—know as well as they now know—know beyond a moral certainty, that he was to be elected public printer before this House met? Ay, months ago, did he not know it too well not to begin preparation for his work? Let him, let the Globe answer me. It is too bad, I confess, thus to be forced on all occasions to acknowledge our humiliation; but facts, stubborn facts, must stubbornly be told! I repeat the question—if the materials were not ready for our order, how came they to be ready for Blair & Rives's own sales to members? I bought one hundred; a colleague tells me he bought twelve hundred; you, and you, here, there, every where, (pointing to seats around him,) bought of Blair & Rives, whilst you were waiting for the same work at public expense. If the "engravings," too, were not ready for the copies with the accompanying documents, why were the small messages, without the accompanying documents, not furnished? Blair & Rives had to sell out their own private stock on hand before they executed the order of the House. The printing we are told was done, but the copies not furnished. So much the worse.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] says, that in the last Congress the balance of patronage to the press was against the administration; that Gales & Seaton had the printing. Sir, I am making no small, petty issue. I said "the Government" patronage; whether in the hands of one party or another, it is still patronage, and Government patronage. But now, looking prospectively for the next two years, the whole of the executive printing, and of the printing of this House, falling little short of two hundred thousand dollars, is to be heaped on one pet office of "the Government." Here-fore, the printing has been more divided among the different presses. But I am not for the one or the other printer, or for any, to enjoy this immense patronage—I am for taking it from all. Gentlemen need not throw up Gales & Seaton to me. I never voted for Gales & Seaton; and I will not debate with them the poor, pitiful, contemptible issue between Gales & Seaton and Blair & Rives, or any other party printers. If their interests, or their parties' interests, were all which are involved in this question, I should not care enough about it to break silence; but there are most paramount and momentous and vital interests of the country and its future welfare involved—interests which we cannot long overlook, without forgetting our country in the low and grovelling strifes of party—the interests of independent legislation, and of independence in the public mind.

I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] whether, when he was stumbling over the speeches lying about and obstructing the recesses and passages of this huge building, he fell upon speeches on one side alone? Were there not piles upon piles of "the party" speeches as well as of "the panic" speeches? He says during the panic session—the panic session! Yes, sir, it was a panic session; "the party" was panic-struck for a while; but I am done with that. I do not mean to discuss old things. I mean to look ahead, and to endeavor to make all things become new. During the panic session, the gentleman says, when Gales & Seaton were public printers, we heard nothing of extravagance then in public printing. The gentleman is out, sir; he is mistaken: there was a committee on the subject of abuses expressly appointed, at the head of which was placed an honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CLAXTON], but that committee could never, or did never, report. I have never known, though I could guess, perhaps, why that committee never did report. My honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY] was a member of that committee, and he, no doubt, can tell us why, and can tell us, too, of some abuses which might have been reported.

The gentleman not only complains of the printing of panic speeches, but also of the Post Office report. I am not astonished, sir, at his complaining of the printing of 25,000 copies of the report of the Post Office Committee—that was a "panic report!" But the complaint only shows how far reform would go. He says that report was very voluminous, and was read by nobody. It is so much the better for "the party" if that report has been read by nobody. But let him not lay that flattering unction to his soul. Sir, that report, which was the result of the joint industry, ability, and acuteness, of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITLESSEY] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT], than whom there are not, and never were, in Congress, two more useful and faithful representatives of the people. That report broke up the nest, probed the old sore, and laid bare the corruption of that Department. I do not know that all the foul matter has run out yet, and that it may not yet become more corrupt than ever. There are some other departments which I should like to see probed. There are your land offices, and your Indian bureaux, which, if all I believe is true, are now, and have been for a long time, festering with as stinking corruption as ever ulcerated the Post Office. I should like to see about 25,000 copies of just such panic reports printed upon each of those departments. Well may gentlemen complain of the distribution of such information as that contained in the report of the Post Office Committee. Such information to the people is well calculated to strike "the party" with a panic! Sir, 25,000 copies of that report were not half enough for a population of twelve millions. It told a tale of corruption, where all should be as pure as the air of your mountains, in a republic. Would that I could believe it would produce a real bonafide reform—not a reform, such as party politicians hold up to the desire and expectation of the people—not a reform merely to turn out and put in, but a radical reform, a cure, a healing of the disease. It did all it could do: it informed us of the disease; it let out some fetid matter. But I fear it exposed a most fearful character of the disease. I fear it is the king's evil on the body politic! It is not always to cure, to become informed of a malady. You may stop up one rat-hole, sir, and they will gnaw another. You may cicatrize one old sore, and another will break out on some other part of the body. I desire the people to become acquainted with the case and its type; and I do desire, above all things, that they will doctor it. Such panic reports, I say, sir, are of vastly more importance than your President's messages, and all your Secretaries' reports, which never pretend to expose abuses. Expose abuses! which rather smooth over some things that must not be known for the administration's sake! Yes, sir, where I would print one President's message, I would print one thousand copies of any report which exposes the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, to the nation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] says it is the first time that the administration has had its printer. The administration its printer! Why, sir, here is the doctrine of the "spoils" distinctly avowed on this floor. The administration its printer! I repudiate, I despise, I scorn, I detest, I abhor, such a doctrine! It is servile, it is corrupting, it is mercenary. The administration its printer! This is the feeling; here it is; and what does it say to us and to the American people? I pray you, sir, and them to look at it, to mark it, and to reprobate it as I do. We are not safe, the Government is not safe, if such abominable sentiments shall obtain a footing amongst us. What, sir! it is avowed that the press, too, belongs to the victors? Yea, all!

Ay! and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] says, too, that these questions about mileage—these honest questions about corruption, and all that—come from new members. Indeed! there is a confession for you. True, sir, though too true. We come here honest, at least professing to be honest, but we are not here long before we become "used to almost any thing!" [Here Mr. CAMBRELENG whispered to Mr. WISE, "how is it with you, WISE?" to which Mr. W. replied, looking at Mr. C.,] I am no better than I should be, but I am not yet, thank God, "a hardened sinner!" I do not know how long, a little "figuring," perhaps, might tell how long, I shall be disposed to act with the new members; but I am glad there are many new members in this House, and I hope they will haste to do their duty whilst they are "fresh from the people!"

Mr. CRAIG moved that the House adjourn; but withdrew it to enable the Speaker to present sundry communications from the heads of Departments.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Having laid before Congress, on the 9th ultimo, the correspondence which had previously taken place relative to the controversy between Ohio and Michigan, on the question of boundary between that State and Territory, I now transmit reports from the Secretaries of State and War on the subject, with the papers therein referred to.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, January 11, 1836.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. JARVIS, came up in order:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And be it further resolved, that in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table without being referred or printed.

The question pending was the following amendment, offered by Mr. WISE:

"Resolved, That there is no power of legislation granted by the constitution to the Congress of the United States to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and that any attempt by Congress to legislate upon the subject of slavery, will be not only unauthorized but dangerous to the union of the States.

Mr. JARVIS modified his resolution as follows:

Whereas any attempt in this House to agitate the question of slavery is calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy the peace and prosperity of the country. Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And it is further resolved, that in case any petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, moved to lay the resolution as modified, and the amendment, on the table.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. PARKER called for the reading of the resolution, as modified; which was done.

Mr. HOLSEY rose to a question of order. He was upon the floor when this subject was last before the House; and he supposed that he was entitled to the floor; and that the motion to lay the subject on the table could not be received under the circumstances.

The CHAIR said if the gentleman had claimed the floor when the subject was first announced, he would have been entitled to it. But as he had not done so before several gentlemen had risen, and a modification of the resolution had been made, it was now too late to press his right to the floor.

Amendment of Rules—Naval Appropriations.

[JAN. 13, 1836.]

Mr. MANN, of New York, inquired whether the motion to lay the subject on the table was in order, a similar one having been made on a former occasion.

The CHAIR stated that the motion was in order. Since the vote referred to, other matters had been introduced.

The question on the motion to lay the subject on the table was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 53, nays 156.

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ash, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, Carr, George Chambers, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Evans, Fowler, Graves, Grennell, Hannegan, Hard, Harlan, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, Janes, Laporte, Lawrence, Lincoln, S. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Parker, Dutee J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Spangler, Sprague, Sutherland, Underwood, Vinton, Webster, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Bell, Booke, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Burns, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Granger, Grantland, Grayson, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hamer, Hammond, Hardin, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Hunstman, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, R. M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Luke Lea, Leonard, Logan, Loyal, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Manning, Martin, J. Y. Mason, William Mason, Moses Mason, Maury, May, McComas, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, Pickens, Pinckney, Rencher, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Rogers, Seymour, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Taylor, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Toucey, Towns, Turner, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Weeks, White, Wise—155.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. HOLSEY obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman to postpone his remarks, inasmuch as the morning hour was about to expire.

Mr. HOLSEY said it was evident that it would be almost impossible to arrive at a decision on this subject, if they were to be restricted to a small portion of the morning hour. Under these circumstances, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Tuesday next, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to print the resolution and amendment.

Mr. PARKS moved to postpone the subject, and make it the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. OWENS hoped his colleague [Mr. HOLSEY] would accept the latter proposition as a modification of his motion.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON reminded the gentleman that he contemplated asking the House to consider the fortification bill to-morrow. He hoped the motion to postpone until Tuesday would prevail, or that the gentleman from Maine would withdraw his motion.

Mr. PARKS said he would be glad to comply with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON;] but he must be excused. The peace and quiet of the country required that this question should be speedily settled.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was in favor of the postponement until Tuesday, with a view that the appropriation bills should be in the mean time taken up and acted on.

The further consideration of the subject was then postponed until Tuesday next, made the special order for that day, and the propositions directed to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, called the attention of the House to a business which was of the first importance to be considered. We are now in the fifth or sixth week of the session, and the rules, the defects in which were so seriously felt, had not yet been amended, though, according to the general sense of the House, they required amendment. They had been referred to a select committee, and several very important amendments had been reported for the consideration of the House. Gentlemen had given notice that they would to-day and to-morrow call for the consideration of the most important appropriation bills, which would create as much debate and excitement as any subject which would come before the House at this session. He thought it necessary that the House should appropriate this day to the amendment of the rules. He knew the Chair, under the existing rules, must find much difficulty and embarrassment in directing the business of the House, and also had it in his power to exert an important influence on the proceedings of the House, though he did not impute to the present occupant of the chair the exercise of any undue influence. The defects of the rules and orders ought to be supplied before the House proceeded further in the business of the session.

Mr. MANN said it was the intention of the Committee on the Rules and Orders to ask the House to consider the report at an early day. There could be now no more inconvenience felt for the want of rules than there had been for the last two years. The existing rules, until others were adopted, were the same which had been in force for the last four or five years.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House proceeded to take up the orders of the day.

SEMINOLE HOSTILITIES.

The bill making appropriations for the repression of the hostilities of the Seminole Indians in Florida, returned with an amendment from the Senate, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONNOR in the chair.)

The amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the repression of Indian hostilities was agreed to.

The consideration of the bill making partial appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1836 was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, postponed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole upon the naval appropriation bill.

Naval Appropriations.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to insert an item of $15,000, to defray the extra services for surveying the coasts and harbors of the United States from 1830, &c. Agreed to.

Mr. C. also moved to strike out the proposed appropriation of $200,000, for the purchase of sites, and erection of marine barracks, near Charlestown, Massachusetts, New York, Norfolk, and Pensacola.

Mr. C. briefly advocated the propriety of striking out the item, on the ground of its being, in itself, an innovation, and probably unnecessary. It was thought by many distinguished officers, that the corps itself was an unnecessary appendage to the navy, and only requisite to keep up subordination, where the system of impressment prevailed. The money was also required for the repair of fortifications, &c.

Mr. WISE and Mr. SUTHERLAND briefly defended the character and utility of the marine corps.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, if a vote in favor of striking out was to be considered as the expression of an opinion, on his part, that the marine corps was unnecessary and ought to be dispensed with, he would vote against the motion to strike out the item in the bill, for the building of marine barracks. He was not prepared, unless blessed with more lights than he now possessed, to give a vote from which it might be inferred that he considered the marine corps useless. His honorable colleague had represented these marines as being a sort of amphibious creatures, belonging not strictly to the land or the water. Still he was not aware that the Navy Department had recommended a dispensation with this corps, or that the navy commissioners or the Committee on Naval Affairs in this House had expressed any opinion against the utility of this corps. He was informed by a member of that committee near him [Mr. WISE] that the Committee on Naval Affairs were decidedly in favor of the retention of this marine corps. For his own part, he had always understood that they were extremely useful and efficient in time of engagement. He knew very little about the details of their duty, but he believed that they carried small arms, and when two hostile ships came within musket shot of each other, a faithful and well-disciplined marine corps must be very efficient. He had always understood that one of the most gallant officers, whose loss this country had ever mourned, had been killed by a shot from one of the enemy's marine corps; and he could not vote to strike out the section under consideration, if he was to be considered as thereby indicating his conviction that the marine corps was unnecessary, and ought therefore to be dispensed with.

Mr. BELL drew the attention of the committee to the items for making additions and improvements to the various navy yards, amounting, in the aggregate, to upwards of $600,000. He thought not a dollar beyond the absolute necessary repairs should be expended; for, in case of an exigency, such as rumored, men and ships, and not navy yards, were wanted. He thought at least this $200,000 ought to be stricken out, and the $600,000, too, unless the exigencies of the naval service required it, with which Mr. B. confessed himself not to be sufficiently versed to be able to say himself.

Mr. PARKER thought, in case of war, nothing required more attention than our navy yards, and he maintained that this was one of the most necessary and indispensable appropriations of the whole bill. He hoped at least the $600,000 would not be stricken out.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said the question was not to dispense with the marine corps at all, but whether they should postpone, to some future period, the proposition to accommodate the two different branches of the naval service with distinct barracks. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from New York would be adopted, and the item stricken out. He also drew the attention of the committee to the necessity of passing this bill as speedily as was consistent with its full deliberation.

Mr. MILLER said a few words in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that the item had not undergone the full examination of the Committee of Ways and Means, for if it had, they never would have inserted it at all. It did not belong to that committee, but to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was a new matter, not belonging to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARPER, of Pennsylvania, would vote for the amendment, because he did not desire to see the marine corps too much separated from the navy, nor made a distinct branch of the service. Besides, he thought the proposition in other respects unnecessary, because there was plenty of accommodation for them already provided.

Mr. WISE should vote for the amendment, not because the marine corps were not desired, but because they were more efficient where they were.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he should support the amendment for the same reason.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the item stricken out.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to strike out the sum of $950,000 "for the repairs of vessels in ordinary, and the repairs and wear and tear of vessels in commission," and insert, in lieu thereof, the sum of $2,000,000 for the same objects.

Mr. C. said he was instructed to move this amendment by the Committee of Ways and Means, with one single exception; but, in saying this, he begged also to observe, without reference to the question of war, that he feared not to assume the responsibility of the measure. Mr. C. referred to the state of our relations with Mexico and with France, as a reason for requiring this additional appropriation for the navy.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means need not have been so superfluous as to have declared that he was willing to assume the responsibility of this recommendation. These are times (said Mr. T.) when it is the fashion to assume responsibility, and in no case certainly more striking than this. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] said the other day that these were times of change. It is true. Not only the powers of one department of the Government are assumed by another, but the appropriate duties of one committee are assumed by another. As to all matters of finance, it is my duty to look to the Committee of Ways and Means; but I have yet to learn to what authority reports from that committee are entitled upon subjects appropriate to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the still more important Committee on Foreign Relations. I repeat, sir, that the Committee of Ways and Means, on matters properly belonging to it, is entitled to our confidence, and the more so because the chairman of that committee is a practical and successful merchant. But, sir, as to other matters, we have had to-day a practical illustration in the subject last considered by the House, where all the lights which we had were from that committee—lights which only made "darkness visible." If these appropriations are necessary, without reference to our present foreign relations, let us have information upon the subject from the Secretary of the Navy, with the usual and proper estimates, and coming to us through our Naval Committee, and I shall not oppose them. If necessary with reference to those foreign relations, let us wait for information from the Executive; if as an ordinary appropriation, as at present advised, they seem too large; if with reference to our relations with France, they are too small; give us but light, and we will be able to act understandingly, and in a way that becomes this Congress, the guardians of the interests and the honor of the American people. Why, sir, have we not that information? Some gentlemen seem to have it—all are entitled to it. Who are we, sir, that are thus called upon to take a step that may have a most important bearing upon the highest interest of any people—a bearing, sir, upon the great question of peace or war?

Naval Appropriations.

The Representatives of the people are a part of the Government, without whose concurrence no measure connected with this deeply interesting question can be adopted. It is our right to have, to demand, sir, all the information which may be in the possession of the Executive. Unless fully advised, and under the most inexorable necessity, I will take no step which may weigh a feather in the now nicely adjusted balance of peace or war. I do fear, sir, that we may yet be involved in a war with France; I am determined, for one, (and if only one, that determination shall not be shaken,) that I will have no share in bringing it on. No, sir, when it does come, I am resolved that I will be able to say to my constituents and the country, my hands are clear of it; you shall not say that I did it. Let it not be said that, whilst I admit the possibility of such a war, I will not vote to prepare for it. Not so, sir. When that war is inevitable, when the interest or the honor of the nation (its honor is its interest) shall demand it, and when I am put in possession of all the information on the subject, then, sir, and not until then, will I take any such responsibility; and not, sir, until I am so advised by that department of the Government whose duty it is to advise me on the subject. I will not make war in this indirect manner, on the discussion of a clause in the appropriation bill; nor will I do any thing that may have the remotest tendency to that end. War with France, sir! The very idea would be ridiculous, if it did not involve consequences and issues so infinitely important and momentous. Although I repeat I have serious apprehensions that we may be involved in war, I will do nothing that may lead to it. As matters now stand, there is no cause of war; nor do I believe there is the slightest reason to anticipate that France will strike the first blow. It is with us to choose both whether we are to have that war, and the time for it. Let us wait for intelligence of the reception of the President's message in France; let us not add to the existing difficulties of an adjustment. The controversy with France is narrowed down to a mere point of etiquette and punctilio; so narrowed down, sir, that, in such a controversy between two gentlemen, if I, as the friend of one of them, were to allow them to go on the field of single combat, and either were to fall, I should regard myself guilty of murder.

When I use this strong language, sir, it is due that I should glance—and the time and occasion only admit of a glance—at the origin, progress, and present position of the controversy. By a treaty concluded with the French ministry, indemnity is secured for certain spoiliations upon our commerce; and, what is more, an important stipulation, and of great advantage to France, of the treaty of 1803, is surrendered; a stipulation so important that the most distinguished member of the French Chambers opposed to the treaty declared that he regarded the indemnity of twenty-five millions as nothing to it. Two separate commissions, appointed by the French Government to investigate these claims, had, after laborious investigation, reported the amount due us to be about thirteen millions. A sum is agreed to be paid nearly double that amount. Was this not enough to create distrust on the part of the French Chambers; enough to make them doubt about the treaty, and require them to look fully into it; when there is added to all this that our minister first demanded seventy millions, gradually came down to twenty-five millions; like a Jew selling a yard of calico, after the demand of seventy, accepted twenty-five millions, and boasted (with how much of dignity and justice I do not say) that even this sum would pay every cent due American citizens, (thereby acknowledging that his demand of the higher sum was not just); and, further, that not more than one fifth of the French claims were conceded?

I have known a horse jockey to boast that he had cheated a gentleman; but a boast like this I rather think occurs for the first time in the history of diplomacy. What, sir, a boast of an advantage obtained in the settlement of a pecuniary claim; and that advantage, too, obtained by us from France, above all nations on the earth from which we should have desired it! No such advantage was obtained; and the President says, "that the settlement involved a sacrifice, was known at the time." Not surely known by Mr. Rives, because he could not then have made the boast; but it surely ought to have been known by him.

Was it not enough to excite the suspicions of the French Government, that our negotiator had thus boasted of the advantage he had gained—whether with or without cause is not material? In this state of things, late in the discussion, the difficulty is suddenly sprung, that eight millions had already been paid by the Spanish Government in the Florida treaty. The Duc de Broglie was unable satisfactorily to answer it, and said that "he had but a confused recollection of that treaty." He who had made the treaty of indemnity, whose duty it was to have known all about the Florida treaty, was unable to explain satisfactorily the difficulty. Under these circumstances, was it to be wondered at that the treaty was rejected, and only by six votes, in a body of more than three hundred and fifty? What then, sir? Was the treaty abandoned? No, far from it. A national vessel is fitted out. The King of France would not trust to the ordinary conveyance, but sent a national vessel to convey to our Government the assurance of his continued and faithful efforts to procure the ratification, and of his hopes of being able still to accomplish it, and entreating that nothing might be done to add to the difficulties already existing. In this stage of the matter, the President, in his annual message, very distinctly intimates his opinion in favor of reprisals on the property of French citizens, to avenge a national wrong by the seizure of the property of private citizens; and this, too, shortly followed by the recommendation of our minister in France, that our Government should assume a high tone, and use strong language—very distinctly intimating that threats would extort from the French people that which their sense of justice had refused. Sir, I was astonished, when I read that communication. I was surprised that such an idea ever could have occurred to any one, still more, sir, to a gentleman whose judgment ought to have been matured, and who had the reputation of wisdom and experience, and with a thorough knowledge of the French character—a people, brave, proud, and warlike, to a proverb. I feel, sir, an extreme difficulty in speaking of this matter, without subjecting myself to a charge of a want of American feeling. But, sir, whilst I am an American citizen—an American Representative, I cannot disregard the claims of truth and candor. I am not the apologist of France. I am, sir, the vindicator of justice and right. And I am constrained to say that all the difficulties in which we are placed have, in my judgment, arisen from the indiscreet warmth of our own Government, and a course of measures which I will not say may not have been prompted by the high temper, strong and often high impulse of our own Executive—a course nothing the less to be regretted. Why, sir, let me ask, this most unwise haste in the recall of Mr. Bartram at this particular time? Why remove the only possible medium of communication between the two Governments before the arrival in France of the President's message, which, but for that recall, would in all probability have been regarded as a sufficient explanation, as most surely it ought to be regarded? France took exception to a supposed threat in the communication of the President to Congress. In a similar communication such a threat is disavowed; and France is bound to notice the disclaimer, conveyed in the same manner as was the insult, and puts herself in the wrong if she does not.

But, sir, this matter has at last reached a most nice and narrow point of etiquette. The President scouts the idea of making any explanations of his message; and yet such an explanation is made by our diplomatic agent, with the President's approval, which approval he authorizes to be communicated to the French Government; in other words, I will not make the explanation myself, but the explanation made by my agent I adopt. Now, sir, is not this a quibbling unworthy of both parties? I think it is going far enough, and ought to have been accepted. But is it upon such a point, that two great and powerful nations are to plunge their people into all the horrors of an interminable war—interminable, because it will be a war upon a point of honor, which neither can yield? Are human happiness and human life nothing? Is war a mere pastime, that it is thus, and for such causes, to be brought on?

As to the French fleet which is said to have been sent upon our coast, it does not in the slightest degree move me from "my propriety." If that fleet were sent to overawe and intimidate us, it would be a very different affair: then, sir, I would not even treat with France, until the whole nation were clad in armor. Is such the fact? Has France in any one instance threatened us? No, sir. That fleet is not professedly sent to intimidate, but to secure the commerce of French citizens from reprisals—reprisals threatened by one whose power over the action of our Government is known every where—one the least of all men living given to child's play—one very apt to do what he threatens. If that threat be of a bold and daring act, under such circumstances, every obligation of protection due by a Government to its people demanded some such measure of precaution. So far from threats, has not the whole course of France been marked by a forbearance that would have been proper in no people having a less unquestionable character for courage? Has not the French minister, over and over, replied to the charge of duplicity and bad faith, and exculpated his King from it, when he would have been justified in repelling it with scorn?

[I disclaim all arguments drawn from a calculation of the comparative amount of the expenses of a hostile collision with France, and the amount secured by the treaty. I agree fully with gentlemen, that, if the national honor, and our ability or our willingness to protect our citizens in all their rights, are involved, considerations of the cost are unworthy and degrading.]* If such an issue is presented, I will not condescend to say, nor permit it to be doubted, what will be the course of the people of South Carolina, in a matter of duty, of patriotism, of honor. The whole world already knows what it will be. The history of the State in all time past renders it certain to all what that course will be. Sir, when this country engaged in the last war, the great cause of which was the impressment of American seamen, and but for which that war never would have been declared, South Carolina had scarcely a seaman on the ocean. But it was northern seamen who were impressed, the national honor assailed; and what was the consequence? War, sir, war—and so it will ever be, for a like or a sufficient cause. I see none such now. I will not contribute, by any vote which I may give, to create such a necessity.

* The lines in brackets not in the speech as delivered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he had listened to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and was astonished to learn that we had been the aggressors. The argument of the Duke de Broglie was one of great ability, and fully sustained the justice of our claims, and was an ample answer to the suggestion in relation to our having obtained an advantage in our diplomatic transactions with France. At present, however, the fairness of our claims was no longer open for discussion. Every branch of the French Government had passed upon them. The King, the Peers, and the Chamber of Deputies, had all given their sanction to their validity.

The papers containing the debate in the French Chambers, laid on our tables last year, had been circulated throughout the whole nation, and the merits of the controversy were distinctly understood by our countrymen every where. And although there might be a reluctance on the part of all to go to war with our ancient ally, still he felt satisfied that, to sustain our honor in this dispute, there would be but one sentiment in the event of such an issue. It certainly was a subject of gratulation to know that this matter was so well comprehended by the people at large. With the President's message at the opening of the session before them, which they had received with great unanimity, they were willing to intrust the most delicate question of peace or war to the Congress of the nation.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had, under an impression that the condition of the country required it now, moved to enlarge one of the items in the appropriation bill, with the view of increasing the naval force of the country. A short time since, the House passed a resolution directing an inquiry into the propriety of this measure. To this enlargement of the appropriation the gentleman from South Carolina objected. For himself, Mr. S. said, he would vote for the proposition with great cheerfulness. We must look to the organs of the House, in a great measure, for information; and we find in this instance the committee, through their chairman, ask for the increase. This is not the time for very precise calculations as to the amount we may be willing to put at the command of the Government, for the defence of the republic.

The gentleman from South Carolina saw nothing improper in the course of the French, in relation to the recent orders of that Government concerning their fleet. Mr. S. said, whatever might be the design of the French vessels in sailing in this direction, he thought it would comport with sound policy for us to look to our navy, and in peace (perhaps he might say upon the verge of hostilities) to prepare for war. Under these impressions, he promised his humble aid to the committee in support of all the appropriation bills that went for a prompt and efficient defence of the Union. The Chief Magistrate ought to have ample means to meet any contingency; and he saw no danger in committing them to his discretion. We could not find safer hands. He had, during our last contest, given us a sure pledge of his patriotism and ability to carry on the military operations of the nation. His great skill, manifested in the darkest period of a war that he ended so gloriously, will, in the event of a contest with the French, do much to bring it to a speedy termination. The appropriation now asked is to be put at the command of General Jackson; and I am the more willing to commit it to his discretion, because, in my judgment, I believe he never will recommend war with the country of Lafayette, unless a just sense of national honor requires it. Mr. S. said he was convinced that every section of the republic would ardently support the war, if we should be forced into it by the French Government. France, it was true, was an early friend; and to raise arms against her would require great provocation. But if her course leaves us no other alternative, why, we must and will enter the lists with her. We hear much about the strength and improvement of the French navy, of the science and skill of her officers. This is doubtless all true, but it argues the propriety of granting the appropriations before the Committee of the Whole House. Whatever may be the advanced condition of the French marine, and however gallantly they may sustain their cause, I have no fear that our "star-spangled banner" will not come out of every conflict beaming with renewed lustre. But I do not wish for war, and least of all a war with France, if it can be shunned with honor. At present, I think the question of war is not properly open for debate upon the amendment. When that time should arrive, if any gentleman from South Carolina or elsewhere should feel disposed to enter upon the discussion of its propriety, they will find themselves met on all quarters by gentlemen who are prepared to sustain the country in such a crisis. I quit this debate, under a firm conviction that, if we should be compelled to assume a warlike attitude, the sons of South Carolina will pour out their blood as freely as any other State in the Union, in defence of their much-wronged country.

Mr. BYNUM said that he had not expected an attack on the measures of the administration generally, on the subject of the propriety of an appropriation of an inferior magnitude; but it could not be unknown to the House that a simultaneous attack had been made elsewhere; and he could not allow the declamations of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] against the President, and the policy of an administration to which he in part had contributed his humble support, to pass unnoticed, when he believed the President had acted as became the Chief Magistrate of the American people. It was evident, both in this House and elsewhere, that in the contest with France we are to have here a French party and an American party, than which there was nothing that he more sincerely regretted. The game was up—it had been started in another part of the Capitol. It could not be forgotten by any gentleman in Congress, that during our last contest with Great Britain there was said to have been in this country an English party—a party which made bonfires and rejoiced at the defeat of the American arms. God forbid (said Mr. B.) that there should be a party now springing up among us, who would rejoice at our defeats in a contest with France, if we should be unfortunately involved in a war with that Power. But he asserted that, from what he had seen, the American people had a right to expect this. The symptoms indicating it he thought too manifest to be misunderstood. A few years ago, the distinguished sage who now occupies the white house was assailed on another occasion with equal acrimony and virulence by the same party, for the purpose of estranging, no doubt, the feelings of the people from him. That party then acted upon the presumption that the ignorance of the people would admit of their being led away from the President of their choice by mere clamor and unfounded declamation. Mr. B. then had said the people would not sustain them; they had not done it; and the great majority then in that House in favor of the measures of the Executive was the best living evidence of the fact; and he rejoiced that he had lived to read the testimony of the American people themselves on the subject, by the appearance of such an overwhelming majority of their Representatives in that House. If we had been carried off by the eloquent tact and abuse of the superior leaders of the opposition, and he confessed many were, we should have been led off after a set of men who were conspiring against the feelings and wishes of a great majority of the American people, without the least concurrence of sentiment or principle amongst themselves. Being foiled, however, in their attempts heretofore, they have agreed to try and get up another hobby, and have seized this occasion to vent their gall against one of the most patriotic individuals that has ever lived in this or any other country, and who had done more for the security of American liberty than any other man now breathing, the assertions of the gentleman notwithstanding; whose character the whole American people stood pledged to support, and which they had vouched for, by the overwhelming votes which he had received at their hands, more than once, for the first office in the gift of the nation. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had said that, in every position taken in relation to France, the President had acted falsely. If Mr. B. was to infer from that that the President had acted falsely with France, he denied it. The American President had not nor could he act falsely with France or any other Power living. In behalf of the American people he denied it.

[Mr. THOMPSON explained. He did not intend to say the President had acted falsely, but had taken false positions.]

Mr. BYNUM resumed. He said he was glad the gentleman had qualified the assertion. Then it was a mere matter of opinion between the gentleman from South Carolina and the President of the United States, and it would be for the great body of the American people to say whether the President of the United States was right in the position he had taken, or whether the gentleman from South Carolina was right in that which he had taken. Mr. B. said he most cordially agreed in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, a few days ago, [Mr. HAVES,] when he said he believed that much mischief had grown out of speeches made here and elsewhere, through a mere spirit of opposition to the Executive. He believed it candidly and honestly. France believed it, and for this reason she acted more obstinately, he had no doubt, than she otherwise would have done, in her refusal to pay our people the just debt that she had wrongfully withheld from them for more than twenty years. The gentleman from South Carolina had said, too, that, if we were to go to war with France, it would be a ridiculous war. As much as he was opposed to a war with France or any other Power, he could not believe it would be a ridiculous war. The characters of the parties concerned forbid such an idea. It had been said elsewhere, and repeated here by the gentleman, shall we go to war with France for five millions of dollars? He would say, yes; and for five millions of cents, if it were necessary to maintain the honor and independence of the nation. He was astonished that such a position should be taken by the gentleman, coming from the quarter that he did; that it was the amount of money for which a nation should alone go to war. He hazarded nothing in saying that time would show that the course taken by the President, in relation to France, was not only right, but necessary for the honor and security of the rights and dignity of the American people. The American people had given, as far as public sentiment could be ascertained, their verdict already on this subject, in favor of the course of their Government; and still the opposition was catching at this and other hobbies, to bolster up their prostrate and exposed condition. Mr. B. wished to make one remark here to an honorable gentleman of another body, and it became him to make it, coming from the State from which he did. He saw, in a public journal a few days since, some remarks, represented to have fallen from that honorable gentleman in another part of this building, which were (said Mr. B.) "that the House of Representatives was not the part of the Capitol where fair play was to be expected." He did not wish particularly to remark on the character of the author of the assertion, as he thought it, at this time, politically, an exceedingly unenviable one. He took occasion, however, to say that the assertion was a calumny on the House, and was devoid of all truth. The House of Representatives was the only democratic branch of the national Legislature, and from it the people of the country had every thing to expect, and little from the opposite body.

The democracy of the land had nothing to expect from that quarter of this Capitol. It was the only germe of an irresponsible aristocracy in the Government, and it had in more than one instance showed entire disregard of the will of the people. The gentleman from South Carolina had said the House was not so pugnacious as to adopt the admonition that in time of peace we should prepare for war; and had said much, ironically he supposed, of the pugnacious spirit of the House.

Mr. B. said he should really like to know when the honorable gentleman from South Carolina had become so pacific, and the party with whom he had acted so long. But a few years since he recollected well that the golden cord that bound this holy Union together was upon the eve of being burst asunder by the warlike spirit that prevailed in a certain quarter of this republic, and it was as much as the whole fraternity of the States could effect to suppress this spirit without the horrors of bloodshed.

Mr. B. said he stood there the representative of those who went for their whole country. He stuck to no party longer than that party stuck to the rights and interests of the country. Whenever he should see a disposition in any party to go against those interests, he would leave it. He never expected to belong to a party which was free from errors; and if the gentleman never supports an administration until he gets a perfect one, he feared he would be found to be an opposition man for life. The gentleman has stated, also, that he could not take a single step for the defence of the country. He (Mr. B.) said he was for taking steps for the defence of the country when he saw a dark cloud lowering over us, which threatened to inundate the whole land with ruin. He was for providing a shelter from this portentous storm that hovered over us; wisdom, he thought, dictated it, whether it should finally burst and pour out its contents on our devoted heads or not.

The gentleman had taken off much of the bitterness of his remarks, however, by his explanations, and had gone far out of his way to censure the cabinet for the part it had taken in this controversy, and had declared in every instance our Government had been the aggressor in the contest with France. [Mr. T. again explained.] Mr. B. was astonished to hear this censure uttered by an American tongue on an occasion like the present, when a war is threatened us by one of the most powerful nations on the earth. He would say, as he had said before, that, instead of the President and the administration being the aggressors in this unfortunate controversy, they had acted with great moderation and precaution on every occasion relating to that subject. They had relinquished claims, for the purpose of effecting an amicable adjustment of the matter, to an enormous amount; but that was even misrepresented. The distinguished gentleman who was charged with the negotiation of this matter had relinquished this much to the French Government, for the sake of procuring peace and amity with that Power. The course which that minister pursued was to be seen on the records of the House, as well as on the records of the executive department, and he hoped to live to see justice done that distinguished individual. He viewed him as being one of the purest patriots of the age, and he hoped to live to see him the occupant of the House so much desired by some gentlemen and their friends. He thought the friends of the administration had suffered themselves to be placed in a false position here by the superior management and tact of their adversaries. What is the contest now going on in this country? He said, unequivocally, he viewed it as a contest between the democracy of the nation and the advocates of an aristocracy; and they were right in his judgment. It was a plain, direct contest. It must be plain to every intelligent observer, whether or not the people shall have the power to rule the nation, or those who conspire to lead them. Here he wished to be permitted to remark that this body should never have permitted the character of the Executive to be reproached, as it had been by another branch of the Legislature, when they were equally culpable, if at all, and participants in the same measures for which they had witnessed volleys of abuse against the Executive alone. He could not omit to remark on a subject recently agitated elsewhere, in relation to a certain measure which would have gone far to put the country in a state of defence, and ready to give their enemies a hearty welcome, whenever they chose to visit us as such. Every American heart must have burned with shame for the failure of that measure, the consequence of which was now about to be felt; and he feared that the injury already resulting from it would prove fatal to the best interests of the country. The failure to pass the bill, which was rejected last session, appropriating three millions of dollars for the defence of the country in case of a war, has been attributed to the House of Representatives; and he thought it time that this House should make up an issue with another, as well on that as on other subjects, and let at once the question be decided, whether the democratic or aristocratic influence is to prevail in this republic. It had been asserted in another body that it was this House which had rejected that bill. It had been attempted to shove the responsibility of the rejection of that bill on the House of Representatives; but it was shamefully untrue, and he assumed here in his place the responsibility of pronouncing it false, no matter from what source it came. The responsibility must rest on another body. He said the House was not responsible for the rejection of that bill. It had done all that it could do, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to pass it, and there were many present who aided and contributed their mite towards effecting it. He had voted for the bill, and gave it his humble support. The responsibility of the rejection of that bill could not justly rest on this body.

But (said Mr. B.) I will return to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, to notice a few more of his extraordinary remarks.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina was for acting on very different principles from that recommended, by the Father of his Country, "In peace prepare for war." He thought this advice came with peculiar applicability at present, and never was there a time when this House or this nation could with more propriety adopt it.

He had said that he did not wish, nor would he at this time be drawn, upon a mere collateral question, into the discussion of peace or war with France; but whenever that time arrived, he would be as willing to meet the question as the honorable member from South Carolina. He did hope, in the sincerity of his heart, that the question of peace or war, would never be agitated by this House with France. He had always hoped and believed that the difference between the two nations would be amicably settled, but he could not know it, and he thought it the part of wisdom, therefore, to provide for the worst. He was sorry to see evidences manifesting themselves not only here, but in another part of the Capitol, to throw every obstacle in the way of Government; and he sincerely regretted to see it persevered in with such pertinacity from a certain quarter. He believed the whole efforts of the party doing it would prove, as heretofore they had, to be abortive, and contribute more to expose the motives of that party. The intelligence of the people was too general in this enlightened age, and their discernment too correct, to be misled by mere abuse and declamation to the disparagement of one whom they had honored with their highest confidence.

Mr. B. said that he deprecated any insidious attacks upon the measures of the administration, so long as he supported it. He was in hopes that gentleman who felt it their duty to oppose it, under any and all circumstances, would bring in some measure of a general nature, and not give vent to their indignant feelings upon every minor collateral question. He was satisfied, in his own mind, that the party with whom he acted was ready and willing to meet their adversaries on any and every occasion. They had done so, and a verdict had been given by the people—yes, the republican democratic people—in their favor. Yet, (Mr. B. said,) he had cause of complaint to make against the party with whom he had acted in this House: it was, that they had sat here silently, and let an issue be made up by another body with the Executive. This body, at which much had been aimed by another, in another part of the Capitol, should not have left the President to have contended alone against it. No, (said Mr. B.,) this House should have made war against them, as the true representatives of the people, and have met them in the very centre of the rotundo of the Capitol, if necessary, and have there decided the question, whether the people, through their representatives, were to prevail in ruling this country, or a body not elected by the people, nor directly responsible to them for their conduct. An issue was now about to be made up with those who fancied themselves beyond the power of the people, how far they could go in defiance of the public will, and sustain themselves. By an association of daring leaders, co-operating to sway public opinion, the whole republic had been convulsed. If they succeeded, in his opinion the public voice was hushed, and it would be idle to talk longer of our free republican institutions. He thought the time had nearly arrived, when it was necessary that the people should essay their strength, and teach those refractory men that their power was neither to be insulted nor put at defiance by them; and he called on the House, as the only representative body of the nation—the only one where the immediate voice of the people could be directly heard—not to shrink from its part of a responsibility that was attempted to be shuffled off on the shoulders of the Executive.

The Executive had done all that the people had asked, and it was their duty to sustain him, here and elsewhere. Heretofore, however, he had been literally sustained alone by the people, and had proven to be almost the only true reflector of the public will.

Here Mr. JARVIS rose, and observed that he perceived that the gentleman from North Carolina was much exhausted; and, in order to give him time to continue his remarks, he moved an adjournment of the House, which was carried.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, on the 7th instant, was taken up:

“Resolved, That a select committee of nine be appointed to inquire what amendments, if any, are expedient to be made to the laws relating to the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, and also into the expediency of modifying the organization of said institution, and also whether it would not comport with the public interest to abolish the same; with power to report by bill or otherwise.”

Mr. HAWES said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, a committee, consisting of one member from each of the States, had been appointed, and that committee went into an investigation of the affairs of that institution. That committee performed the duty assigned them, but their report was made at so late a period of the session that it was impossible for the House to act upon it. The resolution which he now submitted varied but in one particular from the one adopted, raising the committee of last year; and that was in reducing the number of the committee. From the number of that committee, it was almost impossible to get them collected for business. The number was entirely too great. As this was a mere resolution of inquiry, he would say nothing of the abuses which existed in that department of the Government, but hoped the resolution might be adopted without debate, so that the committee might proceed to the duty assigned them.

Mr. WARDWELL said he thought that this subject ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. He believed that the committee of twenty-four, which was appointed last session, had investigated the subject fully. Their report was brought into the House, and it set forth all the facts which we wanted to know. He would therefore move to amend the resolution so that the subject might be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH wished the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] would give some substantial reasons why the subject ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It seemed to him that a special committee ought to be raised; but if the friends of the institution thought that a special committee would not do them the same justice which the Committee on Military Affairs would, and they would offer that as a reason, he would withdraw his objections. As there were doubts about the organization of this academy, it was desirable that a committee should be raised, which could devote as much time as possible in bringing out the merits or demerits of the institution. He believed that the Committee on Military Affairs would not have time, although they might have the disposition, to do the subject justice. He believed a special committee would do ample justice. He hoped the gentleman from New York would withdraw his motion, or that it would not prevail.

Mr. BRIGGS thought that the subject had already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, by the general resolutions referring the different items of the President's message to committees, and therefore inquired whether the present resolution was in order.

The SPEAKER said that the present resolution was one of inquiry; and he considered the reference of the President's message as not applying to the case.

Mr. BRIGGS then said he would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because he thought the subject ought to go to one of the standing committees. It had been said by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] that, in consequence of the number of the committee of last session, it was almost impossible to get them to business. He thought the gentleman labored under a mistake. That committee had a meeting early in the session, and appointed a sub-committee to investigate the whole matter, and that committee went industriously to work. After their investigation was completed, they made an elaborate report. The committee adopted that report, which report was now on the files of the House; and if gentlemen wished information from it, they could order it to be printed. It was because this subject had been so recently and thoroughly investigated, that there was no necessity for further investigation. He would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, remarked that the people he had the honor to represent in the State of Illinois, took a deep interest in this subject, and were he to remain silent on the occasion, they would consider him derelict in his duty. They expected him, on all occasions, to advocate such measures as would tend to reform this institution, or to abolish it entirely. This was the reason which induced him to rise on this occasion. It was astonishing to him (Mr. R.) that gentlemen, friends to this institution, were so strenuous and so much opposed to an investigation of this subject. If it be an institution founded on a proper basis, and conducted on sound republican principles, they need not fear an investigation; if it be of this character, an investigation will not injure it; neither time nor talents can prevail against it. But the great dread of an investigation was almost positive proof that there was something wrong in the institution.

Mr. R. said his honorable friend [Mr. BRIGGS] tried to stifle this investigation, by his attempt to satisfy the Speaker that the subject was already referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. This was strong circumstantial proof that there was in this affair something not right. The other gentleman [Mr. WARDWELL, of New York] wished to have the subject referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. R. said he had the highest respect for that committee; but some of them, and perhaps all of them, had already expressed an opinion on the subject, in a report favorable to that institution; and, from this consideration, were not so impartial as a select committee raised expressly for the occasion.

Mr. R. remarked that an official investigation, and that made known to the people, would cause the institution at West Point to wither and die. Under its present organization, the young men who ought not to be educated there were the exclusive individuals that were educated in it; and, what was still worse, it was made a kind of monopoly. The cadets educated there were the exclusive officers in our army, right or wrong; they were the officers who were to conduct our armies to glory or disgrace; and it mattered not what deeds of valor the privates in the army might do, they could not rise, as there were no places for them; the cadets filled all. A private soldier in the war which seems to be approaching us might do as noble a deed as the character of antiquity did who slew Goliath; he still could not rise one foot in the army. He would appeal to the House if every individual did not expect to rise by his merits? The gentlemen, [Messrs. WARDWELL and BRIGGS,] like others in Congress, would expect to be rewarded for their meritorious conduct. His friend [Mr. BRIGGS] from Massachusetts, no doubt, would be supported by his constituents for his moral and orderly course of conduct in Congress, and his assiduity to business. The same would apply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.] The principle was correct to reward meritorious actions, and an institution or measures that opposed this principle were in themselves wrong. Any person that would look at the report made at the last Congress on this subject would be satisfied that there was something not right in the institution. If the friends of the Academy would let that report be printed, and officially presented to the people, that would be satisfactory. Mr. R. said he hoped, under all the circumstances, the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] would not prevail, but that the subject would be submitted to a select committee, under the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WARDWELL did not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing a preliminary question, but his friend from Illinois [Mr. REYNOLDS] had said that the Committee on Military Affairs had expressed an opinion on the matter. It was not the committee of the last session which expressed that opinion, but the one preceding that, which was a different committee entirely. The committee of the present body had expressed no opinion on the subject. But it was very probable that some of those who would be on the select committee had expressed opinions adverse to the institution. The last Congress had refused to print the report. He protested against having so many select committees on subjects which ought to go to standing committees. He was willing to have the institution examined—yes, probed to the core; but let it be done by the proper committee. He would say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. Why was it that all this objection came from the western States? It was, he thought, because all persons in those States who had any topographical knowledge, might expect some employment from Government, which business is now done by the graduates of the institution at West Point, without cost to the Government. If, however, that institution was abolished, and those engineers not sent among them, there might be some fine offices for the young gentlemen of the western country. No wonder that western gentlemen's constituents were in favor of abolishing that institution.

Mr. HANNEGAN had a few remarks to make on the subject. He was a member of the select committee of the last session, and would say that it was not in the power of the Committee on Military Affairs to give the subject the attention which it required. The committee of last session made their report to the House, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARDWELL] tells us that the House refused to print that report. Why did the House refuse? Because it required two thirds to make the motion to print, and the friends of the institution rallied around it and refused to print. That gentleman said that the West alone opposed that institution. He (Mr. H.) knew gentlemen from the East, South, and the North, who opposed it. That gentleman also said that the young gentlemen of the West expected good offices if the institution be abolished. He (Mr. H.) would be glad to have the offices given to those who came from the ranks of the people, and not to the sons of those were now in high office. He hoped and trusted that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky would be adopted, and that a thorough investigation might be had.

Mr. HAMER said he could not see what possible objection there could be to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky. On one hand it was contended that it was one of the most aristocratic, and on the other that it was one of the best institutions that ever was established. Why, then, not allow us to collect facts, so that we may be enabled to make up an impartial judgment on the subject? A large portion of the people of the country believe that the institution ought to be abolished; then let an investigation be fully had. Mr. H. would say a word to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARDWELL.] He is mistaken; the people of the West are governed by no such motives as those attributed to them by that gentleman. That gentleman admits that a band of men are sent out to fill all the important offices; men who are the friends and relatives of those who are in high station, and who have political influence. The sons of men high in office are educated at that institution, and those men are sent out to fill all the high offices in the western country. If the people of the Mississippi valley educated their sons at their own expense, why should they not be appointed to those offices? If they are capable, let them have the offices. He objected, and his constituents objected, to the existence of the institution in its present form. He therefore hoped there would be no objection to an investigation.

Mr. MANN, of New York, desired to make a few remarks upon the subject before the House; but, as the morning hour had expired, he called for the orders of the day.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK SUFFERERS BY FIRE.

A bill from the Senate for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York was read twice.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said this bill was the same in substance, and differed only in words, from the one which was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. It would not, therefore, be necessary to refer this bill to that committee. He moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he felt it his duty to throw himself upon the indulgence of the committee, and ask them to take up and consider the bill from the Senate for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York. His reason for doing so, he explained to be, that the whole business of the custom-house at New York was obstructed, and must remain obstructed so long as that bill was not passed; for every bond due was lying over, and no entries could be made until those bonds were cancelled.

The bill, he said, as it then stood, and was sent from the Senate, did not embrace that provision which had before excited opposition in the House in relation to the surplus revenue. Its object was simply to extend accommodation to the debtors of the Government, who had been unable to pay their debts, from the loss of not less than twenty-five millions of capital in the city of New York. He therefore moved that the committee take up the bill from the Senate in relation to that subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read from the Clerk's table, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause to be extended (with the assent of the sureties thereon) to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the conflagration at that place on the sixteenth day of December last, by the burning of their buildings or merchandise, the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given by them for duties, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal annual instalments, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled, upon giving to the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively, payable in equal instalments in three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled as aforesaid; and the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up, or cancel, all such bonds, upon the receipt of others described in this section; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States, and shall have the same force and validity: Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded.

And provided, also, That the benefits of this section shall not be extended to any person whose loss shall not be proved, to the satisfaction of the collector, to have exceeded the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section, as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the seventeenth day of December last.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the only variation between this bill and that reported in the House was as to the limitations, and the more specific designation of the kind of property destroyed. Under former acts of this character, the amount of property destroyed merely was set forth; the Senate had, he thought very properly, inserted the qualification of property, and he hoped it would be approved of by the House.

Mr. HARDIN said, as the Senate had made the alteration, none would be entitled to any benefit who had not sustained a loss to the amount of one thousand dollars; and sufferers to that extent were to have a credit to the extent of three, four, or five years, without interest, that he understood. But he did not understand the proviso in the same clause, because it appeared to authorize loaning money out of the public Treasury, by way of renewing the old bonds. The money to be returned, without interest, upon three, or four, or five years, upon the cancelled bonds, was nothing more nor less, he maintained, than loaning so much money to the merchants of New York who had goods destroyed to the amount of one thousand dollars. The poor mechanic, the widow, the orphan, could derive no benefit from this bill. But he objected to it also on principle. He was opposed to loaning the public money, either with or without interest; and he denied the power of the Government to loan its public treasure in this way. He knew that bills had heretofore been passed for the relief of sufferers under a dreadful calamity at Caraccas, Alexandria, &c.; but that was done under the impulse of feeling. Could Congress relieve every citizen of the United States, who might be overcome by calamity, or afflicted by Providence? How many ships were lost upon the ocean! How much property lost! And who ever heard of bills introduced there for relief in such cases? There were said to be some fifteen millions of property destroyed at New York; but the chief loss had fallen upon the insurance offices, not upon the merchants. Probably not more than three, four, or five millions were lost by the merchants. The gentleman had said that more than one half the revenue was collected in New York—more than five millions of dollars. Well, all that money remained there, deposited in pet banks, and used for the benefit of the merchants of New York, without the Government deriving a dollar's benefit. Mr. H. moved to strike out the proviso to the first section. He said, also, he should move to strike out the second section, and then he intended to vote against the bill.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said: It is not my purpose, sir, to participate in the debates of Congress the present session; but the extraordinary occurrence which has induced the report of the bill before us, the very singular amendments proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, and the deep interest I feel in the speedy resuscitation of that devastated city, compels me to depart from the silent course I have prescribed for myself.

The gentleman's amendment proposes, first, to strike out the proviso in the first section, the whole of the second section; and, finally, the gentleman promises, when so amended, to vote against the whole bill. My arguments will, therefore, have reference to the whole bill, and I promise the utmost brevity. But, first, I must disclaim the honor of the biblical title of Babylon, which the gentleman has given to New York. I must also disclaim the honor he ascribes to us, of governing the four-and-twenty States. We feel no such honor; we exercise no such power; and if the gentleman means the State, which is not precisely the basis of the present discussion, he is still mistaken. That ill-fated city, sir, in a single day, by an act of God, which no human foresight could avert, which no human arm could stay, has lost more than one fourth of its entire assessable personal estate. That desolated city stands a debtor to the nation in the sum of three million six hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars. The bill before us proposes not to forgive the debt—not to diminish the principal sum of the debt—not to jeopard it; it proposes merely to postpone the payment from the dates of maturity to the several dates named.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to view this case as it really is: the nation a rich and prosperous creditor; the devastated city not an insolvent, but a debtor oppressed by a calamity unparalleled in the two hundred years' history of this country, and rarely equalled in any age of any country. It has ever been the common sense of mankind that the relation of debtor and creditor imposed mutual obligations as well as mutual interests. It has ever been the practice of mankind in this relation, under great calamity and privation of means on the part of the debtor, to claim and receive from his full-handed creditor not only the kind of relief provided in this bill—postponement of payment—but advance, moreover, of money or other necessities. Shall we depart from a principle of ethics and a rule of practice sanctioned by all ages and by all grades of men? No, sir, motives of self-interest forbid it—motives of humanity forbid it.

There is in the case under discussion, sir, something more than the mere simple relation of debtor and creditor between the parties. There is in this case, and most strongly marked, the nearer and closer relation, and the stronger obligations, of employer and agent, of principal and factor; and this debt, sir, has accrued, not partly, but wholly, in the performance of the duties of such agency. It has been the policy of this nation—a policy so discreet, so wise, and sound, that I trust it may never be discontinued—to collect the necessary funds for the support of Government from masses of property, prior to those minuter subdivisions for the consumption of the community, avoiding thereby the more tedious, the tenfold more costly and more offensive mode of thrusting the unwelcome tax-gatherer into the domicils of our people, for the ancient mode of capitation, tithe, or small property tax.

It has been found the mutual interest and the mutual necessity of the parties, that the nation should collect very nearly two thirds of its impost revenue through the agency of the city of New York. More than two hundred and sixty millions have been thus collected and paid into the Treasury. How skilfully or unskilfully this duty has been performed I will not pretend to define; the Treasury records will give the answer. I would not be understood to intimate that New York has paid a single dollar from her own coffers more than her just quota. Every body knows that the consumer of the merchandise, wherever may be his location, is the ultimate payer of the import tax. Nor do I claim that such agency has been profitless or onerous. I have already said that the interests of the parties were mutual. My object is merely to exhibit the existing fact, and to deduce from it the very cogent argument for the postponement of payment, that the debt we owe the nation has arisen, and unavoidably arisen, in our relation of agent to the Government in the collection of its revenue, which, by an act of God, we are at present unable to pay. Every body knows, sir, that the process of such collection—and I will add the process of creation, too—of the imports, is by and through the importation of foreign merchandise; and it is equally well known that the means, and the only instrument of the whole performance, is capital. This capital is annihilated, or so greatly diminished, that gentlemen may be assured a fearful derangement must ensue unless we derive large temporary assistance somewhere.

There is, sir, a third relation between this ill-fated city and the nation, which claims strongly her protection. I mean, sir, that common relation which every great political or social community owes to all its parts, and all its parts owe to the whole.

We ask this relief, then, sir, first, on the principle of our relation to the nation, as a debtor of impaired means, with a creditor whose coffers are over-full. Again, sir, we ask it on the principle of our relation as agent, suddenly bereft of the very implements of our agency, while our principal is possessed of a superabundant supply. And again, sir, we ask it in conformity with the common, social, equitable obligation which a great and prosperous community owes to each and all its parts, which, from sudden and unavoidable calamity, require such aid. May I say, sir, we do not ask it in the spirit of supplication, humiliation, and alms-giving. The city, sir, though devastated, has yet remaining means. She is rich in the insuppressible spirit of enterprise, and in the unmitigated industry of her citizens. She merely wants temporary aid. She asks of you in this bill the indulgence of deferring payment until she can render her remaining means available. Will the nation look calmly on, and close its door on us, while all around us elsewhere have opened their hearts, hands, and coffers to us? Will the frugal but equitable East, will the hardy but generous West, will the mounting chivalry of the South, will the most prosperous nation that the sun of heaven ever shone on, refuse the credit which so many reciprocal interests and mutual obligations enforce? She will not; I know she will not. Is there any legal or constitutional bar to such postponement? None, sir: your records are full of precedents precisely in point; the only dissimilitude is in the magnitude of the loss in this and former cases—the devastation in this being some twentyfold greater than in those. Will that unfortunate city be the only beneficiary of the measure? By no means, sir. In its commercial intercommunications with every part of the nation, it has become largely a creditor. And this mass of commercial credit has been most frightfully swollen by the sale and hypothecation of the public stocks of nearly every State of the Union. But now, without this aid from Congress, the sudden abstraction of so large a portion of our moveable capital by the conflagration must compel us to force our commercial debtors, and to press the return of a tremendous amount of stocks to the several States of their creation. It is charged by the gentleman from Kentucky, as against the bill, that the relief reaches no other sufferers than the merchants. He is mistaken; for although the provision is intended chiefly for that class, as the chief sufferers, and other aids are preparing for other classes of sufferers, yet such is the diffusive nature of capital, and such the laws ruling the existence, the formation, and the blended intercourse of the people which make up the great whole of a dense commercial city, that it is quite impossible to place capital in any class or in any position which will not extend itself beneficially to all. The laborer, cartman, mechanic, all, all will feel the assistance. I may myself be benefited, who have been a mechanic these forty years, and have neither ships, nor bonds, nor imposts. But were it otherwise, should we withhold it? Are the merchants not men? Are not their families women and children? Are they not subject to the same wants—hunger, thirst, griefs, dismay, ruin—as other folks? And because a merchant has lived well, and is now devastated, will he feel want and ruin the less poignantly on that account?

Mr. Chairman, I have detained you too long. I have endeavored to confine myself strictly to the argument. I have meant to suppress all unnecessary detail. The peculiar relation I stand in towards the sufferers would not permit me to say less. Had I not prohibited myself, it were easy, sir, to give you volumes of detailed individual loss, distress, dismay, more affecting to the mind, more appalling to the heart, than the great view of the desolation.

I think the bill ought to pass; I trust it will pass.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, said, the only power existing in the Government by which this bill could pass under the constitution and the laws, was the relation between debtor and creditor. He maintained that the money paid, the Government was not only bound to hold it, but had no right to return it. Mr. C. should vote in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN.]

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that, appreciating and admiring, as he did, that humane, liberal, and high-minded feeling, which should ever characterize an assembly composed of the representatives of a great and magnanimous nation, he had not permitted himself to doubt that the bill under consideration would pass, if there was no constitutional objection in the way of its passage. The greatest calamity with which the elements had ever scourged any city on this continent formed the occasion for the appeal which was made in behalf of many of the enterprising and ill-fated citizens of one of your commercial cities. The disaster was one of unprecedented violence, and gentlemen should not too readily have started, if the remedies proposed had even exhibited some extraordinary characteristics, which he humbly conceived that the provisions contained in the bill did not do. To call for chapter, and rule, and precedent, and section, to justify means of relief in such an emergency, would (he spoke it with all due deference) be too stoical a requisition for the occasion. It would be a libel upon legislation, under free and constitutional Governments, for it would be virtually saying that, in legislation, the head could never approve what the heart most eloquently dictated.

That the bill for the relief of the New York sufferers, frame it as you might, would be opposed, was indeed to have been expected. It was to have been expected that that jealous vigilance over the public interest and the national Treasury, which, salutary as it was in the main, so often detected objections and bugbears which its own creative energies only produced—it was to have been expected that this never-sleeping principle would, in any event, occasion some opposition to the bill; but the friends of the bill still hoped that when honorable gentlemen came to weigh all the arguments and considerations, derivable not only from precedent, but from principle, that could be urged in favor of the bill, they would not have the heart to give it their negative; for he firmly believed that they would not have the argument of the heart alone to justify them to their constituents; but that reason, justice, expediency, and even precedent, should plead their justification.

Were gentlemen aware that the statute books abounded with precedents to justify the relief proposed to be given by the first section of the bill, extending the credit upon the revenue bonds? He had collected a few, and he believed only a few, of the acts which Congress had passed to relieve those who had been overtaken by such a calamity. In 1803, the town of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, was visited with a destructive fire, and Congress on that occasion promptly interposed and passed an act for the relief of the sufferers, similar in principle to the first section of the bill now under consideration. It authorized the collector at Portsmouth to cancel the old bonds, and take new ones, and to extend the credit given by the old bonds. In 1807, it seems that Portsmouth was again visited by a similar calamity, and the like relief was given by Congress. In March, 1804, an act was passed for the relief of the sufferers by fire in Norfolk, similar to those which were passed in the cases of Portsmouth. It will be recollected that, in 1820, a fire swept away a considerable portion of the city of Savannah; and you will find in your statute book a similar act for the relief of the Savannah sufferers on that occasion. Here, then, were precedents in abundance to justify the interference of this House, if there was any weight in precedents.

But, by examining these same statute books, it would be found that Congress had not limited their relief against such calamities to the mere extension of the bonds given for duties, but had also, on various occasions, wholly remitted the duties on the goods destroyed, and that, too, on a principle that he considered to be entirely defensible. Under our system of indirect taxation, it was intended that the consumer should actually pay the duties upon goods imported into the country; and if those goods were destroyed before they went into the hands of the actual tax payer, it was right that they should be refunded to him who had thus, in anticipation, paid them to the Government. If Congress had, then, as he asserted, on a variety of occasions remitted the duties, and the principle of such interposition could be supported, he could imagine no difficulty in supporting this bill on the ground of principle; a bill which did not at all propose to relinquish the debt to the Government, but only to extend the time for payment of it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] had objected to the bill because, as they seemed to suppose, it dispensed charity. He (Mr. V.) did not consider that the bill at all involved this principle of charity. Your great importing merchants were your agents, to bring into the country the means of raising revenue. You were the principal. The arm of your agent was crippled by a certain catastrophe, which no human skill could guard against; and the question was, whether you would let him sink, and be disabled from bringing into the country any more means to enlarge your revenue; or whether you would, by a little indulgence, encourage and enable him to go on in his occupation of enterprise, and bring from abroad new means of swelling your Treasury. All gentlemen would agree with him, that not one single dollar's worth the less of foreign goods would be consumed in the country, by reason of the immense mass of goods that had been destroyed in New York. The vacuum occasioned by the devouring element must, and would most assuredly, be filled up; not a coat less would be worn, not a cent's worth of groceries the less would be consumed. What, then, would be the consequence to the Government? Why, sir, the Government would actually make money out of that which had blasted the hopes and annihilated the property of so many enterprising individuals. It would realize the duty upon the goods destroyed, upon the goods for which the bonds in question were given, and then derive an additional revenue from the immense quantity of goods that must and would be imported to supply the deficiency. The Government would then inevitably gain much by means of an event which had created so much individual distress; and would we not, should we not, when we were to be the recipients of so much gain, extend a little indulgence to our unfortunate creditors? He humbly conceived that policy and expediency, as well as justice, dictated this course; that an opulent individual creditor would, under like circumstances, grant to his unfortunate debtor all the relief provided for by the bill. Suppose a debtor engaged in some occupation which consequentially produced much gain to the creditor; suppose him overtaken by a severe calamity, which paralyzed his energies and disabled him without some relief from further prosecuting his business, so directly profitable to himself, and so incidentally profitable to the creditor: would the latter, sir, considering his own interest, hesitate to extend his bond? He would do this, and be apt to go further, and make a new loan. Self-interest, if no better motive, would prompt him to do this; and was the arm of Government so tied up that it could not, in such a case, do for its own interest what an individual would do? He did not believe that we were so lamentably impotent.

It had been remarked by gentlemen, that the proviso to the first section of the bill was objectionable, because it provided for cases where bonds had already been paid. He did not consider this objection at all sound. If we legislated at all, we should do it in such a way as at least not to be subject to the imputation of partiality. Why should not those sufferers who had been compelled to pay their bonds participate in the benefits intended to be secured by the bill, equally with those whose bonds were unpaid? They had paid, because they could not enter their goods when their bonds laid over. Was this compulsory promptness, this inconvenient abstraction from those funds which were necessary to enable them to further prosecute their business, was this to operate against them? He hoped and confidently believed that the bill would pass this House without amendment.

Mr. McKEON said, that in presenting himself to the committee, with a view of offering some remarks in relation to the subject then under consideration, he trusted the committee would find in the catastrophe which excited the consternation of the whole country, and called forth the bill on the table, sufficient apology for his rising. He should be wanting in the duty he owed to the city which he had the honor in part to represent, and in gratitude to a constituency which had for years honored him with their confidence, if, on an occasion like the present, he did not endeavor to make known to the committee the claims of his fellow-citizens. He confessed that he was surprised to witness the observations made in opposition to the measures then under consideration. The relief asked for in the bill was so partial that he had hoped no objection would have been raised; but, since it had been, it was his purpose, if the committee would favor him with their attention, to point out the propriety of the passage of the bill. An awful calamity had fallen upon the city of New York. It was not his intention, even if he had the power, to attempt to arouse their sympathies, by depicting the scenes of destruction which now might be visible in the commercial emporium of the Union. It was not his intention to describe the effects of a conflagration which had never been equalled, in its devastating and sweeping fury, on this continent. Our public journals had been filled with appalling statements of the misfortunes of our merchants; with descriptions setting forth that the section of the city most devoted to mercantile operations, with its hundreds of stores and warehouses, and its millions of property, was now a pile of smoking ruins. The misfortune of New York was a national misfortune. This blow, struck at the commercial mart of the country—this wound, given to the very heart of the western world—was sufficient to paralyze for a time the industry of the nation. It must alarm the capitalist—it must dishearten the manufacturer—it must harass the agriculturist: in a word, in must penetrate into the most distant spot, diffusing dismay throughout every portion of this vast confederacy, wherever human industry was active. To follow the ramifications of such an event was impossible. Those ramifications were, as had been well expressed in another branch of this Legislature, so "complicated and implicated" that pursuit was impracticable; but so intimately were all the great interests of the country united, that the vibration must be felt in every point, with greater or lesser influence. If the smallest pebble thrown into the stream of commerce was sufficient to disturb the smoothness of its current, what must be the effects of a convulsion like this, which had, as it were, upturned the entire bed of the mighty river itself? It was a national calamity, and in that point he wished it to be viewed. So far as relief could be granted to the city, he was confident that when it was taken into consideration that thousands actively engaged in business, consisting of merchants, and all connected with them in their transactions, had, in the very midst of an inclement season of the year, been thrown out of employment, their business disturbed; that confusion reigned where but a few hours before all was order; and that in the hour of affliction, while with unsubdued spirits these very citizens were rallying their scattered force, while they were calling upon the Hercules of the General Government for assistance, yet they were exerting every means to rise above the troubles with which they were oppressed—he felt confident, he said, they would not refuse the sanction of that committee to the bill. We do not, continued Mr. McK., in this bill ask for a remission of duties—a question hereafter to be presented, and which he hoped to see adopted. There is nothing in this bill with regard to the surplus moneys of the Government. He wished gentlemen to understand these points. He wished to remove impressions which he was aware existed in the minds of many, in relation to the provisions of the bill. The first section provided for an extension of the time of the bonds of all persons who had suffered loss by the fire of the 16th of December last, for periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal instalments, from the day of payment specified in the bonds. It also provided for the cancelling of the bonds, upon others being given with proper sureties, payable in the like space of three, four, and five years. To the first section were annexed two provisions. The first, that those who were within the provisions of the act, and who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the fire, should be entitled to the benefit of the first section—that their bonds should be renewed, and the payments made on them refunded. The second provision denied the benefit of the section to any person whose loss did not exceed one thousand dollars. This section was not only founded upon every principle of justice, was dictated by every maxim of sound policy, but was in accordance with the settled practice of the country. Nothing novel was presented in that part which provided for the extension of the bonds. They would find in their statute book law after law, from the year 1803 to 1820, sanctioning the principle of this section. They would discover the cases, already referred to, of the sufferers by the fires which occurred at Portsmouth, at Norfolk, and at Savannah, and in which the extent of the calamity giving rise to the legislation was not to be compared with that of the city of New York. The section was fortified by precedents, to which he solicited their serious consideration.

The gentlemen from Kentucky and Pennsylvania [Messrs. HARDIN and CHAMBERS] objected to refunding the money already advanced by the debtors of the Government. We had no right to pay back the amount. There can be no doubt, sir, as to our right. The whole question is in our hands. We are here to adjust the differences between the Government and its debtors. We are here to do justice towards all those debtors. So far as those who have paid their bonds are concerned, would it not be refusing to them the kindness which we intend to give to all debtors of the Government, if we do not provide for a future period of payment? It would be cruelty to take advantage of their situation, and hold the money they were compelled to pay, in order to fulfil the law, and that they might enter their goods. If we intend to extend the time, let us extend it for the benefit of all who have suffered. Standing in the relation of a debtor overtaken by a sudden misfortune, the merchant has a strong claim upon the Government, with an overflowing Treasury, for forbearance, for time to meet the payments of his bonds. Is it prudent to harass your debtor? Is it not wise to sustain him in his efforts to obtain the means of satisfying your demands?

To the second section of the bill, which provided for an extension of all other bonds given prior to the late fire for a period of six, nine, and twelve months, he had anticipated objection. To many it might appear strange that the bill should extend in its provisions beyond the actual sufferers by the fire. Many would object (as had the member from Kentucky) to an extension of time without the exaction of interest; and many might imagine a preference would be given to the port of New York over other sections of the country.

He (Mr. McK.) was prepared to show that analogous cases could be found for the legislation which was now asked for. Congress had from time to time extended to the debtors of the Government, owing large sums on the purchase of public lands, the period of payments, and had at length not only released the interest, but also deducted a large per centage of the principal. Against such measures no objection ought to have been raised—it was part of a just, liberal, and sound policy, calculated to foster the enterprise and give an impulse to the industry of a large section of country. He therefore desired that the same principle which had been adopted in regard to the branch of the public revenue derived from lands should be extended to that received from the customs. If there had been extension and forbearance in one case, he hoped the same policy would be pursued in this instance. No deduction was solicited; merely further time for payment. The fire (Mr. McK. said) had not only affected those whose goods were destroyed, but every man in business of any nature in the city of New York, and particularly merchants. Their operations must be crippled by the destruction of a large amount of capital; millions upon millions, the result of the labors of years, the accumulations of enterprise, had been entirely annihilated, totally abstracted, and the commercial community must suffer thereby to a considerable extent. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHAMBERS] remarked there was no evidence of the true state of losses. The committee had no estimate before them. He (Mr. McK.) was in possession of a statement from which some calculation might be made of the immense amount of property destroyed. It was the result of the labors of a committee which reported to a meeting held in the city of New York, the mayor presiding, and from which it appeared that the whole number of buildings destroyed is ascertained to be 527, exclusive of the Exchange and the South Dutch Church, and may be fairly valued at $4,000,000, which is a fraction over $7,000 each, and is generally considered a correct estimate. As far as the committee could ascertain, less than one half only of the mercantile houses have reported their loss in goods by the late fire. By duplicating this amount, ($6,557,846,) we have $13,115,692, as the probable total sum destroyed in merchandise of all descriptions. Add to this the estimated value in buildings, $4,000,000, and the whole loss may be calculated at $17,115,692. This amount was far below the actual loss; upwards of twenty millions of capital had been sunk; and to relieve the community from the effects of the withdrawal of this amount, measures must be adopted, and without delay, if the country did not desire to see a prostration of a large portion of our mercantile population. The gentleman from Pennsylvania referred to the fact of the most of our merchants being insured, and the probability of their being indemnified by these insurance companies. He (Mr. McK.) had been furnished with a statement, by a member of the committee of the merchants from the city, in whose intelligence he had every confidence, setting forth that there were eighteen insolvent companies representing a capital of $6,850,000, and six solvent institutions amounting to $1,900,000. These millions, which performed many functions in the financial operations of the city, were now lost to the merchants. Under the present bankruptcy of the insurance offices, the merchants must be suffering. The payment of even the small amount which may be paid by the solvent companies could not be calculated upon under many months, and during that period the insured must be embarrassed to a great extent. So far as indemnity was concerned, there was no prospect. The remark had been made, in the course of the discussion, that New York was able to sustain herself; that we heard of no failures, therefore we were not called upon to act. He did not understand that, because extraordinary, he might say superhuman, efforts had been made to sustain the credit of the city, we ought to refuse assistance. These efforts, while they redound to the honor of the merchant, ought to arouse us to assist men capable of making such powerful struggles against misfortunes.

Why do they here present their memorials? Because they cherish their commercial character; because they value their credit as their very life blood; because they wish to protect it from the slightest breath of suspicion. They well know its mighty efficacy in giving wings to the enterprise of our citizens. They are well aware how it has carried onward our commerce, and that with the loss of that credit must sink the high character which the American merchant now sustains throughout the commercial world. For these reasons they appear here; and let it not be said that you permitted the honor of your merchants to be jeopardized in the hour of an unexampled calamity; that you refused to extend to them the generosity of the nation. Why was the credit system originally adopted? To aid with your capital the rising commerce of the United States. Your merchants had industry and enterprise, but they wanted capital. It was granted to them, and the magnificent results show the sound policy of your movements. The reason which operated then, applies with great force to the present case. Your merchants are now operating with a capital diminished twenty millions and upwards, and to that extent have a strong claim upon your sympathies. And now let me turn to my honorable friend from Kentucky, and, with his permission, lay before him the history of the transactions of New York in reference to the General Government. I wish to point out to him the conduct of that city in the collection of the public revenue. I speak not of the faithful discharge of duties as the agents for the collection of our imposts. I refer not to the immense revenue of that port in the spirit of exultation, or with a view of holding up to this House the gigantic means derived from the industry of our citizens. I regret that my honorable friend has attempted to arouse the feeling of this House, by representing our strength—our solicitations for the use of the public treasure. I will not conceal the pride I feel in the city of New York, and how that feeling has been increased by the recent display of energy on behalf of her inhabitants. But, sir, the Union has a right to be proud of her also. She belongs to you all, and any injury inflicted upon her must react upon the whole country. She is the storehouse of the industry of the nation, and to the representatives of the nation belongs the protection of her interests. The gentleman from Kentucky ought not to blame us if, with natural advantages unequalled upon the face of the globe, with a location commanding an immense foreign commerce, and hundreds of miles of inland communication, our merchants have exerted themselves to advance the prosperity of not only that city, but also of the entire country. By an examination of the Treasury accounts, the honorable member would find that upwards of two hundred and sixty millions had been paid by the port of New York into the Treasury of the Union. A vast portion of revenue had been collected by some of the very men now applying for relief. New York paid annually two thirds of your revenue; she has been a faithful and indefatigable agent in the collection of your imposts; and to deny her the request now made would be an unkind requital for her conduct towards the Government.

The bill ought not to be delayed. Every day it was postponed added to the difficulties the merchants were now suffering under. Goods were daily arriving which must be entered, and he entreated the committee no longer to delay the adoption of the measure now before it, and to destroy at once the fears which otherwise might be entertained of an unparalleled commercial distress. Prudence dictated an immediate decision on the question.

My colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has given you to understand that a pressure must come, and you ought to put these merchants over it. The storm was gathering, and you ought to protect them from its fury. It would be well for the members to consider that the connexion between New York and the whole country is so close that distress cannot fall upon her alone. Credit has been given on the faith of these bonds to every part of the Union, and must be redeemed. If you insist on payment from the merchants, they must call upon the different sections of the country. On the representatives of the whole nation rests an awful responsibility. They ought not to add to the natural difficulties with which the commercial community might be compelled to contend. True it was, we had their bonds; but did it become us to insist on the penalty at this moment? When the great master of the human heart was desirous of presenting to us the character of an opulent and unmerciful creditor, he gave us a Shylock. How had we all burned with indignation at the recital of the unfortunate victim who had given the bond! But, sir, he had, like our debtors, calculated on his future success to meet his engagements; he rested on the return of his rich argosies, wherewith he might discharge his debts. But misfortune came upon him; and when his unmerciful creditor insisted on the penalty, when the cruelty to be inflicted was defended on the very same principle which we have put forward on this floor, that its non-fulfilment might establish a dangerous precedent, whose heart has not revolted from even the sketch of imagination? Would it be believed that we should present to the civilized world the reality, that, with our coffers overflowing with funds accumulated by our own agents, we should insist on payment, because it is so nominated in the bond? You may insert the knife, you may have your pound of flesh "nearest the heart," but you may be satisfied that the most delicate nerve in this immense body politic will grieve under the operation. You will affect the whole country, which must inevitably suffer from such a policy.

To the city of New York you have been indebted for a large portion of the surplus revenue which you now have in your Treasury. Is it not sound policy to give those facilities which will permit the stream of wealth to pour on in its natural course, (now I trust but temporarily checked) into the great reservoir of the nation? Is it not sound policy in you to inspire the recuperative energies and to infuse into the great body of the merchants that confidence which is the foundation of credit, and the companion of prosperity of a commercial people? Believe me, the aid of your Treasury will be returned fourfold hereafter. The money is not required, the security of the Government is not diminished, and you afford the means of renovating the commercial system. Give New York the means to sustain her commercial credit, and she will soon add to the riches of the public coffers by her extended importations.

We may be told that in a question of this nature we are in danger of surrendering our judgments to our feelings. I do not admit by the adoption of this bill we should be committing such an act, and, even if we did, to what nobler conqueror could we yield submission than to the best feeling of our nature—to the sympathy for the sufferings of our fellow-men. The destruction does not confine itself to those for whose relief the bill on your table is intended. Would that our action, within constitutional limits, would permit us to encircle all who suffer by this calamity—to relieve the thousands thrown out of employment—to succor the infirm, the aged, and the helpless—to save from misery those who now must bide the pelting of the pitiless storm! Much do I regret that, to borrow the figure of eloquence, our kindness must resemble the sun, which in its rising only illumines the loftiest eminences, and not that sun in its meridian effulgence which diffuses its light and warmth, not only over the loftiest palace, but into the deepest valley. We ask not for charity—for that charity which has already afforded precedents for noble acts in the thousands given to the people of Caraccas, and to the people of New Madrid. I will not refer to cases to show how former legislation has not been remiss in the execution of the duties of philanthropy; but while I point to these cases, and ask you to not even advance so far, but to afford us cold, unfeeling justice, to relieve the distresses of our community, I do hope this will not be denied to us.

Let it not be supposed that this is a mere local question. I feel confidence in appealing to the various interests which are here represented: to the manufacturer and mechanic, the profitable result of whose labor depends much on the capacity and integrity of the merchant; to the agriculturist who, although his main dependence is upon the soil, is aware that the value of that soil, and the products of that soil, must be increased by his sustaining the prosperity of our commercial interests. The various industries of the country are so interwoven, and depend so much upon each other, that it is the duty of all to uphold such as may be in danger. The influence of commerce is not only felt in particular points. To its invisible power not only the magnificent cities with which our seacoast is studded, but the most remote hamlet in the Union, may attribute their prosperity and advancement. The gentleman from Kentucky asks, who are these merchants? Will he permit me to answer him by remarking that they are his brethren, protected by the constitution of our country, which extends its blessings to every citizen; that constitution which provides that into your hands shall be given the care of the interests of commerce? And for whom do I ask the sympathy of this committee? For men whose industry is ever active, whose talent is unsurpassed, men who are strongly identified with the interests of the country, who have ever been foremost in works of kindness, and whose philanthropy has been extended to the unfortunate of every clime. I claim it for those whose spirits are unbroken and energies uncrushed amid the ruins of their desolate Rialto; I ask it for those who have carried the glory of the American name and the fruits of American labor into the most distant portions of the earth. For such men I claim it.

But a few days since and but one feeling was in this House. The glow of sympathy was visible in every quarter. I was indulging the hope that relief would be instantaneously afforded. The whole country seemed to be alive to the consequences of the catastrophe. I cannot forego this opportunity, which is here afforded me of offering my thanks to those communities which have expressed their kind feelings in behalf of New York. To their Representatives on this floor I cannot but say that, however my constituents may want in me one who can give competent expression to the deep feeling of gratitude which they entertained for the generous sentiments sent forth from every quarter in their behalf, they may rest assured that their kindness has not been extended to those who are cold or insensible of its value, or by whom it will soon be forgotten.

I trust, sir, that the warm feelings of sympathy expressed on every side are not dying away with the sounds which carry to the furthest bounds of our country the report of this awful calamity. The tumultuous noise is still breaking over the land; but it is echoed back into these halls, in the shape of the resolutions calling upon the Representatives of a generous people to sustain the commercial metropolis of the Union. Confident I am it will be heard before long from beyond the Alleghany, calling upon my friends from Kentucky. Let us obey that voice, which speaks to us in tones of comfort for the distressed, which tells us to aid in the cause of our afflicted merchants, and to allow commerce once more to pursue her course. It does not become us to refuse assistance to that gallant vessel which, in the hour of misfortune, has been overtaken by this sudden tempest—she still appears above the wave, with shattered spars, and riven with lightning, yet bearing upon her deck a noble crew, whose energies are unchecked, and hopes unbroken, amid the darkness of the storm, and struggling to preserve their bark from the yawning gulf. Must they be deserted in such an hour? Must they perish? Will you extinguish the light which has been shining here, cheering them in their struggle, towards which they have turned their anxious eyes? Let it not be said that you hesitated to extend the indulgence of the nation to the unfortunate; that commerce had made her appeal in these halls to the Representatives of a generous people, to those intrusted with the guardianship of her interests, and that her appeal was denied. Let it not be said that an American Congress refused to American merchants forbearance.

Mr. PICKENS said he deeply regretted the public calamity that had prompted the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to propose the bill upon the table. Mr. P. said no gentleman in the House could feel more sympathy for that noble city, the pride and the ornament of this confederacy, so far as commercial wealth, prosperity, and enterprise, are concerned. To see her, to a great extent, laid in ashes and ruins, is enough to call up all the charitable feelings and kind emotions of the human heart; but (said Mr. P.) we stand here not to pass measures that may constitute precedents important to the future welfare of a common country, from the mere impulses of feeling and sympathy. We stand here to exercise certain great trusts, for the benefit of the people of this confederacy, which trusts are regulated and defined by the great provisions of the constitution. He said he did not intend to press the argument out elaborately, but begged to refer to two provisions of the constitution: First, "All duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;" and, secondly, "No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another," &c. Mr. P. said that an essential element in the amount and regulation of duties was time and indulgence upon the revenue bonds; if, for instance, three, four, and five years were given in the city of New York, and only six months in Boston, he apprehended that this would be not only a violation of the spirit but the letter of the constitution. He remarked that, in reply to this, the argument might be that this was not a regulation of revenue or a revenue law; but he contended that if this preference could not be given directly, in the first instance, it could not be done indirectly afterwards; for this would involve us in the additional difficulty of passing, to a certain extent, an ex post facto law. If, after a revenue law be passed, operating under the provisions of the constitution equally in every port and on every class, you by law then vary its operations, and grant indulgences and preferences, you in fact, for all practical purposes, violate the spirit of the constitution. Mr. P. said that, as to the different precedents that had been referred to in the practice of the Government, it was matter of indifference to him, as the action of no preceding Congress could have any great weight on the present Congress in its constitutional opinions on any subject. So far as mere expediency was involved, then, the precedents of former Congresses might be referred to as entitled to consideration.

He continued, that the Treasury agents might and had extended indulgences on bonds; but it was upon the principle that, if they were pressed, the amount, or part of it, might be passed to the Treasury; and, if indulged, the whole might finally be paid. This was exercising a sound discretion, for the exclusive benefit of our fiscal affairs, for the advantage of the Treasury, but not with a view to benefit the debtor. Mr. P. said that in all such cases the circumstances with which it was connected made the law of that particular case, and the discretion of the Treasury officers was to be exercised for the benefit of the Government. But (said Mr. P.) here you propose a general law, for the benefit of a whole class in a particular port, not extended to other ports, and not for the benefit of the Treasury, but avowedly, as its title purports, "for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York." This, Mr. P. said, he apprehended was a perversion of the powers of this Government. He said that the gentleman from New York [Mr. McKENNA] had referred to the case of Caraccas, when this Government afforded relief in a public calamity; but that stood on different principles. As far as the foreign intercourse and relation which exists between us, as one people, and other nations, this Government is, in a great measure, unlimited. There are certain duties which we owe as a united people amongst the family of nations, which duties are to be performed by this Government, defined and laid down by treaties, and regulated by the admitted precepts of national law. Mr. P. said that, even in the case of Caraccas, he would not have voted the relief, as he doubted whether alms-doing and charity could legitimately be included amongst the laws of nations, particularly amongst those nations under limited and constitutional Governments. There was, however, an obvious distinction between the case of Caraccas and affording relief by extending credits on custom-house bonds to a certain class in a certain port, which is not extended equally to all other ports. Mr. P. said that, in the case of Alexandria, it was unconstitutional, as the Government had no power to appropriate, except from a local Treasury, in such a case; the general Treasury being for general purposes under the specific grants of the constitution.

Mr. P. continued, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] had said this calamity extended its effects into all the ramifications of commerce throughout the various interests of the country. This (said Mr. P.) is true; and, according to the doctrine laid down by the gentleman, that the consumer paid, if we are to follow out this principle, then the merchant of Cincinnati, who had received his goods through the importers of New York, and should be so unfortunate as to lose them by fire or otherwise, would have precisely the same claims, in justice and principle, for relief from this Government, as those embraced in the present bill. He has paid the duties in his purchases from the importer, or perhaps he may be the importer himself; and if relief is to be afforded in one case, the same justice should afford it in the other. Mr. P. said, under such a principle, there was not a town or village in any State of the confederacy that could not have the same claims upon the aid of this Government. Any interests injured by the visitations of Providence would claim your relief, and there could be no bounds or limits, as far as equal justice is concerned, to such a precedent; it would, in fact, make this Government the great insurance office for this whole Union.

Mr. P. said that the experience of the British Government was against extending relief in such cases, by altering the custom-house or revenue laws, except in specific cases laid down and incorporated into the general law at the time of its passage. Ever since the great fire in London, the practice had been to issue exchequer bills, or make specific grants from the Treasury; but not to vary the revenue laws. Mr. P. said, if the experience of England had found this course inexpedient, surely it becomes us, under our limited Government, to avoid a practice or precedent which she has abandoned.

Mr. P. said this bill proposes relief to merchants alone, while the heaviest losses fall upon the insurance companies; their capital, as he understood, amounted to about $9,000,000, and perhaps the most of it was swept off by these very merchants who had their goods insured. The effect of this would be to extend relief to those who might have suffered least, while it withheld from those who suffered most, and perhaps deserved most, as the capital in these insurance offices might belong to the widow and the orphan.

Mr. P. continued, and said that that proviso which provided for a restoration from the Treasury of the amount of certain bonds paid, and indulgence granted on the amount, was clearly unconstitutional, as this was money in the Treasury, to all intents and purposes, and could not thus be drawn back, as a loan, without interest. Mr. P. would not go into a calculation of the benefits New York had received from the immense amount of deposits made in her banks for the last year or two, as this was not the time, under the unfortunate circumstances of the case, to calculate that. He said his objections were upon constitutional grounds; and, he would repeat again, that he regretted he could not vote for the bill. When he looked to that noble city, and thought of her wealth and commerce, he felt, as every man ought to feel who had the heart of an American, the kindest emotions of sympathy for her calamity, and deep regret for her loss. When he remembered her, not in the history of the present day, but in 1765, when she received the first meeting ever held by a portion of these colonies to resist British aggression; when he remembered her as connected with some of the most consecrated scenes of our Revolution, he felt every disposition to follow the impulses of his heart rather than the sound dictates of his judgment. He had given the reasons that would influence him in his vote, and that was all he desired.

Mr. MANN, of New York, replied to Mr. HARDIN. He had hoped that this bill would have been discussed without sectional feeling. The people of New York did not come to ask for charity at the hands of that House. They asked only for common, simple, plain justice, not for charity; for that common justice meted out to every other part of the country. Mr. M. defended the course that had always been pursued by the State of New York, for her liberal policy and generous and enlightened principles; because, from her geographical situation, she was the largest commercial State in the Union, it did not follow that she should not have justice done to her. The bill under consideration proposed no bounty, as in the case of Caraccas, but provided nothing more than she had a right to ask, and what was as much for the interest of the country generally as for New York. Mr. M. defended the provisions of the bill, and replied at length to Mr. HARDIN. Mr. M. said it was well known that the larger share of the banking capital of the gentleman's own State came from New York.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he felt a warm sentiment for the people of New York, and he was prepared to give them relief. He was prepared to remit the duties on goods actually destroyed by fire, and that he believed to be the only relief that ought to be granted. He did not look upon the importing merchant as paying the duties. The consumer paid; the importing merchant was the mere agent of the Government. Duties were generally an advantage to the latter, who invariably pay more for the imported goods in proportion to the tax levied upon them. Believing the measure he had indicated to be the only relief that ought to be afforded, he should vote against this bill in every step, but the other he would cheerfully sustain, or he would vote for this bill if it was modified according to what he considered the only proper mode of relief.

Mr. BEARDSLEY did not believe there was any constitutional objection to this bill. Mr. B. read the two clauses of the constitution before referred to, and argued that there was no inequality or local preference given to New York by this bill. Neither the remission of duties, nor an extension of time for their payment, applied to the prohibition of that instrument. The constitution applied to the law imposing the duties: that they "shall be uniform;" and that no preference was given by this bill to the port of New York over any other.

Mr. SUTHERLAND referred to the case of a law passed several years ago, relative to certain importations in the port of Charleston, South Carolina, by which a duty of ten cents tonnage was imposed on all ships entering that port. This case he adduced to show that for a long time past Congress had been in the habit of passing laws with regard to local regulations of duties and tonnage. By the law Mr. S. referred to, the city council of Charleston were authorized to impose a duty of ten cents a ton, for the temporary relief of the sick there, &c.

Mr. PINCKNEY was in favor of the bill, and intended to vote for it. He gave a history of the law cited by Mr. SUTHERLAND, which he said was passed to authorize the city council of Charleston to complete a federal work they had, from patriotic and benevolent motives, undertaken at their own cost.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again. Agreed to; and the House then rose, and at a quarter to four P. M. adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 15.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, on the 7th instant, was taken up:

“Resolved, That a select committee of nine be appointed to inquire what amendments, if any, are expedient to be made to the laws relating to the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, and also into the expediency of modifying the organization of said institution, and also whether it would not comport with the public interest to abolish the same; with power to report by bill or otherwise.”

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. WARDWELL, proposing to substitute the Committee on Military Affairs for a select committee.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he intimated yesterday, when this resolution was under consideration, that he desired to say a few words upon it. In the first place, he wished his colleague to withdraw his amendment to refer the subject to a standing committee, and to suffer it to undergo the investigation of a select committee.

In regard to this institution (Mr. M. said) there was a great disparity of opinions, and the subject was one of very considerable interest to the State he had the honor in part to represent. It was also of considerable interest to the various States surrounding this institution, and he found, to his surprise, during the last session, a strong disposition manifested by that portion of the representatives coming from those States, thus located, to maintain this institution in every one of the charges made against it. At the last session of Congress a committee of twenty-four members, consisting of one from each State, was raised, on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] to investigate the affairs of this institution. That committee appointed a sub-committee, whose labors had not been yet officially promulgated to this House or to the country. He had the honor to be a member of that committee of twenty-four, but not of the sub-committee; but he concurred partially with the views contained in that report, which was, to say the least of it, an elaborate examination of the institution from its earliest time. He knew that in doing so he incurred some censure from a portion of his own State; but he never had, and never would, flinch from any important duty he felt it incumbent upon him to perform there.

Mr. M. said, in the examination of the transactions of this institution he had found much to censure. He believed, if its friends on that floor would take the trouble to investigate it in the same way the committee did last year, they would find more to censure, in the principle of the establishment, than they were aware of. He knew very well that it was necessary to have military officers; they were highly useful at all times. But that was not the inquiry at present. The inquiry was, whether this institution should continue under its present organization. Now, there were abuses in this institution developed in that report; abuses of a character that would not find, he presumed, a single advocate on that floor, when they came to be promulgated.

In his opinion, said Mr. M., the principle on which this institution was established and organized was utterly inconsistent with the principle of all the other institutions in the country. But, because he thought so, he did not therefore desire to see its extermination. It was at variance with all our other institutions, because it was exclusive. It formed the only avenue by which the people of this country could approach the offices of the army. It was the gate-way, and the only gate-way, by which any citizen of this country could reach them; and that was not right.

It was again objectionable to Mr. M's mind, because he could perceive no reason, he never had perceived any reason, why a single individual out of any part of this Union should be selected by a member representing that district upon this floor, to be educated exclusively at the public expense, although he knew gentlemen would say, as they had heretofore said, that this was necessary, in order to acquire the best amount of military information in the country. There was no doubt that it was necessary to have this information in the country, both in time of war and in time of peace; but could it not be secured by some other means? There was no reason why one individual should be taken and educated at the public expense. But besides the principle, what was it in practice? Why, we saw individuals continually pressing the Government in every quarter for admission into this institution, to be educated professedly for the military service, but very frequently, too generally, with the secret design in their hearts of devoting themselves to the civil pursuits of society. This was another ground of objection in his mind, even if the institution bestowed the military education required, because you sent a young man there with a fraud in his heart; and the course of education unfitted him for the performance of those duties incumbent upon civil life. You sap and destroy the foundations which should form the basis of his future course. Moreover, the system was just such a system as prepared a young man, not for civil, but for a military life; and the first thing he had to do was to unlearn almost every thing he had learnt there. These were some of the objections that presented themselves to his mind. The objection, however, to selecting an individual out of a population of 47,700, and educating him at the public expense, was one that he never had seen satisfactorily answered, for it could not be answered.

But, said Mr. M., gentlemen might ask him what system could be adopted by this Government, in regard to that institution, so as to procure that degree of military education they all agreed as requisite and necessary. Why, he thought it very simple indeed. He granted that it was necessary this profession should be in the country at all times. But, in granting this, he did not grant that it should be procured by the means then existing. He would do this, and there stop. He would support an institution like that at West Point, established perhaps on somewhat similar principles, and provide that the Government should erect all the necessary buildings, and establish the professorships, which should be supported at the expense of the Government, and there he would stop. He would leave it open, as every other institution of the country was of a literary character. He would do away entirely with the privileges which the present institution conferred upon the individuals who had passed through it. He would leave the offices of the army open to honorable competition, so that those best qualified should be selected, by whatever means they had acquired their military knowledge. This would excite a proper competition, and the country would be benefited by it, and, in his judgment, better served than at present. He could see no reason why a man educated at this institution should be more peculiarly fitted for the offices of the army than any other. What did experience, what did history show? Was it not that, whenever the country required the exercise of those powers, that individuals possessing them were always found and elected by their confederates to defend their country?—and those made the very best officers. It surely did not follow that because a young man was educated at West Point, or in the military schools at Paris, that he therefore possessed more courage than any other.

As the thing then stood, and as the report, when it came to be promulgated, (which he hoped it would,) would show, this institution cost the country by far too much for the education of these young men. Whether it sprung from abuse or not, such was the fact, when they looked at the utility produced by the expenditure. This, taken in connexion with another fact, offered an additional ground of objection to the institution as it then existed. If Mr. M. recollected the report right, it proved that not more than two out of five of all the persons who ever entered the institution had staid there long enough to graduate, and not two out of five who had graduated ever entered the army. And when it was recollected that not two out of five who entered the army staid in it more than two years, he thought it conclusive that the utility of the institution was not commensurate with its expenditure. If Mr. M's memory served him right, the report showed that every graduate coming from that institution had cost the United States more than five thousand dollars within the last ten years, and previously a much larger sum; and, he believed, within one year the graduates of that institution had cost upwards of thirty thousand dollars. He did not know the cause of that immense expenditure. It might be by mismanagement or misfortune; he cared not; but it showed there were some extraordinary abuses in regard to the institution. Now, if there be any truth in these statements, any truth in the reports that extensively prevailed in the country, the institution was mismanaged and misconducted, and ought to be investigated into and reformed. He therefore made an earnest appeal to his colleague, that he would withdraw his amendment, and permit the subject to go to a select committee.

Mr. M. made some further remarks in relation to the duties of the Military Committee, which were too onerous to afford them the time necessary for the investigation of this object; in addition to which, many of the gentlemen on that committee had predispositions in relation to it. He hoped the House would send it to a select committee, so that the institution, in all its bearings, should undergo a full and complete investigation. He hoped the friends of the institution themselves would vote for the original motion, and that his colleague would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, then addressed the House for a short time; but, without concluding, gave way to a call for the orders of the day.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, from the select committee on the subject of the District banks, obtained the consent of the House to report "a bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia to the 1st day of October next."

The bill was twice read.

Mr. THOMAS said the bill did not require commitment. He was about to ask the House, with the assent of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, to take up and act upon this bill at once. It would not, he said, require any discussion, as there could be no difference of opinion in regard to it. The committee unanimously agreed in asking the House to act on the bill without delay. It proposed to continue unimpaired, to all the banks doing business in the District, all their powers and privileges, till the committee had investigated their condition, and Congress could act upon the question of the renewal of their charters. It was indispensable to the interests of the District that the bill should be passed. He hoped the House would consent to order it to a third reading.

Mr. HAWES said he would like to make this inquiry of the chairman of the committee: If the object of the bill was to afford an opportunity for the committee to investigate the affairs of the banks, and for Congress to act upon the subject, what was the necessity of extending the term of the charters beyond the close of the present session? If the charters were to be extended at all, he wished it to be for a shorter time.

Mr. THOMAS supposed, he said, that the time fixed would meet every possible objection, so as to supersede the necessity of any remarks. The committee could not anticipate the action of Congress on the subject, nor their own report. They might report in favor of renewing the charters of some of the banks, and against the renewal of others. Congress would not probably adjourn till the 1st of July, and it was important that the banks should have time to prepare for a change so important to the District, if their charters should not be renewed.

Mr. McKENNAN did not rise, he said, to provoke a debate on the bill, nor to oppose it. He wished to congratulate the committee on their arrival at the same conclusion which the Committee for the District of Columbia reached at the last session, on this subject, and presented to the House in the form of a bill similar to this; which, on motion of the gentleman himself, was laid aside.

Mr. PARKER said the bill required more attention than the House could now give it, and he moved its postponement till Thursday next.

Mr. HARDIN made an inquiry of the gentleman from Maryland; in reply to which,

Mr. THOMAS said the select committee had not yet commenced their investigation. They had postponed it till the House decided on this bill. If the bill should not pass, he was instructed to ask of the House permission for the committee to sit during the sittings of the House. If the bill should pass, the committee would be able to attend to their duties in the House, and continue the investigation also.

Mr. LANE understood, he said, that the object of taking this business from the Committee for the District of Columbia, and referring it to a select committee, was, that the select committee would prosecute the investigation diligently and without delay. But now it appeared that, though some time had elapsed, the committee had not commenced the investigation. Sir, said Mr. L., I see something more in this bill than its apparent object. It may be intended to ask for a summer session for the committee. He believed that the Committee for the District of Columbia, setting himself apart, would have performed the business promptly, quickly, and with ability.

The motion to postpone was rejected.

Mr. HAWES spoke in favor of a shorter time for extending the charters. If the object of the bill was to enable the banks to wind up their concerns—

[Mr. THOMAS here said he had not stated this to be the object. The object was to afford time for Congress to determine on the propriety of continuing them. While up, he would state that his purpose in calling for a select committee was to prevent the necessity of a summer session of the committee.]

Mr. HAWES was willing, he said, to give the banks ample and sufficient time to wind up their concerns, should their charters not be renewed; but he was unwilling to extend the charters, for the purpose of the investigation, longer than the end of the session. He moved to strike out the 1st of October, and insert the 30th of June.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, to test the sense of the House on the subject, moved the previous question.

The motion was not seconded by the House.

Mr. PARKER protested against so much haste. There was no necessity for it; and many errors were not unfrequently committed by too much haste in matters of legislation. He could see no reason why the consideration of the bill should not be postponed until next week.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, hoped there would be no attempt to apply what was called the gag-law, with respect to this subject. So far as relates to the people of this District, who had no representatives here, there perhaps was no question that could be discussed.

that involved more considerations in regard to them than the present. He conceived the gentleman who had reported this bill must have had some object in view. Why continue the charters of the banks until the 1st of October next, if it was the object of the committee to procure the action of Congress in relation to them before it adjourned? In what situation would the District be, provided the House had not an opportunity of acting on the subject before the next session, by which time the charters would have expired some weeks? Why, bankruptcy or insolvency must be the consequence. But he might be told, by the honorable chairman, that the committee contemplated action. Well, if action really was contemplated before the adjournment, why the necessity of this bill at all? Let us go on and try if the investigation with respect to these banks can be completed. If malfeasance, or any other act, on the part of any of the District banks, should be detected, the sooner the people here knew it the better. He was told, no longer ago than yesterday, that the papers, accounts, and statements of one bank, necessary to be disclosed, were in preparation for that purpose; and that every thing the committee would require could be furnished by giving three hours' notice. It had been said that the papers necessary to the investigation were so numerous, and the duties so onerous, that the committee could not get through their labors with that despatch some gentlemen were led to suppose. Why, then, he would say, let the papers be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, who had nothing to do, and were seeking for business; but until the select committee had made an attempt, and are prepared to say they cannot go through the investigation during the present session, the House cannot consider the propriety of referring the subject to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTSMAN addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, as one of the committee appointed to investigate the situation and condition of these banks, I feel it to be my duty to submit a few remarks for the consideration of the House, in reply to the gentlemen from Indiana, New Jersey, and Rhode Island. It seems to be insisted by the two former, that the House committed a great error in referring this subject to a special committee, and that if it had been submitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, the investigations necessary would have been at least half through by this time. There is a great deal of sensibility manifested by the Committee for the District of Columbia upon the subject. It would seem, from their continual complaints, that they suppose the House has robbed them of a portion of their rights.

I am willing, sir, to admit that the Committee on the District of Columbia possesses more ability, and can transact this business in a style exquisitely genteel, systematic, nice, and scientific—more so than any committee in the House, or that ever was in it. But, notwithstanding all this, upon a full, thorough, and ample discussion, it has not been the pleasure of this House to assign this duty to them. It was thought, for reasons satisfactory to the House, that a select committee should be charged with this investigation. If those gentlemen are dissatisfied with the decision of the House, I know of no way to reverse it, unless they will take an appeal or writ of error; and then I know of no revising power, which can take jurisdiction of it, unless the appeal, or writ of error, is taken to the gallery.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] says that he had a conversation with the President, or perhaps some of the directors, of one of these banks; and that he has the books, papers, and documents, all ready, and that an examination can be made in their houses. I entertain no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it is these three hours' examinations of banks that has enabled many of them to commit the deepest frauds, and to fatten upon the substance of the laboring classes of society, and then, in a proper time and prudent manner, break very genteelly. There are two characters of breaking in this country—the one is to break very poor, and the other very rich; and a three hours' examination of any bank will enable it to choose between the two modes. In fact, sir, I consider it no examination at all. It is not within the compass of human possibility, it is not within man's power, (the Committee for the District of Columbia always excepted,) to make an examination into the situation and condition of a bank, and the manner and correctness with which it has been conducted, where a large business has been transacted for the last fifteen or twenty years, and digest the information in an intelligent form, such as should be laid before this House, in three hours or three days. It may take weeks. If an examination is gone into, it should be a thorough and satisfactory one. If there has been any foul practices by it, or rotten places now in it, under it, or about it, this should be fully eviscerated and brought before the public; it is an important item to take into consideration, upon the present application to renew their charters. If the affairs of these institutions had been fairly and honestly conducted, it is alike due to the public and the banks that the facts shall be known and set down to their credit. Is it possible that the gentleman from New Hampshire can suppose all this can be done in three hours? It is true, sir, they may bring up the prettiest set of bank books, more neatly bound, and more handsomely gilt, with the finest writing; the t's all crossed and the i's all dotted, which will exhibit a most splendid appearance, and which will answer all the purposes intended by a three hours' examination. But, sir, all things may not be so smooth, honest, and fair, when we get a peep behind the curtain; there may be something rotten in Denmark.

I will now, sir, turn to that part of the subject which operated upon the minds of the committee in relation to the extension of their charters until the 1st of October next. There are seven or eight banks in the District; some of those, it is understood, through all the fluctuations of the times, whether produced by those shocks and revulsions which will occasionally happen in the moneyed concerns of any Government, or by the celebrated panic, have sustained their credit and reputation by paying at all times the gold or silver for their notes whenever they were presented, while others (which may, in the examination of the select committee, be considered of the second class) did not honor their notes, but suspended specie payments, much to the injury of the citizens of the community who were in possession of those notes at the time of this suspension. The first inquiry of the committee, in regard to these banks, will be to ascertain the causes which produced this suspension: was it by causes over which the directors of these banks had no control, or produced by circumstances that could not be foreseen, and fairly calculated upon, by exercising a reasonable degree of prudence and precaution? Some reports have gone abroad, quite unfavorable to a portion of those banks in the District which had suspended specie payments. It is unquestionably due to the public and the trading community, to ascertain the truth of these statements, and establish the facts, if they be. It is equally important to the banks so implicated, that a strict examination should be made. If the reports are not true, let them be honorably acquitted. I consider it due to them as an act of justice. It will require much time to do all this. These charters expire on the third or fourth of March; and although the committee could accomplish the task by that time, if leave was obtained for it to sit during the session of the House, yet it is an alternative to be avoided.

ed if possible. The members of the committee have important business committed to them, by their own constituents, which requires their attention while the House is in session; which they cannot dispense with without great delay, and perhaps danger of its being lost for want of attention.

But, separate and apart from the beforementioned reasons for continuing the charter of these banks until the first of October next, the interest of the banks and the policy of Congress both require it. It is impossible for the banks to wind up their business in six weeks, without great injury to themselves and to the commercial community of the District. If Congress, after a full examination of their concerns, shall not think proper to recharter them, the time specified (the first of October) is as early as they can wind up their affairs, without creating a shock to the moneyed concerns of the District. It is right that a sufficient time be given for that purpose; therefore, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] to restrict the time to the 1st of June. I am equally opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE,] which proposes an extension of the charter to the 4th of March, 1837. It is the duty as well as the policy of Congress to dispose of the whole subject, and finally, at this session. If we fail to act upon it now, and postpone it to the next session of Congress, which is a short one, it cannot receive the consideration to which it is entitled.

And, again, Congress will be harassed with the question some three or four weeks, then much to the detriment of other business. If it shall be the pleasure of Congress, upon a full examination, to recharter those banks, then it will require time to introduce those modifications into the charters which time and experience has afforded, in order to make them as perfect as possible; so that their usefulness may be felt, with as little inconvenience to society as their practical operations will allow, and at the same time to guard against the abuses and frauds of the banking system. I have no doubt this can be done to a considerable extent. This is an enlightened era of the world: the march of improvements and inventions, and of mind, has no former example; it has outstripped the wildest conceit that existed even fifty years ago. There is no science which has received more improvement and accessions of knowledge than that of banking.

Take the same men, such of them as are yet living, who framed the bank charter for the United States Bank, and let them now set down to the work, with the additional information and experience they have since acquired, and they can construct one infinitely preferable, so that not one sixteenth part of the frauds which have been charged upon that bank could have been committed, without an easy mode of detection. But to form such a charter it requires time.

For myself, I have not much favor for the banking system, much less for its abuses. I have never voted for but one. I had opportunities to vote for many. In some instances it may be a necessary evil. When it is so, the charters should be so framed as to make that evil as light as possible. As to those in the District of Columbia, I have neither partiality for, nor prejudices against, them. I think I can do justice; but, in order to ascertain what is just, I hope the House will pass the bill as it stands, which will afford both time and opportunity to arrive at that end.

Mr. GILLET moved to amend the bill by adding a clause providing that Congress shall have the power to repeal, modify, or alter, the privileges extended by this act, any rights which the corporations have under it to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HARLAN moved to strike out the 1st of October, 1836, and insert the 1st of March, 1837; which was rejected.

The question was taken on the motion to amend, offered by Mr. HAWES, and decided in the negative.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on this day, in the following form:

A BILL to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia to the 1st day of October, 1836.

Be it enacted, &c., That the acts incorporating certain banks in the District of Columbia, that is to say, the Bank of Potomac and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, in the city of Alexandria, the Union Bank and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, in the town of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, and the Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, be, and the same are hereby, renewed, continued in full force, and limited to the first Saturday and first day of October, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirty-six.

[The bill was subsequently read a third time.]

The remainder of the day was spent in the consideration of private bills, till the hour of adjournment; when the House adjourned to Monday.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The subject of the petition from sundry inhabitants of Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, presented on a former day by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. HAWES, postponed till Monday next.

THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of A. J. DONELSON, Esq., his secretary, (for which see debates in Senate of this date, ante, page 163.)

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to have the message just received read to the House; and, no objection being made, it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. McKEON sent to the Chair certain resolutions relating to the subject of the message, which he offered for the consideration of the House.

Mr. MERCER rose to a point of order. The rules had been, he said, suspended only for the purpose of reading the message.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations,) said it was his intention to submit a motion that the message and documents accompanying it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and printed. He said he thought it important that the House should have an opportunity deliberately to peruse papers of so much importance, preliminary to any action in reference to them.

After some conversation, on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the documents accompanying the message were read.

Mr. HAWES rose, and moved that 20,000 extra copies of the message and documents be printed.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked that the question should be first taken on the motion, which he now submitted, that the message and documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The message and documents were then ordered to be referred accordingly, and the motion to print 20,000 extra copies was agreed to.

Mr. McKEON asked the consent of the House to submit the resolutions which he had sent to the Chair, for the purpose of having them printed.

Objections being strongly made, by repeated cries of "No! No!"

Mr. McKEON moved a suspension of the rules of the House, in order to offer the resolutions, and asked the reading of the resolutions for the information of the House.

Objections were made to the reading of the resolutions, by many members.

Mr. McKEON inquired whether he had not a right to ask the reading of the resolutions.

[Cries of "order!" "order!"]

The CHAIR stated that he had some doubt whether the resolutions could be read without general consent, as the rule had not been suspended.

Mr. McKEON remarked that he was desirous of submitting the resolutions he had sent to the Chair. He was aware that the rules of the House did not permit him to offer them at the present moment; but, as they related to our affairs with France, the House might, he thought, be disposed to hear them read. As it was the day for the presentation of petitions, he had but little prospect of procuring a suspension of the rule. He informed the House that the resolutions approved of the determination of the executive branch of this Government not to submit to give explanations; and he should take an early opportunity of bringing them before the House. He then withdrew the motion to suspend the rules.

The presentation of petitions and memorials was then resumed.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of certain inhabitants of the State of Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND regretted that the gentleman had thought proper to present this memorial. He felt constrained to move the question of consideration.

Mr. ADAMS said he presumed that the question was subject to the decision upon the appeal taken by him on a former occasion from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PINCKNEY wished, in order that gentlemen might have an opportunity of presenting their petitions, to make the motion that the preliminary question be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS said the appeal which he had taken from the decision of the Chair, on a former occasion, was founded on a desire, on his part, that the subject should not be discussed so as to consume the whole of the day set apart for the presentation of petitions. With these views, he was willing to allow the gentleman from South Carolina to make the motion that the subject be laid on the table, to be taken up and decided on at the same time with the other petitions.

Mr. PINCKNEY then moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. HAMMOND inquired whether the motion of his colleague was in order. The petition not having been received, there was nothing to lay on the table.

The CHAIR said that the motion was in order. The gentleman from Massachusetts had moved that the petition be received. It was competent to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ADAMS presented a similar petition to the foregoing, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND again moved the question of consideration. He gave notice that he would make the same motion in every similar case, until he could procure a direct vote on the subject.

The preliminary question was postponed until to-morrow.

Similar petitions were presented by Messrs. CALHOUN, LINCOLN, GRENNELL, and JACKSON, of Massachusetts, upon which the question of reception was made, and, on motion of Mr. G. LEE, postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SLADE presented memorials, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, of one hundred females of Cornwall, in the State of Vermont; of four hundred and twenty-six females in the county of Madison, in said State; of three hundred and thirty-six male citizens of McConnelsville, in the State of New York, and of the officers and students of Oneida Institute, in said State; which he moved should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. GLASCOCK moved that they be not received.

Mr. GIDEON LEE moved to lay the motion on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. JAMES, of Vermont, presented a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND demanded the preliminary question of reception; which motion was laid on the table.

Mr. RUSSELL presented a petition from sundry individuals, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND demanded the question of consideration.

Mr. GIDEON LEE moved that the preliminary question of non-reception be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. McKENNAN presented two memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania; one of which prayed for the abolition of slavery, and the other for the suppression of the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND moved that they be not received.

Mr. GIDEON LEE moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. McKENNAN asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House; which was lost.

Upon counting, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the call for the yeas and nays was seconded, there appeared to be no quorum voting.

Mr. WISE again moved a call of the House. Lost.

Upon a second count, a quorum was found to be in attendance, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Upon the question to lay the motion that the petitions be not received on the table, (which was understood merely as a postponement of the subject until to-morrow,) the vote was as follows:

YEAS--Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, William B. Mr. HIESTER, of Pennsylvania, presented several petitions, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND moved that they be not received.

Mr. LEE, of New York, moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. L. said he deemed it proper to explain his motives. This day is especially appropriated to the presentation of petitions from our constituents. Several members have not had an opportunity to present the petitions they had brought from home with them. Every county and town in the nation is interested, and should at least be permitted to have their petitions before the appropriate committees. Gentlemen know this class of petitions have already provoked excited and protracted discussions. I know they will continue to do so whenever they come into discussion. The object of my motion is to prevent such discussion to-day, in exclusion of all other petitions. I wish it distinctly understood (said Mr. L.) that I am in favor of the reception of every petition, whatever may be the prayer, provided the language be decorous, and free from immorality. I will vote for the reception of them to-morrow.

The motion to lay the preliminary question on the table was agreed to.

Messrs. DARLINGTON, MORRIS, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, and DENNY, presented various petitions, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; upon each of which Mr. HAMMOND demanded the question of consideration; and, on motion of Mr. GIDEON LEE, the preliminary question of reception on each petition was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITTLESSEY, of Ohio, presented an abolition memorial.

Mr. HAMMOND moved that it be not received.

Mr. GIDEON LEE moved to lay the motion on the table; which was agreed to.

The remainder of the day was almost exclusively devoted to the reception of petitions, memorials, and resolutions; and

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The special order of the day was taken up, being the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. JARVIS, of Maine:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And be it further resolved, that in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

To which Mr. Wise submitted the following amendment:

“Resolved,” and insert, That there is no power of legislation granted by the constitution to the Congress of the United States, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and that any attempt by Congress to legislate upon the subject of slavery will be not only unauthorized, but dangerous to the union of the States.

Mr. JARVIS subsequently modified the original resolution as follows:

Whereas any attempt in this House to agitate the question of slavery is calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy the peace and prosperity of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And it is further resolved, that in case any petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

The question before the House being the amendment of Mr. Wise—

Mr. HOLSEY said he would have supported the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise], had it been presented at a proper time. He was willing to meet the constitutional question whenever it could be presented in a proper manner; but it was not his intention to go into the merits of the question at present. The people he had the honor to represent, and he believed the whole people of the South, believed the constitution of the United States granted no power to legislate on this subject. The position his own State occupied prevented him from going further in this matter. He was of opinion the subject should be disposed of, by calling for the yeas and nays, without discussion. It ought to be recollected that this was a deep and pervading question. The South knew the rights which belonged to them, and it was hardly necessary for him to say that they would maintain those rights. We have the voice of history to warn us how to proceed in this matter. The discussions in the French Legislature had their influence in the insurrection in the West Indies. He had noticed this circumstance merely as an additional motive for drawing this exciting and agitating question to a close.

The resolution of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. JARVIS] would have a conciliating influence on the South—the terms of the resolution being, that the agitation of the question was calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution. It was not inconsistent with the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia; and he was willing to go for that resolution also at the proper time. There could be but one opinion in relation to the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, and he thought that by adopting it we would discharge our obligations to our country. He did not think that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia could be sustained in its present shape, because it would be striking out the language of the gentleman from Maine, and inserting the constitutional question. God forbid that the existence of this great confederacy should be disturbed by a mere matter of propriety. He would say, in conclusion, that he would support the original resolution of the gentleman from Maine; but whenever gentlemen should see proper to present the constitutional question in a proper manner, he would sustain their views.

Mr. HAWES said the people he had the honor to represent viewed the subject now before the House with as great attention and deep interest as, perhaps, any of the people. He had regretted that the discussion of the subject should be carried on, because in his view every speech made was calculated to create an impression in the minds of the abolitionists that they were persecuted. He believed the consequences to be deleterious, let discussion come from whatever quarter it might, whether from the East, North, South, or West. Viewing the discussion as deleterious to every part of this great confederacy, he felt himself bound to demand the previous question.

Mr. PEYTON rose and asked the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAWES said, I cannot withdraw, sir; I have given my reasons for the motion, and I feel compelled to insist upon it.

The motion for the previous question was not seconded by the House: Ayes 90, noes 100.

Mr. PEYTON had hoped the gentlemen of the South would meet the only question they ever wished to see presented there: that was the question of power, not of expediency. Would any gentleman go home to the South and tell his constituents that they might enjoy life, liberty, and property, because it was not expedient to touch it? He would assure gentlemen that the mere declaration of inexpediency, with regard to the District of Columbia, would be insufficient to tranquilize the South, and they deceived themselves if they thought so. Mr. P. then referred to the recent speech of Mr. ANAXES, and the message of Governor Marcy, in relation to the special message of Governor Gayle, part of which he read. This, he said, would show what the South had to expect from the northern feeling and northern people. He would put the case of the guilt of the incendiary being clear beyond a doubt, and that murders without number had been committed through him or his agency; yet, upon the position assumed by the Governor of New York, he could not be punished, because he did not commit the crimes within the limits of the State in which he resided. Mr. P. contended that this conflicted with that clause of the constitution of the United States which provided for the surrender of fugitives from justice. The case of an incendiary firing from a mortar across a State line could be done with impunity, according to that position, if there was no law in the State of New York to meet that particular case.

Mr. P. maintained that the man who committed crime at a distance against a State, was just as amenable to the laws of the State he had outraged, as if he had committed the act within the limits of the State. He just as much fled from justice as the criminal who fled from the State. Mr. P. then read the opinions of Mr. Van Buren on an amendment to the constitution, in relation to the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia, contained in the letter from the honorable Silas Wright to Thomas Ritchie, Esq., and also the letter of Mr. Van Buren to Samuel Gwin, of Mississippi, to show that Mr. Van Buren reserved the power in the States over this species of property; and that it could not be touched without an amendment to the constitution. Mr. P. denied that it could be so amended under any circumstances, and the time was now come when they must come up and meet this question. He then read an extract from a letter of Mr. Butler, the Attorney General, to Hugh A. Garland, of Virginia, respecting the meeting at Albany on the subject of slavery west of the Mississippi, in the year 1819, and Mr. Van Buren's course on that occasion. He also dilated on the proceedings of the New York Legislature in 1820, on the admission of Missouri into the Union, so far as regarded the question of slavery, in which Mr. Van Buren voted for the preamble and resolution declaring that Congress might exclude slavery from new States, before their admission into the Union. Mr. P. then referred to a publication he had received a few days since, entitled "Supplement to the Pioneer," from which he read sundry long extracts, maintaining the right of Congress to suppress slavery in the Territories and in the District of Columbia. There were hundreds of thousands of abolition publications issued from the State of New York, an act which was punishable in the southern States, but the criminal could not be reached, because he resided within the limits of other States; yet gentlemen from the South told us that the North was sound on this subject. He compared the conduct of the abolitionists with that of an armament of private citizens against one of the republics of South America. When such a thing was about to take place, with regard to Texas, he said, the President of the United States promptly issued his proclamation against the design; but no proclamation, no message, no letter, had been sent forth against these societies, who were conspiring a warfare against the institutions of the South.

Mr. P. drew a picture of the condition of the slaves of the South, contrasted with the laborers of the North, and commented at great length upon the above publication or address of the anti-slavery society. He maintained that the only way to meet the question was to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. Any thing less than this would be "shirking" the question; would be evading it. The question of expediency would not now do. He believed there was a fixed determination to baffle the question; and he called upon the gentlemen of the South not to suffer it to be baffled.

Mr. BOULDIN then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the discussion of the several resolutions now under consideration, let me protest against a certain election, now so much talked of, having any thing whatever to do in this matter. Several allusions have been made to some supposed participation of that election with the resolutions now under debate. I cannot believe that any man would bring into hazard the life or safety of the infant that sits upon his knee, and, smiling, looks up to him for protection—the companion of his joys and his sorrows—his friends, his country, and every thing that is dear to him on earth—to forward any party views, or to elevate or disappoint the hopes of any individual. But should I be mistaken in this, I am sure I shall not be in another view of it. If attempted to be used on either side, it will soon be found to be a dangerous weapon, one that cuts both ways, and will soon be laid aside. To say you will never have a President from a non-slaveholding State, will provoke and give excuse to those of the non-slaveholding States to say they will never have one from a slaveholding State. This, if acted on, is a practical dissolution of the Union, and would soon produce it, in every sense of the term. Sir, when I go to the polls, I shall vote for whom I please at the time. Should the election come to this House, (it being then the vote of my district, and not my vote,) I shall vote as they please. As to how I am to find out what they wish, they can inform me in any way they may think proper. I hold myself bound to find out somehow. Nor have I any doubt but that I can. This is all I wish to have to do with that election. Let me then turn my back upon it, while this matter is under consideration. I will vote for no man, from whatever quarter of the Union he may come, who wishes to be meddling with the right of property, and especially that in slaves, because it involves other perils, besides the loss of property.

I will consider the constitutional question first. Although there is difference of opinion on this question—and, no doubt, honest difference of opinion—still I cannot see where the difficulty is. All admit a man's land or his horse cannot be taken from him in this District, any more than elsewhere; and that it cannot be done any where, except for the public use; nor even then, without just compensation.

Can, then, the constitutionality of the proposed abolition be sustained, without showing a distinction between the property a man holds in a slave, and that which he holds in lands or horses? It surely cannot. If, then, there be any distinction, where does it lie? Is it to be found in the constitution of the United States? Certainly not. That instrument makes no distinction. While the federal constitution was under debate, with a view to its adoption, by the Virginia convention, Henry urged that this property was not secured, and gave his reason why he thought so. He was answered that it was; and that clause was cited to prove it, which provides for the retaking of a runaway slave or servant, in any State to which he might abscond. It was insisted by Henry that slaves might be taxed, until the tax would compel emancipation. Amendments were proposed, and most if not all of them afterwards adopted, which now form a part of the constitution, and stand as amendments. Further to secure this, and all other property, we find this amendment: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."—(See amendment to constitution, sec. 5.) This was then the most valuable species of property held by the southern States, as well as now. This property was then almost entirely peculiar to the South, and they were unwilling to trust it to any one but themselves. This was the greatest stumbling-block in the way of the adoption of the constitution. The determination to hold it wholly within their own power, and trust it to no one, makes the South feel and know that State rights and State Governments are more dear to them than to any section of the Union. Sir, they did not mean to intrust it to those who they knew believed, or professed to believe, that property could not be held in a slave. With the clauses before quoted, and the other clauses in the constitution and amendments, all recognising and securing, or seeking to secure, this property, with many doubts and fears, and contrary to the advice of many of the wisest and best men we ever had, we adopted the constitution—went into the copartnership.

Have we gone into this confederacy with the principal part of our property thus recognised and secured; and shall the same instrument be construed to secure the property of one section of the Union, and not that of another section? Surely this cannot be. Some, seeing the palpable absurdity of this, fly to this idea: say they, you cannot liberate the slave now in being, but you may forbid the increase to be held as slaves. Compel us to maintain the mother, while she raises the children! The master is thus made slave to his negro! Take all the rents and profits, but hold the property in the land sacred! Be careful not to interfere with the right of property in the mare, but take away all the colts! Such ideas, however, though they may weigh upon the minds of others, weigh nothing upon mine. It is property, or not. The constitution is binding upon all, or none; none can claim under a deed or will, and against it, or deny its validity; none can hold on upon that part of the constitution which is to their advantage, and discard all the balance. What distinction can be drawn between property, and property in this respect? What, sir, shall you not be able, with the whole power of the confederacy, to take away a man's horse, worth forty dollars, unless it be for the public use, and not then without just compensation, and still be able to take his slave, his property, worth one thousand dollars, not for the public use, not with just compensation? Some have said this property might be taken away, if it became dangerous to the public. This cannot be for the public use. If set free they will not be property at all, and cannot be property for the public use. This is a strange idea—to make property useful to the public, by making it no property at all!

In the first place, a man cannot be placed in much greater danger, or a much worse condition, than by taking away from him the proceeds of his whole life's labor—his bread for his children. In the next place, it is wholly inconsistent with the profession, that those who contend for those powers in this District do not claim them over the States. If this argument, drawn from danger only, will authorize emancipation here, where there are but few slaves, (and, from the smallness of the District, there never can be many,) what will it not do, if transferred to Louisiana and Mississippi? In the third place, the danger is not less on account of the interference of strangers. And, in the fourth place, we never meant, nor do we mean ever, to put ourselves or property in negro slaves under the care and keeping of those who have no slaves. No, sir; no distinction can be drawn between the right to interfere with this property and any other, on the part of the Federal Government. When the States of Maryland and Virginia conveyed away this District to the Federal Government, they had procured a bond to be given by the Federal Government, that private property should not be taken for public use, without just compensation. How, then, comes it that this Government shall assume the power to take away the most valuable property they had, when it fell into its hands?—and that, too, (twist it as you will, at last it comes to this,) because other people do not like this kind of property—have scruples of conscience. Yet it seems many have no scruples of conscience that will prevent them from taking away the property of others—ay, sir, and after entering into the most solemn obligations not to violate an instrument which says you shall not, except for the public use, and then not without just compensation. It is not pretended to be disguised that there is a plan afloat for general emancipation; and these petitioners, generally, say they conceive this to be a part of the means to be used, in order to consummate their general object.

It appears to me that, view the memorials and arguments in every light, resting as they do upon some supposed distinction between this and any other species of property, they all must come at last to this point—that the property in a negro slave is no property at all. We have no thoughts of trusting half the whole wealth of all the South to abstractions of this kind. We claim negro slaves as property; we hold them as such; and the property in them was recognised, guaranteed, secured, or sought to be secured, to us, against all interference. The constitution either secures it to us, or it does not. If it does, we have all we want upon that point. If it does not, we are deceived, and must secure it in some other way, but not by putting it under the control of those who have no slaves.

Many are of opinion that large manufactories are dangerous to the liberty, safety, and morals, of a nation. Shall we burn them down, sir, by act of Congress? Such ideas appear to me to be subversive of every security for property, dangerous to the community, and hostile to the peace and order of civilized life. I cannot see the least ground for asserting this power.

But, on the point of constitutionality, I can differ with any gentleman, from any part of the Union, and do it in perfect good will and good humor. With equal good humor and complacency can I hear abstractions on the subject of negroes and negro slavery. As long as they are kept north of Mason and Dixon's line, they can never hurt us of the South. Nor can they hurt there much; for, as my Lord Bacon says, "though such things work mightily on men's wits, yet do they produce no very great effects." The mischief never begins until an attempt is made to reduce them to practice.

I promised you, and, through you, my constituents, that whenever the abolition question came up, not entangled with any question of order, or with any extraneous matter, I would express my opinions and feelings upon it. Yet, who can be ignorant of what are the feelings and opinions of a Representative of any portion of the slaveholding districts upon this subject? There is no difference of opinion or of feeling, either in regard to the right to interfere, or the disposition to do so, by the Federal Government. Nearly all these memorials declare, in terms, that they mean this measure to operate, in some form or other, to produce, or to induce, the emancipation of the slaves of all the South. The fact is not attempted to be covered, that there are untiring efforts constantly in action, the object of which is to emancipate our slaves. Some petitions propose to do it immediately. Others propose to do it gradually. I am entirely satisfied, that to do it, or use the means to do it, either way, is a violation of the constitution, subversive of private and public safety, and, if persevered in, fatal to the Union.

I have, however, no great solicitude on the constitutional question. When the mind gets its own consent to take from me my property, and endanger my life, upon speculative notions of this character, it is obvious it will find it easy enough to get clear of constitutional difficulty. And it is not material whether it come to this determination through infatuation, perversion of intellect, or perversion of moral sense, or from corruption known and felt; it will, in neither case, stand long upon constitutional construction.

Sir, I have been compelled to come to the conclusion, that when our lives and our property depend upon construction, and construction only, no great reliance can be placed in the safety of either.

The opinions of the greatest and best of men differ and change with time and change of circumstances. Look to the opinions of the great, wise, and good men, who framed and adopted this constitution, with its guarded, careful amendments. Mark the opinions delivered in debate on its adoption. I know they stand in the form of argument, but not the arguments of counsel, feed to maintain one side only. They are the arguments of a judge delivering the sentence of life or death; pronouncing sentence of life or death to a nation's independence. When Patrick Henry urged, before the Virginia convention, that, under the constitution proposed, a sovereign State might be dragged before a court, what did the late Chief Justice say in reply? Mr. Speaker, when I allude to the late Chief Justice of the United States, let me do it with all humility and homage to his great name and virtues. Would that I could pay a tribute as just and ample as it is sincere, to the splendor of his talents, the magnitude of his acquirements, and, what is more than all, to the purity and simplicity of his heart, and the unbending firmness of his justice.

In answer to Henry, and in support of the constitution, or rather its adoption, he said, among other things, "It is not rational to suppose that sovereign power should be dragged before a court." Does he then say, or even intimate, that, in the adoption of that constitution, a State would cease to be a sovereign Power? Far from it. Such a hint I do not recollect to have seen; at that day it might have been fatal to the adoption. He says further: "I hope no gentleman will think that a State will be called at the bar of the federal court." What he thought of it afterwards, after decisions and after opinions will show. We find that the most illustrious men have stood out for a time upon a constitutional difficulty, and yielded at last. Witness the history of the Bank of the United States. I may not be right—I hope I am not—but it appears to me that positions have been taken, which in their nature are impossible to be executed, and contrary to the spirit and letter of the constitution, and that by construction on the constitution.

Has no such position as this been substantially taken—an independent savage nation in the heart of a sovereign civilized State, under the protection of the federal court?

I hope I am not right; but it appears to me that good men have convinced themselves that this is practicable, constitutional, and just; and that the savages are to remain, in all time, not subject to the laws of the State, scalping and tomahawking men, women, and helpless children, if they please, under the protection of the federal court. If all those whose ancestors took land from the Indians would return to them all the lands thus held, there would be room enough for the "poor Indians." "Can a man be pardoned, and retain the offence?" When, then, I see that great men can thus construe and thus act—great and good men, many of them as great and as good as any men in any age or country—I do not like to place my principal reliance on constitutional construction in this affair. I know we must rely mainly upon ourselves. But as far as depends upon our fellow-citizens and friends not situated as we are in regard to this property, especially members of this House, I am anxious to have an answer to this question: Do you (professing to be friendly to us of the South) mean to take any steps, directly or indirectly, to produce their effect now or hereafter, which steps are intended to take from us this property, and, in doing so, put us and the property both in danger? No man can answer to this for those that are to follow him. Each man must answer this question for himself. If the answer is yes, I care not a fig for his constitutional notion. I cannot feel that that person, whoever he may be, or whatever he may think of the purity of his own intentions, is a friend to me or mine, or to the southern people.

We of the South are notoriously assailed upon this subject, in church and out of church, (I mean no reflection on the church,) by societies and combinations of all descriptions in the Union, and of many foreign countries. Are we now to be assailed by this House? The votes which have been taken indicate decidedly that we are not—the friendly countenances I meet every day tell me it can hardly be. But if we are to be assailed by this House in legislative form, inevitable necessity has taken our course for us. Philosophers may dream, and fanatics may rave in their wild imaginations, but we know that our course is taken for us by dire necessity. We know that three millions of men are not to be managed by philosophic dreams, or the wild imagination of fanatics. Many are the schemes devised for our benefit by men and women, many of whom are as ignorant of the matter as they are officious in meddling with that which does not concern them. Some advise emancipation immediately, openly, violently; others propose to proceed more cautiously, carefully. The purposes being the same, (the emancipation of other men's property,) differing only in the means proposed to be used, the more temperate tells the more rash that he will defeat the object. So far, then, his rashness will benefit us. With such an object before him, the more guarded and circumspect he is, the more dangerous he is to us. There is only one point upon which all their schemes and plans ever agree—that we of the South sleep on a magazine of gunpowder. Some propose to set fire to this magazine openly, in broad day, and immediately; others say it would be best to burn it off gradually by a slow match, and hurt nobody. Sir, such speculations are amusing, as long as they are not attempted to be put into practice. This is the very scheme that was proposed and tried in St. Domingo. It was some time before the match caught the magazine of powder; but when it did take, it blew up the whole island at a blast. Instead of millions on millions of pounds of sugar and coffee, and numerous other articles of value, reared by the hand of care and industry for exportation, what have they now but the spontaneous growth of the island—mahogany and the like? Their population reduced to less than half—many of the full-blood negroes now to be found in herds, naked and wild as the beasts of the forest, flying from the sight of man, even of their own country and color! This is the fruit of this scheme of gradual emancipation. In that experiment, as soon as the white people began to perceive the effect of this gradual scheme, almost all who could, left the magazine—left the island. Those that remained were, with the help of certain societies in France, massacred in the most treacherous and brutal manner. Those who innocently think that this powder can be burnt off gradually, have my thanks for intending me no other mischief than to burn my powder without my leave. Yet they must excuse me; I cannot agree to the project in any way. I wish not to add to any excitement that may exist, or fan the flame of discord. Yet, two years since, nearly, when I first had the honor of a seat here, I expressed a wish to print one of these memorials. It contained two propositions—one that it was a shame and disgrace, as well as pain, to northern and eastern gentlemen, and foreigners, to come to this capital and find slaves and slaveholders here. Every word applied as thoroughly to Virginia, and the whole South, as to this place. The other proposition was this—that if abolition took place here, in the heart of Virginia and Maryland, it would compel or influence them to do the like. Here was a direct proposition to use means to emancipate our slaves in these States. I wished to print this, and let the South know what was proposed, and what feelings these people entertained towards us, and how many they might be, many or few, and who they were. It was thought to be a firebrand by my honorable colleague, [Mr. Wise,] and I abandoned the idea, as that seemed to be the opinion of the whole South. Yet I thought and said, and still think, that if a friend detect a man attempting to burn my house or do me serious injury, and arrest it, he has only half done his work. His next duty is to tell me, that I may be on my guard.

It is not, then, a new thought with me that the South ought to know and understand that there is danger abroad; and I am happy to find my honorable colleague agreeing with me now.

I have considered this emancipating notion for a long time, and think I understand the quarter from which it is pressed upon us. This thing is found in the South as well as the North, though not to the same extent—in Europe as well as in America. It is found mainly among the aristocracy—I mean the money, that is the only aristocracy in this country—and among the gossiping classes, rich idlers, and their dependants, who, not being obliged to work, are speculating upon that which will involve the life and property of thousands and millions of honest, industrious citizens. I know all rich people do not do this, but it surely comes from that quarter. I never knew an industrious man, whose habit and business was to make bread with his own hands for his wife and children; nor any industrious woman, (his wife,) whose duty and habit and pleasure it was to honor her husband, and feed and clothe his children, that ever pressed this thing much upon any one, or meddled a great deal with other people's business in any thing. This class have not time for such things. Do not understand me to assail the wealthy part of the community rudely. Far from it. As they have the means and leisure to acquire, so have they much intelligence and many accomplishments not to be found among the poorer classes. As they are freed from the temptation incident to want, so are they free, in a measure, from many of the vices to which those who are more pressed by want and necessity are more subject. I only speak of the fact, as I conceive it to be, without disparagement to either class.

I wish not to provoke the ire of those who are friendly to us, though not living in a slaveholding district. To go crusading against people about their abstract notions, could only be equalled, in absurdity, by the crusade of the fanatics against us for that which we cannot help, if we were ever so anxious. I know that fanaticism is abroad in the land; north and south, east and west, in Europe and America. With that it is useless, worse than idle, to attempt an argument. It is in vain to appeal to its bowels of compassion.

"Arouse the tiger in the Hercanian desert,
Strive with the half starv'd lion for his prey;
Lesser the risk, than to rouse
The slumbering fire of wild fanaticism."

It seems to palsy every valuable faculty of the mind and the soul. Look but at the crusaders; see how they went on like raving maniacs for more than two hundred years. Many of the most prudent and worthy men, whose every action was weighed in the balance before their course was taken; every effort for their family, their friends, and their country—many thousands of such men, suddenly influenced by the hermit Peter, or some such fanatic, abandoned all they had been toiling for all their days, or sold it to purchase an outfit for the expedition to the Holy Land. How many seas between, how many hostile lands, they never thought to inquire; how many armies they should have to subdue, they disdained to estimate. They pressed forward, regardless of the fields whitened with the bones of others cut off in the same mad career. Men of wisdom as well as men of folly were eagerly and equally engaged in this enterprise. Now, men of all kinds, wise or foolish, look back upon them and their mad career with utter astonishment, and stand amazed at their madness. The excitement upon the subject of negro slavery appears to me to be exactly similar, and nothing but God has power to arrest it.

To desire the prosperity and happiness of the whole human family, and endeavor to promote it, is genuine benevolence, which is the queen of all the virtues. Free from all fanaticism, many of the wisest and best are deeply concerned for the negro race. To such feelings and such notions my heart yields its most profound and warm devotion.

I cannot, however, participate in their hopes or their efforts. When I look back into the records of past ages, and am unable to find this race at any period, in all time, in any place, equal to their own protection against any other race of men, I cannot but feel that man's efforts to alter a destiny so abiding must prove unavailing. I mean the negro race. The Moor, the Carthaginian, the Egyptian, were all black, or nearly so, but not negroes. The negro has several marks that distinguish him from any other race. The most remarkable is his woolly hair. I do not mean to reproach him with this peculiarity, nor can I see any necessary connexion between this peculiarity, or any other that he has, and his inferiority. I mean merely to say that I can find no satisfactory proof that, in any time past, this race has been found equal to his own protection against any other race. While a son is an infant, under father or guardian, he can be provided for and taken care of; but when of full age, if he cannot take care of himself, he will hardly be taken care of: much more certainly is this the case with a nation or race that is not equal to its own care and protection. Who will take care of a nation that is not able to take care of itself? I cannot find any proof that this race has ever been in any other condition. What was their condition in the days of Solomon? "Negro slaves were, in those days, extraordinary marks of luxury, pomp, or show; and were sometimes exhibited as objects of curiosity. Josephus, speaking of the trade carried on by Solomon at Ophir, which he places in Africa, mentions that, besides gold and silver, he obtained thence much ivory, blacks, and monkeys; and these formed the greatest part of the African trade, even till late years. Solomon bought the negroes for the service of the temple, the high priests, and the seragios, whence some few found their way, as presents, to the courts and cities of foreign Powers. But in the subsequent ages, the decline of the kingdoms of the East extinguished the demand for such articles of luxury; the speculation of foreign commerce ceased; the avenues to distant objects became blocked up or forgotten; and the negro provinces of Africa, retaining only a very precarious communication with the Moors and Arabs, remained unnoticed and unknown, until the Portuguese adventurers again opened a route to their shores, two thousand four hundred and forty years afterwards." Such was their condition then—such it is now. The best protection they seem ever to have had, is the African climate, in which no abiding European settlement ever could be made, though tried in all ages; and Asiatics can with difficulty.

After the lapse of two thousand four hundred and forty years, what was their condition still? While other races have been rising into eminence and falling into barbarism, they remain the same—ay, sir, and are still the same. Efforts have been made for three hundred years to civilize them, and advance them on their own shores, but all in vain. Some of the old historians use expressions as if the Egyptians were negroes; but the proof is now ample that they were not negroes, but had negro captives among them. All the Egyptian mummies, with scarcely any exception, have straight hair and Asiatic faces—all the sculptures, statues, and paintings, show that they were not negroes. Sir, can you believe that the famous Queen of Sheba was a negress, and it not mentioned? Had she gone up, with her woolly hair, and lips higher than her nose, into all the splendor of Asiatic magnificence, would not such a novelty have been mentioned?

The only doubt that can be raised is in regard to the Ethiopians. Philosophy took its rise first in that country. It seems easily shown that it was a nation formed of people of different races. As I can find nothing certain to show that the philosophers of that day were not negroes, I cannot say they were not; yet, upon the weight of testimony, what probability is there that they were? None that I can see. They have never taken the lead since. Some individual might, but exceptions prove the rule; yet I have no recollection of ever having seen an individual instance of a first rate man in any thing (except perhaps music) of that race.

There are hordes and nations of them in that neighborhood (Ethiopia) exactly such as they were thousands of years ago.

There is a race spoken of in the Old Testament, of whom it is said—"Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." I have much confidence in the truth of the Old Testament, as well as the New. There are many things in each beyond my reach, upon the common rules of evidence, to know whether they be true or not, but there is nothing that I ever could find to be false. If in this the negro race is not alluded to, I do not know what race is alluded to. If I did not find a race of men, as I think, exactly agreeing with it, I might have passed over it, as a thing the application or truth of which I could not exactly see. From age to age they have fulfilled this saying. Shall we say it is wrong, and we will alter it? Or shall we say we do not believe it? And why not believe it? See the prophecies of the Jews. There are the prophecies, and here are the people; proving, by their condition, the truth of the prophecy. Their condition could not have been inferred from what had been the condition of that or any other people, before or since the prophecies. It may seem hard, and does seem hard, as far as we are able to look into it, and nothing but positive submission to overruling destiny in the eyes of the unbeliever, or submission to overruling Providence in the eyes of the believer, confiding in his wisdom and goodness as well as submission to Omnipotence, can reconcile the heart of a kind man to it. And, sir, should either rebel, what effect would rebellion have?

Some say the negro would be equal, with an equal chance. If so, he must prove it by his own actions. It cannot be proved by supposition or hypothesis. Why has the negro not had a chance? Why has he not caught the European, the Asiatic, the American, in his turn? Other races have been up and have been down; but they have been down always.

I know many wise and great men have hopes that the negro race may be yet brought up to an average with other races. I am obliged to feel respect for the opinions, or even the serious hopes, of men of great talents and virtue. Yet, having been raised in a slaveholding section, and being so well acquainted with their character there, and having taken some pains to inform myself of their previous condition, I cannot feel any serious hope of their ever being brought up to that condition by man's agency.

Judging from individual cases, a man might hope; but exceptions prove a rule, though they may exist. It is contrary to all logic to argue from particulars to generals; but I am not informed of one exception in which it appears that the negro has arisen to any thing like an equality in any one great pursuit of learning, or any thing else, compared to the first-rate in that same pursuit in other races. God forbid that I should disparage them. Oftentimes it happens that they are better and more intelligent than many who are lamenting over their ignorance and depravity. We have scripture authority to show that we are brothers; and the authorities I have quoted from, and alluded to, are not intended to upset the scripture, but to prove by other evidence the truth mentioned in the scriptures, that we are all from one stock. They prove it to my satisfaction; and I believe would have proved it if I had never heard of the scripture.

I do not rest our course to be pursued upon the truth or falsehood of my opinion on this matter; our course is marked by necessity. Whether negroes be equal or inferior—whether it was right or wrong in the origin to have brought them here—whether slavery in the abstract be right or wrong—they are here in such numbers, and so interwoven with our institutions, we cannot get clear of them without doing a great deal worse by them and ourselves, than by holding them. To get clear of them we should be obliged to exterminate them in self-defence. The only use I wish to make of this view of the matter is this: If the success be so doubtful and even hopeless of placing the race in a safe condition, and raising them upon a level with other nations, there is less propriety in pressing upon us, when evils are great and incalculable, and benefits just within the range of possibility. A question is asked, what is to be done? I know but one answer. Leave it to God. In the ripeness of time, and in his own way, he will do right about it. The spheres keep their place and the heavenly bodies move in their orbits without regard to any agency or resolutions of men. Surely, then, when subjects grow so large, and the consequences of interference so perilous, men can never be held responsible for leaving them in the hands of an overruling Providence, where at last, let man resolve what he will, they must remain.

Their weakness can never give us the right to abuse them. But necessity and legal right compel and entitle us to hold them. I have no idea that, under the circumstances, it is a crime to hold them, and shall not trouble you or myself with nice questions of what would be my opinion under other circumstances; yet I will say, sir, that I see nothing more monstrous in this thing, in any way, than in many other things elsewhere. I see nothing to induce me to believe that if the pious rage of the fanatics had carried them before Christ, when on earth, under the same circumstance, as some of their brethren and predecessors did, in regard to the woman who was taken in adultery—I say I can see nothing in it to prevent his giving the same answer. “Let him that is without fault cast the first stone.” If they will obey this rule, I am willing they may throw as many as they please. But they have not the shame or self-condemnation that the others had.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

“They’ve nought to do but mark still Their neighbor’s faults and folly.”

One thing is observable. Adultery is forbidden, and put with murder, and the list of blackest, deepest crime. Slavery is nowhere forbid, at least in terms, if at all. We are driven to long inferences, and that against fact. It existed all the while, and still not expressly forbidden, or by any reasonable implication. Yet, sir, do not understand me as branching out in defence of slavery, or against it in the abstract; I speak only as to our present condition; the most inconvenient feature of which is, that it lays us liable to fanatic and unauthorized interference from others. If we indulge the noble feeling of hospitality, the delight of the southern man, and take into our bosom the foreigner, seeking fortune or seeking pleasure, we put it into his power to touch us in this tender place. Pity enough is it that human depravity and human ingratitude should be found great enough to abuse it; and still greater would be the pity, if, entering into the closest alliance of friendship and interest with others, they should be found willing to touch us on this tender chord. I will pass from this gloomy view of the subject; it is an old story and an old truth, that the heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.

It might seem that Providence intended something for the benefit of the negro race, in suffering a portion of them to be brought among civilized men, where they could be governed and protected under and by their laws, until they were prepared to receive his further blessing. If this be his design, I have no idea that man can defeat it. To carry them back to Africa would seem well calculated to stay all advance in their career. But the idea of carrying all the negroes back to Africa was never entertained seriously, I imagine, by any one. There are about three millions. To carry them and find a home for them in a distant country is an easy job for fanaticism; but all time is unable to show any thing like it. We are talking of war with France, and France talking of war with us. Think of the cost of the few regiments that either would think of sending across the Atlantic. The fanatics think, and think rightly, that the cost would be worthy the consideration of both nations. This is not the point upon which their brains are diseased. But to send three millions across the Atlantic, and find a home for them, and defend them until they are able to defend themselves, is a light matter in the estimation of fanaticism. Viewing, on the whole, this project as utterly impracticable, as well as unconstitutional, I am opposed to any interference of any kind calculated to irritate. We are told that slavery among us is a sore evil. Sir, if a man be afflicted with a cancer on a vital part, what would he think of a surgeon who would propose to cut it out? What would you think of a surgeon who would insist upon amputation, when you knew the consequences would be death? What would you think of the charity or kindness of him who would persevere in chafing and irritating an incurable wound? To let us alone to our destiny is the kindest favor that can be bestowed upon us.

I will now proceed to answer some of the charges that have been made against the South, as a pretext for interference with our matters. Sir, they draw their conclusions from premises not one of which is true in point of fact.

It is not true that the Africans in their native country are made worse. They were, very many of them, cannibals, when the slave trade commenced. Instead of catching, killing, and eating, their enemies, they now catch and sell; careful not to kill.

It is not true that the slaves are worse off here than in their country. Lander’s Travels show that four fifths of them are slaves. As Mr. Randolph said, “It is the happiest occurrence that ever could have befallen them. They are taken from a country where they are little better than baboons, and transplanted into one where they are made intelligent beings and Christians. As to the whites,” said he, “it is another matter.” They are freer, happier, and more intelligent, and more pious, than they were in their own country.

It is not true that the whites are worse than the white men in other countries. Any judgment formed here would be charged with partiality. Go to any country abroad, and see if a southern man stands questioned by his locality. Who stands higher than a southern gentleman, for honor, truth, justice, piety, or virtue, in any sense? Has he the name of a hard-hearted, hard-handed tyrant? Sir, his character is known in the world. And does it suffer by comparison with that of gentlemen of any non-slaveholding State? Who, for pure, feminine modesty, and unsuspected chastity, as well as every other quality that can recommend her to the love and admiration of stranger or acquaintance, stands better in the eyes of the world than the southern female? Is it supposed that she will suffer by comparison with females in any non-slaveholding State?

It is not true that the southern people are less safe, in any sense, unless from the meddling of others. Where is the country that has had less violence in its bosom, within two hundred years, than the South? The affair at Southampton is the only one of any size. How much fanaticism had to do with that may be doubtful. What has been the case with non-slaveholding States? Have they had no mobs, no riots, in that time? Have the United States troops never been obliged to lend their aid? There is no country where there is less personal violence, fewer robberies, especially by the negroes. Personal security is as great as anywhere in the world. Often a lady, with thousands of dollars in her custody, with no other white protection than her beautiful daughters or grand-daughters, some miles from any other white person’s dwelling, surrounded by fifty or one hundred and fifty slaves, her only protection; all who know any thing about it, know what would be the peril at which an attempt would be made upon her. There rest treasure and beauty secure together. Think you they would be more secure, thus guarded by hirelings, in a non-slaveholding country?

It is not true that the free negro here is better than the slave. Judge him by the communion table, the jail, the whipping-post, or the gallows; and they will give it in favor of the slave. Put them to any test, it will turn out the same.

It is not true that slaves are as dishonest as is said and supposed by those not acquainted. Captain Smith, who first made a permanent settlement in Virginia, says, “as in all countries, where there are many people, there are some thieves; so in all seas, much frequented, there are some pirates.” There is stealing, then, by land and by sea. The jails and gibbets prove this all over the world. But I will state a fact by which comparison may be drawn with other places. Having practised law in the country, in the courts of the interior, the nature of that profession has, for twenty years and more, carried me into houses, public and private, from the residence of the most affluent to the most humble dwelling of the poor. I carried saddlebags without a lock, and never lost the value of a cravat in my life from them. In all that country negroes are the domestic servants, and, in almost all instances, such things are committed to their care. There are many places where there are no slaves, at which, if your hat, or cloak, or trunk, get out of sight, or is not delivered to some one who has given bond and security to return it to you again, or place it where you direct him, you will never see it again; and then, unless you have the number or description of the porter, it is infallibly gone. I do not mean to say slaves do not steal; they do steal, but not more than people do in many places where there are no slaves.

It is not true that they are worse provided for than laborers in other places. The increase in that population will prove this, without any thing more. In many places where there are no slaves, the increase in population is nothing, being limited by the means of subsistence. I sat, sir, and my heart bled for the sufferings of the poor in New York, as painted with such feeling and eloquence, by a gentleman from that State, [Mr. Ferris,] at the last session. I wondered that, while so much sympathy was felt for our slaves, there were no bowels of compassion left for these poor sufferers—groups of them, in that extreme cold weather last winter, hovering for days and nights over smoking saw-dust. This, too, because a protecting duty was laid on foreign coal, that the rich collier might realize a few cents more to the bushel, to add to his thousands, perhaps millions; and this appeal was made to induce us to take off that duty. I have never seen slaves in any situation comparable in suffering to this.

It is not true that the whole of life between master and slave, is that of tyranny on the one hand, and hatred on the other. I have never seen stronger or more lasting friendships than are found between the children raised up in the same family. I have never seen more bitter tears shed than I have seen dropped by the domestic slave over a deceased master or mistress, or other member of the family. Often have I known the mistress to rise at midnight, and travel through the most inclement weather to the sick bed of her servant and friend—yes, sir, friend—and watch over her, and sympathize with her in all her affliction, until the rising sun. I have seen this done often by the slave, though wearied by toil—willingly, voluntarily. I have seen him go to the sick or otherwise afflicted master or mistress, and nurse and watch all night. This is no rare or uncommon thing. Why, then, should it be said of us that the relationship between master and slave destroys all the finer feelings of the heart. Happy is that man in his friendships who has as many friends, who will risk their lives for him, as a large slaveholder generally has slaves who will peril their lives for him. This is said to be induced by interest only. It is not. But grant it. Neither interest nor any other motive can induce many to do so to the suffering poor. It is not true that the relationship will produce the effect to destroy noble feeling. Where do we get our ideas of honor and chivalry but from the days of chivalry; and who were in more positive bondage than was the page or the squire to his superior?

It is not true that slaves are more idle, or their labor less profitable. The exports from this country will show this. Three articles of export, the proceeds of slave labor exclusively, cotton, tobacco, and rice, amounted, a few years since, to sixty millions out of eighty millions of dollars, the whole export; and that exclusive of what is used in this country. There cannot be more than two millions of thirteen (the whole population) employed in it.

I have denied some charges against the South, merely because they have been so often repeated that, if not contradicted, they might be taken for admitted. But I deny all right in any to challenge, question, or meddle with us in our affairs, in that which does not concern them.

Neither do I mean to be construed as an advocate for negro slavery, or any other kind of slavery, in the abstract; only such as we have and cannot get clear of. As to the negroes, I should be willing to get rid of them in any way that is consistent with humanity and the rights of the owners. I am not willing to violate private right, public right, or common sense and justice, about it; neither am I willing to see them sacrificed for my whim or benefit. Self-defence might, and will, if there be much more interference, instigate them to acts that will compel us to sacrifice them.

One word more before I resume my seat. I have much confidence in the good feeling of this House towards us in this thing; much more than I had before it was openly agitated here. Yet, let me appeal to gentlemen by every tender endearment of peaceful life and security, under the freest and happiest Government on earth, not to suffer this thing to be pushed on us by legislative action or encouragement. When once we are sure that you deliberately design to push this on us, we are friends, we are brothers no longer. Let none flatter themselves, that when the elements of civil war and discord are matured for action in this nation, they will be secure in some safe and peaceful retreat, far removed from slavery and its consequences. When once these elements are put in motion, (at whatever end of the continent,) their desolating flame will rage from one end of the confederacy to the other, until we die the death of all former republics, and are buried in their family vault, within the arms of despotism. This has been the fate of all, and will, I fear, be ours.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20. SMITHSON LEGACY.

Mr. CHAPIN moved to consider the motion, which he submitted yesterday, for printing 5,000 copies of the report, submitted yesterday by Mr. ADAMS, from a select committee, together with the President's message, correspondence, and will, relating to the bequest of James Smithson, late of London, deceased.

Objection being made,

Mr. MANN, of New York, said the report was in reference to a subject of considerable interest, not only to the House, but to the country generally. As the report was in the hands of the printer, it was proper that, if an extra number of copies was ordered, it should be done at this time. He moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of entertaining the motion to print; which was agreed to: Ayes 107, noes 46.

Mr. HOWARD desired to know from some member of the committee the purport of the report, and what disposition was proposed to be made of the bequest. He was entirely ignorant on the subject.

Mr. CHAPIN, of New York, said he would, as a member of the committee to which the subject of the Smithson bequest had been referred, answer the inquiry of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD.] It was not proposed, either by the report or bill which the honorable chairman of the select committee [Mr. ADAMS] had submitted, to indicate the plan or organization of the institution to be founded. At present, it would be entirely premature to do so; because the first step was to obtain the funds, leaving the application of them to future legislation. The bill provides that the President of the United States shall appoint an agent to prosecute the claim in the court of chancery in England, where the funds are locked up, in behalf of the United States, and, on the receipt of them, to give the proper discharge or acquittance for the same.

Sir, the bequest of James Smithson, amounting to nearly half a million of dollars, is among the most liberal benefactions upon record. Coming, too, as it does, from a citizen of Great Britain, who is not known to have visited the United States, or to have had any friends residing here, it may be regarded as a distinguished tribute of respect paid by a foreigner and stranger to the free institutions of our country. It is due to the memory and character of the donor, that suitable publicity should be given to this noble and generous act of public munificence; it is due, also, as the acknowledgment of the grateful sense of Congress, in behalf of the people of the United States, for whose benefit the bequest was made; and it is in an especial manner necessary, in order to call the attention of men distinguished for learning and talents in all parts of the Union to the subject, for the purpose of obtaining an expression of their views and opinions in regard to the plan and organization of the institution proposed to be established. This splendid benefaction confers immortality upon the individual by whom it was bestowed, and does honor to the age in which we live.

Mr. C. concluded by expressing the hope that the motion to print would be adopted by the House without a dissenting voice.

Mr. PARKER said the House had not entirely got out of a debate which had arisen upon a bill which was intended to provide for their own pay, in reference to the alleged excessive expenditures of the contingent fund of the House, for the item of printing. A great deal of complaint was made on the occasion alluded to, because of the number of the President's messages ordered to be printed by the House. He was so case-hardened, that he would, upon a like occasion, do the same thing again. He was, however, not prepared to vote for the proposition before the House. The report was doubtless an able one, but he could see no reason why five times the number which were necessary for the information of the House should be printed. It would be recollected that a report had been made in the Senate on this subject, which had been published in all the newspapers he had seen. They would not be called upon to make any disposition of these funds, because they had not yet received them; and if they ever did, it would perhaps be fifteen or twenty years first. Upon the whole, he did not consider it at all important that an extra number of this report should be published.

The motion to print 5,000 extra copies of the report was then agreed to.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, and modified by the adoption of an amendment offered by Mr. GLASCOCK.

The question being on the motion of Mr. WISE to insert a substitute for the resolution—

Mr. WISE (by consent of Mr. BOULDIN, who had the floor) modified his motion so as to move an additional resolution to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GLASCOCK remarked that he had no objection to this motion.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked whether this subject would occupy the day, or be limited to the hour assigned for resolutions.

Mr. BOULDIN did not yield the floor for the purpose of this inquiry, and said he might as well finish what he had to say on this subject at the present time. He resumed, and concluded the remarks which he commenced yesterday. [Mr. B's speech is given entire in yesterday's debate.]

Mr. PICKENS took the floor.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the orders of the day.

Mr. PICKENS suggested that the motion was not in order, as this subject had been made the order of the day.

The CHAIR stated that the motion would not be in order till one o'clock, and he would not decide the question of order in advance.

Mr. PICKENS commenced a speech on the subject of the resolutions, and continued till one o'clock.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

After some conversation between Mr. PICKENS and the CHAIR, the CHAIR decided that the motion was in order.

Mr. HAMMOND asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; and they were ordered.

The question being taken, there appeared yeas 105, nays 105, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Banks, Barton, Bean, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Cambreleng, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, Childs, Clark, Coles, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Denny, Dickerson, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, Gillet, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hannegan, Hard, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawes, Hazeltine, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, Janes, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Logan, Loyall, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKeon, McKim, Miller, Milligan, Moore, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Dutee J. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Towns, Turner, Underwood, Weeks, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—105.

The CHAIR voted in the affirmative.

So the House determined to proceed to the orders of the day.

The engrossed bill, to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia to the 1st day of October, 1836, was read a third time, and passed.

H. of R.]

Partial Appropriation Bill—Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[JAN. 21, 1836.]

PARTIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1836, was taken up.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to postpone this bill; and said that, in moving the orders of the day, it was his object to call up the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in New York. It was necessary to act on this bill, in order to remove the embargo now laid on the commerce of the city of New York, in consequence of its delay.

Mr. WISE remarked that he should oppose the motion to take up that bill.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS asked when the general appropriation bill would be reported.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it would be reported on Tuesday morning next. It had been delayed by the illness of one of the principal clerks of one of the Departments.

The motion to postpone the bill was agreed to.

After some conversation, in which Mr. HARDIN, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and Mr. WHITTLESEY, took part,

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, all other bills lying on the table were postponed, in order to take up the bill for the RELIEF OF SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

The House having then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in the city of New York—

Mr. EVERETT spoke briefly on the subject of the bill, and indicated several amendments which he should offer if in order. One of these amendments provides that the collectors shall take new bonds in every case; and another that the debtors shall pay interest on the bonds for the time for which the payment was deferred.

Mr. DENNY said his chief objection to the bill arose from its conflicting with that clause of the constitution which provided that there should be no preference given to one port over another. The second section of the bill did go to alter, to a certain extent, the present revenue regulations. The first section of the bill provided for the relief of individuals who had suffered by the fire; but the second section was too general; for it extended to all the importations in the port of New York prior to the late fire, and to that extent gave preference to New York over every port in the country. It was partial legislation, in direct violation of that clause of the constitution. It also conflicted, he thought, with the act of 1832, commonly called the compromise bill. These were his objections to the bill. He would have been glad if the bill had been more specific, had classified the sufferers, and discriminated between those who were the citizens and the foreign agents.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said the bill was already so encumbered with the amendments, that he should not offer then what he intended to at a future period of its consideration. The bill was too partial in its operations, and left altogether unprovided for those who had most claim upon the community and upon Congress. There was but one portion of that community who ought to be relieved. It was those who had imported goods, had them in packages, and lost them by the fire. Mr. P. said, at the proper time, he should move a third section to the bill, providing that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to all other persons who have suffered loss of property by the late conflagration in the city of New York, not provided for in either of the sections of the bill, fifteen per cent. on such loss.

Mr. P. urged another objection to the bill; which was that of giving up the power of Congress over this matter to the collector of New York. No man esteemed that gentleman more highly than he did, but he never would consent to give up such control to any man, as was proposed in this bill. Another feature of the bill was objectionable. It provided that no sufferer could receive any benefit from it, whose loss did not amount to the sum of $1,000. He also referred to various analogous acts of relief, and argued at length against the provisions of the present bill.

Let those, he said, who have suffered, bring their claims individually before Congress, and let them be investigated; but this bill was in violation of all existing precedents, and conflicted with the principle on which alone relief should be afforded. It provided for the most wealthy, and omitted the most needy. The bill was not what it purported to be. It was not "a bill for the relief of the sufferers of New York," but a bill extending accommodation to the mercantile interest of New York.

Mr. PHILLIPS rose and stated that he desired to address the House on the bill; but that, as the hour was late, he would move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion, the House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the question of order upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair in reference to a petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, presented heretofore by Mr. ADAMS, upon which Mr. GLASCOCK had raised the question of reception.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said the House had from time to time manifested a disposition to postpone this subject. He could see no propriety in disposing of it now, inasmuch as a question of more importance was before the House and undecided, which was connected with the same subject. Congress had been seven weeks in session, and but two bills had passed the House: one of which was in relation to the accounts of the American consul at London, and the other in regard to the hostilities of the Indians in Florida. There existed manifest necessity for action upon various measures of importance, and he therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject before the House until Saturday week.

Mr. ADAMS said he was desirous of having the question taken on the appeal from the decision of the Chair, because, so long as that decision stood, there was no possibility of the people having a chance of presenting their petitions to the House. On the last petition day it was with difficulty that a discussion, which would have occupied the House the whole day, was avoided, and the people precluded from having their petitions received. If the question was decided that a motion not to receive a petition was not subject to the 45th rule, he would pledge himself to offer an amendment to the rules, because it would be in the power of any one member to get up and move that a petition be not received, and then, according to the decision of the Speaker, the whole day might be consumed in discussing that petition. He hoped the House would decide the question at once. If the House decide that the decision of the Speaker was wrong, it would be equivalent to an amendment of the rules. Gentlemen were mistaken if they thought that by putting this question off from week to week they would get rid of it. He believed if the Speaker would reconsider his decision he would reverse it; but if he would not, he (Mr. A.) would ask the House to decide whether the people should have the right to have their petitions received or not.

[H. OF R.]

The motion to postpone was then agreed to: Ayes 94, noes 59.

After transacting some other business,

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. JARVIS, of Maine:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And be it further resolved, that in case any petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

To which Mr. WISS submitted the following amendment:

"Resolved," and insert, That there is no power of legislation granted by the constitution to the Congress of the United States, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and that any attempt by Congress to legislate upon the subject of slavery will be not only unauthorized, but dangerous to the union of the States.

Mr. JARVIS subsequently modified the original resolution as follows:

Whereas any attempt in this House to agitate the question of slavery is calculated to disturb the compromises of the constitution, to endanger the Union, and, if persisted in, to destroy the peace and prosperity of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress. And it is further resolved, that in case any petition praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia be hereafter presented, it is the deliberate opinion of the House that the same ought to be laid upon the table, without being referred or printed.

The question before the House being Mr. WISS's amendment, which he subsequently moved as an additional resolution to Mr. JARVIS's—

Mr. PICKENS rose and observed that he regretted exceedingly the necessity that induced him to say any thing on the interesting and deeply exciting topics before the House. Sir, when I had occasion, some weeks since, to make a few remarks on this subject, I, as well as the party I have the honor to be associated with, were then denounced as attempting to raise a discussion and excitement for party purposes. It was said that, like the Hartford convention men and abolitionists, we were put down and sunk in the country, and that we desired some sectional excitement to raise us from our weak position, &c. I would disdain to notice this, if the charge had originated from, and been confined to, a miserable whipster editor, who has been hired to hunt down all that is virtuous and intellectual in the country, who has fed upon calumny and fattens upon slander, and upon whose countenance envy and malignity hold their cadaverous union; I would loathe to touch this pitiful thing, that lives by licking the spittle of men, if it were not that it is understood to represent the executive branch of this Government, and is the organ of the dominant party that now rules the destinies of this republic. This being the fact, I call upon every honest and virtuous man to brand it with the indignation that its falsehood and infamy deserve. Let no man suppose that, because I belong to a comparatively small party, persecuted and misrepresented, my voice is ever to be silenced upon this floor, when the honor or the interests of those I stand here to represent may be involved, directly or indirectly. No earthly consideration shall deter me from uttering the sentiments of my heart on this subject. Let no man make it a question for partisan warfare or for party triumph. It rises above all parties, and is identified with the dearest and paramount interests of every southern State in this confederacy.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen enough to convince me that there is an unsound state of feeling here and elsewhere, totally at war with our rights and our institutions. I have not read passing events for the last year, to be now deceived at what I see. I agree with gentlemen, when they say the abolition societies and their open partisans are at present, compared with other great parties, small, so far as numbers are concerned. But, to ascertain their real strength, we must examine the peculiar division of parties that exists in the non-slaveholding States. Take, for instance, New York, and we find there the anti-masonic party, the whig party, and the party I believe called the "regency party." From the division of these parties, the abolitionists become important and powerful, as holding the balance of power; hence it is that all other parties, desiring their strength, acquiesce, to a certain extent, in their measures and movements. There is a high game playing for political power, and those who would seem to be weak from numbers become strong from position. Their strength consists in fanaticism—in painting scenes of imaginary evil—in appealing to the passions of the heart, and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] says, to their religion. And when was fanaticism arrested? Look at its history all over the world. In its first commencement, it is seen like a speck in the distant horizon; but mark it as it rises—it spreads and widens, and grows blacker and blacker, until it sweeps with the fury of the rushing tornado, desolating the earth; and the good and the wise stand as if stricken with dumbness, while the bold and the strong quake and tremble like unweaned infants under the trumpet's blast.

In its first struggles it is despised for its weakness, but at length, "crescit eundo," until it walks erect in its giant strength and power, and, with the muscular action of a madman, tramples into the dust and earth those who at first felt pity for its delusion, and contempt for its impotence. The only way to contend with it is to meet it and strangle it in its infancy.

What has been the history of the last summer? We have seen the whole country excited and agitated to the highest degree. There has not been a State, nor county, nor town, from one end of this Union to the other, that has not been tremblingly alive to the "general welfare." Societies upon societies have been formed, thousands upon thousands have been raised, for the avowed object of producing a change, a deep and vital change, in the domestic institutions of the southern States. There is scarcely a common newspaper, a magazine, or review, that comes from the North, but what brings something of prejudice and denunciation against us. There is not a school book, not a common geography, which does not contain something, by innuendo or insinuation, calculated to train up our children to believe that the inheritance of their fathers is full of evil and iniquity. The prejudices, opinions, and moral power of the whole non-slaveholding States are directly and openly against us on the subject of domestic servitude. And well may the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] declare that every member's speech on this subject, from north of Mason and Dixon's line, would be an incendiary pamphlet, and if they pursued a certain course here, they would be swept from their seats.

Sir, under these circumstances, is it astonishing that we should be excited here? But it is not in our own country only that we have to encounter prejudice. England has emancipated her West India islands. France is also moving in the same direction—her press, too, is calling up the prejudices of the nation against this institution. And in England there is no Review, from the polished and talented Edinburgh, down to the Jeremy Bentham levelling Westminster, that does not open its battery and denunciations upon us. Even, too, that prince of modern demagogues, Mr. O'Connell, in the plenitude of his arrogance and vanity, must think fit to strike the vilest and basest notes, to call up the passions and prejudices of the ignoble and low against institutions the true nature of which his ignorance forbade him to understand, and against a gallant people, whose virtues his natural vulgarity could never appreciate. He talk about equal rights and public truth, when he lives upon a splendid income raised by "grinding the face of the poor," by drawing the last farthing from a starving and devoted people! And here I regret, deeply regret, that a gentleman on this side of the Atlantic, distinguished for his learning and elegant diction, has recently thought proper to echo back these notes, and play a second part to this Irish demagogue, by publishing sentiments and a tissue of visionary declamation, calculated to have no other effect than to excite feelings, sympathies, and prejudices, at war with the harmony of the Union and the forbearing principles of the constitution, which he, as well as every other good citizen, has tacitly sworn to support. I allude to Dr. Channing, and I allude to him with pain and regret. Instead of standing on his palmy eminence, with the benevolence and charity of an enlightened Christian, to pour out "oil upon the troubled waters," we find him inculcating sentiments and spreading doctrines calculated to alienate the affection and sympathies of the people of this Union from different sections.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot mistake all these things. The truth is, the moral power of the world is against us. It is idle to disguise it. We must, sooner or later, meet the great issue that is to be made upon this subject. Deeply connected with this, is the movement to be made in the District of Columbia. If the power be asserted in Congress to interfere here, or any approach be made towards that end, it will give a shock to our institutions and the country, the consequences of which no man can foretell. Sir, as well might you grapple your iron grasp into the very heart and vitals of South Carolina, as to touch this subject here. Georgia has perceived this, and felt its full force. She, under these views, has recently passed a resolution declaring it unconstitutional for Congress to touch this matter here, and met the whole subject as became her and her interests. Under these circumstances, I was astonished to hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOLSER] intimate that he was willing, for the present, to give this resolution the go-by. [Here Mr. HOLSER explained that he was willing to meet the question when it came up at the proper time, in a distinct and independent resolution, &c.] Mr. P. then proceeded, and said that he would not press these circumstances at present.

Virginia has but the other day passed a resolution to the same purport. She, alive to the deep stake she has in the question, has approached near to unanimity on it. The resolution, denying to Congress any constitutional power over the subject in this District, was passed by a vote of one hundred and fifteen to nine, in her House of Delegates. There, there is one subject at least upon which all parties can unite. I was deeply gratified to see that noble State speaking as became her ancient character. That proud State, justly proud, from having enrolled on the scroll of fame her hundred patriots, has felt her vital interests and honor concerned, and moved with a unanimity and spirit that became the land of Richard Henry Lee, George Mason, and Patrick Henry. I trust no son of hers here will fall below the position she has chosen to occupy. Before she can waver or falter on this subject, directly or indirectly, you must first break up the foundations of all her institutions; you must make a new race of people in her bosom, who must forget the glory of the past, whose hearts must beat with impulses and emotions of a new and degenerate nature, whose mothers must quicken with a new and unnatural offspring.

Sir, I deprecate all party ties and party feelings in this matter. It is too solemn a subject for this. If there be any man here who has any misgivings or trembling as to the future on this subject, let me say to him, this is no place for him. If there be any representative here, from any part or portion of the slaveholding race, whose heart is so bowed down in subserviency and servility to party discipline and party organization as to be drawn off on this question for the vile purpose of partisan ascendancy and political triumph in the miserable conflicts of the day, let me say to him, this is no place for him, unless he is prepared to cover himself with prostitution. If there be any gentleman here, from the same region, whose aspirations are to please the dominant interests of this confederacy by sycophancy and flattery, for the purpose of clothing himself in the livery and trappings of office, this is no place for him, unless he is prepared to abandon the inheritance of his fathers, and cover his children with degradation and ruin.

It is of no avail to close our eyes to passing events around us, in this country and in Europe. Every thing proclaims that, sooner or later, we shall have to meet the strong and the powerful, and contend over the tombs of our fathers for our consecrated hearth-stones and household gods, or abandon our country to become a black colony, and seek for ourselves a refuge in the wilderness of the West. It is in vain to avoid the contest.

Mr. Speaker, as to the constitutional power of this Government to touch the subject in any shape or form, within the States of this Union, I disdain to argue that point. If the dominant interests of this nation should ever become so bold and reckless as to touch the matter, or exercise such a power, directly or indirectly, then, if we hold our seats on this floor, we shall become the slaves of slaves, and deserve our infamous destiny. If ever we should be forced to hold up the noble but mutilated parchment of the constitution as a shield between us and the Goths and the Vandals who may have come in to desecrate and desolate all that is venerable and fair in the institutions of our country, then indeed shall we have lived to see the day when conflagration shall sweep through the land and scath its living monuments—when the scattered fragments of a broken and dismembered empire shall exist here and there, only to mark where the republic once was.

While I can never consent to discuss the constitutional power of this Government as relates to the States, yet it becomes us to examine the powers under the constitution given in this District.

Mr. Speaker, before we proceed on this point, it would be well for us to call to our minds the circumstances and causes that induced the acts of cession granting jurisdiction in this District. When Congress was in session at Philadelphia, a mob created great disturbance, and they found themselves unable, for want of authority, to protect themselves and their officers. Hence it became important that they should have some territory with exclusive jurisdiction over it. The object and sole desire of Congress was to be able to protect itself, its officers, its public buildings, and make such other municipal regulations as might be deemed necessary for the harmony, quiet, and independence of the Government. When we look at these circumstances, and then compare the clause in the constitution conferring legislative power, we can come to but one conclusion as to the great leading objects of the trust. The words are, that Congress "shall exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the States in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings."

"Exclusive legislation" here cannot mean absolute and unlimited legislation. This Government cannot legally exist in any position without all the restraints of the constitution binding upon it. It is created by the constitution, and cannot act in any sphere except under its specific grants; and to contend that it has all the powers here that the States can exercise within their territories, is a solecism in constitutional law; for the States can exercise all the powers not prohibited by the principles and spirit of their own constitutions, or the constitution of the United States, while this Government can exercise no power not specifically granted by the constitution, or absolutely necessary to carry into effect some specific grant. Exclusive legislation means that no other Government shall have concurrent legislation. Congress shall exercise "like authority" over all places purchased for forts, arsenals, &c. The legislation and authority exercised in this District, in like manner, shall be exercised over places purchased for forts, &c. If, then, Congress is unlimited here, then it is unlimited in those other places where public works are; and if slavery can be abolished here, then, in like manner, can it be abolished in all those places in the heart of a State where there may be public works, &c. All the power intended to be given was to enable this Government to protect and preserve its public works and improvements, and "like authority" was intended to be given in this District—authority that might be essential to carry out the legitimate objects of the original trust, and no more. Any exercise of power beyond the obvious meaning and plain intentions of the grant of power at the time it was given, is a violation of its spirit and perversion of its purposes.

Again: The ninth section expressly excludes Congress from prohibiting the importation of slaves until 1808. If the clause giving "exclusive legislation" embraces the power to abolish slavery, then it was created without limitation at the date of the instrument. But if Congress had, before 1808, attempted to prohibit the importation of slaves, here or elsewhere, it would have been directly against the letter of the constitution. There has been no new acquirement of power since the date of that instrument, nor enlargement of the provisions of the clause granting "exclusive legislation." We cannot do that indirectly which we cannot do directly; and if Congress had abolished slavery here prior to 1808, it would have been the most effectual measure to prohibit their importation; and this they were clearly and expressly prohibited from doing. I do not refer to this so much as being perfectly conclusive as to show that it was the whole spirit and intention of the constitution that this Government should have no power to disturb this delicate and exciting subject. We all know the extreme jealousy that existed amongst the States on this matter at the formation of the constitution—so much so, that it was one of the principal difficulties in forming a "more perfect union."

Is it to be supposed that Virginia, sensitive and jealous as she was at that time on the subject of slavery, would have ceded a portion of her territory and citizens, if she had, for one moment, conceived that, under the clause in the constitution conferring legislative powers, they were to be thrown at the mercy of other interests, and other sections, antagonist to herself on this vital point?

The fifth amendment declares that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." Much less can it be taken for private use. It cannot be taken except for public use. It becomes, then, important to ascertain whether slaves are private property. And here let it be observed that there is a loose idea abroad, that we hold our rights to that species of property under the compromises of the constitution. We hold them as original rights, before and above the constitution, coming from the States in their separate existence. The compromises of the constitution relate entirely to the relative representation that the States, as political communities, shall have upon this floor; but this is not the source of rights to us in this or any other private property. The constitution recognises them as private property: the second section, apportioning our representation, the clause enabling the owner to recover his fugitive slave, and the clause sanctioning their importation until 1808, all show that the constitution recognises them as property, as things other than persons. The judicial tribunals of the non-slaveholding as well as the slaveholding States have all settled this principle. Then they cannot be taken except for public use. What is public use? If they were wanted on our public works, if they were needed in a great emergency, then might they be taken on just compensation. But if there be any one thing clearer than another, it is, that abolition was not the public use contemplated in the constitution. They cannot be taken without just compensation, even for public use. How can money be drawn from the public Treasury, except through appropriation by law? There can be no legal appropriation, except to carry into effect some specific power granted in the constitution, or clearly implied as absolutely necessary to carry into effect some specific grant. There is no specific power to abolish slavery, and it, being itself a high exercise of substantive power, cannot be implied as absolutely necessary to carry into effect any other power. As well might we pass appropriations to pay the people of this District for their cattle and horses, to give them the blessed privilege of running free and unrestrained over the barren hills and waste commons around this Capitol. As to principle and power, it is the same.

But it is said, all the States may emancipate, and this District be left without the means of changing its condition. This is certainly any thing but a constitutional argument; for I answer, that even if this were to be the case, it is the constitution, and will be so until it is changed by the proper authorities. There is really no difficulty on this point, as those who choose can now emancipate by deed or will. In connexion with the constitution, let us for a moment examine the act of cession from Virginia. The proviso declares "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States." Let it be understood that this follows immediately after the clause describing the tract of country and particular extent of territory ceded. I admit the terms are somewhat equivocal at first. If the words, "the rights of individuals therein," refer only back to control the property in the soil, then they were of no use; for, under the constitution alone, Congress could not have interfered in the freehold. One of the first principles of the magna charta is, that no freeman shall be despoiled of his freehold without a judgment of his peers. If those words were meant only to limit the power of the Government over the freehold of a citizen, then they were useless verbiage. Those who inserted them must have meant something more. When we look at the sensitiveness of Virginia on the interesting and vital subject of the peculiar property of her citizens she was about to cede, we are led to believe that she must have meant, in the words "rights of individuals therein," other rights than those of "soil." Connec-this with the clauses in the constitution, and no man can refrain from admitting that it is, to say the least of it, a doubtful power, which every patriot in a limited Government would refrain from claiming as under the constitution.

But, Mr. Speaker, I take higher ground than this, and contend that, according to the bill of rights of Maryland, and the constitution of Virginia, those States themselves could not have ceded absolute and unrestrained power over private property of any kind in this District. The citizens of this District had peculiar rights secured in their property by the constitutions of their own States; and if Virginia and Maryland had attempted to cede absolute power over this subject, they would have violated the rights of their own citizens, and would have committed, not a legal act, but an act of force. Next to life and liberty, these citizens had, under the paramount laws of the two adjoining States, the rights of property secured in the most solemn and unqualified manner; and as well might Virginia now divorce from herself any portion of her freemen, and transfer them, bound hand and foot, to the jurisdiction of New York, as to have thrown the citizens of this District, in their rights to a peculiar property, upon the unrestrained and tender mercy of this Government.

Again: No State, from the Potomac to the Mississippi, under its constitution as it now stands, has any right to abolish slavery without the consent of the individual owners. I assert this upon that great principle of English liberty which is incorporated into every constitution, that no freeman shall be deprived of his property but by the judgment of his peers or the laws of the land. The constitutions are the paramount laws of the land, which the action of no Government, constituted under them, can legally subvert. States may do unlawful acts, which their citizens may assent to or acquiesce in, but this does not constitute legal authority. Those States that hold slaves as property might, if they desired, assemble in their conventions, representing the sovereign power of the community, for the specific object of abolishing that property, and the people might choose their delegates for that alone. But this would be a reorganization of the body politic, above the constitution. And even in convention they would do it under the unwritten and organic law that governs all simple consolidated communities, and which exists from the necessity of the case, that the majority must govern. This exists only in a consolidated community, when it is thrown into its simple and original elements. And even then the minority acquiesces more from a calculation of expediency than obligation.

Sir, if this view be true of the great principles that regulate even the power of the States on this subject, how futile and shallow is that argument which claims for this Government all the legislative powers here that the States have within their territories. But it is stronger than this. The Government of the United States can acquire no legal power, even by consent of citizens. It has no existence beyond the express grants of the constitution, and no power can be acquired for it by the action or acquiescence of the people, as people or citizens: this must be given by the States that made it, and who alone can alter it.

There is a wide mistake and loose notion on the subject of the power of Government over private property. Gentlemen draw their ideas on this subject from the history of European Governments and the jurisprudence of Great Britain. If there be any one principle that has distinguished our Revolution from all others, it is this: that we have succeeded in limiting and restricting the power of Government over private property, and more effectually securing the rights of citizens thereto. If this was not the great principle of the American Revolution, then it has none. The line that separates the power of Government from private property is the line that defines the limits of liberty, in all countries. I know, sir, that the British Government, under the claims of omnipotence in Parliament, has again and again trampled over the great principles of the magna charta, and it is not there that we are to look for examples to define our notions of power in Government over the property of a free people. Under the plea of state necessity and the high prerogatives of police power, a country may be protected and a people regulated, but the Government may be a despotism. But in this country, with our constitutions and limitations defined, I deny the right to interfere with private property except by "due process of law," through the verdict of a jury of freemen.

It is, however, suggested that, although you cannot pass an act to abolish slavery at present, yet you may pass it to take effect in future, upon the post nati principle. Let us examine this. If the rights of citizens be secured unqualifiedly at present under the constitution, how can you directly or indirectly interfere in the future? If I have a perfect right to my stock, I have a right to its proceeds, and the Government that attempts to cut off the right of proceeds is as absolute and despotic as that which would take the property itself. A free Government may regulate and shape "descents," to preserve and protect them for the benefit of its citizens; but no Government is free that, instead of a wholesome and judicious exercise of this power, usurps to cut them off entirely. If Government have no right to destroy the existing property itself, it has no right to destroy its proceeds. The principle and the power are the same in the one case as the other.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to suggest to our northern friends the propriety, if they can, of taking these constitutional grounds. I respectfully suggest whether it would not be better for them to raise the constitutional restrictions as a shield between themselves and popular fanaticism, than to rely upon the grounds of expediency. If they intend to save the institutions of this country, let them raise the constitutional powers against the movements for abolition in this District; let them go home with the constitution in their hands, to show that it precludes any interference. I entreat them to take this ground now, and make the issue with this abolition spirit, when the good and the virtuous have some power and control. Put them down now, by this and strong acts of local legislation, or you will be compelled to come here and cry aloud to save this Union, after it shall be too late, when the beacon-fires of an indignant people shall blaze over a thousand hills, and the swords of a hundred thousand freemen shall gleam on high to avenge our wrongs and vindicate our rights.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that slavery is a "foul blot upon our national escutcheon," "an evil," that "all men are created equal," &c. Let us examine these propositions for a moment. "All men are created equal." What, sir, was the meaning that the author of the Declaration attached to this proposition? Was it meant that all men are created equally strong and of equal size? Surely not. Was it meant that all men were born free? From the child in the bulrushes up to those of the present day, there never was an infant wrapped in "swaddling clothes" that was born free. Was it meant that all men were born with equal rights, to an equal destiny? From the time it was declared that the iniquities of some should be "visited unto the third and fourth generations"—from the days of Moses and the children of Israel—the history of mankind proclaims that there is "an elect and chosen few," made the peculiar receptacles of the favors and blessings of an all-wise and all-pervading Providence. This is the world as we find it, and it is not for us to war upon destiny.

What, then, was the meaning? It was intended to declare the abstract truth that all men were born equally entitled to political privileges. Let us look into this as practical legislators. Throw man back into a state of savage existence; proclaim his physical and brutal propensities triumphant, and himself lord of the recesses of the wilderness, and then this abstract truth may have some practical bearing. But, let him accumulate property; let his intellectual attributes triumph over his brutal nature; make him civilized, and send him forth, erect in the image of his Maker, with the light of reason and benevolence beaming from his countenance, then his great characteristic is, that he becomes a social being. Organize him into society, to act with his fellow-man, and then proclaim the abstract truth that all men are equal, as a great fundamental doctrine to be practically acted upon, and you do nothing more nor less than raise his hand against every other man, and every other man's hand against him; and, instead of its becoming a doctrine full of light and peace to a world sleeping in darkness and bondage, it becomes a doctrine of universal discord, confusion, and ruin. True, it is an abstract truth; but, like all other mere abstractions, it can have no actual existence. True and practical liberty, in my opinion, exists amongst a people who live under a system of ascertained and well-regulated law, that has grown up from time immemorial out of the experience and absolute necessities of the society that is framed under it; and for one people, living in a totally different region, and under totally different circumstances, to attempt to give a system of political liberty to another people, living under entirely different wants and necessities, is one of the most stupid pieces of folly that belongs to the age, and partakes deeply of that arrogance and presumption which would prompt a blind despotism to proclaim one universal and consolidated system for the government of mankind.

In the nineteenth century, when the great institutions of civilization have their foundations laid deep in the wants and experience of accumulated centuries, let no man, in the madness and folly of his zeal, be so reckless as to proclaim a mere abstract theoretical truth, for the purpose of calling up the most envious and malignant passions of the human heart, which must result in pulling down all that is settled and peaceful, and spreading around anarchy and blood. Let no public man act upon a great people by experimental theories. You may proclaim a truth, and form a system perfect in your own mind, but put it into practical operation, and you may bring misery and wretchedness upon a happy land.

Look to the French nation for the last half century, that great source of lessons so full of practical wisdom. They commenced by declaring that "all men were created equal." And the next great solemn act was to declare there was no God, and that the "Bible was a lie." What was the result? After they succeeded in transferring the property of the nation from those who had accumulated it to those who had none, then they chanted hallelujahs to their imaginary system of equality, even while the blood of virtue and innocence flowed in wide-spread sluices from the guillotine, under the hands of Robespierre and Danton. The same sword that was raised on high at Lodi and Marengo, to vindicate the equal rights of republican France, was soon, very soon, grasped by the hand of a tyrant and despot, who waved it, dripping with blood, over an enslaved and unhappy people. Let no man proclaim universal equality as practically to be enforced in any society on earth, unless he is prepared to appeal to universal revolution to sustain it.

Mr. Speaker, we are denounced before the world for holding a race amongst us in domestic servitude. It is not my province, nor is this the place, to expound the precepts of divine law; but I lay down this proposition as universally true, that there is not, nor never was, a society, organized under one political system for a period long enough to constitute an era, where one class would not practically and substantially own another class, in some shape or form. Let not gentlemen from the North start at this truth. We are yet, as a people, in our infancy. Society has not yet been pressed down into its classifications. Let us live through an era, and then we shall discover this great truth. All society settles down into a classification of capitalists and laborers. The former will own the latter, either collectively, through the Government, or individually, in a state of domestic servitude, as exists in the southern States of this confederacy. The only contest in the world is between the two systems. If laborers ever obtain the political power of a country, it is in fact in a state of revolution, which must end in substantially transferring property to themselves, until they shall become capitalists, unless those who have it shall appeal to the sword and a standing army to protect it. This is the history of all civilized people. There is not a Government in Christendom that does not rest upon this power, except our own, and here we have substituted for open force, constitutions, and the concentrated public opinion of communities. But we have not yet lived through experience, and it is yet to be seen whether bribery, corruption, and fraud, shall not take the place, for the present, of the constitution and public opinion, and finally force the old appeal to the sword.

To illustrate this position, take one hundred men, and organize them under one government, and start them with your imaginary notion of all being equal. What is the result? The Creator has made some more active, more economical, more industrious, than others; and in five years, in all human probability, forty out of the hundred will accumulate property, while sixty will not. The political power must be supported by taxes and revenue; and if all have equal power, the sixty will lay taxes upon the forty, and distribute the revenue, not amongst the forty, but amongst themselves. This will in time substantially transfer the property of the forty to the sixty, or the former must appeal to the sword, when twenty out of the sixty will be paid to constitute a standing army, and form the basis of power in the forty. Let it be understood that, in the political action of classes, the restraints of public opinion and public responsibility do not operate through a series of years, but that man, acting in his collective capacity, is essentially impelled by his appetites, his passions, and his interests. It is only in his individual capacity that he becomes an intellectual, moral, and virtuous being.

Let us analyze any Government on earth: take, for instance, the British constitution. The House of Lords represents the landed capitalists of Great Britain; the House of Commons the commercial and manufacturing capitalists; and both together represent the aggregate capitalists of the country. The King is supported as a third power, to check and balance the two other equal powers, and give vigor to the system. They are mutually interested in one thing only, and that is, to ascertain what the labor of the nation will live on; and all over and above that they take and divide among themselves and the interests they represent, by the power of raising revenue, and in its distribution. This they do in the ten thousand shapes and forms which human ingenuity and wickedness can invent: through a standing army and navy, the civil and diplomatic corps, and half a million of pensioned profligates, besides the whole system of taxation, by which all the burdens shall indirectly fall on one class, and the blessings on another.

And this would inevitably be the result in every non-slaveholding State of this Union, in the course of time,

H. or R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

under a separate and individual existence. As certain as destiny, property would there change hands, or those who have it would be compelled to appeal to the sword, or sink into political degradation. In addition to our infancy as a society, and the unparalleled superabundance of freehold, the Government here, through its distributions, has, to a certain extent, satisfied the laborers of the North, and diverted them from their capitalists at home. But nothing but open agrarianism can much longer keep in peace and subjection an excited and hungry multitude, who, under the cry of the "poor against the rich," may be raised, to clamor for vengeance around the vaults of hoarded wealth.

The capitalists north of Mason and Dixon's line have precisely the same interest in the labor of the country that the capitalists of England have in their labor. Hence it is that they want a strong Federal Government, through which they may more effectually control the labor of the nation. But it is precisely the reverse with us. We already have not only a right to the proceeds of our laborers, but we own a class of laborers themselves. Hence it is that we want a strong Government at home and a weak one here, except so far as concerns our foreign relations. And hence it is that no doctrine that makes this Government controlled by the simple action of a majority of mere numbers, can be more desolating and fatal in its effects upon us. This, sir, is at the basis of all difference between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States of this confederacy. But let me say to gentlemen who represent the great class of capitalists in the North, beware that you do not drive us into a separate system; for if you do, as certain as the decrees of Heaven, you will be compelled to appeal to the sword to maintain yourselves at home. It may not come in your day, but your children's children will be covered with the blood of domestic factions, and a plundering mob contending for power and conquest.

Mr. Speaker, let us look for a moment into this modern crusade, raised all over the world against domestic servitude. The British Government violated the rights of property to emancipate a race in the West Indies, only to throw them upon the world, strolling vagrants and vagabonds. And it is remarkable that the same minister who held in his hand the act of emancipation to the black man abroad, rose in his seat to congratulate the nation that he was enabled to withdraw troops from foreign stations, and to "place them in the manufacturing districts" at home, "to keep down insurrection and disturbance." While a mistaken sympathy, and bigoted and fanatical religion, can prompt men to feel for the imaginary evils of the black or red man of distant regions, there seems to be no heart for the suffering and slavery of the white man at home. The same Government that suffered itself to be forced to an act of emancipation, through the influence of stupid fanaticism, aided by the instigations of the British East India Company, for the purposes of gain and monopoly, actually holds in political vassalage at home, Ireland—the land of genius and eloquence. While seven millions of men around them feel all the pressure of despotism and abject slavery, in want and misery, they have the hardihood and shamelessness to proclaim emancipation abroad. While England holds in bondage one hundred millions of human beings in her East India possessions, where, if any native should dare to raise a voice (even although that voice should be a female princess) against British clemency or the British Government, immediately fifty thousand bayonets would spring up for plunder and murder; yet, sir, while this is notoriously the case, she has the hypocrisy to preach universal emancipation.

Take, sir, a case nearer home. In the city of New York it is that societies upon societies have been formed, and thousands upon thousands raised, to alleviate the evils of the far South, and to regenerate our country. Go into that city—visit "Five Points," and there gaze, if you can, upon the scenes of wretchedness, guilt, wo, and misery. Behold thousands upon thousands, of all hues and complexions, dragging their starving and emaciated forms from their dens and cellars into the light and warmth of day, to support sinking nature. I believe there is more want, more evil, and more suffering, in that single city, than exists from the Potomac to the Mississippi. It would take all the resources of their societies to relieve those who suffer at home. Yet the stupidity, bigotry, and fanaticism of modern days, which are sweeping through the land, seem only to seek out distant objects, where the imagination exaggerates evil, on which to exercise their blind and ignorant benevolence.

Mr. Speaker, as to the particular treatment of those we avow to hold in bondage, and our peculiar rights in them, I scorn to vindicate either the one or the other here. But let me say, sir, that our system of domestic servitude, where all the sympathies and interests that can bind individual capitalists and individual laborers together exist, is the same patriarchal system that existed in the first ages of society. Our classifications is into blacks and whites; and we openly avow before the world that we own the former, through both intellectual and physical force. We have nothing to conceal or disguise. Ours is the ancient system of society that existed amongst the Greeks and the Romans, and, to a certain extent, in the feudal serf system of the Gallic race. And here let me refer, when the world supposes it full of intrinsic weakness and evil, let me but refer to a single instance. I allude to Attica, where there were 536,000 souls, and out of them only 122,000 free citizens. And where does the world look for the highest specimens of art, and taste, and refinement—where for the loftiest and purest strains of poetry and eloquence—where for the noblest and most exalted examples of arms and patriotism, but to Athens? Ours is a frank and bold system, that sustains itself by open and undisguised power. And let me say that here consists the great difference between the ancients and the moderns: the former were more open, frank, and bold; the latter have more ingenuity, duplicity, and cunning. The modern system of ruling classes through the Government, and party ascendancy, rests upon duplicity, bribery, and fraud.

Hence it is that there has not been, for the last hundred years, a statute passed in Great Britain, professing to give equal rights and privileges to the great mass of the people, whose preamble is not full of falsehood and hypocrisy. Public men are trained up, from the institutions of modern society, to practise deception, duplicity, flattery, and fraud, that one half of society may rule the other half.

Look, for instance, to the State of New York, as things now exist there. We find an artful, profligate, and daring party, leagued together by moneyed corporations, by the distribution of offices, and the power and terror of perfect organization, for the open purpose of swaying the political destinies of the country. Sir, I solemnly believe that, for baseness of purpose and in degrading means, no party has ever risen in any civilized country to equal it, since the Jacobinic clubs of France held their midnight meetings; when no man dare whisper the secrets of his heart, even to the partner of his bosom, without being arraigned under their terrible inquisition. I appeal to the minority from that State, on this floor, to know if they do not live under a system of political vassalage, in which the dominant party openly spread out upon their banners, "booty—booty!" and the "spoils of victory belong to the conquerors!" and under this vile standard call upon their mercenary bands to gather into the plunder of a sacked camp. Sir, they preach democracy and universal equality to us, and practise political despotism at home. This is the cant, duplicity, and profligacy of modern times.

Mr. Speaker, I owe perhaps an apology to this House for speaking so plain; but, sir, I have been taught from my father's board to disguise no sentiment I entertain. I know I have uttered sentiments little calculated to please those interests that now hold the destinies of the country in their hands. I know that what I have said is ill calculated for popularity in this country, but I speak the truth as I believe it to exist, and ask no favors of any man or set of men living, save my own constituents.

Sir, it may be said that what I have uttered tends to disunion. I did not come here, demagogue like, to talk about the glories and the blessings of this Union. These stand recorded in the history of the country, and need no feeble voice of mine to hold them up to the admiration of the world. But let me here say to gentlemen from the slaveholding race, beware! beware! unless, in your generous and patriotic attachment to this Union, you should find yourselves finally dragged down, and kneeling in idolatrous worship before some idol made by human hands of the present day.

That union which springs from ambition and fanaticism—an unnatural offspring, begotten in sin and iniquity, foul and loathsome from its leprosy, blood-shot and bloated from revelling in spoils plundered from others—I scorn to love. Raise not up this monster-god, and call upon me to bow down and worship at its unholy and unhallowed shrine. I disdain to do it. Give me that union which springs from truth and virtue—fair and comely in its form—in a bending attitude, with an outstretched arm, to raise the feeble and protect the weak—dispensing equal political favors, and imposing equal burdens on all sections. Give me the Union under the constitution—give me the Union that has borne our stars and our stripes to the remotest quarters of the habitable globe—give me the Union that our fathers gave us, and I will pledge the last drop of blood in my veins to vindicate and defend it—but no other Union.

As soon as Mr. P. had concluded,

Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor; and Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day; but the House did not sustain the motion: Ayes 84, noes 90.

Mr. HOAR then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the resolutions on your table present for the consideration of the House a dry constitutional question. Not only has this question been discussed by several gentlemen who have addressed the House, but the subject of slavery, as it exists in the States, its bearing on the union of the States, the relation which the several States and the General Government bear to each other, as far as this subject is concerned, have been freely and warmly debated. I propose to offer some remarks on the constitutional question, and to answer some of the observations respecting the conduct of the Governments of the northern States, which have been made in the course of the discussion of these resolutions.

Before I enter on the consideration of the question whether Congress can constitutionally abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, I wish to express my views on the subject which seems to have caused the principal alarm and apprehension in the minds of gentlemen from the southern portion of the Union. It has been observed, by a number of the members from that part of the country, that the abolition of slavery in this District is an "entering wedge" to the abolition of slavery in the States in which it exists. This seems to be a very favorite expression with many of the gentlemen who have addressed the House against these petitions. Notwithstanding the very high authority in its favor, the figure does not seem to me in the least degree appropriate. By an "entering wedge," gentlemen are understood to mean, in this case, a method of passing the boundary between right and wrong, in a manner almost imperceptible at first, and advancing gradually to the completion of the wrongful purpose. It is difficult to imagine a more clearly defined limitation of power than is afforded by the constitution on this subject. The "hitherto shalt thou come, and no further," is as clearly marked here as in any other part of that instrument. If the wedge shall ever be used, it will be introduced head foremost.

There is no section, clause, nor expression, in the constitution, which would seem to suggest or countenance the idea that it was intended by its framers to give to Congress the power to abolish slavery in the States. If the existence of slavery is recognised, the control of it is left by the framers of the General Government where they found it, with the States, where it exists. Among the numerous political heresies started in different parts of the country, I may have heard the doctrine that the General Government does possess the power to abolish slavery in the States alluded to as one entertained by "some people," and "somewhere;" but, as far as I can recollect, I have never heard any person, from any part of the country, assert or pretend that Congress possesses this power. Whether slavery be right or wrong, in itself, the subject is exclusively for the consideration of the State Governments within the limits of the States where it exists. The southern States cannot, therefore, for a moment, admit the power in the General Government to interfere with this subject in the States, without yielding their claim to independence. No northern State can wish them to make this admission; because, by parity of reasoning, their own State powers would be merged in the power of the General Government.

Far different are the provisions of the constitution in regard to this District. To Congress is given the power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over" this District.

This language is as comprehensive, as plain, as unambiguous, as any which could have been used to confer the power in question. If gentlemen, denying the existence of this power, were called on for proof of the existence of any other power in Congress, they would find it difficult, as far as the mere form of expression is concerned, to name one more indisputably conferred. It then is incumbent on those who deny the existence of this power to show that, notwithstanding the universality of this expression, it was the intention of the framers of the constitution to except from the grant the power in question. This seems to be conceded. It is not pretended, and indeed cannot be pretended rationally, that the language used is not sufficient to convey the power. It is said, however, that though the language used would, by its import, convey all power of legislation, or rather exclusive power of legislation, yet it cannot be supposed that it was intended to confer on Congress unlimited power over the inhabitants and property within the District. It is said that this is not "an unlimited, absolute, despotic power of legislation over this District."—[Mr. LEIGH.] "That private property cannot be taken for public use, and much less for private use, without compensation."—[Mr. PICKENS.] That "the local Legislature of this District can pass no law which the States are, by the constitution, prohibited from passing; that there are great leading principles in the nature of society, and of government, which prescribe limits to our legislation; and that, fortunately, here the constitution speaks too plainly to be misunderstood, declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation."—[Mr. Wise.]

Comprehensive and strong as is the language of the constitution above cited, I do not contend, Mr. Speaker, that it was its design to confer unlimited and despotic power on Congress over this District. I have not very critically examined all the exceptions which have been mentioned in the course of this debate, because most of them are irrelevant to the present question. Those which have been urged as having a bearing on the present question will be carefully examined.

If slavery cannot be abolished in this District, without violating the principle which prohibits Government from taking private property for public use, without compensation, slavery here must remain undisturbed. In determining the question, however, whether this great rule of legislation would be violated by granting the prayer of these petitions, it will be well to advert to a rule which seems almost a mere truism, viz: "That the intention of the parties to a contract, or of the Legislature in passing a law, is to govern the construction." The intention, then, of the framers of the constitution is here the object of inquiry. The authors of this instrument knew well the force of the language they employed. They were exceedingly cautious in guarding all points where danger was apprehended. It will not be said that there is any more direct expression, used in any part of the constitution, declaring the sense of the parties to this instrument, and indicating an intended exception to the general grant, than has been above mentioned.

I shall not much insist on the proposition that, though slaves be property, they are also persons, and, as persons, their rights may be abridged or enlarged, as justice and the good of the whole system may seem to require. It might be urged that the Government of any State, consistently with all the rights of individuals, might extend the property of a free parent, in the labor of his child, one year, or five years, beyond the common law age of freedom; or abridge, to the same extent, that property in the parent, and give it to the child.

It is to be observed that these resolutions equally embrace all other modes of abolishing slavery, as well as the immediate and universal emancipation of the slaves. Some of the arguments also are founded on the supposed embarrassment to the southern members of the Government, coming to this District with their families, while resident here for the discharge of public duties. It is very apparent that all these difficulties may be easily avoided.

In order to solve the question, then, "how did the parties to this instrument regard the point now in issue, when the constitution was made?" inquiry should be made, what was the practice of the several Governments with which the parties recently had been, or then were, connected?

That the Government of Great Britain possessed this power, probably will not be doubted. That Government has recently exercised the power in relation to her West India possessions. But I do not rely on this, except to show that the stretch of power which Parliament had exercised towards the colonies induced the framers of the constitution to guard vigilantly against conferring dangerous powers on Congress. A more important inquiry is, what was in fact the understanding and the practice of the parties themselves on this subject at this time? The answer to this inquiry, it is believed, must settle this question.

Several years before the United States constitution was made, (as early as 1780,) one State in the confederacy had wholly abolished slavery within its limits. Several others had passed laws by which the same end has since that time been gradually attained. Each of these States adopted such means as, to its own Legislature, seemed advisable. No special power was granted to any one of the State Legislatures by the people, nor was such power ever asked. The language used in the State constitutions, or charters, neither was, nor could be, more clear or explicit, in conferring the power under which they acted, than that above quoted from the constitution of the United States.

It is said that the constitutions of the present slaveholding States give no power to their respective Legislatures to abolish slavery in those States, and that new power must be given to enable these Legislatures to accomplish that purpose.

Conceding that the gentlemen who have made this remark are better qualified to give a true construction of the constitutions of their respective States than I am, and that these constitutions, in fact, give to the Legislatures of those States no such power, I still contend that the fact (if it be such) has but little effect on the present question. It is perfectly undeniable that the southern members of the United States convention who framed the constitution knew as well, when that instrument was formed, as any one now knows, what the views and what the practice were in the northern States of this confederacy on this subject. They then knew that, in the northern part of the country, it was clearly and fully believed, and indeed was doubted by no one, that language no more plain and explicit than the clause now under consideration did confer the power on the several Legislatures to abolish slavery, without any other consent of the owners of the slaves than that which they gave as members of the community, when they formed their respective constitutions, or when they entered into their respective societies. Having this knowledge of the views and the practice of the northern States, the southern members at that time did not disagree with the northern in opinion on this subject; or, if they in fact entertained a different opinion, they gave no notice of this difference, which, as far as the present question is affected, would be the same thing.

It probably will not be denied by any one, that the result of this inquiry will be the same, whether it is supposed that the same opinion was entertained by the members from the North and the South on the construction then given to the State constitutions at the North, or that there was a difference of opinion on this point at that time, and the difference was concealed, or not expressly notified, by the southern members of this confederacy.

Suppose, for the sake of stating clearly the argument, (what no person would seriously impute to the sages who represented the southern portion of the country in the convention, on account of its disingenuousness,) that, having assembled for conference apart from their northern associates, they should have held this language: "It is understood at the North, that the power to abolish slavery is vested in their State Legislatures, and given them by language no more comprehensive or strong than that by which this constitution gives the power intended to be conferred on Congress over the future seat of Government. At the South, this is understood differently. We believe that people of the respective States must give the power of abolishing slavery in so many words, or by other and more precise language; or we believe that the liberation of the slaves would be a violation of the great rule, that private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation. It is not necessary for us to state our opinion on this subject to them. It is not necessary for us to state to the people of the North, that we think their ideas of justice and propriety on this subject too much resemble the principles and the practice of the British Government, which we unitedly condemn. When they shall attempt to act, in the government of the district to be ceded, on the same principles on which they now act to their respective State Governments, we may then urge our objections to their principles and their measures."

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

This is as favorable a statement of the case as the history of the transactions in question will warrant. On this statement, considering the North and the South as two parties to the constitutional compact, the South are bound to adopt the northern exposition by every system of law which men hold sacred, whether moral, honorary, municipal, or international.

It is believed that no part of this statement of facts is questionable. The views of the northern States on the subject of slavery, and the power to control it by the State Legislatures, were as well known at the South then as now—as well known as that there were northern States in existence. If the difference of opinion on this subject then existed, as no limitation to the comprehensive language was introduced into the constitution, certainly the limitation cannot now be introduced by implication. But it is not easy to perceive any good reason for believing that such a difference of opinion did then exist. The idea of this implied limitation of power comes nearly half a century too late.

An objection to the existence of the power in Congress to legislate on this subject has been mentioned by several gentlemen, in the course of this debate in this House, founded on the construction of the constitutions of the States of Virginia and Maryland.

It is thus stated by a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] That gentleman observes: "I take higher ground, and contend that, according to the bill of rights of Maryland, and the constitution of Virginia, these States themselves could not have ceded absolute and unrestrained power over private property of any kind in this District." "If Virginia and Maryland had attempted to cede absolute power over this subject, they would have violated the rights of their own citizens."

A gentleman [Mr. LETCH] whose high intellectual and moral worth tends strongly to give a currency to his opinions, even on questions of doubt and difficulty, in an argument published in the newspapers, observes: "The argument for the power of Congress I understand to be this: that the grant to Congress of the power of exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the District, vests in Congress all powers which the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland may rightly exercise within their respective jurisdictions." Undoubtedly, sir, Virginia and Maryland neither did cede, nor could cede, absolute power, nor any power over persons of any description, nor private property of any description, in this District. If they could do this, the absurdity stated by the gentleman from South Carolina would follow. A State Government might cut up its territory, and sell that and its citizens to any Government, savage or civilized, on earth. This proposition rests on a principle no less clear and certain than that Government is a trust not transferable—an agency without power of substitution. Precisely so far as either of these States should attempt to convey any power of legislation of any kind to the General Government, so far would that State Government attempt to alienate its trust or agency. So, sir, with great deference, I contend that the power which Virginia and Maryland might have exercised over this District is not the measure of the power which Congress may exercise here. All that Virginia and Maryland could do, and all they professed to do, as to power over the District, was to relinquish each its own power. Most manifest it is, that no State in the Union could transfer any portion of its power to the United States, or to any other Government. Unless it be true that a releasor of property, after a release, made without condition or reservation in the instrument of release, still retains dominion over the property released, no more reference is to be made to the constitutions, or laws, or usages, of Virginia or Maryland, than to the constitutions, laws, and usages, of any other State in the Union. All the power which Congress possesses is derived through the constitution of the United States, from the people of the United States—equally, and no more than equally, with the rest, from the people of Virginia and Maryland. It is a contradiction to say that Congress shall exercise exclusive legislation, and yet that the laws or constitutions of either of these States limit that power of legislation, or are in any way binding on Congress. The above-cited provision of the constitution of the United States, it is contended, is "the only source," if not "the only measure," of the power of Congress.

The act of cession of Virginia contains this proviso: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein." The author of the argument above cited [Mr. LETCH] contends that the word "therein" refers to both members of the sentence; and that the sense is the same as if it had been written, "any right of property in the soil therein, or to affect the rights of individuals therein."

If this be the true construction, the citizens of Alexandria have still the right to be represented in the Legislature of Virginia, and have still all the rights which they ever enjoyed as citizens of that State. If nothing in the act of cession affects the rights of any individual in the ceded territory, those rights remain wholly unchanged by the act, and Congress for many years has been exercising an unwarranted power in every act of legislation over this District.

The resolutions under consideration deny all power in Congress to interfere with slavery in this District.

It has been said, "if we are deprived of the free use of our property, we are, in effect, deprived of our property."

The South claims to hold its slaves as property, with all the incidents and rights pertaining to other property. Be it so: what is the power of Congress over the trade of the country in all sections of the Union? Not a bale of broadcloth, not a hogshead of sugar, not a cask of wine, no article of necessity nor of luxury, can be introduced into the country, but by observance of the rules prescribed by Congress. An excise is imposed, and collected on the sale of such articles of domestic growth, and at such times and places, as Congress chooses to prescribe. Acts of Congress have long since been passed to facilitate the sale and transfer of slaves within this District; and yet it is contended that Congress has not the constitutional power to prohibit the making this ten miles square the factory of slave dealers from the southern and western sections of the Union. Heretofore Congress has legislated on the subject of the transportation of slaves from one State to another, prohibiting with much particularity certain proceedings with them, considered injurious to the community. [Act 1807, ch. 77, (or 67,) sec. 8, 9, 10; act of 1820.]

Mr. Speaker, the northern States are required to interpose, by legislative enactments, to suppress the efforts of the abolitionists, and to deliver up to the officers and Governments of the South, for trial and punishment at the South, northern citizens, who have never left the limits of their respective States, for a violation of a law enacted by a southern Legislature. Charges of a grave character are made against the whole northern section of the Union, collectively, imputing to that portion of the country insincerity in their professions of regard for the peace and welfare of the South, because they have not complied with these requests.

A case is brought into notice by a gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PEXTON,] which he considers and urges as a case supporting this heavy accusation against the

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[JAN. 21, 1836.]

North, and as a violation of the law of comity, which every independent State or nation is bound to observe towards a neighboring State. The case stated is this: A grand jury of Alabama prefers an indictment against a citizen of New York, who has never entered the limits of the territory of Alabama, for the commission of an alleged crime in violating a law of the last-mentioned State. The Governor of Alabama demands of the Governor of New York the surrender of the supposed culprit to the Government of Alabama, to be tried by the courts of the last-named State, by the laws of the same State, and for a violation of a law enacted by a State into whose territory the offender never entered until transported there for trial and punishment.

The bare statement of such a claim would seem to be sufficient to place it in its true light, but for the character and standing of those who thus come forward in its support. It is because the Chief Magistrate of one of the States in the Union and an honorable member of this House urge this claim on the North, and especially because a refusal by one northern Governor to comply with this request is made a ground of criminating the whole northern section of the country, that gives it a claim to notice.

What is the great fundamental principle of our Government? Is it not that the people shall govern themselves? In the case above stated, the law is enacted by a Legislature wholly foreign to him who is claimed as its subject. The legislator is in no way nor degree amenable to him, or to those who are said to be subject to the law; nor have the latter, in any way or degree, given to the former any authority or power to control their conduct.

To allow this principle would indeed introduce a strange state of things. The highest judicial tribunals of the State of New York cannot officially understand the laws of another State, until they are proved as facts in the particular case in which they are to be applied; and yet the most uneducated adult person in the State of New York would be exposed to be seized, transported a thousand miles from his home, tried for a breach of one of those laws, which the judges of his own State cannot know, and, it may be, condemned to fine, imprisonment, or death, for doing an act which, if judged by the laws of his own State, is perfectly innocent. Mr. Speaker, if this be not slavery, I will acknowledge the obligation to any one who will inform me what slavery is.

There are many provisions of the constitution manifestly repugnant to the claim set up in this case, but it cannot be necessary further to examine the subject.

It is said that the abolitionists wish to abolish slavery in this District, in order that they may have a proximate and convenient position in which to carry on their future operations against the South. The petitioners are represented as saying, "give us whereon to stand, and we will move the [southern] world." Any person casting his eye on a map of the country, and noticing the length of line by which Virginia and Maryland are now bounded by non-slaveholding States, will probably think they must be miserable engineers to suppose this little spot of ten miles square can afford much aid to the accomplishment of their plans. The abolition of slavery in this District would probably have very little effect on the slaves, or on slavery, in any of the States.

Another ground of complaint, urged by several gentlemen in the course of the debate, is this: It is said that the essays of the abolitionists have for their object the excitement of uneasiness and discontent among the slaves, and that their tendency is to produce insurrection and servile war. They further allege that the writing and printing of the essays, being carried on within the limits of independent States, and being injurious to the slaveholding communities, the latter communities have a right to complain of the proceeding, and to demand the suppression of those publications, as libellous and seditious in their nature, by the punishment of their authors.

This complaint deserves serious attention. It presents for consideration questions of great and acknowledged difficulty. That a person standing on one side of the line between two States, may, in various ways, inflict an injury on a person on the other side of the line, and that the guilty party is justly punishable; that, in many cases which may be imagined, he ought not to be protected, and would not be protected, in any well-ordered State, would seem not to be questionable. Although this case has been stated in the course of the debate, to prove the propriety of the complaint and demand above stated, it does not seem to accomplish the purpose. It remains still necessary to inquire how far the publications above alluded to are wrong in their nature or tendency, and how far, if wrong, it is practicable to correct the wrong. I trust, sir, that the northern Legislatures, and people generally, desire faithfully to observe the federal compact, and as faithfully to perform all the duties of good neighborhood. Gentlemen from the South, I suppose, will admit the impropriety of asking from northern Legislatures the enactment of laws such as, under like circumstances, the southern Legislatures would refuse to sanction. Obligations of the kind in question, if they exist, are reciprocal. It is said that the principles of international law require this interposition on the part of the northern States. There doubtless are precedents, in great abundance, for indictments and punishments of real or supposed seditious, fanatical, and treasonable publications. The eminent scholar and philanthropist, Dr. Channing, the pride and the boast of his countrymen, one of the great lights of the age, who has been so peculiarly noticed by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] has heretofore written several essays, any one of which would, under the reign of Henry VIII. or of either of his daughters, have carried him to the stake. The pioneer of truth, he who, in advance of his cotemporaries, discovers and fearlessly advocates the cause of truth, will often find that, like a soldier in an enemy's country in advance of his corps, he is concentrating on himself the missiles of the foe. It is not enough, however, to cite precedents in distant ages, or in countries where principles of government, essentially different from our own, are in operation. Authorities, to avail as authorities, must be generally approved in our own age and country. One case, and one case only, has been cited to prove this law and practice. It is the case of the indictment, in England, of Peltier, on the complaint of Bonaparte's minister. The gentleman who cites this case [Mr. HAMMOND] says, "If England, where more battles have been fought for the liberty of speech and the press than in any portion of the world, felt bound to indict a journalist for libelling her greatest enemy—the enemy of the whole human race—is it unreasonable to ask you to extend the same justice to the grossly slandered and deeply injured people of the South?" It would be very easy to adduce almost any number of precedents of indictments and punishments, found and inflicted for libels on Governments, or for seditious writings. That such precedents exist, by no means proves what must be proved, to lay a just foundation for the complaint in question, which is, that, at the present day, the southern States would themselves prescribe to their own citizens such laws as they require to be enacted at the North. In the above-cited case of Peltier it ought to appear that his punishment (if sentence had been awarded and punishment inflicted) was approved by the public voice of the citizens of free States. The gentleman did not state whether, after a deliberate consideration of the argument of Peltier's counsel, he thinks his punishment would have been approved by the gentleman, who cited the case, himself.

Suppose the language above cited from the gentleman's speech had been used, not in public debate, but had been printed by him in the reign of Bonaparte, and application had been made by Bonaparte's minister to the Government of the United States, or of South Carolina, to institute a prosecution against him for the words, as libellous: who can believe that the application would have been successful? Yet what could have been said of that tyrant worse than that "he was the enemy of the whole human race?" I do not mean to say or to intimate that this language is unjust. Far from it. Language of like import was used concerning him by persons, and in instances innumerable, in every State of the Union, and probably in every month from his accession to the throne to the day of his departure for St. Helena. A similar statement might be made concerning each of the successive Governments of France, for many years subsequent to 1789. What remarks have we heard in this debate concerning the treatment of Ireland by the English Government? Charges of tyranny, of oppression, of unrelenting cruelty, have been uttered, repeated, and reiterated, in the public prints of our country, with all the force and in all the forms which the English language can supply. While this language has here been used, numerous insurrections and rebellions have broken out and been suppressed, with more or less bloodshed, in Ireland. Yet who has heard of an indictment in this country for a libel of the British Government? Would southern juries consent to indict and convict their fellow-citizens for this liberty of speech or of the press, as an offence at common law, or by the law of nations? Would southern legislators prohibit the utterance, with perfect freedom, of any opinion concerning any Government on earth? The members of the holy alliance have not always been spoken of as perfectly "holy" by Americans. Probably no one here has been very apprehensive of punishment on this account.

The present Chief Magistrate of South Carolina, a gentleman who has often instructed and delighted not only his auditors in this hall, but the people of this nation, has recently, in an official communication to the Legislature of his State, given utterance to sentiments which, carried to their legitimate, practical consequences, would produce great and radical changes in the Government of every northern State, and, if received as true, would produce as much discontent among the inhabitants of the North as any thing which has been uttered by any northern abolitionist could produce at the South. Now, should a northern man ask for an indictment against any citizen of South Carolina for uttering similar sentiments, either orally or in print, he would be thought insane. Yet the difference between the two cases is this: In one case, those on whom the unfavorable influence is to be exerted cannot generally read any thing which is written, whether good or bad. In the other case, those who are to be affected can read, and do habitually read, whatever is written on public affairs. In the one case, liberty and its institutions are brought in question; in the other, slavery and its concomitants are the subjects of discussion.

An instance of legislation on the subject of seditious writings has occurred in the Government of the United States. What was the opinion of that law generally at the South need not be stated. It certainly was not such as to render it probable that any statute regulation of the press, as far as expression of opinions on subjects of public interest should be concerned, would soon be attempted.

Could any Legislature of the State of Virginia, for instance, be induced to prohibit, by statute, the most full and free expression of opinion on any subject, either of politics, morals, or religion? Could the Legislature of that State, by any act of legislation, succeed in preventing the citizens of that State from a full and free expression of opinion; or deter them from a fearless discussion of any subject pertaining to the public welfare; or hinder their advocating any plan for the advancement of the greatest good of the greatest number, however wild or heretical? It may be presumptuous in an inhabitant of another State to express an opinion on the subject; but it is believed they could as easily, by legislation, exclude the tide waters from their own Chesapeake.

I have thus far, Mr. Speaker, proceeded on the supposition that the abolitionists are wholly in error in their theory; and I do not intend at present to discuss the question, whether slavery is a blessing or a curse, nor whether the abolitionists be fanatical or rational. Suppose, then, that there is an opaque body at the North, "radiating darkness" on the regions of the South, and producing unreasonable discontent in a portion of the inhabitants: what ought to be done? A band of furies in Paris, in the reign of Robespierre, were hurrying a victim to their common gallows, (the lantern post,) and were about to execute on him what (in some sections of our country) is called Lynch law, on account of some real or supposed heretical opinion on the subject of government, when the object of their rage saved his life by proposing the pertinent question to those who held him in custody, whether they expected to see any better, after they should have suspended him at the lantern post, than before?

What, Mr. Speaker, is the antagonist principle, or the appropriate corrective, of speculative error? Is it physical force? Will you enact a bill of pains and penalties for absurd reasoning, or hypocritical cant? Will you punish, as criminal, false inferences in regard to facts, in newspapers or pamphlets? The practice would be new in this country. A late King of France tried an experiment there, within a few years, on the freedom of the press; the result need not be stated. It is universally admitted that, in this country, there are newspapers in great numbers so conducted that their statements scarcely afford the slightest presumption in favor of their truth; yet, for the sake of the incalculable benefit to be derived on the whole from a free press, the immense evil is tolerated, and probably will be tolerated. The slander of individuals depends on different principles, and will be punished by grand juries and traverse juries. Seldom, however, I believe, will an attempt be successfully made to punish, by indictment, any one for any writing professing to have in view the advancement of the public good, on account of its seditious nature or tendency. I do not mean to assert that a case never has occurred in which this has been judiciously done, nor that it can never be done hereafter; but it does seem that a careful examination of the cases in which this has been attempted will not lead to a conclusion very favorable to them.

What, then, is to be done? It is asked, when was fanaticism put down by reasoning? I answer, that it has, probably, been put down by reasoning as often as by force. If honest but mistaken men are to be opposed, let the sword lie still in the scabbard, and take up the pen. Southern gentlemen will not distrust their own power to meet argument with argument, when truth is on their side. I am quite sure that some of the southern gentlemen will admit the inexpediency and injustice of sending a man to become cool within the walls of a prison, merely because he has been a little too much heated in debate. If mere fanaticism is in question, the most effectual antidote is neglect. If, in two centuries, there has been but one insurrection among the slaves of the South, it is difficult to believe that gen-temen have not over-estimated the danger to be apprehended from that source, in consequence of any essays to be sent from the North. The southern States can make such provision, as to them shall seem expedient, for the punishment of any person, from whatever quarter of the world he may come, who shall be found attempting to instigate their slaves to insurrection and rebellion. If any such person shall suffer, having been fairly tried for his offence, he will probably suffer with little more sympathy than others excite who suffer for their crimes.

I have no more of an inclination than I have of a right to dogmatize on this threadbare subject. Perhaps my views are wholly wrong. It may appear, within some few months, that northern legislators will find no difficulty in accomplishing what is required of them; or, if they should meet difficulties, some southern statesmen may suggest a method of obtaining their object, which, upon examination, will be approved by the public voice. If so, all freemen will rejoice that, at length, that great desideratum in legislation is supplied—a method of effectually suppressing the licentiousness of the press, without infringing its liberty.

It is readily granted that it is scarcely possible for man to inflict a greater evil on his fellow-man than is inflicted by the malicious or thoughtless dissemination of falsehood. But can human tribunals so distinguish between the different classes of writers, as to send one class to the penitentiary, and give due rewards to the other? That this can in no instance be done, is not affirmed. The experience of the world thus far, however, would seem to apply to this case generally the mandate—"let both grow together until the harvest."

Before Mr. HOAR had concluded his speech, as given entire above,

Mr. GRENELL moved an adjournment, but gave way for the Speaker to present the following message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1836.

SIR: I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the director of the mint, exhibiting the operations of that institution during the year 1835.

The report contains also some very useful suggestions as to certain changes in the laws connected with our coinage, and with that establishment, which are recommended to your early attention.

Besides some remarks in it on the progress made in the erection of the branch mints, and procuring machinery therefor, I enclose a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting more detailed statements as to the new buildings, from each of the agents appointed to superintend the erection.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. JAS. K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the message was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed; and then
The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22.

FORTIFICATION BILL OF LAST SESSION.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and claimed the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while he noticed an attack made in one of the morning journals [supposed to be the United States Telegraph] upon himself. He would not notice it, but for the reason that it was an attack, not only upon himself, but also upon the House, in relation to a question now before the Senate. The paper to which he referred stated that his (Mr. C's) published remarks upon the three million appropriation bill were not made till after the adjournment of Congress, or, in other words, that they were never made at all. At this time, when he had higher game in view, he would not condescend to notice this statement at all, but for the consideration to which he had alluded. And he now noticed it only for the purpose of pronouncing it false, and to state that, when an opportunity offered for going into a discussion of the loss of the appropriation bill in question, there would not only be one, but many, of both parties in this House, who would feel it their duty to vindicate the proceedings of this body in relation to that affair from any reflections which had been, or might be, cast upon them.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS rose and said: Mr. Speaker, in connexion with this subject, I desire the consent of the House to offer a resolution; I ask that it may be read.

The resolution, which is in the following terms, was then read,

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of the present session as relates to the failure, at the last session of Congress, of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into, and report to this House, the causes and circumstances of the failure of the bill.

Objection having been made,

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered by the House.

And the question on the motion to suspend was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 129, nays 60.

So the House determined to suspend the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then offered the following amendment to the resolution:

"And that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers."

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded. That part of the President's message which relates to this subject is in these words:

"Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the national Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other. This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been most usefully applied during the past session."

I think this is all that is said in the message upon the subject. I have offered the resolution for the appointment of a committee, with instructions to inquire into and report the facts relating to the loss of this bill, principally in consequence of what has occurred in another place on this same subject, in which not only the facts stated by the President in this part of his message have been denied to be true—

The SPEAKER (interrupting Mr. A.) said that allusions to the proceedings of the Senate were not in order. It was indispensable that this rule should be observed, in order to preserve harmony between the two branches of the Legislature.

Mr. ADAMS continued. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly disposed to observe the rules established for the intercourse between the two Houses of the Legislature, and I will go no further in relation to any thing which has taken place in the Senate than those rules authorize.

JAN. 22, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, the House has heard me say that I offered this resolution in consequence of what has occurred in another place. I do not say that place was the Senate of the United States; that is a matter which any gentleman in this House is competent to determine for himself. I say this, because, although I am fully aware that any allusion to what is going on in the other branch of the Legislature is not in accordance with the formal rule of the House, yet it is perfectly well known that not a debate of any importance occurs in this House, but that a practical reference and allusion is made to it in the Senate; and because, however, this formal rule may be carried into force and effect upon ordinary occasions, if it is not to be subject to any exceptions whatever, it must take from me the possibility of stating the real grounds upon which I ask for the appointment of this committee. I say, therefore, that I do not refer nominally to what has taken place in the Senate, but I do refer to what has taken place elsewhere. And I shall proceed, sir, and continue to make reference to what has occurred in that place, so long as it shall please the Speaker and the House to allow me to proceed.

The SPEAKER said he merely gave the intimation, that no reference to the proceedings of the Senate was allowed. He had the authority before him.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts. Will the Speaker read his authority?

Loud cries of "order! go on! go on!"

Mr. ADAMS continued. Sir, in another place—

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, called to order. The member from Massachusetts said he did not nominally refer to the Senate. If, however, he did so intentionally, he was equally out of order.

The SPEAKER said he could not anticipate what the member from Massachusetts intended to say. The moment he made a remark in violation of the rule, the Chair would enforce the observance of it. The Speaker here read the rule of the House applicable to the subject, and again apprized Mr. A. that all allusions to the Senate were out of order.

Mr. MERCER desired to confine the attention of the Chair and the House to the language already used by the member from Massachusetts. Now was the time to decide whether the latter gentleman might be permitted to proceed; that is to say, whether he did not intentionally allude to the Senate, although not so nominally, by using the word "place" instead of "Senate."

The SPEAKER said, before a decision could be had, the exceptional words must be committed to writing.

Mr. MERCER deferred his point of order for the present.

Mr. ADAMS continued. I will endeavor, so far as my humble ability will permit me, to avoid any collision, not only with the letter, but with the spirit of the rule to which the gentleman from Virginia has appealed; and I will transfer the location of the "place" where these things to which I shall be under the necessity of referring have happened, from the Senate of the United States (if the gentlemen thinks proper to fix upon the Senate as the place to which I allude) to the office of the "National Intelligencer." If the gentleman from Virginia has any objection to that—

Mr. MERCER. I object to any quibbling calculated to produce a collision between this House and the Senate.

Cries of "order! order!" after which,

Mr. ADAMS continued. In the "National Intelligencer," the newspaper of the official printer of the Senate of the United States, (I hope I am not out of order in that,) there is published a report of proceedings which have taken place in a certain quarter; and in that paper I find it charged, not only that the statement in the message of the President of the United States, which I had the honor to read, was untrue, but that the failure of the appropriation bill was not caused in the Senate; that it did not fail there, but that it failed in another House. Where was that, sir? Was it this House? No, sir; that House exists no longer; but it was in this hall; and this House, which is now here, consists in a very great measure, of the identical individuals who composed that House. One hundred and forty members of that House are also members of this; and in the "National Intelligencer" I find it charged, not only that the failure of this bill was owing to the fault of that House, but "that it died there, and that there its bones are to be sought." I find it also charged that, in the process of losing that bill, and in the introduction of that portion of it which caused its failure, the most violent attacks were committed upon the constitution of the United States by the President and by that House, in conspiracy together. Sir, it is admitted, upon all hands, I believe, and upon all sides, that the failure of that bill was occasioned, materially, by the introduction of a section in which three millions of dollars were appropriated, under the circumstances in which the country then found itself, for the defence of the country; and the President tells us that the failure of that appropriation bill, and of that particular item of appropriation, is now a subject of great inconvenience to the people of this country. Upon this subject, sir, an issue has been taken in the "National Intelligencer." That issue involves not merely the President of the United States, but it involves this House.

Sir, there is an additional reason why I wish for a committee to inquire into this matter. That reason, in itself, I hope, will be sufficient inducement for every member of this House, who feels his own honor implicated in the charges against it, to call for this investigation, to have the subject exposed before the nation, and to show where the failure is to be truly charged. I have repeatedly said, in this House, that I consider the first duty of every branch of the Government is to harmonize with every other branch in the transaction of the business of the people; that the first duty of every member of the House of Representatives is to support the President of the United States, to support the Executive Government of the country in every measure belonging properly to its high office, in every measure in which the judgment of the individual acting can support the proceedings of the Executive. I have repeatedly said that, in like manner, it was equally his duty to support the measures which pass in the other branch of the Legislature, and that this duty is reciprocally obligatory upon the Senate and the House of Representatives. This I have always considered as the first duty of every person concerned in the administration of the Government, whether in the legislative or executive branches. There is another subsequent duty, by which each of these three branches is made a guardian and sentinel over the acts of the other, and in which it may be their duty (and a painful one it must be at all times) to oppose any measure, be it of the Executive or the other branches of the Legislature, which they may think inconsistent with the constitution, or with the interests of the people. Harmony between the two branches of the Legislature is of extreme importance; harmony between the legislative branches and the Executive is scarcely less important. Now, sir, in the transactions of that day, or rather of that night, circumstances occurred between the two branches of the Legislature, which I deem proper objects of inquiry for a committee of this House. I allude simply at this time to two of them which relate to this very bill. This appropriation of three millions of dollars for the defence of the country was inserted in the general appropriation bill, by an amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,]

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 22, 1836.]

proposed in consequence of a resolution which had passed unanimously in this House the night before, and in which the House declared, by that unanimous vote, "that the execution of the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, with France, should be insisted on." It was well known to every member of this House, and I believe, also, it was known to every person in the city out of this House, that the appropriation of three millions of dollars was introduced into the appropriation bill in consequence of the vote which had passed the night before. It is well known (and I see the faces of a hundred persons who know it as well as I do; for they were present at the debates which took place, and which occupied a week, or nearly ten days, before that vote was taken) that that resolution, which finally passed by a unanimous vote, was contested in the most ardent manner, on the ground that it would give occasion for a war. If you look to that resolution as it passed, and to the resolutions which were offered as substitutes, you will perceive that the resolution was debated with the most extreme animation, and that it was opposed and resisted on the ground that it would bring the nation into a war. Well, sir, under these circumstances, although the House did not give just occasion for war by the adoption of that resolution, how was it possible for statesmen, looking to the interests of their country, not to perceive, from the opposition and resistance which had been made previous to the unanimous vote on the resolution, that those arguments, being conjectural, and looking into future events, might possibly be correct; and that it was proper and right that this country should be put upon its defences, and into an attitude to meet and sustain the resolution which they had unanimously passed? This is the ground upon which that item of appropriation was introduced into the general appropriation bill upon the last day of the session. And why upon the last day? Because it was only on the night before, nearly at midnight, that the vote had passed; not a single day was to be lost. In all this debate in the "National Intelligencer" there is no more trace of such a resolution passing this House, than if it had never existed; no more trace than could be found on the journal of the Senate of what they would have done to defend the country, or to insist upon the execution of the treaty. Now, in this debate in the National Intelligencer, I find a prodigious display of eloquence, to show that it was unconstitutional to introduce this section, appropriating the three millions, because it had not been recommended by the President.

Mr. MERCER called to order.

Loud cries of "go on!" "go on!"

Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky, hoped the gentleman would withdraw his point of order, and permit the member from Massachusetts to be heard to the last.

Mr. MERCER gave in writing the exceptionable words, namely, that it had been contended that the "section appropriating the three millions was unconstitutional," &c., thus referring to a late debate in the Senate of the United States. He made this call to order with great regret. In the present position of this country, it was of great importance to preserve comity and harmony in the intercourse between the two Houses. In the present crisis of our affairs, this was, more than ever, of indispensable importance.

The SPEAKER said that the words objected to would be read; the member using them might deny them, and then the House would decide whether they were the words or not. Did the member from Massachusetts deny them?

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman from Virginia expressed a great aversion to quibbling on this subject, and in order to avoid—

Cries of "order!"

Mr. PARKER said that the avenues of the House were so crowded, and the noise so great, that he could not hear what was going forward.

The SPEAKER insisted on members retaining their seats.

Mr. ADAMS. Do I understand that the Speaker calls upon me to say whether those are my words or not?

The SPEAKER. Such is the course prescribed by the rules.

Mr. ADAMS. I say then that, in order to keep perfectly within the rules, I did some time ago do away with any possibility of the application of my remarks to the Senate of the United States, by transferring them to the "National Intelligencer." I did not say, if I recollect right, although in the warmth of debate I cannot remember every single expression I have used, that this publication in the "National Intelligencer" was a debate in the Senate. I said there was a report of a debate in that paper, and that I referred to whatever charge there was in that. I therefore wish that the correction may be made, that the words "Senate of the United States" may be stricken out, so that there may not be on the minutes any formal allusion to the Senate.

Mr. MERCER recapitulated the substance of Mr. ADAMS's words, as they were understood by himself.

Mr. ADAMS said the gentleman from Virginia had arrived at his meaning, but not at his words.

The SPEAKER called to order.

Mr. ADAMS said he wished to say a word. He did, on recollection, remember that he had introduced the word "Senate" in his observations, but it was not in relation to any thing now passing in the Senate. He alluded to what occurred at the last session of Congress; and such allusion as this, he considered, came within the compass of the rule. He had as much right to refer to what occurred at the last session, as he had to any circumstance in history. If not, he must retract his words, and say these things occurred elsewhere. He had no recollection of using the word "Senate," or of referring to it, except as to what occurred at the last session; and what occurred then was now on the journal of the Senate.

Mr. MERCER said that if the member from Massachusetts intended to refer exclusively to the proceedings in the Senate of the last session, he (Mr. M.) would withdraw his point of order.

Mr. ADAMS said he was extremely unfortunate in not being able to make himself understood. He did not say that he referred exclusively to the last session of Congress; he said he did not name the Senate, after the objection made by the member from Virginia, as to what was doing at this time. As to what had been done now, he referred to what appeared in the "Intelligencer," let it be where it might, in the Senate or any where else. But he did allude to what took place in the Senate the last session of Congress; and if he might not do this, he had as well sit down quietly and take the vote upon his resolution; for it appeared, from what was done at the last session, that the constitutional question was connected with the subject of his resolution.

Mr. MERCER renewed his point of order.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would be permitted to proceed, in order or out of order. If ever there was a time when the whole truth ought to be told, touch whom it might, the Senate, the House of Representatives, the President of the United States, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other person, now was that time. Let the House have a fair chance now to hear the truth, and he begged that every gentleman would be permitted to tell all he knew, and of whom he knew it.

The SPEAKER said the objectionable words would be read; which having been done,

JAN. 22, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Massachusetts had declared that these were not his precise words, and the question for the House to determine was, whether they were the words or not; and then the Chair would decide on the point of order.

Mr. MERCER inquired if the member from Massachusetts desired to alter the words, as written down.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; strike out every word in which I am represented as alluding to a present debate in the Senate. I allude to the "National Intelligencer."

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts. To whose speech does the gentleman allude?

Loud cries of "order! order!"

Mr. HARDIN rose to say something, but the House called loudly for order, and

The SPEAKER decided that that gentleman was out of order.

Mr. HARDIN. Oh! very well, Mr. Speaker, but I will be heard some time yet.

"Order!" "order!"

And the question was then put, "Are the words reduced to writing, the words spoken by the member from Massachusetts?"

Whereupon, the House decided that they were not the words spoken; and so there was no question of order before the House.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded. Mr. Speaker, I do assure this House that my object, in the resolution I have now offered, is precisely the same with that which the gentleman from Virginia has, with sincerity I doubt not, offered as his motive for endeavoring to arrest me in my address to the House. It is my wish to restore harmony between all the departments of this Government, not only between this House and the Senate, but also between both Houses of Congress, if possible, and the executive department. For, let me now say, that if ever there was a time when harmony, perfect and complete, between the different departments of this Government was necessary, that time is the present. The people of this country call for it; the interests of the nation demand it; and this is my motive for submitting the resolution before you. Sir, I trust that if this House will indulge me with the appointment of the committee I demand, that committee will have it in their power to report that all the charges which have been made against the House of Representatives of the last session of Congress are utterly groundless and unfounded. Believing that such will be the result, in the appointment of this committee, I hope that it will contribute to restore the harmony, which can no longer exist under present circumstances, between the two branches of the Legislature of this country. The restoration of that harmony depends upon the vindication of the honor of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress; for, if that vindication cannot be made complete, I see no prospect of any harmony between this House and the other at the present session of Congress, and more especially upon that most important of all subjects before us, our relations with a foreign Power—the question of peace or war.

Sir, the foundation of my resolution is entirely defensive; its object is to vindicate the late House of Representatives from reproaches, such as I believe to be utterly undeserved. It is difficult for me to reconnect together the train of thoughts which I was presenting to the House at the time I was interrupted; but I will come to one or two points, which, I believe, require to be elucidated, in order to restore harmony between the two Houses. Whilst giving the history of the introduction of that section for the appropriation of the three millions, I assigned the cause for it, and, in assigning the cause, I said that, in the multitude of reproaches as to the unconstitutionality of the proceedings, both of the Executive and the House of Representatives, at the last session, one of the great charges was, that the House inserted this appropriation without a recommendation from the Executive. This, sir, was the great basis upon which was founded that burst of patriotic indignation and eloquence, which would rather have seen an enemy "battering down the walls of this Capitol" than have agreed to this appropriation for the defence of the country. Sir, only one step more was necessary, and an easy step it was, for men who would refuse an appropriation, even in the terms and under the specifications in which that was proposed, if the enemy were at the gates of the Capitol—I say, there was only one step more, and that a natural and easy one—to join the enemy in battering down these walls.

[At this stage of Mr. A's remarks, there was a loud burst of applause from every part of the House. The Speaker called upon the House to aid him in the preservation of order, and remarked that such an innovation of the rules and dignity of the House had not been known for the last ten years.]

Mr. A. continued. Sir, I pass from that subject to the incidents which occurred in the passage of that bill. I have stated that this section was introduced, from absolute necessity, upon the very last day of the session, because it was the consummation of the unanimous vote of the preceding day; which, in the opinion of many reflecting men, and even of those who voted for the resolution, might probably lead to hostile measures, and might compel the country to appropriate all its resources to the purposes of its own defence. This was the foundation upon which the appropriation was introduced into the bill. And are we now to be told that this and the other House must not appropriate money for the defence of the country unless upon the recommendation of the Executive? Why, sir, the Executive has told you, in his message, that this appropriation was perfectly in accordance with his views, and that declaration is made the ground of the charge of unconstitutional conspiracy and man-worship upon the part of this House, for consenting to that appropriation. Where was the possibility of a recommendation from the Executive of all the estimates to be made from the Department, of all the messages and communications from this to the other House of Congress, to demand these three millions? The resolution of the House passed the day before; that resolution was passed in consequence of a communication from the Executive, and was the act of this House, upon the recommendation, and in furtherance of his views, as expressed in his communication to Congress. What, sir, is the meaning of all these charges of man-worship? Am I a man-worshipper of the President? I appeal to the conscience of every man in this House. I voted for that appropriation in the bill; and if there is one act in which I glory more than another in my life, it is the vote I gave on that occasion. Am I chargeable with man-worship for so voting? Sir, in the repeated occasions which I had to address the House on this subject whilst before it, I certainly did take the liberty of differing with the Executive in relation to certain measures proposed by him. This House differed from the Executive; this House did not adopt the measures recommended by the Executive. But this House, and, thank God, the people of this country, have done homage to the spirit of the Executive which suggested the measures they did not approve. Now, I repeat again, why is it that this House must be charged with man-worship and unconstitutional conspiracy with the Executive of the United States, because they passed an appropriation for three millions of dollars for the defence of the country, at the time when there was believed by many to be imminent danger of war, without a message from the President, and estimates from the Departments?—when it was well known that the resolution passed upon the last day previous to the day on which the session was to close, and when this very appropriation was proposed, instead of another resolution, founded upon the recommendation of the Executive? If you will look to the journal, you will find that the present chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at that time the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, at that time gave notice to the House and to the world, that, instead of the resolution founded upon the recommendation of the Executive, he should propose this very appropriation of three millions of dollars.

We are told in the newspaper that no one knew any thing of the matter; that it was not known till afterwards. No, sir, nothing that passed in the House, more especially going to defend the honor of this country, was known to a certain party of another House; nothing of that kind had been done there. In that place there had been abundant evidence shown upon their journals that they would not do any thing which had the recommendation of the Executive. If you look to the journal of that year to find a syllable of what they thought should be done for the interest of the country, you will look in vain, or you have better eyesight than I have.

Here is a fact as regards the relations of the country with France at that time; there were two systems of policy, or, rather, three. There were the measures recommended by the Executive. (I may refer to these matters now, because they are matters of history.) In another place, there were resolutions passed, very explicitly declaring that they would not do what the Executive recommended; but there was no resolution saying what they would do; there was no resolution having any allusion to a question with a foreign Power. This is not to be found upon their journal. In this House a different course was pursued. This House did not, under the influence of man-worship, adopt the specific recommendation of the Executive, but it adopted that unanimous resolution to show that, although the specific recommendations of the Executive did not meet their views, yet that the rights of the country and the execution of the treaty were to be insisted on. Well, sir, in another branch of this building it seems it was not even known what was doing in this House, and we are told now that they knew nothing about this resolution of the House which had passed unanimously, there being 217 approving ayes recorded on your journal.

That resolution, sir, was the cause of the appropriation; and I believe that in the impartial estimate of the people of this country, and of posterity, it will be found a sufficient cause for the appropriation of the money for the eventual defence of the country, notwithstanding that there were no estimates from the Departments, and no formal declaration of the Executive, betwixt the 2d of March at 12 o'clock at night, and the 3d of March at 8 o'clock in the evening, when that resolution was proposed. The simple statement of the fact that the appropriation arose from the vote of the House, knocks to the ground the whole scaffolding against it, that it was not recommended by the Executive. I ask, where is the objection now? All the eloquence and indignation and horror of the violation of the constitution, of the conspiracy with the President of the United States, and of man-worship on the part of this House, are all gone; not a shadow is left. But, sir, it is not an unnatural thing, in looking for motives for public actions, to imagine that this diversity of policy on the part of the House was by no means welcome in the other part of this building, for the reason that the course taken by this House in the face of the nation was, without question, a declaration that, in another place, there had not been sufficient attention paid to the rights, honor, and interest of the country. The force and power of this resolution was felt. What was the consequence? We did vote the appropriation; and if that vote could have had any effect abroad on the foreign country upon whose action all was depending, to sustain the honor and rights of this nation, the failure of the bill was equally calculated to destroy any effect which that vote might produce.

Well, sir, the three million appropriation was received in the Senate in a most unfortunate temper. I now speak of that, sir, and beg to refer to the proceedings. In the first place, a motion was made for the three millions in this House at seven or eight o'clock in the evening: the yeas and nays were taken upon it—there was little objection made to it here. It was understood by the whole House, upon both sides, that the proposition was in consequence of the resolution the night before; and that that was the foundation of the appropriation. There was not a syllable of objection made here, on the ground that no recommendation from the President or estimates from the Department had been received. No man rose to object to it on this ground. All knew what was the real cause of the proposition; that it was the vote of the previous night; for notice had been given by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in withdrawing his resolution, that measures ought to be taken to put the country into a state of defence. This was the resolution for which was substituted the appropriation of the three millions, explicitly confined to a contingent necessity, intended to provide against the possibility of an enemy battering down the walls of this Capitol. I said, sir, that the proposition was received in another place in a bad temper. Now for the authority: the resolution appears on the journal of this House, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy; provided such expenditure should be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

This was the object. Was this House squandering the public money when they made this appropriation? No, sir. But will it be said that this appropriation might have been abused? Well, sir, when the country is invaded, when the country has an enemy at her walls, it is a sorry objection to make to an appropriation for defence, that it might possibly have been abused. It is a sorry objection to say, that you have no confidence in the man at the head of your Government, that he would apply the money to the proper purpose. I had no such objection. I did believe, in the honesty of my heart, that if an occasion had arisen for the expenditure of this money, it would have been faithfully expended for the purposes for which it was devoted by this House; and whatever may be my opinion of, or my relations with, the head of this Government, I hope the sentiment with which I voted for the appropriation cannot be charged to man-worship.

Upon this appropriation 109 names are recorded in the affirmative; and of this number my own name is recorded as the first. And if all the members of the House are here present, there are seventy-two gentlemen who now hear my voice, whose names are also recorded for it. Are they man-worshippers? Are they conspirators against the constitution of the United States, with the President, or any other human being, or association of human beings? If we are, I apprehend that those who charge us must bring some other evidence of the fact before they will be believed by the people of this country, or by impartial posterity. And, sir, among those seventy-two names, I recognise some whose opinions by no means accorded with those of the Executive, or with those of the majority in this House—names of men who, if they were capable of any thing like man-worship, which I do not believe, it would not be for the present tenant of the executive mansion, but for some other men, even for men who now make this charge against them.

I said that this section of the bill was received in a bad temper in the Senate. There was a burst of indignation and of eloquence against this appropriation; and the Senate immediately disagreed, with very little debate, I believe. They sent their disagreement to this House. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I appeal with certainty to your recollection as the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, when I say that upon this disagreement you did me the honor to ask me, as I had voted for the bill and the appropriation, what the House should do? and that I said that I should vote for receding, because, with the temper which prevailed elsewhere, I was satisfied, if we did not recede, that the whole bill would be lost. That was my opinion; and that was the occasion upon which it will be found upon the journal that, after the Senate had first disagreed, my name is found changed, so far as to vote to recede. I did so vote, as I here declare in the face of the country, not because I meant to recall the vote I had given, but solely under the impression which I say I believed, and then communicated to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that, if the House did not recede, the whole bill would be lost. Now, as the object of the bill was for an appropriation of the same kind as ordinary appropriations for the defence of the country, and believing it impossible to gain the assent of the Senate to the bill as it then stood, I was unwilling to hazard the loss of the whole bill, and I agreed to give up the three millions. A motion in this House was made to recede; and although my vote was given in favor of receding, yet such was not the sense of the House. Upon that motion, the vote stands 87 yeas, against 110 nays, being two or three more than voted for the original proposition, and from which I voted to recede. The sense of this House, therefore, was strong, earnest, and repeated.

How was the bill treated in the Senate? How was it treated in the Senate? Sir, the next communication which the House received was, that the Senate adhered to their disagreement. Adhered! Every man knows that, in the process of intercourse between the two Houses, adhering is the last term in the disagreement, and that it is scarcely ever recurred to except as a challenge of defiance to the other House to persist. What is its consequence? It is, that, by the vote to adhere to that single section, the Senate does substantially say to this House, "take back your appropriation, or lose your bill," and that at the earliest stage at which they could pass such a vote.

It is well known to every man in this House, who has experience in these matters, that this vote to adhere never is passed between the two Houses in a good temper. It is always considered as a gauntlet thrown upon the floor as a challenge, which says, "there, lose your bill, or do what we think right."

As I adduce this circumstance as evidence that the appropriation was received in bad temper, I think myself called upon to prove what I state, that this is not the ordinary and courteous mode of communication between the two Houses. Mr. Jefferson's Manual, under the title of "Amendments between the two Houses," says:

"When either House [i. e. the House of Commons] sends a bill to the other, the other may pass it with amendments. The regular progression in this case is, that the Commons disagree to the amendment; the Lords insist on it; the Commons insist on their disagreement; the Lords adhere to their amendment; the Commons adhere to their disagreement. The term of insisting may be repeated as often as they choose, to keep the question open." The term "insist" (continued Mr. A.) is the courteous and decorous term: one House insists upon its own view, the other upon its own, and then a committee of conference is appointed. The Manual goes on to say:

"But the first adherence by either renders it necessary for the other side to recede or adhere also, when the matter is usually suffered to fall;" that is to say, (continued Mr. A.,) that when both Houses adhere, the bill is lost. The Manual then says:

"The term of insisting was certainly (in 1679) a happy innovation, as it multiplies the opportunities of trying modifications which may bring the Houses to a concurrence. Either House, however, is free to pass over the term of insisting, and to adhere in the first instance. But it is not respectful to the other."

Now, sir, I adduce this as an evidence that the appropriation was received in the other House in bad temper: The Senate did not take the ordinary course of insisting upon their disagreement and asking a conference, or insisting and giving an opportunity for this House to insist and ask a conference. The Manual says it is usual to insist three or four times, sooner than come to this disrespectful mode of communication.

This, sir, is the practice of the British Parliament; we know it is the practice here; we know that if the Senate send here, and the House determines to have no communication whatever, they do sometimes adhere. I know not a single instance of the kind. When a thing is so inherently odious that the House will not listen to it, they send it in this form to the Senate. The Senate does the same thing under similar circumstances; but I doubt whether another instance can be found in which, at so early a stage, the Senate has adhered. No, sir, it was a special odium, a bad odor with which this appropriation was relieved in that House, which induced them to draw the sword and throw away the scabbard, and they adhered to their refusal to appropriate. But, sir, notwithstanding that, on the adherence of the Senate, the natural feeling (which I confess was in my bosom) was, that the House should adhere also; and, although a motion to that effect was made, yet so anxious was the House to pass the bill, that they did not adhere. They passed over the uncourteous and disrespectful proceeding of the Senate, and they neither adhered nor receded; but they insisted again, and they asked the appointment of a committee of conference, to which the Senate agreed. When that agreement was made, the hour of 12, by the real time of the night, had already passed; not by a few minutes, but, according to my recollection, by nearly half an hour. When, I say, the conferees were appointed, that clock, to be sure, (pointing to the clock above the Speaker's chair,) whoever had the management of it had, so far as a clock could show, the power of Joshua, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still. But that was not the power to which old Time submitted; he moved along, not regarding the hands of this or any other clock.

Well, sir, the committee of conference went out, and the conferees of the House on that committee, I am bound to believe, felt constrained very reluctantly to consent to a reduction of this appropriation to $800,000, and thus this dreadful constitutional conspiracy all melted down to a single question of dollars and cents—whether $3,000,000, or only $800,000 should be appropriated for the defence of the country in case of absolute necessity. The appropriation was made positive, instead of being contingent upon a necessity not certain to come, and it was confined to two objects of permanent ordinary appropriation, still leaving the possible contingent danger unprovided for. I say, sir, I believe the committee on the part of the House had been constrained to accede to this reduction, for the same reason for which I had myself voted to recede from the appropriation itself, and that was, to save the bill. But, sir, when that committee returned, this House was no more; it was a lifeless corpse. A friend and colleague of mine, now in my view, remarked indeed that, if it was dead, it was the noisiest dead body he had ever seen or heard of, and he said truly. It was so, but it was nevertheless dead de facto; and your journal will show that, from that time, it was impossible to form a quorum. Just before that, not only a quorum, but a very large quorum, had been found; and I say this, because, among the charges made in the "National Intelligencer," I find a contrasted view in which the extreme assiduity of the members of the Senate upon this last day of the session is compared with that of the House, where business was not transacted for want of a quorum; and that circumstance is much dwelt upon. But why was the House without a quorum? Because there were at least some sixty or seventy members who, being conscientiously convinced that they were no longer representatives of the people, refused or forbore to answer to their names. Your journal will show that motion after motion was made to ascertain if there was a quorum; your journal will show that one of the members of this House, [MR. GILMER,] upon a call of the yeas and nays, declined to answer, upon the ground that the House was not in existence; and your records will show that no motion was made to resort to the rules of the House in order to compel him to vote.

Sir, I must say, in candor, that I was not one who believed that the powers of this House expired at midnight. I held a different opinion, and I then expressed it. More than two hours after the hour of midnight, I here stated that, in my opinion, the two years' duration of Congress, and the four years' duration of the office of President of the United States, was from the time of the day at which the President of the United States was inaugurated, and the time at which the House first commenced its operations—say the hour of noon on the 4th of March. This, I believe, is the true construction of the constitutional term of two years; but it is a constitutional question, and it is not for me to judge of the motives of others who conscientiously believed that, after midnight, they no longer held in their hands the trust which had been committed to them. This was the case with many of the members, and, as a proof of it, I refer to a vote taken a few moments before the want of a quorum was discovered. Upon the last bill which had passed, (the Cumberland road bill,) the question was taken by yeas and nays, and there appeared ninety-four members voting in the affirmative, and eighty in the negative, making a total of one hundred and seventy-four votes. One hundred and twenty-one members constitute a majority of this House; and I say this in vindication of this House upon one of the charges to which it has been subjected—of negligence to do business to such a degree as not to have a quorum. Within ten minutes of the dissolution of this House, there were one hundred and seventy-four members voting; and the want of a quorum was not in consequence of members not being here, but because they conscientiously believed that they no longer had a right to act as the representatives of the people. He recollected the particular instance of an honorable member from Georgia, a man as able, as conscientious, upright, and intelligent, as any member of that House or the present, who, being called upon, refused to answer, and gave as a reason for refusing to answer, that he was no longer a representative of the people; and, when the vote was taken, he left his seat, and went out of that door, from which he never returned. I speak of Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia. At the time, then, when there appeared an absence of a quorum, it was not that there was not an amply sufficient number of members to vote so long as they thought it their right to vote, but from the conscientious conviction of so large a number as reduced the remainder to less than a quorum, that they had no longer a right to vote, because, at the very next calling of the yeas and nays, the whole number that appeared to answer to their names was one hundred and thirteen, being sixty or seventy names less than the previous vote had shown.

Sir, after that took place, the committee of conference returned from the Senate to this House. No report was made upon the conference to this House, and the reason assigned by the chairman of the committee was, that there was no House. The yeas and nays were called, and it appeared that no quorum could be formed.

I have said, sir, that it was not my opinion that the constitutional powers of Congress expired at midnight on the 3d of March; and it becomes a question of some importance, because, if this were so, you would have no continued Government. Every two years there would be twelve hours during which there would be an interregnum, a vacuum, an anarchy, in which no Congress of the United States existed. And worse than that, upon the same principle, at the expiration of the term of service of the President of the United States, you would again have twelve hours of interregnum, of anarchy, before the President elect was inaugurated in his office. I believe, therefore, that the two years' duration of Congress and the four years' duration of the presidential term commence from noon, the time of the inauguration of the President of the United States, and the time at which the first Congress assembled to commence its operations under the constitution. There is nothing said upon this subject in the constitution of the United States; it cannot be made a question of constitutional law. What is the amount of the term of two years? It would be difficult to prove astronomically that two years, computed from the 4th of March at noon, expired in two years on the 3d of March at midnight; there would be a chasm of twelve hours. The time at which a day shall commence and terminate is a matter purely arbitrary and conventional. Some nations, in their civil computations, have commenced the day at sunrise, some at sunset, some at midnight, and some at noon. Do not all navigators, and individuals engaged in the operations of astronomy, compute the day from noon to noon? Every navigator knows this. The principle, once established, could be attended with no inconvenience, whereas the computation from noon to midnight must be subject every two years to a solution of continuity for twelve hours by the non-existence of a House of Representatives, and once in every four years to an interregnum, or vacancy, in the office of President of the United States; and emergencies might arise, might, perhaps, even be precontrived, in which either of these events would be attended with great national inconvenience. Now, astronomically speaking, if you must come to a definite conclusion, I should say that, since the first Congress met at noon on the 4th of March, 1789, two years from that time, at noon, the Congress would cease to exist; and so on up to the present time. Monarchical Governments are always guarded with every possible care against the solution of continuity—their kings never die. It would be a radical defect in every republican Government not to be invested with similar official immortality; the office always filled, however often the incumbent might be changed. Such is my opinion, and if the House had concurred with me, I would have said here until noon of the 4th of March. But such was not the opinion of a large number of the members. It was their opinion that, when the hour of midnight arrived, (making some, and no trifling allowance for the different indications of different timepieces—probably more than half an hour—and willing to do that, some, perhaps, more, and some less, when the time could no longer be doubted,) they believed they had no right to vote. But all that allowance of time had passed, and it was, in my opinion, at least one o'clock before the chairman of the committee of conference returned to this House. Well, sir, it was understood to be a fact, and much discussion has appeared in the newspapers respecting it, that at the time the chairman of the committee of conference returned, the President of the United States had left the Capitol, declaring that he would receive no further communication from Congress, because he considered that the constitutional term of that Congress had expired. Sir, I believe this to be true, and that he did not leave the Capitol till very shortly before one o'clock, if it was not quite one. What was doing in this House at the time must have been known to the members of the Senate, if they had seen fit to take the pains to learn. It was well known to all here that, after this time, no quorum could be formed. No vote could be had—none was taken—the House was de facto dead, however noisy. In this state of things, after the House had expired, and after it was a lifeless corpse, equally impotent for aggression or defence, there came a message to this House from the Senate. And what was it? I ask the Clerk to read it.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[II. OF R.]

[The Clerk read as follows:

“Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States.”]

Mr. A. continued. Mr. Speaker, as one of the oldest members of this House, and as being, from your official character, the guardian and vindicator of the honor of this House, I ask you if, in your experience in the legislation of this country, you have any recollection of such a message passing between this House and the Senate? A message reminding the House of their duty! reminding, the House of what they were to do! reminding the House of that particular business which it was their duty to take up and pass upon! Turning from you, sir, I ask the oldest member in this House, I ask the youngest member in this House, whether he has any recollection of such a message passing between the two Houses, in his experience? Any recollection of such a message from the House to the Senate, or from the Senate to the House? I pause for a reply.

I hear none, sir; and, under these circumstances, I take upon myself the responsibility of saying that no such message had been recorded on the journals of the two Houses since the Congress of the United States has existed. What, sir, one of the two Houses of the Legislature turning task-master to the other! to teach them their duty! Why, sir, we read in Holy Writ of a judge of Israel who undertook to teach the men of Succoth, and it was by scourging them with the briers of the wilderness; and this was precisely such a feature. Here are the briers of the wilderness sent in a message from the Senate of the United States, to teach this House what they are to do, and what are their duties. I dwell upon this, sir, because, if there is to be any such thing as harmony between the two Houses of Congress in the discharge of their duty to the people of this country, I hope this resolution will stand a solitary warning and monument, never to be repeated. I hope that no such message will ever go from this House to the other, for it is not the province of this House to remind the other of its duty. I hope that this House will always understand the courtesy that is due from one public man to another, and from one public body to another, sufficiently to suppose that the Senate of the United States knew themselves what was their duty, and would discharge it accordingly.

I have said that no such example exists on the records of the journal of the two Houses. There are, I am aware, instances in the Parliament of Great Britain of such messages, and they are referred to in the same Manual of Mr. Jefferson. This, sir, is the passage, under the head of Messages:

“When a bill is sent by one House to the other, and is neglected, they may send a message to remind them of it.”

Mr. A. proceeded. But, sir, even there the impropriety of such a message, in all cases inexpedient, and as an act of the grossest discourtesy from one House to another, is noted; and it is said: “But if it be mere inattention, it is better to have it done informally, by communications between the Speakers or members of the two Houses.”

This, sir, is the practice in England. Now, this communication, in the first place, presupposes that the House to be reminded had neglected the business; and the only case in which the Manual says it is practised in England, is where one House neglects. Sir, I have referred to the authorities in Hatsell and Gray, set down in this Manual, for the instances adduced; and I find that the last instance of such a message passing between the two Houses of the British Parliament was in the year 1721, one hundred and fifteen years ago; and in all the cases, and there are several referred to there, principally in the Parliamentary Debates, these messages were never sent unless where there was a serious misunderstanding between the two Houses, and when the neglect of a bill sent from one House to the other was great and exceedingly injurious.

Such is the nature of this message, which I hope, as I have said before, will never be repeated in the future intercourse between the two Houses of Congress. But, sir, to complete the true character of that message, let me inquire at what time it was sent. It was sent at two o'clock in the morning; it was sent after it was perfectly well known here and in the Senate that no quorum of this House could be formed; that the majority considered itself as having closed its labors, and as being no longer the representatives of the people. What was the consequence? When that message was delivered, I was sitting in this chair, and I must confess that, if ever pain and indignation filled my bosom, it was at that moment. I felt it as an insult to the immediate representatives of the people; and if the message had been sent at a moment in which the House was competent to act, with the power to resent an unprovoked insult, I verily believe that, imitating the example given us by the Congress of our confederacy during the revolutionary war, not to the Senate of the United States, but on another occasion, I should have moved that the message be sent back by two members of the House to the Senate, and cast upon the floor, with the declaration that it was not the custom of the House to receive insolent messages. Probably it was well, I believe it was, that I had no opportunity of giving vent to those feelings which arose in my bosom at that time. What were the feelings of other members of the House I know not; it was not for me to say in what light others considered the message. I do not know that I have ever communicated my feelings to any member of that House; I did not communicate them at the time; I suppressed them, for I saw that this insult was committed upon a dead body; I saw that it was the Achilles of the American nation, dragging around the walls of Troy his prostrate and lifeless foe.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

Yes, sir, there was great indignation, great eloquence, and great horror, displayed at the conspiracy and man-worship of this House, with the Executive of the United States, for passing a bill appropriating three millions of money for the defence of the country, and that was the source of this triumphant message. Now, sir, technically speaking, probably the bill containing these appropriations did fail in this House; but if it failed at all, it failed before the appointment of the committee of conference; it failed in consequence of the vote rejecting that particular item of appropriation; it failed because it pleased the Senate, in their wisdom and patriotism, to stake the whole fortifications of the country upon the rejection of that single item. In the interval between that day and this, we have all had time to suffer our feelings to cool. I have submitted in silence to that operation on the part of the Senate, the manner in which it was conducted, and the temper which was manifested not only to the President of the United States, but to this House. I say I have submitted to it in silence; and if it had not been revived, if the charges against the House had not been renewed, with redoubled vigor, and with the transcendent abilities which belong to those who led the Senate to this course of operation, I would have remained silent, I would have sacrificed every thing to peace and harmony. But now, sir, under these charges, repeated, revived, and enforced with all the argument that nine or ten months of meditation could supply to minds of the highest order—when such charges go out to the people of this nation, accusing the House of Representatives of conspiracy with the Executive against their rights and interests, and of unconstitutionality in their proceedings upon this bill, I could no longer sit in silence. I have therefore moved this resolution, so that this House may not put trust in what I have said to them, but that they may appoint a committee to inquire into, and with instructions to report to this House, what were the true causes and circumstances of the failure of that bill.

After Mr. ADAMS had concluded his speech,

Mr. WISE addressed the House to the following effect:

Mr. Speaker, I did not expect this discussion to arise to-day. I was in preparation for it on another occasion, and if my facts, and inferences from them, be not presented so well arranged as they might be, and as is desirable they should be, I hope I shall be excused on the score of being thus called up unexpectedly. The whole matter shall be right in print.

Sir, this has become a very important subject, and should be so considered. The question, "Who is responsible for the failure of the fortification bill of the last session?" is now made to supersede almost every other question, no matter how deeply, pressingly, and immediately, it may involve the most important public interests for the future. I readily confess that we should be providing for the future, rather than be squabbling about the past. But so it is, "the party" has seen fit to make this a test question of political merit; it has been discussed in all the public prints, particularly in that which is the organ of the administration; is made the most prominent subject of discussion in Congress; the most woful misrepresentations concerning it have obtained currency and credence; the innocent are made to bear the sins of the guilty; truth and justice both have been violated; a presidential canvass is made, in part, to depend upon this question; the public mind is anxiously inquiring about it, and I am determined that the whole truth shall be told, and that all the light which I can shed upon it shall be given to the world. The discussion thus far has been perfectly blindfold. By one party the Senate, by another the House of Representatives, has been charged with the loss of that bill. Now, sir, the main fact which I rise to establish is, that neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives is justly chargeable with its failure.

I say, sir, let all crimination and recrimination between the Senate and House of Representatives, both innocent, forever cease, for I can prove by this journal (holding up the journal of the last House) alone, and by other indubitable testimony besides, that neither the Senate nor the House was responsible or censurable for the failure of that bill. The Senate did its duty, the House did its duty, and both were not only willing but anxious for its passage. No blame for its failure is fairly attributable to either. Called upon to say upon whom the blame should fall, I say, as Nathan said unto David, "Thou art the man!" [pointing directly to Mr. CAMBRELENG.]

Sir, let not the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] take this as personally unfriendly or unkind. That gentleman has always been courteous and kind to me, and I desire ever to be courteous, kind, and respectful to him. But truth and duty impose a task upon me on this occasion, which I must perform, regardless of all personal considerations. This subject is introduced by himself, the question is up, it is fair to discuss it, he is here present to defend himself, "eye to eye, and face to face;" this House is the place for the trial, before the eyes of the whole nation, and the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help us God! should go forth to the people from this Capital!

I here charge him as being wholly, or in part, with others of his party, responsible for the failure of the fortification bill at the last session of the last Congress. And, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BRYNUM], who spoke a few days ago on the increase of navy appropriations, need not have been so particular to throw a stumbling-block in the way of freedom of speech and of inquiry on this subject, by repeating emphatically so often that it was "not true" that the House of Representatives was responsible for the failure of that bill. No man who knows the truth of the case will presume or pretend to charge the House of Representatives with that failure. Whether the House of Representatives was guilty or not guilty, is not the true issue. No one will join that issue with the gentleman, and no one who knows the truth of the case will accuse the Senate.

I here make the charge, as I believe it, from the journal, my own evidence, and that of others, to be true; and I appeal to the facts to sustain it. To the facts, then, to the facts!

On the night of Tuesday, the 3d of March, 1835, the three millions amendment to bill No. 600, "An act making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States, heretofore commenced, for the year 1835," was reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That amendment reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy, provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

On the question that the House do concur with the committee in this amendment, the vote stood: Yeas 109, nays 77. Number of votes, 186.

JAN. 22, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

I beg of the House to mark the number of votes given, as I proceed.

On the bill to establish branches of the mint, the next vote, upon a call of ayes and noes, was, yeas 115, nays 60. Number of votes, 175.

A message was afterwards received from the Senate, informing the House that they disagreed to the three millions amendment. A motion was then made by Mr. Gholson that the House do recede from its amendment. The previous question was then called, and on the main question, "Will the House recede from the said amendment?" the vote stood: Yeas 87, nays 110. Number of votes, 197.

The House then insisted on its amendment, and sent a message to inform the Senate. The Senate then returned a message that the Senate "adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of" the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. Cambreleng that the House do adhere to their said amendment.

[Here the SPEAKER interrupted Mr. Wise, by saying it was not in order to call members by name on the floor. Mr. Wise replied that he was reading from the journal of the last Congress.]

Upon a motion then to recede, the previous question was demanded, and upon the question, "Will the House recede?" the vote stood: Yeas 88, nays 107. Number of votes, 195.

A motion was then made by Mr. Hubbard that the House do ask a conference; which motion was carried; and Mr. Cambreleng, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Hubbard, were appointed managers to conduct the said conference on the part of the House.

Here, sir, permit me to remark, that the honorable Dixon H. Lewis, of Alabama, has not yet arrived, from indisposition, and he is not here to testify. I wish, for the sake of a full development, he was in his place. But, sir, Mr. Cambreleng is now in this House, and Mr. Hubbard is now in the Senate.

[Here the SPEAKER again interposed, and said the gentleman was out of order in calling gentlemen by their names.]

Mr. Wise again replied that he was reading from the journal of the last Congress.

[The SPEAKER said the gentlemen named are of this House.]

Mr. Wise proceeded. Well, sir, Mr. Lewis, of the last Congress, is not here; Mr. Cambreleng, of the last Congress, is now of this House; and Mr. Hubbard, of the last Congress, is now of the Senate; and Mr. Cambreleng, of the last Congress, can here tell the whole truth; and Mr. Hubbard, of the last Congress, can tell the whole truth in his place, if the gentlemen will come out fully, as they should. Each House of this Congress is supplied from the committee of conference of the last session with a witness of all the facts, who can, if he will, disclose the real truth of this whole transaction. Will they tell what they know? Will they satisfy the public mind? Will they disclose all, and conceal nothing? I pray them to speak out, and hold nothing back, for the sake of truth and justice! Sir, I could not sit in my seat calmly and coolly, and suffer the torture of this controversy, much less rise and speak, knowing the whole truth, without disclosing it fully. I could not permit innocence in my sight to grope about blindly for its defence, though guilt should fall on my own head by disclosing the truth. I could not see violence done to truth and justice, whilst I was present ready with the means of vindicating both. Let the witnesses, the best witnesses the case admits of, come forward and testify fully as to all the facts, known or unknown! Will they do it?

[Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would tell all.] I am glad to hear it, and I shall congratulate the country and the friends of truth and justice, if all be told. But to proceed.

The Senate was notified of the request for a conference.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to render permanent the present mode of supplying the army, &c., which took up considerable time. Mr. Briggs, from the joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported the examination of two enrolled bills, and Mr. Dickerson reported that forty-four bills had been presented to the President, the titles of which were named. Mr. Ashley, of Missouri, during this time, also made several motions, which occupied considerable time, to take up a harbor bill, which does not appear on the journal. And at this and every point of time, the House was delayed by continual efforts to take up particular subjects not in order.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Cumberland road bill. Previous to the vote on this bill, the conferees on the three millions amendment had returned into the House.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here said, no, no; he had remained in the House, after being appointed on the committee of conference, until the vote on the Cumberland road bill, and voted on that bill; that the committee did not return to the House until about the time of the vote on the Moore and Letcher resolutions, which was some time after 12 o'clock.]

Mr. Wise proceeded. Sir, the gentleman must be mistaken, or he was guilty of a neglect of duty in delaying so long to attend the committee of conference. From the time of the appointment of the conferees until the vote on the Cumberland road bill, more than an hour elapsed; and if the gentleman was so conscientious about the time of night he legislated, he should have hastened to do his duty on the committee of conference, lest the House should expire before this precious bill could in conscience be saved. As he did not though, but delayed until the hour had come, he should, on that ground, if on no other, be held responsible. But, sir, my recollection is, that the committee of conference returned into the House before the vote on the Cumberland road bill; and just before or at the time of that vote, the first notice that I heard was given of the hour. The vote on the Cumberland road bill was taken up after 12 o'clock at night, I know, from two circumstances. Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia, than who no man is more honest, and no man more unaffectedly scrupulous on points of conscience, when his name was called, rose, pulled out his watch, and audibly announced to the House that he could no longer sit in his place and vote, for the reason that the hour of twelve had arrived. He immediately left the House. He practised bonafide what he professed. He gave me the first notice of the time, and of the question whether, in fact, we were defunct. He did not depend upon that false clock face, (pointing to the clock above the Speaker's chair,) the hands of which were made that night to point backwards. It was the first time in my life I ever saw old Time flying backwards; the old might soon have returned to their youth again. I wish that clock was all that is false which is fair about this Capitol! He relied on his own watch, which was regulated by his conscience. Thus reminded of the hour, and struck by the conduct of Mr. Gilmer, upon whose watch and whose conscience I could rely, I was on the point of making opposition to the bill before the House, for reason of the hour, as well as of constitutional objections, when I was prevented by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKENNAN,] who held me down, in a playful way, in my seat, which circumstance he may recollect. Thus I am certain, that when the vote on the Cumberland road bill was taken, the hour had come and was past! I voted on that bill on account of my constitutional objections to it, and declined several votes afterwards, until my colleague [Mr. MERRICK] and others convinced me there was no foundation for the objection to voting after 12 o'clock. On the question, "Shall the bill pass?" the vote stood: Yeas 94, nays 80. Number of votes 174.

This, sir—this was the last bonafide vote of the last House of Representatives. Here it died, strangled by fraud and foul play!

I beg of the House to stop here a moment with me, whilst I collect together and group the facts which I wish borne along in our remembrance, when approaching other facts which follow.

The House will please to remember that the committee of conference was appointed long before the vote on the Cumberland road bill, and time enough for them to have reported before the hour expired.

Remember that the committee of conference returned just before or at the time of the vote on the Cumberland road bill, or just before or at the time of the vote on the Moore and Letcher resolutions. I care not which.

That, from the offering of the three millions amendment until the Cumberland road bill, inclusive, the yeas and nays were called five times, showing, at the different times, 186, 175, 197, 195, and, immediately preceding the Moore and Letcher resolutions, 174 members present and voting.

Mark, now, the names of those who voted on the Cumberland road bill knowingly and wittingly, with proclamation of notice, after twelve o'clock at night. Among the yeas in favor of that bill we find the name of Samuel Beardsley, a gentleman who, in a breath afterwards, excused himself from voting, for the reason "that the term for which the members of the twenty-third Congress had been elected had expired." Such is the vote, and such the reason for not voting, as the journal shows beyond dispute.

[Here Mr. BEARDSLEY said that, by his watch, it was not so late as twelve o'clock when the vote on the Cumberland road bill was taken. He recollected that there was a diversity of opinion about the hour.]

Well, sir, the gentleman has served in more than one Congress: did he ever know any diversity of opinion, any question about the hour, before the last night of the last session?

[Mr. BEARDSLEY said he could not submit thus to be catechised.]

I know, sir, from childhood up, that catechisms are unpleasant; but when truth is suffering violence we must all submit patiently to be questioned, and the nation must know all the facts, and the whole intent in this case. But perhaps by that gentleman's watch it was not then twelve o'clock, though it was soon afterwards. I know it was twelve o'clock and past, for I remember well the fact that Mr. Gilmer, whose conscience did keep a strict watch over his timepiece, announced it to the House and departed from his post, which he never did unless compelled by sickness or a sense of duty; and I know that I was held in my seat by the strong arm of a strong friend of the Cumberland road bill. The name of that gentleman is not the only name which I wish the House to remember among the votes on this bill after twelve o'clock at night. Among the nays, sir, we find the name of Churchill C. Cambreleng.

[Here the SPEAKER again interrupted Mr. WISE for calling members by name.]

Mr. WISE again said, I claim the right to read the journal of the last session of Congress. Names, dates, persons, facts, are what are wanted. I cannot get along unless I am permitted to call things by their right names. It is impossible for me to get along with any thing like a connected relation of facts, if I am thus to be interrupted.

[The SPEAKER said the gentleman has the right to read from the journal. I thought he was naming gentlemen in this House.]

Mr. WISE replied, I have told you, Mr. Speaker, repeatedly, that I was reading from the journal, and I claim the right to read plainly out the name of—Churchill C. Cambreleng.

[Cries of "go on! go on!"]

As soon as Churchill C. Cambreleng gave this vote, and all the votes were told, after twelve o'clock at night, Churchill C. Cambreleng, the chairman of the committee of conference, might as well have done his duty and made his report to the House. But this is not all. Two enrolled bills were next reported, one of which the Speaker signed after twelve o'clock at night, confessedly.

Mr. Jarvis, of Maine, then moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, the hour having arrived when the term for which this House was elected has expired, we do now adjourn."

Sir, note that here is a resolution offered to the House, giving additional notice to that of Mr. Gilmer, that the hour had come. Note by whom this resolution was offered: by a gentleman who afterwards voted.

[The CHAIR again interposed for calling proper names.]

Mr. WISE. I read from the journal. I call the attention of the House to the fact that here is a resolution to adjourn, for the reason of the time of night—that the hour had come—that we were dead. Mr. Jones, of Georgia, also, immediately moved to adjourn, for the purpose of trying whether the House thought it could sit after twelve o'clock. Here is double notice to all who had conscientious scruples. It was negatived. When was the want of a quorum to do this?

A motion was then made to suspend the rules to take up the Moore and Letcher resolutions. It passed in the affirmative. Where was the want of a quorum to prevent doing this? After debate, the previous question was moved and demanded. On the question, "Will the House agree to the resolution as herein recited?" the vote stood: Yeas 111, nays 2. Number of votes, 113.

No quorum! but among the yeas I find the names of John Quincy Adams and Churchill C. Cambreleng! Yes, sir, both voting long after all had been thrice notified that the hour had come! Where were their consciences?

[The CHAIR here said it was not in order to indulge in personalities, or to refer to motives.]

Mr. WISE. Why, sir, the gentleman before me (Mr. C.) is continually assuring me that he does not object to be named, and why should the Speaker? No member calls to order, and I hope I shall be permitted to proceed. The gentleman from Massachusetts has said that gentlemen refused to vote after twelve o'clock, for reason of "conscientious scruples." I put the question, then, in more charitable phrase: where were their "scruples?" Not only had Mr. Gilmer retired, announcing beforehand his reason, but two resolutions had been expressly offered to adjourn, assigning the reason that the hour had expired—notice given verbally and in writing before this vote was taken. Where were the scruples of the gentleman then, who after this gave as one reason for not reporting from the committee of conference, that the hour had come?

But, sir, the most important fact at this point of time to be noted is, that at one moment you see one hundred and ninety-seven, at another one hundred and ninety-five; immediately preceding this moment one hundred and seventy-four members present and voting; and of a sudden, in the twinkling of an eye, as if by magic word, there is no quorum! Sir, at the sound of the whistle, the Roderick Dhu-men disappeared! Where did they go—why—for what?

Two enrolled bills were next reported as having been presented to the President for his signature; and a message was next received from the President, notifying the House—the House, of course, then in being, after, long after, 12 o'clock—that he had approved and signed more than seventy enrolled bills. The President, this proves, was in the Speaker's room after 12 o'clock at night, signing bills. It is notorious he was in that room signing bills, after that time of night, after Mr. Gilmer retired, and after the resolution of Mr. Jarvis to adjourn. [The CHAIR again interrupted Mr. Wise for mentioning names.]

Mr. WISE asked, what names?

The CHAIR. The name of Mr. Jarvis.

Mr. WISE. I am reading from the journal.

The CHAIR. I did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. WISE. Why, sir, those names which I am reading from the journal died, according to conscience, on the 3d of March last!

Mr. MERCER said his colleague [Mr. Wise] must of necessity refer to the names of members of the last Congress.

Mr. WISE. I claim the right to do so, and protest against this interruption of the Speaker!

The CHAIR disclaimed any intention to interrupt the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WISE. I hope I may proceed, then, without interruption. A motion was received from the Senate as to enrolled bills, signed by the President. How could we receive this message if we were dead? A motion was again made by Mr. Jarvis to adjourn. Here it was that Samuel Beardsley, of New York, being called, declined to answer, on the ground that the session had expired! He was called and came not, at this time, because the hour had come! Had not the hour come on the Cumberland road bill? Was not notice given to all by Mr. Gilmer that the hour had then come? Mr. Beardsley's name was passed over, and he did not answer again that night. There were many others who did not come again that night, who were here, but had a call from behind the curtain—who shrunk from their posts, and skulked behind that chair, behind those pillars, appeared and disappeared at the sound of the whistle, and who should have shrunk into nonentity!

The question was taken on adjournment moved, then, notoriously after twelve o'clock, by Mr. Jarvis, who had already said, by his resolution, we were dead. The vote stood: Yeas 15, nays 103. Number of votes, 118.

Here, sir, only three members were wanting to make a quorum; and I know, I will make oath to the fact, that there were more than three members in the House who did not vote. Mr. Beardsley was present, Mr. Mann, of New York, was present, and I was present myself, and neither of us voted. I will account, sir, for not voting myself. I wish every gentleman would do so, and had done as I did afterwards—answered when called. But who did vote? Mr. Jarvis voted in the affirmative, and Churchill C. Cambreleng voted in the negative, voted against adjournment, after he knew the hour had come! After every kind of notice which he could have had of the expiration of the hour, he voted against adjournment; virtually declaring, necessarily voting that the House might sit, was competent to legislate, and ought to continue in session. Now, sir, gentleman may excuse themselves, those who pretend to have had "conscientious scruples," for voting in the affirmative, for that may have expressed their scruples about continuing to sit; but I am utterly at a loss to see what can justify those who had "conscientious scruples" in voting against adjournment. Why vote to sit if they could not sit? If the House no longer existed in law, and possessed no legislative functions or power, after the hour of twelve, what object was there in voting to continue its session? Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] say that he changed his opinion; that his "scruples" were begotten between this point of time and the moment he refused to report the proceedings of the committee, for the reason that the hour of twelve o'clock had expired?

But, sir, I must proceed; I am determined to travel over the whole journal, and point out every fact, even to the crossing of the t's and the dotting of the i's. After Mr. Jarvis's last resolution failed, for want of a quorum, Mr. William Cost Johnson, of Maryland, from the select committee on establishing a national foundry, made a report, which was read, and the resolution therein recommended was agreed to by the House! How could this report be made, and this resolution be agreed to by the House, if there was no quorum and no House? If a quorum and if a House to receive and agree to a report and resolution of a select committee, why was there not a quorum and a House to receive and agree to the report of the committee of conference? Why did its chairman, Churchill C. Cambreleng, not then make its report? He was voting against adjournment, though he knew, all knew, the hour had come; and, so far from being a dead body, the House was a living, legislating, acting, moving body!

The Speaker then laid before the House no less than nine communications from the executive Departments, among which was the letter of the Postmaster General, which was read; and Mr. White, of Florida, laid upon the table an act of the Legislature of that Territory. In a word, sir, every species of legislative action was performed. We were invested with all the functions, attributes, powers, and paraphernalia of a House of Representatives. We were not dead, but living legislators, with the substance as well as the semblance of an organized body—the Speaker sitting in that chair, the members here in their seats, long after it was notorious that the hour of twelve o'clock was past and gone forever. Thus formed, thus acting, living, moving, and having our being, we received a message from the Senate to notify the House that the Senate was waiting for us to act upon the fortification bill:

"A message from the Senate, by Mr. Lowrie, their Secretary:

"Mr. Speaker, I am directed to bring to this House a resolution passed by the Senate, and which is as follows:

"Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States."

Sir, what did this message mean or say, which could have been offensive? It is expressly respectful in its language and in its object. The Senate was waiting for the action of the House on this bill, which alone delayed the termination of the session, and which remained unacted upon by the House, whilst it was acting upon a great variety of other business of much less importance. To my mind, the Senate, by this message, so much abused in the interpretation of it, said to the House, "respectfully," "we do not wish this bill to fail, and we respectfully ask that you will act upon it, and save the interests of the country involved in its passage." This message was received; it was not sent back with an insult to the Senate, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would have dashed it on their floor; and what then transpired? The journal states:

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 22, 1836.]

"Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of the conferees on the part of the House, then rose and stated that he declined to make report of the proceedings of the committee of conference aforesaid;" and, sir, mark the reasons, and compare them with the facts already detailed: "On the ground that, from the vote on the resolution granting compensation to Robert P. Letcher, which vote was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference, it was ascertained that a quorum was not present; and, further, that he declined to make the said report, on the ground that the constitutional term for which the House had been chosen had expired."

Up to this moment the House had been hourly waiting for the report of the committee of conference, and not until this moment had the least intimation been given that the chairman of the committee would decline to make the report! He gave two reasons: First, "it was ascertained no quorum was present." How was this ascertained? Why was not a quorum present? That is what I wish the gentleman to answer me! Up to a given point of time—up to the vote on the Moore and Letcher resolutions; and, if that was the time when the committee of conference returned, up to the very moment when that committee did return, there were one hundred and seventy-four members present and voting—fifty-three more than a quorum. What became of this number of votes? Why, sir, at the sound of the whistle, at the wink of the leaders, the "faithful vanished! the "trained bands" were "down! down!" in ambuscade, at the stamp of the foot! It was not because they were not here, but because, being here, they would not vote—were ordered not to vote, that there was no quorum. I put it to the gentleman if he did not know, and does not know now, that there was more than a quorum present? How many were present refusing to vote, when but three were wanting to be added to the vote of one hundred and eighteen? Were there not more than twenty present who voted, or refused to vote, as circumstances directed them, or as the leaders pleased? Who were they who would not vote? Read the journal for yourself—he who runs may read. Look at the names of "the party!" It was not the House, or a majority, which was to blame. A majority of the House was ready, and willing, and anxious, to pass the bill; but a very small minority could reduce us below the number of a quorum. A majority of the House maintained their posts and did their duty that night. Some, it is true, left from anxiety to get home, some were sleepy, some were—I beg pardon, I was about to say some were drunk; but, drunk or sober, they were ready to vote and pass the bill; but the chairman of the committee of conference [Mr. CAMBRELENG] would not make his report, because there was no quorum! Now, how did he know there was no quorum without a call of the House?

[Mr. CAMBRELENG. I knew it.]

Mr. WISE. Yes! I know you knew there would be no quorum without a call; no man knew it so well as you did! But how did you know it? Did you not know where those were who were ordered to be "deficit" on the occasion of a call? So much for the want of a quorum!

The second reason of the gentleman was, "that the constitutional term for which the House had been chosen had expired!" Now sir, please compare this reason with the gentleman's own votes. Thrice, previous to his excuse, the gentleman himself had voted on a call of the yeas and nays—he voted on every call—from the Cumberland road bill up to this paltry excuse, repeatedly after twelve o'clock at night! He voted against the Cumberland road bill, then in favor of a resolution to pay money out of the House fund to Robert P. Letcher, and actually against an adjournment, after the hour of twelve o'clock, before he gave in this excuse for not reporting from the committee of conference; and, sir, will it be believed that the gentleman did actually vote upon a call of the yeas and nays even after he gave this reason, that the term of the House had expired! Sir, I cannot understand the consistency of this conduct with these excuses for failing to do an act of duty. Can the gentleman explain this?

[Mr. CAMBRELENG. Yes, I will.]

Mr. WISE. You will attempt it, but you cannot explain it. Yes, sir, after this excuse was offered, a motion was made to adjourn, and on the call of yeas and nays Mr. Cambreleng was found still voting. And, sir, among the list of nays on this last vote, at the far end of the night's labors, is found the name of John Quincy Adams.

[Mr. ADAMS here explained.]

Mr. WISE was proceeding to reply; when

[Mr. MERCER said his colleague had totally misapprehended the gentleman from Massachusetts, and repeated in substance Mr. ADAMS's explanation.]

Mr. WISE. Then I have misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he had been arguing all the time that the House was a dead Hector at twelve o'clock that night. The distance of the gentleman's seat prevents my hearing him distinctly. I am happy to be corrected, for the gentleman's opinion is one I regard highly on such questions.

But, sir, there is that other name, which must not be forgotten, by the side of the towering name of the gentleman from Massachusetts; that name reads, Churchill C. Cambreleng, who continued to vote after he excused himself from reporting, because in his conscience he was dead!

To go back a little. Mr. Cambreleng, with such excuses, and such of his own conduct to rebut them, declined to make the report of the conferees, and Mr. Lewis had to make the report, long, long after the conferees had returned to the House.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG said the report was not made by Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. WISE. He did make it! Here it is upon the record, (holding up the journal:) this journal says so.

"Mr. Lewis, from the conferees, then made a report, as follows:

"That the conferees had agreed to recommend to the respective Houses, that the House of Representatives recede from its amendment, containing an appropriation of three millions of dollars, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy; and that, in lieu thereof, the bill be amended by inserting therein the following, viz:

"As an additional appropriation, the sum of $300,000 shall be appropriated for arming the fortifications of the United States, over and above the sums provided in this act; and that the sum of $500,000 shall be, and hereby is, appropriated for the repairs and equipment of the vessels of war of the United States, in addition to previous appropriations; the said sums to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

On the question to adopt this report, it was objected there was no quorum; and tellers having been named, they reported that no quorum was present.

Mr. Lewis did make the report, whether it was received or not, and it was entered on the journals. I was sitting by him when he made the report. He took it from Mr. Cambreleng, who was called on to make it, and handed it to the messenger of the Clerk, who has put it upon record. He made the report, though the hour had come! And, sir, I could not but observe his astonishment when Mr. Cambreleng refused to make the report. No quorum! Do we ever count the House when we receive the report of a committee?

JAN. 22, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

How know there was not a quorum before a count? Sir, it was notorious there was a quorum; it was known to every man. I would say, if there was one, there were one hundred and fifty members at least in the House when that report was made. They were in that lobby; they were skulking in every direction, and refused to vote. They knew their own motives. I will not dive into their hearts, but such is the fact!

After the yeas and nays on adjournment, we received another message from the Senate, by Mr. Lowrie:

"Mr. Speaker, I am directed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate has finished the legislative business before it, and is ready to adjourn."

Now, sir, no man will accuse me of being the advocate or the apologist of the Senate. But "give the d—l his due." Let the truth be told—acquit whom it may—injure whom it may. This message can be considered in no other light than another respectful intimation to the House to act on the fortification bill. So I considered it at the time. The Senate could not with propriety have renewed the first message, without seeming to arrogate the prerogative of dictating to the House, or without seeming to be guilty of the insolence which was charged upon the first message by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] They therefore said, "the Senate has finished the legislative business before it!" And was this not the fact? Was the fortification bill there? No, sir! it was here, in this House, and here unacted on! Yes, sir, notwithstanding this bill was still unacted on in the House, Mr. F. O. J. Smith, of Maine, one of the "faithful," offered a resolution, "that a committee be appointed to wait on the President, and to notify him that, unless he may have further communications to make, the two Houses of Congress, having completed the business before them, are ready to close the present session. Although this was admitting that the session had not closed, yet, was it true that both Houses had completed the business before them? Had the House of Representatives acted on and completed the fortification bill which was before it? It had not. The Senate had completed its business; the House had not.

The House again proceeded to take up the Letcher resolution. There was no quorum answering, though one present. Mr. Smith then moved a message, to notify the Senate that the House "had completed the business before it," whilst the fortification bill was still unacted on, and after the two messages from the Senate directing our attention, requesting our attention, to it! Pending this motion and the call of the House, Mr. Mason moved to adjourn, because the Senate had adjourned, and his motion passed in the affirmative, without even the usual interchange of courtesy between the two Houses and the other branch of the Government. Such was the termination of the last Congress; and I do say, sir, it was one of the most disgraceful scenes I ever witnessed; it was unbecoming barbarians and savages, much more the representatives of a civilized nation! Sleepy, tired, drunk!

Mr. BYNUM. Is the gentleman in order when speaking thus of the last Congress?

Mr. WISE. I do not pretend to say, Mr. Speaker, that all Congress was drunk, or that one half, one third, or one tenth of the members were drunk; but I know that some were drunk; that I was not of the number; and so it was, that what with manoeuvring, being tired, opposed to some measures, sleepy, drowsy, and drunk, no quorum could be had unless it had suited certain individuals.

Mr. LANE said he should like to hear the names of those who were drunk.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman might feel unhappy, sir, if I were to mention names.

I have now, sir, given you the facts upon the journal; but there are other important facts—facts unwritten, as well as facts written. Out with them! Come, rise in your high places all, here and elsewhere, and tell the truth, the whole truth. Sir, it is said that bill failed in the House. That is not true. It failed before it got to the House from the conference room. It dropped like a spent ball before it quite got here; it dropped near that door. Sir, there are two statements about the matter; they may be conjectural; I cannot vouch for them. I mean to put interrogatories. I put it to the gentleman, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] Did no "busybody" whisper aught in his ear as he was on his way to report to the House? Did no one tempt him, as he passed, to strangle the bantling under his care? Was there no magician near? No d—l and his imps? And, if this may be denied, I put it to the honorable chairman of the committee of conference, [Mr. C.,] if no member of the committee received a billetdoux after he resumed his seat? Did the honorable chairman, after he left the conference room, not intend to make the report? Did he not, after he returned to the House with it, inform a gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. FORESTER,] though it was then after twelve o'clock at night, that he intended to make the report? Did he not sit down by a gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] and give him to understand, with the report on the desk before him, that the report was to be made? Why did that intention fail? What prevented? Sir, there were spirits haunting the Capitol that "awful night"—there were strange whispering—chattering elfs—ghosts, as I am told—I did not see them—blue devils and imps! Is it true? Was there any dealing with the "infernals" that night? Tell us, I pray, tell us, and let the curse fall on the necromancers—not on the victims of the horrid spell!

[Mr. CAMBRELENG. I can tell you.]

Mr. WISE. Ay, you can tell us, can you? There is another more important fact, which must come out. Out with it all, say I. You, Mr. Speaker, ay, you, sir, are deeply concerned in that matter; deny it if you can. Before I disclose that fact, I must premise that I voted for the three millions amendment. There were 109 votes for it, the name of John Quincy Adams first, and my name last, on the list of yeas. I was held to a strict accountability for that vote by my constituents, with whom I have settled it, as a gentleman whom I now see [Mr. TYLER] can attest, for I believe he heard my reasons and my apologies before the people. Sir, I have now to say that, under the impressions of that amendment at the time I gave that vote, I would give the same vote again, with the same information I then possessed. And here, be it known, by the way, in justice to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that he did notify me personally in that lobby—I do not know that he notified the House—one or two days before the 3d of March, I believe—

[Here Mr. C. said he notified the House the day before, when he withdrew the resolution for contingent preparation for war.]

Mr. WISE. Of that I am not certain; but the gentleman did notify me, personally, perhaps the day before it was offered, that he intended to offer that amendment, and asked if I would vote for it. I replied that, without reference to a state of war, for a peace establishment alone, I would vote for thrice three millions, for the purpose of putting our navy in respectable trim, and to repair and complete our fortifications. But no one notified me, no one informed me or the House, in my hearing, that the President recommended that additional appropriation, or that "it was in accordance" even "with the views of the Executive!" I had sufficient information of my own, without the views of the Executive, to convince me of the necessity of a large

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 22, 1836.]

appropriation for means of national defence. I knew that our navy and fortifications were in a most lamentable and disgraceful condition—disgraceful to a nation like this—disgraceful to the Departments which have their care and superintendence! I knew that, notwithstanding our commerce floats and needs protection in every sea, notwithstanding the navy was a popular favorite, notwithstanding more than sixty-five millions had been expended on a navy since the last war, we had but one ship of the line in commission on the ocean! We have but one now.

I knew that several new ships, which had never been in service, were rotten and decayed. I knew that some were rotten on the stocks for want of care. I knew that the naval architecture which has lately been introduced by the board of navy commissioners was a disgrace to the arts in this country. I knew that to put crews on board several of our sloops of war, the Warren, Lexington, and Natchez, for instance, was to send them to a prison-ship; that the vessels could not sail fast enough to overtake any thing they could whip, and could not get out of the way of any thing that could whip them. I knew that the projectors were ashamed of their own experiment. I knew that immense sums of money had been thrown into mud and water upon certain "water-halls." I knew that certain grand improvements upon our guns, reducing their weight from that well-known standard of experience and science, 200 pounds of metal to the pound of ball—the chimera of medium guns*—had ruined, in a great measure, our naval ordnance. I got the report of the inspector of naval ordnance into the House the very last night of the session, through my friend the honorable William Cost Johnson, who made the report on establishing a national foundry. That report had been made to the board of navy commissioners for more than twelve months, and had never been communicated to Congress, because, I presume, it exposed some of the chimeras of the Department, and shows how the sixty-five millions have, in part, been expended. From that report I knew that about 750 of the guns of the navy were unfit for service, and they are now, many of them, on board your vessels of war. The men are afraid of them. I knew it would take from six to twelve months to get our ships and vessels of war in ordinary afloat. Concerning the War Department, I knew that scarcely one of the old fortifications, which were left dilapidated by the last war, was in a state of repair. Witness the facts exposed during the debate that very last night of the session in relation to Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, and the works on the Gulf of Mexico! I knew that, notwithstanding more than twenty-six millions had been expended on building, or rather on commencing to build, fortifications since 1820, not one scarcely of our new fortifications was completed. I say "commencing to build," because the system has not been one of defence; it has been one of electioneering to scatter Government patronage! Instead of completing those commenced before others are begun, as many congressional districts as possible are given a taste of Treasury papp, and the works begun and incomplete are left to the necessary injury of delay, and to the tender mercy of any enemy who may choose to capture them. Your own forts are now exactly in the condition either to be blown up, or to be turned upon yourselves. Witness Old Point Comfort and the Rip Raps! I knew, sir, that, with the most extended coast of any people on the face of the earth, on the gulf, on the Atlantic, and on the lakes, to be defended, we had not a fort in readiness for any emergency, near or afar off. I knew, according to information from the ordnance department, it would take twenty years, at the present rate of appropriation, one hundred thousand dollars only per annum, or, in other words, a present appropriation of two millions of dollars, for armament of fortifications alone! I knew we had but three safe foundries in the entire eastern section of the country, at which ordnance can be cast. I knew that casting of ordnance was no light job, and two millions worth was not to be cast in a day. I knew that from Florida to Maine there was not a single fort which could mount twenty guns. I knew that there were no gun carriages. Witness Fort Washington, the guard of the pass to this Capitol, which has once been burnt, has not a gun on its ramparts. And, in addition to all this, I knew that a French minister (General Bernard) knows our condition of defence better than we do, for he has been our chief engineer! Such I know to be our condition, and such I know to be our condition now, though year after year, every year the false cry has been heard from the watch-towers, "all's well!" Every session of Congress, every return of the session, have we been most graciously greeted with the formal and fashionable congratulations and felicitations on the happy and unparalleled present condition and the prospects of the future prosperity of our country. And, Mr. Speaker, here we are! caught naked, defenceless, unprepared, and unpreparing for defence, with our hands in the lion's mouth! Let those who have all the time had all this information, and who have all the day been standing idle, recommending nothing, reporting nothing, advising nothing, no! not until this very moment, bear the blame; I, and those with whom I act, are innocent.

Sir, I say I knew that, with all this immense want of appropriation, three millions would be but as a drop in the bucket for either of the objects—fortifications, ordnance, or increase of the navy. Knowing this, I voted for that amendment. Not with reference to war; for, not more than twenty-four hours before, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had withdrawn his resolution to make contingent preparation for war, though that gentleman proposed the three millions amendment, and now assigns the necessity at the time of preparing for war as the reason! The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] withdrew a similar resolution, and voted the very next day for this amendment; and now tells us that the "next step for those who voted against that amendment was to join the enemy!" After the withdrawal of that resolution upon French affairs, but the day before, by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, could I, could any not initiated, doubt that these three millions were not proposed for war? I voted for the amendment for reasons of peace, not of war. I thought it the best way to keep peace to be in a state of readiness for war, and that sound economy as well as policy required the appropriation. For the reasons I have given, I wanted no estimates, no more data than I had already.

But, sir, many gentlemen had not then this information—the estimates, the data. No information, no estimates, no data, were furnished by the Departments, or by the committees. There was time enough for the estimates to have been furnished; for I tell you that notice was given to me personally, beforehand, and it must have been in contemplation, before notice, that this amendment was to be offered; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] shall not claim to have given notice, and still urge that there was not time for the data to be furnished. Indeed, all the time his resolution was pending to make contingent preparation for war, these data and estimates should have been prepared; they should always be ready. But no information of the kind was furnished those even who might have been willing to vote upon faith in the President.

* These guns, I am told, were ordered in 1826.—Note by Mr. W.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

The faith of some was monstrous strong!—did not know that he wished such an appropriation, or even that he thought it proper. Why, sir, when I returned home, and was accused by my opponents of voting the President three millions of dollars, I honestly and sincerely told my friends that the President never called for the appropriation, and I presumed he must have thought it unnecessary, or he would, as in duty bound, have certainly recommended it by message, or through some Department. Never, until I saw his message to this Congress, did I know that amendment was "in accordance with the views of the Executive. And, sir, I venture to say that a large majority of the last Congress were as ignorant as I was of any such "views of the Executive." I can prove here on the spot, by a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [MR. PEXTON,] that he was totally ignorant of "the views of the Executive," or of any information from the Departments in relation to this three million amendment.

But, sir, I now know, by evidence newly discovered, that some few did know that the President did desire this appropriation of three millions; that they, though chairmen of the principal committees, never communicated it to their committees, much less to the House; that they whispered it to a few others, and told them "not to say any thing about it." You, Mr. Speaker, you, I charge with the guilt of that fact! You may deny it in your place, or not. If you do deny it, I am ready, with a witness, to prove that—[Here Mr. WISE read a written statement, given to him by the honorable Luke Lea, of Tennessee, corroborated by the statement of the honorable Samuel Bunch, of Tennessee, in the following words:

"On the last night of the last session of Congress, pending the question of the three million appropriation, two of the members of that Congress hesitated as to the propriety of voting for said appropriation, when one of them proposed to the other that he would make inquiry of one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, who sat near them, whether this appropriation had been asked for by the President; which he did, and received for answer, that the committee had been asked for it, or it had been intimated to them that he desired it, but that you need not say any thing about it; which answer was immediately communicated to the other member. It was then agreed upon between the members, that, as the money was not to be used except for the purposes specified, and not until the contingency should happen to make it necessary, they would vote for the amendment."]

Sir, I charge you with being that member who—

[Loud cries of "order! order!"]

MR. WISE. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [MR. POLK,] it is said, gave this answer. Is it true? Yes or no! Guilty or not guilty?

THE CHAIR. If it is desired that I should make any statement of any fact in my knowledge, I am ready to make it.

[Cries of "no! no!" from Mr. POLK's own friends.]

MR. MERCER considered the call upon the Speaker, as such, to be out of order; but the call upon him, as a member of the last House, in order.

MR. WISE. I call upon the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress.

THE CHAIR said, if the House wished it, or would permit it, he would make a brief statement. [Cries of "no! no!" from some of his own friends, and of "agreed! agreed!" from all quarters.]

MR. ADAMS here attempted to get an explanation.

MR. MERCER hoped the House would yield its unanimous consent to the explanation of the Speaker.

MR. VINTON wished to know if the Speaker himself desired to explain: because, if not, he should object to it.

THE CHAIR said he considered the whole proceeding out of order; but, as he had been personally alluded to, he had not arrested it, and that it would afford him sincere pleasure if the House would permit him to make a statement.

No objection being made,

THE SPEAKER (the House having given its permission, and many members expressing a desire that he should do so) said that the Chair took great pleasure in stating to the House that, upon that occasion, he had felt great solicitude for the safety of the appropriation bills which had not been acted on; perhaps the more solicitude, from the position he at that time had the honor to occupy in the House, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Having, as he had, charge of some of these bills, and feeling that some responsibility devolved upon him, his attention had been closely directed to them. He did remember, upon that occasion, when the three millions appropriation was moved, that, in a casual conversation, two members of the House, two of his own colleagues from Tennessee, who were also members of the present House, and who at that time occupied seats immediately in his rear, asked him some question in relation to that appropriation, and that he replied that he thought it a proper appropriation, and one that ought to pass. He had, he said, no recollection of the precise language he made use of, but he had said, in answer to the inquiry of his colleague, substantially, that he thought the appropriation proper, that the Executive had been consulted, and that it met the Executive's wishes, or something to that effect. As chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, inquiries had often been made of him in conversation, by members of the House, in relation to different appropriations; and he had always given the information in his possession, as he had in this instance.

The Chair would then state what he had not perhaps thought it necessary, at that time, to be stated to the House, and it was this: that he had conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and with some members of the Executive, upon the subject of this appropriation. As chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, it was his duty, if a heavy appropriation was proposed, to ascertain, and be able to give the information to the House, if it was required, whether the Treasury was in a condition to bear it. He had always felt it to be his duty, whilst chairman of that committee, to consult different members of the Executive branches of the Government, when he thought it necessary to obtain information in regard to all appropriations for the public service. And when the question was asked of him by his colleagues, in regard to this appropriation, the individual now occupying the chair had answered, in substance, that he thought the appropriation altogether proper, and that it met the approbation of the Executive. He did not remember adding any thing of the purport stated by the gentleman from Virginia, though he may have done so, and would not say he had not; though, if he had, it had escaped his recollection.

The Chair would respectfully remark that he was really unable to conceive how this could be a matter of any sort of importance. If it had an important bearing, he was at a loss to perceive it. The Chair felt a deep sense of obligation to the House for the opportunity offered him of giving this brief statement.

If the House would permit him, he would add a single suggestion. It must be evident that the debate which had sprung up that day had given rise to great excitement and feeling, and would require great forbearance, on the part of the House and the Chair, to enable him to preserve order. He would repeat to the gentleman from Virginia that, in reminding him, a few moments ago, that it was against order to refer to honorable members of the last Congress who were also members of the present House, and in their seats, by their names, it was far from the intention of the Chair to interfere with any of the rights of the gentleman from Virginia, and would exceedingly regret to interfere with the rights of any member upon the floor. The Chair thought it out of order, and supposed such a course of debate, if suffered to proceed, was likely to produce excitement and collision, and he had therefore wished to arrest it. He felt assured that the gentleman from Virginia, and every other member, would see the necessity of such a course, and would sustain the Chair in his efforts to preserve the order and harmony of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. LEA, of Tennessee, then rose, and confirmed the statement which he had given Mr. WISE in writing, and which the Speaker [Mr. POLK] admitted to be true.

Mr. WISE. Sir, permit me to say that I truly and sincerely sympathize with the situation of the Chair. I know its embarrassments, and I shall at all times be ready to sustain its efforts to preserve order.

But to proceed. And this, Mr. Speaker, is not an important fact! What, sir! the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means know the fact that the President desires an appropriation of three millions of dollars, not communicate it to his committee or to the House, and, whilst endeavoring to get it through, and obtain votes for its passage, to whisper the President's will to a few members in their seats—to be kept a secret!!! Great God, sir, and this in these days, in the green rear, is not a matter of importance. I wish not to deal with this fact until I have a fair opportunity.

Mr. PEYTON here moved an adjournment; which was carried.

On the following day Mr. WISE resumed his remarks, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my remarks of yesterday, permit me to say, the reflections of the past night have admonished me that a most serious, solemn, and delicate duty has accidentally, on the occasion of this debate, devolved upon me, and upon all in this House who are disposed, without fear, favor, or affection, to do their duty to their country and its sacred institutions. I lament, sir, sincerely lament, for the sake of all that is dear to us, that the corruption—corruption, sir, is the word—of the times does exist; but it is too true, it is engendered, it is sneaking through every avenue almost of the public service, it is undermining the constitution and the safety of the free Government which we derived from our fathers, and I glory in dragging it out from the darkness which it loves, and in exposing its "hideous front" in the full light of truth, to the astonished gaze of the honest and unsuspecting people of this nation! I will then leave the correction of it to them. They can create, and they can destroy. It is one of their virtues that their confidence in those whom they have trusted is not easily to be shaken; but when once deceived, once betrayed, their vengeance, their condign punishment is awful! I know they are honest, and will not tolerate corruption.

Sir, before I closed on the past evening, we had arrived at one most important fact, which the journal does not record, which was not before known, which I would that the history of my country in its very infancy had not to record, and which I must say has produced a most—distinguished anxiety.

We have arrived at the solemn fact—half admitted and fully proved—that, at the last session, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. POLK] was informed and knew that the President of the United States desired an appropriation of three millions of dollars for military and naval service; that he never communicated it to his committee or to the House of Representatives; but whispered it, as a secret, to a few members in their seats, desiring them to "say nothing about" the fact that such was the desire of the President!

I call upon this House and this nation to witness this fact, stated, proved, and not here denied, but admitted. Here (striking his breast) is the accuser; there (pointing at the Speaker) and there (pointing at Mr. CAMBRELENG) are the accused! There are others (signifying Mr. V. B. and Mr. F.) who may be the guiltiest of the gang. The people are our judges; they are now sitting, and will judge righteously.

Why, sir, appoint a committee? The investigation is already made; here is the record evidence, (holding up the journal,) there are the oral witnesses, (pointing to Messrs. LEA and BURCH;) and the truth necessary for a verdict and conviction, to the mind of any honest, impartial man, is already out. There is no necessity for the appointment of the committee asked for. The material facts, or some of them, are already before the House, and all of them, if I can bring them out, shall be before us here; and here, before the eyes of the world, they should be divulged. Sir, if a committee is appointed, it will be a "stocked pack." I will not consent to play with such cards! If a committee be appointed, there will certainly—we have got to that pass—be two reports, conflicting and diametrically opposite. No matter where truth, where justice lies, I say we know beforehand there will certainly be two reports. Committees are more used now-a-days to gloss over than to probe corruption. I have but little confidence in them. If they cannot report favorably to "the party," they will never report at all! Why appoint a committee, when here it has been charged, face to face, and fully proved, that the fortification bill of the last session was lost by the manoeuvring, with others, of a gentleman whose name reads in the journal—Churchill C. Cambreleng! When here it has been charged, and not denied—ay, if denied, fully proved—that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [JAMES K. POLK,] knowing the views of the Executive, but never communicating them to committee or House, did go round privately among members, and tell such as were friendly to the President that he wanted the grant of three millions, but not to say any thing about it! What need, then, I repeat, of a committee to ascertain what is already known? These facts have come out, and more must follow. Let them follow, one after another, in review here in this hall, and, if you are honest, you will gaze on the procession with indignation and alarm! No plastering committee in a shut chamber! Let the naked truth stand up here, to confront men in high places, no matter who they may be, charged with fraud and corruption.

I will never examine this subject any where else than in this House. And how was that three million amendment proposed? Sir, although it was apparently brought upon us suddenly, in the last hour of our existence, and although the House had no notice of it, at all events, not until the day before, yet now it seems that it had been for some time thought of in another quarter; that it was "in accordance with the views of the Executive;" that these views had been communicated to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. POLK,] and to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who communicated them secretly to a few others. There was time then, sir, for all the estimates to be furnished. I know, and the gentleman [Mr. C.] will bear me witness, that he gave me notice, personally, some days before the 3d of March, that he intended to move an amendment for three millions, though I had no notice of its form, and much less had I notice that it was "in accordance even with the views of the Executive." I pledged myself to vote for it, from the information I possessed in relation to our defenceless condition. A day, a single day, was sufficient time to furnish the estimates, from the numerous facts which lie in the way of every body, and especially for the Departments, which should always be ready with all information as to the condition of the country. It was known to you, Mr. Speaker, that the President thought this a proper and necessary appropriation, and that he desired it to be made. Why was this not made known officially to the committee and to the House? Why did not the President "give to Congress" this information, "and recommend to their consideration" this measure, which he judged "necessary and expedient?"

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

Sir, it is made the imperative duty of the President of the United States by the constitution: "He shall, [reading from the constitution,] from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." This is his duty, not by that permissive word "may," but by that imperative word "shall," and not at the beginning only of a session, but "from time to time;" at all times proper he is bound to do and perform this imperative duty. Now, sir, on the 3d of March, 1835, the last Congress had been twice in session, and in existence two years; and yet, at the beginning of neither session, and at no time whatever, had he ever intimated even that the "state of the Union" required an appropriation of three millions of dollars. He did not communicate any such "information" to this Congress! Was the Executive ignorant of the wretched condition of our means of defence? Did he not know the startling facts which I have already disclosed in relation to our fortifications, our ordnance, and our navy? I say, sir, they are too plain to be stumbled over by any body, and certainly the Departments should be the very sources of information on the subject. There was, however, a great deal of trouble in the wigwam last winter, when the rumors of war reached the guardians of our safety. How will it be if the tocsin of war be actually sounded? The President was not ignorant of our condition; an appropriation was necessary without a speck of war in the horizon, and his message to us this session is proof furnished by himself that he deemed that three millions amendment necessary and proper on the 3d of March, 1835, when he made no recommendation of the measure to Congress, save to you, sir, and you suppressed it; and, though our French relations are in a worse condition than then, he still made no recommendation of such an appropriation in that very message which says it was nine months ago in "accordance with the views of the Executive!"

A secret recommendation! What, in the name of the safety of this Government, was it to be kept secret for? Was the direction to keep it secret the direction of the President? Or was it the unauthorized direction of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means? [Mr. POLK.] This question should be answered; one or both must be guilty, and one [Mr. POLK.] is guilty, whether the other is or not. Would the chairman have dared to withhold any item of the executive will which he was ordered to communicate? If he failed, he was guilty of a flagrant dereliction of duty to the Executive and his recommendation. And if he was ordered to "keep the will of the Executive secret," and did so, he was false to the House of Representatives, to the constitution, and the country, and betrayed his trust!

Sir, though the fortification bill had come to the House from the Senate days and weeks before the 3d of March, this three million amendment was kept back until the last hour. Was it intended to be hurried through by fear of the responsibility to refuse an appropriation for nominal defence, when there was no time to think, and scarcely time to act? Sir, I thought I had clearly excused myself for the vote I gave on this amendment; but late information, such as I have discovered and exposed to the House, makes it necessary for me to say I will swear on the holy evangelists that I never heard one word about the views of the Executive in relation to this three million appropriation until the message of the President to this Congress; and never did I know that the views of the Executive were kept secret until I obtained the written statement from my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. LEA,] which I got from him within the last forty-eight hours! I knew a day or so beforehand that such a proposition would be made, but I thought it would be made and was made on the responsibility of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs alone. I had such information as authorized me to vote for it—information which very few, if any, members besides had; for it was not until the 3d of March, after twelve o'clock at night, that I got in the report of the inspector of naval ordnance, which had never been communicated to Congress, though it had been lying in the office of the board of navy commissioners for near or quite eighteen months, through my honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] who made the report on the national foundry. I say I knew the wretched condition of the navy and of fortifications, and I voted for that amendment under the impression that it was necessary for a state of peace as well as for a state of war. But did I know that none but a few select tools knew the real secret about it? Did I know that two chairmen of the highest committees knew the wishes and views of the Executive, and had concealed them except from a few as a secret? Did I dream that there was danger of this three millions becoming secret-service money? Sir, if I had known or suspected any thing like this, I would as soon have trampled this constitution, this work of our fathers, this guarantee of our liberties, under foot—have torn it into atoms, or thrown it into that fire—as I would have voted for that amendment, appropriating three millions of dollars for secret service? Both acts would have been equally sacrilegious, and would have done equal violence to the constitution and the country. But the secret was kept, and the House remained ignorant of what it was doing!

Permit me, sir, it is due to myself, to give you my impressions of this amendment at the time I voted for it. Its form was not such, I confess, as satisfied me; but in the short space I had to view it, I was led to a construction which reconciled me to vote for it. It is sufficient for my justification, that my impressions of it were honest at the time, though I do not pretend to say now whether my construction of it was right or wrong. There is no principle in the theory of our Government more vitally important, in my estimation, than the principle of specific appropriations. During the whole of the last Congress, I was constantly watchful to preserve that principle as sacred to the freedom of the constitution. It was jealously borne in mind by me when called on to vote for this amendment. I read it carefully. [Here Mr. WISE read the amendment.] In the usual language of appropriation, this sum of three millions was "to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States." I could not, or did not, at the time, regard this clause as extraordinary or improper, because I knew it merely recognised the distinct functions of Congress and the Executive. Congress, or rather, the legislative department, appropriates the public money, and, in all cases except that of the contingent fund of the two Houses and some other minor exceptions, the Executive applies the appropriation. From the foundation of the Government, the money appropriated by Congress has been "expended," with or without an express provision to that effect, "under the direction of the President," or some one of the executive Departments. This, then, roused no fear, no suspicion. Again: this sum was to be expended for "the military and naval service."

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 22, 1836.]

This was, I thought, too general, too indefinite and latitudinous, if it had been alone, unrestrained and unqualified; but it struck me, at the moment, that it was limited, restrained, and made more specific, by the clause or phrase immediately succeeding, "including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy." My construction then was that this three millions of the public money was to be appropriated for "that part of the military and naval service included under the heads of fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy." And knowing that three millions could well be expended on either object, that either fortifications, ordnance, or increase of the navy, would consume more than three millions, and that the whole sum would be very inadequate for all three objects, and not knowing which object might require most of the appropriation, I saw no objection to leaving a discretion in the application of the sum to these three objects, as they might require it to be expended, upon a principle similar to that which authorizes the transfer of a surplus of one fund to the deficiency of another fund appropriated. Such was my view of this part of the amendment, when it was proposed; it is certainly plausible, though I am now inclined to think it is erroneous. I now fear that something more was meant here than caught the eye of one who was called upon to vote so suddenly. The "proviso" of the amendment, which "provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress," I regarded, so far from being an extension of executive discretion in the application of the appropriation, as a limitation of that discretion, and as creating a responsibility on the Executive which would not have been imposed without it. If there had been no such proviso, the money would have been appropriated absolutely, to be expended absolutely, whether necessary or not; and it allowed not the President to judge of the necessity of expending the money for offence, but for the purposes merely of defence, and made him responsible for the exercise of a sound discretion, even in expending the appropriation for those purposes. This construction of that proviso I believe now to be correct; but I believe now that no tongue can tell how it may have been perverted! These views I expressed on the 3d of March, 1835, on the floor, and they were honestly entertained. The sum of money was trifling, compared with the objects of expenditure. I knew it would require ten millions for fortifications, ordnance, and the increase of the navy, considering the manner in which the money of the United States is squandered on our public works, or rather our public contractors. I thought the amendment not only innocent, but necessary, for peace as well as for war.

But now, sir, I should like to know, I have a right to inquire, whether the ingenious, ambiguous, doubtful wording of this amendment had any covert and treacherous meaning. If so, if this appropriation was for secret service money—if it was a man-trap, a Government-trap, I say, with all the energy of my soul, I say, the corruption, the treason, which set it, should be hurled from its high seat, whether that seat be in this House or the white house! If there was any thing foul, false, or fatal, intended by this trap, I am innocent! Was I duped? Was I imposed on? Is it not too bad that the House, or the Senate, should be charged with this individual fraud, and that those very persons who did the wrong, who are themselves guilty of this miserable trick of setting this Government-trap, should now be setting the Senate and the House by the ears for the responsibility of their own wrongs—that they should now be hissing on the quarrel, and chuckling in their sleeves at the success of their cunning device! I do condemn and abhor, I do denounce them and their devices! They are caught! Let them hang their heads, the guilty wretches, in eternal shame! Their guilt is established beyond all controversy by parol and record proof, and I here hold them up to the lash of an indignant people! Sir, when this statement [holding up Mr. LEA's written statement] was made to me within the last two days, I shuddered to think how near I may have been, innocently on my part, brought to aid in an unpardonable crime against my country! Would all the protestations of innocence, made with all the fervor of honest sincerity, have saved my humble name from the everlasting suspicion of being particeps criminis? Sir, if harm to the country was meant, it was the interposition of that Divine Providence which has ever watched over the destinies of this republic, to guard it from secret and open, foreign and domestic foes, and which "bringeth good out of evil," that the appropriation was not made. The coast remains unfortified; but better so than that our fortifications or our standing army should now be bristling with armament against our own liberties! Look upon what may have been the intention and the result. God Almighty may have sent an especial providence to prevent the bill from passing, to save the Government from ruin, and the names of innocent men from eternal obloquy and reproach. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] may set it down as one merit of his trick, of his intrigue, that it may have saved the Government. It succeeded to defeat the fortification bill, but prevented a much greater mischief, and it is now exposed. Yes, sir, from what is now known, the sins of that awful night, the 3d of March, 1835, may have saved the Government. We now know, Mr. Speaker, that you knew the President desired this immense appropriation, and that you kept it secret, and requested others to say nothing about it. I can conjecture no good object in keeping that secret. Can any gentleman give me a reason why the "views" and wishes of the Executive were not made known?

Sir, if a despotism is to be sprung upon us, for mercy's sake let it be known, that we may strike it down or escape from it! Let us see and know it is approaching, that we may stand and strike, or, like our fathers, "take the wings of the morning, and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth," to escape its iron grasp and find a home for the free! Do not give us a secret despotism! I pray God to save this country from a secret despotism! If there is an unpardonable political sin, it is the intent and overt act to bring about a secret despotism. I ask, why was so much secrecy in relation to the views of the Executive necessary? Was there more meant than was expressed by that amendment? I confess, sir, I am bewildered and amazed! The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means covertly whispering the wish of the Executive to have placed at his disposal $3,000,000, and enjoining secrecy! I can conceive of no conduct so reprehensible, so odious, so abominable! Done, too, by "a member of the democratic republican party"—done by a representative of a free people! Sir, I was about to say that the Executive would not dare to impart a secret of that sort to any patriot in Congress: he, any man who loved his country, would have spurned the communication with indignant warmth, and have exposed it upon the spot! I beg pardon of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] for saying this so strongly, as he did not announce the fact as soon as he was told of it. I know, sir, he was honest, and I know the circumstances under which the secret was whispered into his ear. It no doubt did not strike him then as it strikes me now. Sir, if we are to have a despotism, I pray Heaven again it may come upon us in a bold and manly way. Let the man who is to subdue our liberties come with the boldness of a Napoleon; let him, in the sight of all the people, put on the imperial purple and the crown! We will know then the worst, and can prepare the armor of our defence. I could admire whilst I should strike the tyrant of genius and brave ambition, who would attempt to seize upon our liberties by force. But, of all despotisms, that brought upon an unsuspecting people, a confiding, a generous, free people, through the pimps,imps, spies, tools, and pensioned trained bands of secret corruption, is the most loathsome, the most despicable, the most to be dreaded!

Sir, I remember well that when, that night, two of my colleagues [Messrs. GORNON and GHOLSON] warned us against trusting so much to the Executive, I, for one, denied that it was any "pitiful administration or anti-administration measure." I thought so in truth and honest sincerity. It was expressly denied by gentlemen of "the party," among the rest by a gentleman from North Carolina, [MR. BYNUM,] that the President had called for this appropriation, and they contended that we had no right to infer that it was his wish. When I returned home to my good constituents, and was arraigned for voting three millions to the President to do with as he pleased, I vindicated myself most successfully from this charge of man-worship, by showing these very denials that it was the wish of the President to have this appropriation made. It was over and often repeated in your presence, Mr. Speaker, and in that of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [MR. CAMBRELENG,] that the President did not call for the appropriation, and that no man, therefore, could be impeached for man-worship who voted for it. And it was as frequently asked whether we would appropriate so large a sum without a call from the President. You, sir, and the other gentleman, knew the secret, were present, and neither corrected the denials nor answered the inquiries! Sir, you permitted truth to fall in the streets. Knowing the secret, and not disclosing it, would have been bad enough; but knowing it, and keeping it confidentially—not disclosing it to but one or two individuals, that with the view, too, of obtaining their votes for the grant of the three millions, and enjoining secrecy upon them—is awfully alarming! The secrecy, I say, sir, implies some object in the amendment which is not expressed. What was that object? Were three millions wanted for a peace establishment? Certainly not, in the estimation of the Executive, or it would long ere then have been recommended. If for peace, he should have given us information at the previous session. Without doubt the President did not suddenly find out, on the last day of the last Congress, that three millions were wanting for a peace establishment. No, it was not for peace.

Was it for war? No. The House was unacquainted with any such object. It is true, I believe, the President was for war at the last Congress, and I do not know that he has alighted from his war horse yet. But, sir, if war was in the wind, the House was deceived, completely deceived, by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who but the day before withdrew his resolution upon French relations, declaring that "contingent preparation should be made for war." And here, sir, let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [MR. ADAMS,] that he could not have inferred from the resolution "to insist upon the execution of the treaty" with France, that preparation for war was necessary, because such an inference was precluded by the withdrawal of the express resolution to make contingent preparation for war. I ask, then, was the object of this amendment to make secret preparation for war? Did the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [MR. CAMBRELENG] suppose that the resolution to make contingent preparation for war, which he withdrew, would be published in foreign journals as well as our own, and that, taken in connexion with the other resolution, to insist upon the execution of the treaty, the two would be regarded by France as a threat, when this amendment, thus clandestinely smuggled into an ordinary appropriation bill, would attract no notice at home or abroad, and we at the same time could attain the objects of the resolution which he withdrew?

If such was his policy, why did he not make it known to his committee, if not in debate, and let it be understood generally in the House? Is this to be the pretext? Were we to have a war in disguise? Were we to steal upon the enemy? Does it become a nation like this to put a dagger up sleeve, like an assassin? I protest against secret preparations for war, supported by secret appropriations! Would war have been now raging or not, Congress or no Congress, if that amendment had passed? Save me from the question!

But, for the objects of war or of peace, if the amendment had been in proper form, I put it to the members of the last Congress if there was any necessity for secrecy? Neither army nor navy was in a proper condition for peace or for war, and the Departments had the best reason in the world for an honest and an open course. Sir, how much do you suppose the Secretary of the Navy now asks, as an additional appropriation, to put your navy in trim? Only $6,337,775! Well, sir, we were in no better condition, as I have shown you, on the 3d of March, 1835, than we are in now. There was then, I say, as this their own estimate shows, reason enough for a grant of supplies, which might have been honestly and openly stated to us. Why was not this estimate then made as it is now? I mean, sir, in a word, was there any object besides peace establishment for army and navy, or war, which was meant to be attained by the three millions amendment? I fear, sir, that a war upon the Treasury for the purpose of Government patronage, rather than a war upon France for honor or treaty, was meant then, and is meant now! Millions of your public money, which is appropriated for the public good, is, by some legerdemain, appropriated into the pockets of the pets of "the party." Your navy, for instance, since the last war, I am told, has cost you, sir, sixty-five millions of dollars, and for that sum you have got afloat, in commission, 1 ship of the line, 4 frigates, 11 sloops of war, and six smaller vessels! The United States has, I am told, sir, fourteen millions of property in the Pacific, round Cape Horn, one half of which—more than the whole amount of the French treaty—might be struck off at a blow by three French frigates; and you have on that station, I believe, one frigate and two sloops of war! Yes, sir, I have all along thought that it was high time we were making preparation. I thought so for two reasons: I knew we were not upon a respectable peace establishment, and I thought, what I think now, that war is not an improbable thing when General Jackson desires it. I therefore voted for the three millions, and more than ever am I for making preparation, when I fear that the question of peace or war depends upon one man alone—he has enough to do his bidding, here and elsewhere—and when I look at our strength compared with that of other nations.

Twenty million five hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars additional appropriation is required to give us our relative naval strength, compared with France and Great Britain. Five million five hundred thousand dollars per annum required for ten years, to attain and keep afloat such a force.

I think, sir, when we look upon this comparative statement, we cannot say to France, as did the wolf to the lamb in the fable: "'Tis crime enough that she cannot resist!"

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 22, 1836.]

The naval forces of the United States, France, and Great Britain, are:

In commission.	Ships of line.	Frigates.	Sloops of war.	Steamers.	Smaller vessels.
United States, -	1	4	11	0	6
France, -	6	16	39	4	59
Great Britain, -	10	15	73	13	53

Force afloat and building.	Ships of line.	Frigates.	Sloops of war.	Steamers.	Smaller vessels.
United States, -	11	14	14	1	6
France, -	57	64	88	23	120
Great Britain, -	129	128	96	26	166

And I think that this will show us, sir, that, if war was expected or intended, there was a strong necessity to commence preparations for war. Our own quarrel, our own weak state of preparation, and our enemy's strength, should long ago, say I, have admonished the watchful guardians of the nation to be making ready. They have been furiously charging upon others, upon the Senate of the last Congress, for not putting the country in a state of defence. And now, sir, if it can be shown that they are themselves the guiltiest of the guilty in this high offence, what shall be done with the culprits? Shall they not have the poisoned chalice returned to their own lips, which they have offered to others? Be it remembered, sir, that the Executive conducts our foreign relations—he has known the chance and dangers of war much better than we. Ay, sir, some developments we know were withheld from us. If the country should have been preparing for war, then should not the President have been making some recommendations of the kind? Should he not have been warning us to prepare? Where are the recommendations of the Executive, the estimates, the messages, the communications of the Departments, up to this very week of this session? None—no, not one! Was the President for war during the last session? When did he call, or intimate a call, for the defence of the country? Sir, will it be believed that the Secretary of the Navy has not this session, until this present week, furnished your Committee on Naval Affairs with the estimates, the ordinary estimates, of appropriation?

And here, sir, I must be permitted to vindicate the notable minority of eighteen? I intend to do that now—to mark facts hereafter as we go along, and note events as they occur; for I am now more than sufficiently admonished never to leave the defence of my acts in one Congress to any subsequent Congress which may follow. Yes, sir, no estimates were furnished the committee to which I belong by the Navy Department this winter, until they were kicked out of it. If it were so great a sin not to vote three millions additional for the increase of the navy last winter, is it no sin not to ask for one cent up to this time this winter? Sir, it will be recollected that, on the 11th of January, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. JARVIS] introduced a resolution "that the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the naval force in commission." I opposed that resolution, voted against it, and was thrown, by my good friends in this House, into a notable minority of eighteen. To vindicate that eighteen, and to exemplify fully the exact manoeuvre of the three millions amendment last session, sir, I must detail to you a short history of the facts of the case. Some time previous to the time when the resolution was offered by the honorable chairman, [Mr. JARVIS,] he and I were walking on that highway of the nation, Pennsylvania avenue. We met, sir, a distinguished member of the board of navy commissioners—a commodore—who shared in the naval fights and victories of the last war. We stopped to hold a conversation, in which that officer of the Navy Department frankly admitted that our navy required a large appropriation, a much larger appropriation than had been called for by the Secretary; and said that, "if we got into a war with France, we would be whipped for the first three years." "Well, sir," I replied, "if we are to be drubbed for that length of time, I think we had better take care not to get into the fight, or had better begin to prepare for it as soon as possible." He said, "after we were whipped for about that length of time, we would begin to get ready," and begged the honorable chairman and myself to have an eye to the necessities and wants of the navy.

Sir, I am willing to take all the responsibility which belongs to me, and sometimes more than belongs to me, in case of emergency. But I had begun to suspect, what I suspect still, that this French war is but a mere key to unlock the Treasury, and that Congress is to be made, through the cry of national defence, to take the responsibility of turning it, and opening the door for patronage. If the money should happen to be required, and the appropriation be popular, the praises all would be shouted to the Executive, who had not recommended it; and, if unnecessary and unpopular, the curses and the blame would be sure to fall on Congress. I, therefore, sir, was determined, so far as I could, to block the game—to make those who should, take the responsibility. I was willing, and am still, to vote for any reasonable appropriation, if called for, but I was determined to know what additional appropriation would be "in accordance with the views of the Executive," before the election of the next Congress? Accordingly, sir, it was proposed in the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire of the Secretary of the Navy whether any additional appropriation for the increase of the navy was required. This inquiry was directed to be made by our honorable chairman, [Mr. JARVIS,] some time before he offered his resolution of the 11th instant, and was then pending. No answer had been returned to the Committee on Naval Affairs, though it seems now an answer had been given to the honorable chairman. Now, sir, when the honorable chairman offered that resolution, will it be believed that he knew, for answer from the Secretary, that he (the Secretary) had declined to answer the inquiry of the committee? When the honorable chairman offered that resolution, sir, he did not state that his committee had already inquired, and could not get an answer. I did not know then, though a member of the committee, that our inquiry had been refused an answer, and thought it was still pending. If still pending, I thought the resolution supererogatory. To ascertain whether our inquiry had been answered, it will be recollected that I attempted to ask a question of the honorable chairman before I opposed his resolution; that question was, whether the inquiry, on the very same subject of the resolution which we had already anticipated, had been answered by the Department? And I hope it is still remembered by the

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

House how I was prevented from obtaining the answer which I desired from the honorable chairman. I asked the question; the chairman was rising to answer, when the Speaker asked, "Does the gentleman from Virginia yield the floor?" "Yes, to have his question answered by the gentleman from Maine," [Mr. JARVIS.] The question was repeated, and again and again interrupted by the Speaker in the same way, until I gave up, sir, in despair, the attempt to obtain the answer which was so necessary for the correct information of the House. It was the first time since I have been a member, sir, that I ever saw a gentleman thus interrupted and positively prevented from obtaining an answer to an inquiry for information courteously put to a member in his seat.

But, sir, I can confirm a remark which was made the other day, that the Speaker may, if he will, by many tricks upon order, and courtesy too, exercise undue powers over the proceedings of this body. So it was; an honest inquiry was, it seemed to me designedly, stifled in the case which I put. The answer was not obtained, which, if it had been obtained, I flatter myself there would have been apparently either no necessity for the resolution of the honorable chairman, or there would have been no minority of 18. The resolution passed with a vote in the affirmative of 164. And what then did the Committee on Naval Affairs do? How "inquire into the expediency of increasing the naval force in commission," without going right back to the Department, which had already once refused to answer the very same inquiry? We did order a written inquiry to be immediately directed to the Secretary, which is now answered by a written communication, but which also, I am told, would not have been answered, but for a circumstance and an influence which I am not authorized to name. Yes, sir, the answer has at last come, and what does it disclose? Why, that the Department does want more than six millions for the navy alone! The Department of War also has, within this week, crept out of its shell, and called for more than five millions! Eleven millions now, instead of three, actually wanted, and if wanted now, was wanting on the 3d of March, 1835, and no call, no recommendation, no estimates, until almost this very moment! Now, sir, does this need comment? Has there not been clearly an attempt to shuffle off responsibility on Congress? Is it not a plain case that "the party" and its Departments have been longing wishfully for a full sweep at the public coffers, but they wanted you and I to take out the money for them? If we refuse, the cry is raised, "You are against defending the country; the next step for you is to join the enemy!"

Sir, I will not put my hand into the Treasury of the people until I know specifically for what their money is to be expended. Why, sir, even after the House had adopted the resolution to inquire, and before an answer, by some new mode of appropriating, the Committee of Ways and Means, to ensure relief to the Secretary, I suppose, reported an increase of two millions to the ordinary navy bill, voluntarily, and without any call or information from the Department, for aught we know! Sir, this mode of voluntarily appropriating enormous sums, without message, without estimates, without recommendation, or information, or responsibility, on the part of the Executive, other than in expending them, will soon corrupt the Government, and make Congress but the mere tool of the Executive! And now, sir, what judgment shall be passed upon this same Secretary of the Navy, who admits now, by his own showing, that more than six millions additional are, and have been all the time, required for the "increase of the navy," and who yet has never made any recommendation whatever, either to this or the last Congress, except for two frigates, three sloops of war, and four steam-vessels, which was meant as an increase to the peace establishment only, up to this week of this session? Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] now embrace him in his mortification and regret, and hand him over to the executioner for not defending the country?

Sir, my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] told the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] the other day, that "it is the fashion of 'the party' not to shrink from responsibility." My honorable friend has convinced me that he is a most excellent judge of men and things, but he was mistaken that time. No, sir! General Jackson, in perfect accordance with his high-toned independence of mind and action, assumes responsibility, but "the party" shrinks, and skulks, and dodges, in fear and trembling! When Jupiter shakes the empyrean heights, all the gods tremble! When Jackson frowns and stamps his foot, rises in his majesty, and says "I take the responsibility!" all the sycophants of "the party" quake with fear! Witness the deposite question. When the President went forth in doubtful contest against the bank, there was a "little man" who trembled from his hair to his heels, [here some one said he had no hair,] right, sir, his head is bald—from the crown, then, of his head to the sole of his foot. His knees smote together with fright during the battle, but the moment the victory was achieved, out sprang the Lilliputian from behind the Old Hero, and strutted, hectoring over the dead body of the monster monopoly! So it was, sir, with that very three millions amendment. I have no doubt the President was independent and honest enough to have recommended it boldly, but "the party" leaders kept the recommendation secret; and when the sum was reduced so low as to disappoint the Old Hero, and to rouse his wrath to veto the bill, "the party" were manoeuvring, and dodging, and whispering, and cutting, and shuffling through the Capitol, and sending billets, to change the responsibility of the failure of the fortification bill from the President to the Senate! That is the secret. Sir, when it is found that any measure will succeed and aggrandize the "little man," then "the party" will take the responsibility—not before. So it was this very session with this same Secretary of our Navy. If there had been no responsibility, no popularity to risk in recommending six millions for the increase of the navy, the service would not now be suffering for appropriations. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a certain class of men who, put them where you will, in any situation in life, will piddle—I mean old bachelors! I never will henceforth support any man for the presidency who will appoint a bachelor to any office of honor or profit, and especially of responsibility. An old bachelor, sir, is a "withered fig tree"—he is a "vis inertia!" Old bachelors are too near akin to old maids!

Sir, when the Executive desires an appropriation, if he will "give me the information of the state of the Union," which he is bound to give, and show me that the public good requires it, and how and for what it is to be made, I, for one, will never be niggardly in voting supplies. The Naval Committee has already, without recommendation from the Executive, or instructions from this House, of its own motion, inquired into the expediency of increased appropriations. My policy and views are the same as when I voted for the three millions amendment. If war is to come, I fear only the consequences of being unprepared. We have the sinews of war, and should apply them in time. With an overflowing Treasury, and a quarrel with France to settle, I would have voted liberally the supplies asked for, but until now none have been called for. I am for peace—peace! for the sake of peace! But, if war must come, we must be ready. Since the rejection of the most conciliatory overture of compromise, unless there be a mediation of some sort, I cannot see how war is to be avoided. France will not strike, but she will not pay the money. We will not explain, it seems; and, having the cause of war on our part, we cannot remain inactive. But, sir, I do not mean to say I am for war, or to discuss that question at all. I only mean now to say that I shall not take part with France against the President, much less will I against the Congress of the United States. I shall go for my country, "right or wrong." And, sir, as I would not—I am sure the President will agree with me in this, for he knows all about the sport—pit a game chicken without his gaffs on, I might, perhaps, a dominion, just to see him killed—much less would I send out our old ships, which have whipped the proudest of England's navy, to fight Frenchmen, without batteries complete, and the gallant sons of our army and navy, without swords and buckler, and mail of triple steel! But, sir, I must have the recommendation, the estimates, the data, and there must be no juggling! Let the Executive come forward and recommend what is to be done. I will rely chiefly upon his knowledge of the wars. He should have come forward last session. We must have communications from the Departments. They know of the necessity, of which we are ignorant. Even the "fourth department" of the Government, the Globe, has been furnished with more information than has been given to us, to whom it is all, all, without reservation, due. If war does depend upon the will of one man, he will have enough to do his bidding, to vote when he bids them vote, to be silent when he bids them; in short, to say "ay or no," as he may prompt.

Sir, I must hereafter—I have been bitten once by low party tricks and chicanery, practised to put an immense sum at the secret service of "the party"—I say I must hereafter know to a certainty that an appropriation is to be applied to the purposes of national defence, and not of electioneering, before I vote for it. Every man in the Government is now authorized and franked to electioneer, from Indian agents and postmasters up to the President. We now have a President electioneering for his successor, and it is time the nation was told of it with the voice of a trumpet! Sir, since the publication of that letter of outrageous dictation and of justification of "the Government patronage in conflict with the purity of elections," that letter to a member of the Tennessee Legislature, which appears in the Government official, and is there not only justified but lauded, claiming the right to employ all his constitutional powers to expunge a resolution of one branch of Congress, and the right to interfere with the independence of State and Federal Legislatures, I feel constrained, by the love I bear my country, to "cry aloud and spare not!" Sir, I wish to see the public mind concentrated on these facts.

But to return from this digression. The three millions amendment passed; and, after a disagreement, the Senate adhered. Was it disrespectful to adhere? The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who I thought was "in a stew" all that dreadful night, seems now to have a holy horror of the word "adhere." I understood the Senate, sir, as strongly asserting only the doctrine of specific appropriation; not as dissenting from the ordinary items of the bill, and not as objecting to a reasonable amount of additional appropriation formally enacted. The Senate, sir, did not know the secrets! And shall the Senators—among the rest an honored Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] who knows his duty generally as well as any man without being told, who was once trusted by the President first of any, and deserves now to be trusted with his confidence more than all his present friends, who, when he was in confidence, kept it honorably, and the confidence itself was honorable and patriotic—shall they, shall he, be accused and condemned for not knowing without hearing the Executive secret? Shall he be required to know without being told—to vote without knowing why? Why, sir, the service is hard enough to do the sovereign will and good pleasure of potentates when the bidding comes loud and authoritatively, and that Senator is not one who is likely to obey orders from any power but that of his own people and their Legislature; but to do the will of his master without bidding, and to know that will without being told, is too much to expect of any slave. If this is a sin, I hope, sir, that he and his friends will ever have to plead guilty. Sir, the Senate knew no "why or wherefore" whatever for the passage of that amendment—they were taken by surprise—they respectfully disagreed. The House refused to recede, and insisted. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] voted to recede from the three millions amendment, and yet yesterday he asserted that any one "who would refuse to vote for that amendment had but one other step to take, and that step would be to join the enemy and assist in battering down the walls of the Capitol."

[Mr. ADAMS here rose to explain. He had made no personal allusion, he said, to any member of this Congress, nor to any individual member of the last Congress. He had personified a sentiment, and his remarks were applied to that personification.]

Mr. WISE. I am glad to stand corrected; I quoted the language in order to be put right. "The personification of a sentiment!" I see it, sir; I can give it form, size, color—a skin, muscle, bone, and sinew. I can make it a palpable man, whose cranium the phrenologists would mark as very intellectual. I understand now that this is a Massachusetts war, and it is not for me, sir, to meddle with it. If I understand the gentleman's explanation for receding, it was to prevent the loss of the bill; and yet, sir, when the House was for adhering, did he not adhere too? [Mr. ADAMS shook his head.] So it is: the gentleman did vote for once, twice, to recede. Generally, if any man ever does adhere, adhere, and adhere, it is he. I voted for the amendment, and adhered to it throughout. I was not in the secret. I was on the verge of a precipice, and I might have had to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] for a vote which might have saved me from an awful plunge into error.

When the House asked for a conference, the Senate readily agreed, and appointed conferees on its part. The conferees of the two Houses agreed on reducing the appropriation from three millions to eight hundred thousand dollars, and on making it more specific. And I now again ask the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] the chairman of the conferees of the House, whether, when he left the conference, after agreement to report, he did not intend to report? Why did he not report? Sir, I said yesterday there were two conjectures. I say now there are three modes of accounting for the failure of the honorable gentleman's intention. One is, that the report failed because of a word in the ear, whispered by two high functionaries between the conference-room and that door, [pointing to the door next to the Speaker's room,] or the gentleman's seat in the House. Were there not two such "busybodies" in the way of duty to report? Another is, sir, that there was a special communication, a billetdoux, handed to the honorable gentleman, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] in his seat, after he came in from the conference. Was there such a billet, and what was its purport? A third is, that there was a special visit, in person, from a certain distinguished Senator of "the party," [Mr. S— W—, Jr.] What did he say? Was not the burden of all three, the whisper, the billet, and the special messenger—(the Senator stooped low from his high degree, to become a runner between the two Houses)—that the conferees of the House had done wrong to agree to reduce the sum? That eight hundred thousand dollars was a "poor, pitiful sum," which would not satisfy the President? That the President had risen up in wrath, and sworn that he would veto the bill, because the Senate had refused the whole grant of three millions, and that they should be made to bear the loss of the whole bill? Did not the intrigue then assume a double aspect of policy, to ward off from the President the responsibility of vetoing the bill which he had sworn to veto, and to throw the responsibility and odium of the failure of the bill on the Senate? This was the abominable game; it was too bad to juggle us first out of our independence of legislation, and then out of our character! There are five high witnesses to attest these acts, if a committee be appointed to inquire, who may be called on. You may go to the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth highest officers of your Government; and, sir, I should like to see them thoroughly cross-examined. We have had a most important fact disclosed lately. The secret journal of the Senate has been opened, and a certain endorsement of its Clerk has been exposed. Now, sir, that Secretary of the Senate is a most excellent, good, and pious man, with a high and due sense of propriety. He would be cautious to endorse nothing which was not only true, but proper to be endorsed. But I must ask if all was endorsed which was said? I could not shut my ears, sir, to the rumors which passed from seat to seat that awful night. Suppose the Senate did send a message to the Executive that night, rejecting a certain nomination; and suppose, in reply, the President had told the Secretary, "I will receive no further communication from the d—d rascals; the Senate is defunct!" I am sure, sir, such an answer would have been undignified and unbecoming, and that the Secretary's strict sense of propriety, and of what was due to the President and to the Senate, would have prevented him from endorsing all that was said. And yet this committee, if raised, and it inquire faithfully, may bring out many such facts.

Sir, I repeat that there was no disposition on the part of the Senate or the House to defeat the fortification bill of last session. Both Houses did their duty, and both are now equally interested to guard against such interference for the future as actually prevented both Houses, though ready and willing, from doing their duty. Yes, sir; the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON] challenged me, at the beginning of this session, to specify acts of executive intermeddling or interference with the independence of the legislation of Congress. I gave him, sir, one pretty strong case; but here is one still stronger. None could be stronger. On the last night of the last Congress, both Houses of Congress, I assert, and have proved, were not only ready and willing, but anxiously endeavoring, to pass a law which the President himself says, and which I admit, was very important to the public interests, with large majorities in each in favor of the law, and the two Houses agreeing, by special conference; and they could not and did not get the bill through, in consequence of the minions and pimps of the Executive tampering with their tools in the House of Representatives!

Now, sir, if the gentleman wants a stronger case than that, I cannot imagine it. I know such was the fact; and though all "the Government" should swear to the contrary, I should know and believe the fact until the day of my death. Is it to be borne, that some twenty or thirty of a trained band shall, by reducing us below a quorum, reduce a majority of both Houses of Congress below the foot of the Executive? Shall we be thus interrupted in our business by "a fragment" of "the party," doing the bidding of their idol? Is this an administration of the Government in the spirit and letter of the constitution, which makes the legislative department independent of the Executive, and intends that it shall be a check upon the Executive? Will the people suffer this monstrous violence to the theory and practice of their Government? Oh! that I could raise my voice to a pitch of remonstrance which could go forth throughout this land; which could reach every hamlet, every home, and every heart of the people; which could speak, trumpet-tongued, to every man who has in his bosom a spark of the spirit of the free! I would rouse a resistance to this misrule, this corruption, this patricide of "the party," which would soon determine whether the many or the few shall rule the destinies of this republic!

Sir, the whole mass of power which is conferred by the constitution on all the departments of this Government is nearly as great as the whole power of any Government of any civilized people. But the theory of our Government so distributes this power among different branches or departments as to check and counter-balance, restrain and control each other mutually. Power with us is so neutralized to do harm, and so well poised to do good, in the theory of our constitution, that the Government was made free at the same time it was made efficient. But, sir, the practice of the Government has of late so perverted the theory of the constitution, that, through corruption, we are fast becoming bound hand and foot, and a single department is absorbing the whole mass of power. The principle of "the party" is now warring upon one of the cardinal principles of the constitution, to keep separate, distinct, and independent, the legislative and the executive departments. That principle, without which this Government cannot remain free, is totally undermined by the policy of parties to elect legislators to support—that is, to do the will of—Presidents! Is there no jealousy of the Executive left? No esprit de corps in Congress? Gone! gone! Sir, I must remind the House that on the Cumberland road bill there were 174 members present and voting. That the very next vote there was—no quorum.

Here Mr. WISE read a list of the names of members who voted on the Cumberland road bill, and did not vote on the next vote, or Moore and Letcher resolution. There were 66 in number. Of these, Van Buren men, 50; opposition and for White, 16.

On the Cumberland road bill there were 174 votes. Of these there were, Van Buren men, 87; opposition and for White, 87.

Parties were equal on that vote. On the Letcher resolution there were 113 votes. Van Buren men, 33; opposition and for White, 80.

Can this extraordinary desertion of Van Buren men be accounted for but upon the supposition of design? And, too, when it was known they were nearly all present in the House? While the opposition and White men had retained their numbers to 7, there was a falling off of Van Buren men of 54!—54 out of 87! While the opposition and White men continued in their places, giving their votes until the close of the session, the Van Buren men did not again, except a small minority, answer to their name!

On Mr. Jarvis's motion to adjourn, there were 118 votes. Van Buren men, 41; opposition and for White, 77.

On Mr. Carmichael's motion to adjourn, there were 111 votes. Van Buren men, 39; opposition and for White, 72.

Is not the conclusion irresistible that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. CAMBRELENG] might, at any moment after his return from the conference, until the adjournment of the House, by a nod or a whisper, have summoned from their hiding places a quorum, and saved the loss of the fortification bill? Would not Roderick's men have risen up at the whistle? Does not the gentleman from New York know that he might at any time have had a quorum? Did he exert himself to get a quorum? Did he not, and did not you, Mr. Speaker, busily endeavor to persuade members who had conscientious scruples not to vote to make a quorum? Did not Churchill C. Cambreleng protest, by speech on the floor, (see Globe of the 5th of March, 1835,) against the right to compel members to answer the call for a quorum, when he all the time was voting himself? Did not Mr. Barringer, of North Carolina, charge the intrigue at the time, and offer to specify names? Was not Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, who refused to vote on every question from the last quorum to the adjournment, sitting in the House calling for the yeas and nays, when attempts would be made to get along without a call? Did not Mr. Barringer tell him he had no right to call for yeas and nays, as he said he was no longer a member? and did he not claim to be as much a member as any body? Having pledged himself to vote for the Letcher resolution, did he not inform Mr. Letcher he could not then vote for it? And did not Letcher reply, "I knew the Van Buren colts would slip their bridles!" When Samuel Beardsley refused to vote, did not the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] move to expel him from the House? But there were nearly 150 members who actually voted upon the three calls of yeas and nays after 12 o'clock at night. Different squads would come in and vote at different times! The leaders—oh, yes! the leaders—were all present: were they not here, of course? That was one finesse, and the other was to march and countermarch the followers, so as that each one might claim to have voted. But the proof is positive that there was a quorum actually voting after the Cumberland road bill and 12 o'clock, to the last, but voting at different times! My name is among the number of those who voted on the Cumberland road bill, and I failed to vote twice afterwards. Mr. Gilmer's conduct struck me, and I hesitated to vote until I was satisfied by my colleague, [Mr. MENCER,] and when I saw the miserable, infernal game which was playing, I would have voted at all hazards, and did vote, as the journals will show, on the last vote of the session, to help to make a quorum, and against adjournment! And now, sir, what shall we say to these men of the immaculate—the only patriotic men—who would not for the world have had the fortification bill to fail? Shall they not have meted out to them that measure of vituperation which they have meted to the Senate? Shall they not now be hunted down with the furies and scorpions of abuse, not only for failing to do a duty which was unpardonable in the Senate, but for a knowingly wilful false accusation? Hurrah for such patriots! They are for national defence! Oh, shame! Oh, honesty! Oh, truth!

Sir, the gentlemen have got into a hornet's nest by troubling—impudently gasconading about the failure of that bill. They are bitten by their own dogs! Oh, yes! the hour had come for their beautiful trick. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] if he never signed bills after 12 o'clock at night on the last night of a session, when he was President? Sir, I can prove by the manuscript minutes of your Clerk that there was a quorum in the House. Here is a book, the title of which is "Twenty-third Congress, 2d Session—Minutes of the House of Representatives." In this book we find this entry on Tuesday, March the 3d, when the main question was taken on the resolution to compensate Robert P. Letcher: "Ayes 113; noes 3. No quorum—many members declined to answer, though standing at the Clerk's desk, because it was supposed to be past 12 o'clock." Only seven members were wanting then, but three afterwards, to make a quorum, and many members declined to answer! Sir, there was a quorum, and a quorum at the command of "the party." Let it never hereafter be denied.

[Mr. WISE then gave a summary and review of material facts.]

Sir, what caused the Senate to send us that message which I deem so respectful, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] deems so insolent? The Senate was warned of treachery! When that special messenger, that Senator, was seen dodging in and out—he was no ghost, sir; if one, he is a very red-faced ghost, he is a cogniac-looking ghost! [Here Mr. WISE paused, and glanced his eye around, to see him in the hall.] The Senate, sir, was warned of treachery. They then reminded the House of the report of the conference. What less could that body do to defend itself from the Machiavelian plot against it? Was there such a spectacle ever exhibited in this Capitol before, as a trap set for one branch of Congress? This message called out the jesuitical excuse that the hour had come—there was no quorum—"sorry, regretted very much, but the Senate must take the responsibility!"—immediately the plot revealed itself! Sir, I hope that condition of things, and this exposure, will stand a solitary warning to "the party" not to jeopard again the interests of the country, by its low, servile tricks of corruption! "The party" wished to say, by resolution, in reply, that we had finished our business, when this bill was untouched. Hour after hour had the Senate politely waited for this fortification bill to be sent to them for their concurrence, and Mr. F. O. J. Smith moved to say to them—"we have completed our business!" And at last, sir, the House did ignobly adjourn without completing its business, including this bill. Sir, I have not to take back one word of what I said yesterday about the adjournment of the last Congress. Except on one solitary question I shall ever think of the last House of Representatives with disgust. We had a President at the last session bent, I think, on war! The House was subservient, succumbing and servile to his wishes on every other question but that. The temper and the example of the House on that question were noble, and worthy of imitation for all time to come. The gentleman from Massachusetts may well claim it as one of the brightest achievements of his civil career, that he united us unanimously in one of the noblest sentiments which ever actuated the patriot—however divided amongst ourselves, in our own household as brothers, to present an undivided front to a foreign foe! We acted wisely and temperately. And, sir, the real secret is, the reason the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not report sooner, not until the last moment, and then in the form of that three millions amendment, was, that the chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] dared not report counter to the sense of the people on the one side, or to the sense of the President on the other! When we act wisely, though counter to the President, the praise redounds to the Executive; and when any thing wrong is done, no matter by whom, the Senate is now-a-days made the scapegoat to bear all the sins of "the party" to which they are so much opposed!

Before I conclude, sir, permit me to reply briefly to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] That gentleman protests, with great emphasis, against the accusation of sycophancy and man-worship to General Jackson? We have fallen upon strange times. The times have monstrously changed, and some of us have changed with them. I am frequently at a loss, sir, to determine which side of the question that gentleman is on. At the last session he made one speech for war, another for peace, another for war again; and, at last, I thought, was about right. It has lately been said, and I believe he authorized it by a letter to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE,] that he has changed his politics once more in his latter days. If so, sir, I shall be glad of it; for he has had the fortune always, I believe, to prostrate his own friends. I shall rejoice, sir, for another, the best evidence to Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and all the democratic States—all the old democratic party—where the old federal States and the old Hartford-convention federalists are rallying! I believe no man knows his own kind better than the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and I know there is a great change, somehow or other, in the old Jackson party. Sir, a new-fangled democracy has sprung up, and renegade federalists, of whom it has been said that "they haunted the graves of such men as Hamilton and Jay like vampyres," are now among the present democrats in the land.

Fortification Bill of Last Session—Slavery in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman says his object in introducing this resolution is to arrive at truth, and to produce harmony between the two Houses of Congress. Sir, I fear his means will defeat his ends. He will, by this resolution, re-animate and arm the dead Hector, once, he says, dragged around the walls of this Capitol by the victorious Achilles. Instead of an inquiry after truth, the business of this committee will be to arraign the Senate of the United States, and to break down that body, which cannot stand much longer. It has withstood already more than I thought it could bear, and I will not consent to apply another catapult to its walls. The gentleman will find himself mistaken. Instead of harmony, he will array House against House, and the legislative department, divided against itself, must fall. The policy of the Executive, when it means to consolidate all power in itself, will ever be to divide and conquer. I will not aid the Executive against Congress. Instead of being united here, to a man, against encroachments of the Executive, it seems we are to be made ourselves the instruments and the tools of executive aggrandizement. Will there never be any peace in the land until every institution is prostrated to that one? I hope the gentleman does not mean to enlist us in this fatal and unprecedented war upon the Senate. Sir, if I differed as widely as the poles from the Senate on subjects of past differences, I would now, in these fearful times of consolidating all power in the Executive, endeavor to become reconciled to that body, and to meet it on common grounds of peace and harmony and united action. Behold the spectacle of the two Houses of Congress wrangling, to the destruction of each other, upon the point of dispute which failed to do the sovereign will and good pleasure of the Executive, which will and good pleasure was never graciously made known to either. Would that be the Congress which our fathers created by the constitution to be watchful and jealous of executive power? They created us to be a check, to preserve the equilibrium of power, and we are to quarrel about which shall yield most to a department which at best is but co-ordinate! I say, sir, such a Congress as some would make us is not the Congress which the founders of our Government intended; and, when we yield our jealous independence, the Congress of the constitution will be dead, dead, dead! With the power of appointing the Judiciary to decide upon laws, and with the power of controlling, by the bribes of appointment, the legislators who are to enact the laws, the President, if he will abuse his trusts, is omnipotent, and the Government is consolidated in the Executive. Oh! that I could inspire my fellow-members of this House, and the whole American people, to rise up in time against excessive executive power! The time has come when every man, in private life and in public, when the high and the low, the rich and the poor, should meet together for the safety of the Government. Whilst that is at stake, let us conciliate and cheer each other, and say—It is not you of the Senate, nor you of the House of Representatives, who have sinned so grievously against the country, its laws, its constitution, and the spirit of its institutions, but you, the minions of the Executive!

Sir, I denounce the attempt to charge the loss of the fortification bill upon the Senate, on the part of those who make it, knowing it to be false, to be a base fraud and imposition upon the country!

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23.

LOSS OF THE FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution yesterday offered by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of the present session as relates to the failure, at the last session of Congress, of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into, and report to the House, the causes and circumstances of the failure of the bill.

The question being on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend, by adding "with power to send for persons and papers"—

Mr. WISE resumed and concluded the remarks commenced by him yesterday, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and remarked that he had not half so much to say as had been said by the gentleman from Virginia, and he was not disposed, at this late hour, to say any thing. But, with the indulgence of the House, he would take an opportunity to correct some extraordinary mistakes into which the gentleman from Virginia had fallen. His object was, however, not so much to reply to the gentleman from Virginia, as to reach a gentleman who began this war upon him at the last session. In what the gentleman from Virginia had stated there was no novelty. He had brought forward nothing which had not been published in every opposition paper in the Union, for the last six months. He would promise the House to exhibit to them a document published in the city of Philadelphia, while a certain Senator was in that city, after the close of the last session, which would prove unequivocally the falsehood of the charges made against him. Mr. C. repeated that his object was to reach that Senator. This much of his purpose he would announce. He should shrink from no responsibility, and wished to disguise no facts. He should vindicate himself from the charges made against him, and bring his argument to this conclusion: "Let the galled jade wince, my withers are unwrung." With a view to embrace the first opportunity which might be afforded to him to address the House, he now moved that the House adjourn.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 25.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of one hundred and seven females, residing in his congressional district, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMMOND addressed the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS. I claim the floor, and shall not yield it. I move that the petition be referred to a select committee, with instructions.

Mr. GLASCOCK hoped that the gentleman would not—

Mr. ADAMS. I call to order.

The CHAIR said that the gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor. The petition which the gentleman proposed to present was still in his possession.

H. OF R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[JAN. 25, 1836.]

Mr. ADAMS moved that the petition be received; and was proceeding to discuss the propriety of its reception, when

Mr. HARDIN rose to a question of order. It was not in order, in his estimation, to discuss the motion of the gentleman at this time. The order of business now seemed to be, first, prayers, then the journal was read, and afterwards, on almost every morning, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] made a speech.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Massachusetts had made a motion to receive a petition, and was proceeding to discuss that motion. The Chair had heretofore decided that it was competent to do so. The gentleman was therefore not out of order.

Mr. CRAIG appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if this appeal was not identical with the one which was pending on his motion?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. EVANS asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were ordered.

The SPEAKER stated the question. The Chair decided that it was competent, under the rules, upon a motion to receive a petition, to discuss the propriety of its reception at the time it was offered; the 45th rule not applying to a petition not in the possession of the House.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved to postpone the question of order, and the matters connected with it, until Saturday next. His object was to enable members to present petitions.

After a few remarks by Mr. HARDIN,

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved to amend the motion by substituting Monday next for Saturday.

Mr. HARPER was opposed to a postponement. He was prepared to vote upon the appeal at this time.

Mr. REED suggested that the subject should be postponed until Tuesday week.

Mr. WHITTLESEY accepted the suggestion as a modification of his motion.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then modified his motion so as to postpone the appeal, &c., until Tuesday week.

Mr. MILLER thought the sooner the question upon the appeal was decided the better; he therefore moved the previous question, the effect of which, he understood, would be a direct vote upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The previous question was seconded, 85 to 73.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were refused; and the House decided that the question should be put without a count.

The question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Banks, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, William B. Mr. ADAMS said he was glad the question had been at last decided. By the decision, every member of the House, having a petition to present, is authorized to debate, as long as he shall think proper, the question of reception, whether on slavery or any other subject. He had heretofore endeavored to keep a discussion of the question out of the House, and should not now take up the time of the House longer than to state the reasons why he had moved the reference of the petition to a select committee. Mr. A. said his special reason was that the petition just presented came from his own immediate constituents. Heretofore, until the present session, he had never received but one single petition from his own immediate constituents, and that one signed by but very few, because it was well known, from the time that he presented the fifteen petitions from citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, that he should not support the prayer of such petitions. But since the commencement of the present Congress, he had received one or two petitions from his own constituents, and the one which he had offered to the House was endorsed "The within petition of the ladies of Marshfield, Massachusetts, is committed to the hands of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, with a request that he shall present it, and further its object." Mr. A. said he was requested to present it, and from a portion of his constituents from whom every deference was due; he meant from ladies. It was sent to him not only with the request that he should present it to the House, but that he should further its object. He wished the petition received and referred to a select committee, but if referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, he would be satisfied; but he wished it referred to a committee, which would make a report that would satisfy the petitioners that their prayer ought not to be granted. He begged of those who could command a majority in the House, and who were as unwilling as he was to make the abolition question a stumblingblock, to take a course which would treat the petitions with respect; to examine and present, with the utmost force, the reasons which should justify the House in not granting the prayer of the petitioners.

He believed that to be the best course to effect the desired object. He believed it to be the true course to let error be tolerated, to grant freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, and apply reason to put it down. He had no sort of doubt but that a committee of the House could furnish reasons why the prayer of these petitions should not be granted, which would satisfy every reasonable and humane individual in the country. He begged the majority of the House, North and South, to consider whether it was not most just and likely to soothe and compose the feelings of the people of the country. It appeared to him that would be the proper course, and that it would be an easy matter to show why the prayer of the petitioners should not be granted.

The Speaker of the House had the appointment of the committees of the House, and he came from that portion of the country which was most deeply interested against the prayer of the petitioners, and he must be permitted to say, that portion which must be of one opinion, and cannot, dare not, express any other opinion. The Speaker had already appointed the Committee on the District of Columbia, the chairman of which and a majority of members were also from that portion of the Union. If the Speaker of the House appoints a special committee, he will appoint such committee as he shall think best suited to give sound and solid reasons for the refusal of the House to grant the prayer of the petitioners. That would leave the right of petition unimpaired, and still secured to the House. No abolitionists, nor any person favorable to the views of the petitioners, could plead that this destroyed the right of petition. He hoped, for the peace and harmony of the community, and for the peace and harmony of the House, that the petition might be received. He hoped that the sacred right of petition would remain unimpaired, and that nothing appearing to conflict with that right would be the course of the House. These were the reasons why he moved that the petition be received.

Mr. MILLER concurred very fully in the views expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. When petitions of this character were first presented, he was of opinion that there were two modes in which they might be disposed of. The first was to lay them on the table without debate; and if this course was not deemed advisable by a majority of the House, then that they should be referred. If the present course was persevered in, it would preclude the presentation of every other petition during the day set apart for the presentation of petitions. Besides, resolutions were pending involving the whole subject. Under this view, and to enable other gentlemen to present their petitions, he moved to lay the preliminary question of the reception of the petition on the table.

Mr. McKENNAN asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion to lay the preliminary question on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, attended and was qualified.

Mr. ADAMS presented a petition from 160 or 170 citizens of western Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; which he moved be received.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he had hoped that gentlemen would have paused before they proceeded to introduce other petitions of the same character, particularly after the vote which had just been taken, and also when it was known that a similar petition had been made the order of the day for Saturday next, and that the resolutions embracing the whole subject-matter were in the possession of the House, and would soon be finally acted on. To press these petitions now, under circumstances like these, seemed to him to be intended to produce excitement, and wound the feelings of the southern members.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that it was not in order to impugn the motives of any member of the House.

Mr. GLASCOCK said his remark was a general one.

Mr. HARDIN rose to a question of order. He understood the gentleman to present a petition from citizens of the State of Pennsylvania; and as the rule required the States to be called in their order, he did not think the gentleman from Massachusetts was in order. If this principle were carried out, Mr. H. could hand all his papers to a member from Maine, and thus get a preference.

The CHAIR said the rule was not limited to petitions and memorials from the State from which the member presenting one came. Every member had a right to present the petition of any citizen from another State.

Mr. GLASCOCK again appealed to gentlemen charged with these petitions to withhold them, at least for the present, and to wait the result of the resolutions he had just referred to. As the gentleman from Massachusetts (said Mr. G.) has thought proper again to speak of the sacred right of petition, and to urge that not to receive a petition was an encroachment upon that right, and a violation of the first amendment of the constitution, the latter part of which declares "that Congress shall pass no law to prevent the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances," he felt it his duty, situated as he was, having made a motion to that effect some days since, to offer a few remarks in reply. Mr. G. said he hoped he would be pardoned for again repeating and saying, once for all, that he had as high a regard for the right of petition as any member on that floor; but, in admitting this, he must observe, he had an equal regard for the rights and privileges secured to every member under the rules and regulations adopted for our government. Sir, (said Mr. G.,) I feel a perfect conviction, from the slight investigation which I have been enabled to give this subject, that we have a clear constitutional right not to receive a petition; and, in doing so, we violate no part of that instrument to which gentlemen have so frequently referred; nor do we encroach upon any of those rights intended to be secured under it. I hold (said Mr. G.) that whenever any portion of our fellow-citizens peaceably assemble and petition Congress for a redress of grievances, and those petitions are presented, and their contents briefly stated, as required by one of our rules, that moment, if not before, all the rights intended to be secured to the citizens, were secured and fully complied with; and it then devolves on this House to dispose of them as may seem just and proper, in conformity to its rules; which would be, not to receive, to reject after receiving, or to refer it to some select or standing committee, or lay it on the table, dependent entirely upon the will of a majority.

Mr. G. emphatically asked, what is the question now presented for consideration? It is this: "shall the petition be received?" It cannot now be denied, nay, it is admitted on all hands, that the question is a proper one. Yes, sir, it grows out of the very motion made by the gentleman himself, on presenting his last petition, which was that "the petition be received." This brings me, sir, to an important feature, necessarily involved in the discussion; and I shall proceed to show that Mr. Jefferson, the great and illustrious statesman, whose knowledge and experience of all parliamentary rules and regulations have never been questioned, and whose Manual is at this day looked upon and recognised as a text book, and adopted by all legislative bodies and deliberative assemblies throughout the Union for their government, and particularly by the Congress of the United States, holds, and so lays it down in his remarks which follow the 45th rule: "That regularly a motion for receiving a petition must be made and seconded, and a question put whether it shall be received;" and it is in accordance with his views, thus expressed, that the question is now presented, and must always be presented, on the presentation of a petition, if there be any objections to its reception. This (said Mr. G.) he understood to be the uniform practice of this House, and was strictly adhered to in the Senate. If this principle be established, away with all constitutional scruples and objections. They can avail no one; for all who knew the justly-styled sage of Monticello, must know that, in expounding constitutional questions, if he had an equal, he had no superior. Sir, (said Mr. G.,) Mr. Jefferson was a strict constructionist, and would have been amongst the last to have incorporated into the rules of this House any question, a decision of which would violate that constitution which he held so dear and sacred; and, with great deference to the opinions of others, he looked upon it as a reflection upon his memory even to suppose it. Had he considered that not to receive a petition was to deprive the citizens of this country of the right of petition, a right intended to be secured to them under the clause of the constitution to which he had referred, would he not have ingrafted into the rules, or, in commenting upon them, have declared that all petitions must be received, emanating from the people peaceably assembling and petitioning for a redress of grievances? The inference, (said Mr. G.,) to his mind, was irresistible, and he honestly believed all would come to the same conclusion upon mature reflection. That Mr. Jefferson had an eye single to the constitution at the time he prepared his Manual, he had never doubted; and even if he had, he should have been satisfied of the fact upon reading a sentence from the preface of his work, in which he states, "That he considered the law of the proceedings of the Senate as composed of the precepts of the constitution," &c. Let it not be forgotten that Mr. Jefferson, as Vice President of the United States, presided over that body for years, from which time to the present period, the question, "Shall the petition be received?" has been recognised and considered as a proper one, and not conflicting with any feature of our constitution, or why should it be retained? why, permit me to ask, has it not been erased from the rules? or why are we permitted, by recording our votes in the negative on the present question, to violate it, as gentlemen say it will be? Sir, (said Mr. G.,) if it be unconstitutional not to receive a petition, we should not for a moment permit by a rule, or by the practice of this House, any question to be propounded, the result of which would lead to its violation. For himself, he had no scruples on the subject. This question being adopted and considered by Mr. Jefferson as a proper one, left him no ground on which even to doubt; and he felt no disposition to look for higher authority to sustain him in the views he had taken, or to justify him in the course which he had pursued in relation to these petitions. But he could not conclude his remarks on this branch of the subject, without referring with pride and pleasure to a vote given by two distinguished Senators from his own State, as late as the year 1805, against the reception of a petition from sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, (from whence this petition now comes,) "pleading the cause of their degraded and oppressed fellow-men of the African race," as they were pleased to term them; and, on the question to receive the petition, I find the names of those great and good men, James Jackson and Abraham Baldwin, recorded in the negative, and in whose veins purer streams of honor, patriotism, and virtue, never flowed; and who were men as devotedly attached to the principles of the constitution as ever lived, and as watchful of the rights of their fellow-citizens, and on whom it may be truly said, the affections of their people were concentrated. This vote was given, too, at a time when there was but little excitement compared with the excitement of the present day; there was at that period but few abolition societies in the country, no presses established for the printing and circulating incendiary pamphlets, no one was then in the employ of those societies freely to circulate them throughout the land, as they are now, to effect their objects, and to produce consequences most awful in their character. Who (said Mr. G.) does not behold the contrast, and who from the South will not exclaim, if it were right then to reject those petitions, it was imperiously their duty to reject them now. God forbid that any of us should falter in the present contest.

A few remarks (said Mr. G.) relative to those petitions, and he would conclude the argument, which he regretted he was forced to enter into in consequence of their introduction. He had taken some pains to look into these petitions, with a view to judge of their character, and of the language used by the applicants; and he felt bound to state that, of the great number which had been crowded upon us, he scarcely read one which was not highly disrespectful and libellous upon the whole South, and especially those who are owners of slaves. How can it be expected, under such a state of things, that we can pursue a different course than to vote against a reception of each and all of them, as they are presented. For himself, he felt bound to do it; and in doing so it was in perfect accordance with his own feelings, and he confidently believed it would be in accordance with the feelings of those whom he had the honor in part to represent. Be this, however, as it may, he should continue to discharge, fearlessly, what he conceived to be his duty, which was to stamp these petitions, (coming from whatever quarter they may,) with the seal of reprobation, and treat them with the just indignation they merit; and he should continue to do this, regardless of all consequences and of all political considerations.

Mr. G. said he had long since determined not to go into a general discussion of the merits of slavery, for no new lights could be shed upon it; but whenever it became necessary to act upon the resolutions of the gentleman from Maine, he might again feel it his duty to address the House on the constitutional question as to the right of Congress interfering with the subject in this District. Until then he should endeavor to remain silent, and for the present would no longer trespass on the patience of the House.

Mr. MILLER said he would make one more effort to arrest this debate at this time. He moved to lay the preliminary question on the table.

Mr. GRANGER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were as follows:

So the preliminary question was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of four hundred citizens of Indiana and Westmoreland counties, State of Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. The petitioners were unknown to him, and the motives which had induced them to request him to present their petitions he knew not. He had from time to time stated that he was opposed to the prayer of similar petitions. He was also unacquainted with any of the persons whose names appeared upon the petition which he this day presented from his own district. He had no agency in procuring either of the petitions to be sent to him. It was perhaps done in consequence of his declaration that he would present any petition sent to him for that purpose from citizens of the United States, couched in respectful language. This he should continue to do, and he should not scan very closely the particular language used by petitioners.

If objection to the reception of these petitions was placed upon the ground that the language was disrespectful, as was intimated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK,] that objection should be entered on the journal. If the people should be apprized that this was the objection, there would be petitions enough sent here, where no objection of this sort could be urged. Indeed it would be difficult to use language on this subject which would be deemed respectful by slaveholders. Congress had declared the slave trade, when carried on out of the United States, piracy. He was opposed to that act, because he did not think it proper that this traffic without our boundaries should be called piracy, while there was no constitutional right to interdict it within our borders. It was not only not considered piracy, but it was carried on in sight of the windows of the Capitol. Mr. A. referred in strong terms to the evils of the domestic slave trade, and concluded by assuring the House that, whatever might be the character of the resolutions which might be passed, if it should be declared that Congress did not possess the power under the constitution to abolish slavery and the slave trade, he should still feel it to be his duty to present every petition on the subject which might come to his hands, upon the fundamental principle that the House had no right to take away or abridge the constitutional right of petition.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he should make no such promises as were made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to trouble the House a few moments, and make a speech of half an hour. He wished to make a single remark or two, however they might be spun out. The gentleman said he saw, in the motion made by him, [Mr. MANN,] the other day, to postpone the consideration of the question of order, "a cat in a meal tub," and he saw a great many things besides. Mr. M. said, so far as he himself was concerned, he could assure the gentleman that on his (Mr. M.'s) part, and so far as he knew the opinions of his colleagues, there was no indisposition whatever on their part to meet that question distinctly and fairly, as well as every other appertaining to this subject, and to give their votes and opinions, not only to that House, but to the country. He well remembered that, at the commencement of the session, the gentleman from Massachusetts most distinctly, and with great emphasis, declared that every speech made in that House would be, to all intents and purposes, an abolition pamphlet, to be sent into the southern States. The gentleman had also professed to be opposed to that portion of his constituents who desired to agitate this subject; and yet the gentleman himself had taken occasion, upon every petition he brought there on this subject to append an abolition speech to it. Mr. M. left it to the gentleman himself, to that House, and to his constituents, to decide how far the remarks of the gentleman, at that early day of the session, were consistent with the gentleman's subsequent course. Why, this matter might be carried on to an indefinite extent. The gentleman had seen the disposition manifested on every occasion; he had seen the votes in regard to laying the motion to receive on the table; he had seen the action of the House, not only by ayes and noes, but by all its various forms. Mr. M. would therefore add his simple, his most humble request to the gentleman, that he would not be quite so zealous to perform the duties he felt so constitutionally incumbent upon him on every Monday morning, until either the House should manifest a disposition to "dodge the question," or to decide and vote upon it.

As to the right of petition, Mr. M. agreed, in general, with the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts. He should vote, whenever called upon to vote there, to sustain that constitutional right. Mr. M. had no disguises on that subject. He had never voted against that right, and never should. But why bring this subject there every day, every hour, after the decisions that had been given there again and again? Was not the gentleman satisfied? Had not the votes of that morning satisfied him? He trusted it was not necessary to reiterate those decisions.

Mr. ADAMS said, as the gentleman's discourse appeared to have been addressed to him, he would— not trouble the House with any reply.

Mr. TURRILL moved to lay the preliminary motion on receiving on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHING said he was charged with three petitions of a similar character, from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, and moved the preliminary question upon one of them, that the petition be received. Mr. C. was proceeding to state the contents of the petition, and to eulogize the subscribers to it.

Mr. HOWARD raised the question of order, whether the motion could be debated.

The SPEAKER said by the decision of the House it could, but he would put the question whether its acceptance was objected to.

Mr. HAMMOND objected.

Mr. CUSHING then said: This petition prays for the abolition of slavery, and the slave trade, in this District. It is respectful in its terms, being free from the offensive expressions and reflections contained in some of the petitions on the same subject, heretofore presented. It is signed by inhabitants of Haverhill, in the State of Massachusetts; and among the subscribers are the names of citizens of that State whom I personally know, whom I avouch to be highly respectable, and who, whether mistaken or not in their views, are assuredly actuated by conscientious motives of civil and religious principle. They are constituents of mine. They have transmitted to me the petition, desiring me, as their Representative, to present it. And, under these circumstances, much as I have deprecated such a commission, and reluctant as I am to be instrumental in the introduction of any matter of excitement upon this floor, I cannot permit myself to hesitate in the discharge of this painful duty, believing, as I do, that it is the constitutional right of every American, be he high or be he low, be he fanatic or be he philosopher, to come here with his grievances, and to be heard upon his petition by this House.

These petitioners look to me to obtain them a hearing in this place. They have a right to require this office of me; they have, in my judgment, a right to be heard; and so long as I have the honor to hold a seat in this House, no constituent of mine, however humble his condition or unwelcome his prayer, shall see his petition thrust back in his face unheard, while the gift of reason or speech remains to me; for if it cannot be received and considered in the usual forms of legislation, it shall be heard through the lips of his Representative. Nor will I undertake to scan, over-captiously, either the object of his petition or the language in which it is couched. Nor will I stop to inquire how far the petitioners and I myself entertain the same opinions of the general subject-matter. And there are particular inducements which impel me to make a stand at the present moment upon this petition.

I declare and protest (said Mr. C.) in advance, that I do not intend, at this time at least, to be drawn or driven into the question of slavery, in either of its subdivisions or forms. At home, I am known to be of those who long ago foresaw and early withstood the coming of this anti-slavery agitation. Of the many occasions when I have actively interposed in this behalf, I hope to be pardoned for distinctly citing one, as vesting in me some title to be candidly heard by the House. I allude to a published address upon the slave question, in which I deliberately asserted the constitutional rights of the South in this matter. It shall be my aim, on this occasion, to do and say nothing inconsistent with myself, with the letter of the constitution, or with the spirit of the various compromises of interest and opinion incorporated into the Union of these States.

The members of this House have been frequently called, during the present session, to vote upon divisions connected with petitions of this nature. On those occasions I have been content to pronounce my vote simply, and without explanation, leaving my reasons and motives to be construed or misconstrued by others, as chance might order. To have continued so to do until the subject of present controversy were finally disposed of, is the part I should altogether have chosen, had circumstances permitted me to such a course. But, if I have been a silent, I have not been an incurious, nor, I trust, an uninstructed spectator of events. It is rendered apparent that those great matters, which occupy the public mind abroad, do now occupy also this House. If other gentlemen, differing with me in part or in whole, had voted without discussion, according to the dictates of their individual judgment, each of us could fairly have stood upon his personal convictions, and his personal estimation elsewhere, for his justification in the eyes of his countrymen. But that, much as it were in my view to be desired, is no longer possible. What has happened here is enrolled already in the unchangeable records of time and eternity. It is become history. It cannot be recalled; it cannot be blotted from the memory; it cannot be expunged from the annals of the country. The winged words uttered in this House have gone forth to the world, on their mission of good or of evil. Debate we have; debate we must have; we are goaded into debate; it is forced upon us; and from a quarter of the Union whence, I am frank to say, I did not look for it to come; and forced upon us in terms of dictation which I cannot brook, since they leave to me no alternative of escape from debate, but in the passive surrender of some of the dearest of our birthrights, those of free petition, free speech, and free conscience. I say, of free speech and free conscience, both which are involved in the resolutions moved some time since by a gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS.] When these resolutions shall be distinctly before the House, it will become its members to reflect whether they have the constitutional right to attempt, or, attempting, have the power to enforce, what those resolutions seem to contemplate—a perpetual prohibition of debate, and even of motions, upon a large and comprehensive class of subjects. These rights, neither my constituents nor I myself feel disposed to surrender; and upon one of these great liberties of the land, and for the sake of incidentally vindicating the others, I shall, in due time, address the House at length.

My only object, at this time, is to come to a fair understanding with the House, as to the course to be pursued in the debate, and the disposition it will make of these petitions.

At a very early period of the session, a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] met such petitions with the motion that they be not received. All the debates which ensued thereon terminated in evasive and unsatisfactory votes for laying on the table, which left every question of principle unsettled.

Afterwards, on a similar objection to reception being made by a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK,] my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] appealed from a ruling of the Speaker on an incidental point of order; which appeal, and the matters connected with it, have been put off, day after day, and week after week, and still remain suspended for some future time of consideration.

Then came a set of resolutions applicable to a part of the prayer of these petitions, moved by a gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] under which there is a debate in progress, on an amendment moved by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] to the effect that Congress have no power granted by the constitution to legislate on the subject of slavery in this District.

Finally, on the last occasion when petitions of this kind were presented, the question of reception being raised, that question was, by vote of the House, laid on the table, as happened this morning in the case of those petitions presented by my colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] the operation of which is, practically, to refuse to receive the petitions.

Now, I am wholly dissatisfied with this course of proceeding, and I cannot submit to it in regard to the petitions which I am charged to present. I hold that the question of reception, as it is in fact and of necessity the first in order of time, so is it the first in order of principle. It must not be pushed aside to make place for the discussion of speculative resolutions, or for debate on the merits of the question raised by the prayer of these petitions. I maintain that the House is bound by the constitution to receive the petitions; after which, it will take such method of deciding upon them as reason and principle shall dictate. It should first lend an attentive and respectful ear to the prayer of the people. Whether it can or will grant that prayer is an after consideration. I have already kept back for several weeks the petitions committed to me, in order to shape my course according to the deliberate decision of the House; but that decision does not come; it is continually procrastinated for the sake of considering questions which, in my view, are secondary in time and in principle to the question of reception; and I can no longer consent that these my constituents shall be held waiting, as it were, at the doors of the Capitol for admission, when, as I read the constitution, they have a right to demand immediate entrance, and to be respectfully received by their assembled representatives.

I tender to the House, therefore, an alternative. I place this petition at their disposal. If they choose to fix absolutely on a time certain for considering and deciding the question of reception, so that this shall take precedence of the other debate, they will then have this day, as usual, for its appropriate business of the general presentation of petitions. But if they decide, as heretofore, to lay the question of reception on the table, then I shall feel myself constrained to take the floor upon another of these petitions, and keep it, as under a late decision of the House I have a right to do, until I have fully debated the whole subject-matter. If the effect of this shall be to exclude all other petitions for the day, I cannot help it. Be the responsibility on their heads who raise this novel and extraordinary question of reception, going to the unconstitutional abridgement, as I conceive, of the great right of petition inherent in the people of the United States.

[The question, "Shall this petition be received?" was then, at the motion of a gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. HAMMOND,] laid on the table; when Mr. CUSHING resumed the floor and said:]

I now present to the House a petition signed by inhabitants of Amesbury, in the State of Massachusetts, among the subscribers to which are persons whom I know, and avouch to be citizens of the United States. They pray for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories under the jurisdiction of the United States. I make the preliminary motion that it be received; and upon that motion I proceed to express my views to the House.

Steering clear of all the inflammable matter intruded into these debates, gauging myself to the standard of the most absolute moderation, and resolutely tying down my thoughts to the real point in issue, what I propose to examine is the single naked question of the constitutional right of petition, as involved in the disposition of these petitions.

Looking into the constitution, I find, among the amendments proposed by the Congress of 1789, and in the very first of the number, the following article:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Long before I had imagined that such a right would ever be called in question, I remember to have read the remark of a distinguished jurist and magistrate of the State of Virginia, (Tucker's Notes on Blackstone,) complaining that the concluding words of the clause I have cited from the constitution did not so strongly guard the great right of petition as the liberties of the people demanded. On the other hand, a still more distinguished jurist and magistrate of my own State, (Story's Commentaries,) in remarking upon the same article, expresses the opinion that it is ample in terms; because, he adds, "it (the right of petition) results from the very nature of the structure and institutions of a republican Government: it is impossible that it should be practically denied until the spirit of liberty had wholly disappeared, and the people had become so servile and debased as to be unfit to exercise any of the privileges of freemen." These eminent constitutional lawyers agreed in opinion of the importance of the provision; they differed only in thinking, the one that the right of petition could not be too clearly defined; the other that, whether defectively defined or not in the letter, the people would take care that it should in spirit be faithfully observed. While the first entertained a wise jealousy of the encroachments of the people's representatives, the other looked for the protection of the public rights to the people themselves, the masters of the people's representatives. And as the fears of the former have been verified too speedily, I trust that the hopes of the latter will not be less truly realized.

There are some things in the context and phraseology of this article of the constitution, which may deserve attention. It speaks of "grievances," in the general; not "their grievances," the personal grievances of the individuals petitioning, but any thing, public or personal, which they deem to be a grievance. It is the same article which allows to us the free exercise of our religion, and the liberty of speech and of the press. With these primary and fundamental rights of a free people, it associates the right of petition. But there is this peculiarity in the language of this clause of the constitution. The words applicable to our subject are, "Congress shall make no law abridging the right of the people to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The right of petition, therefore, is not a privilege conferred by the constitution. It is recognised as a pre-existing right, already possessed by the people, which they still reserve to themselves, and which Congress shall not so much as touch with the weight of a finger. The people, in their constitution, say to Congress, We place in your hands our right and power of collecting a revenue to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the Union; our right and power to regulate commerce, to coin money, to declare war, and to raise and support armies and navies for its prosecution. Upon these and other subjects you may exercise the discretion which we repose in you by virtue of our constitution. But this you shall not do: you shall not, until after the expiration of twenty years, prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as we think proper to admit; you shall not pass any bill of attainder; you shall not lay any tax or duty on exports; and you shall make no law prohibiting the free exercise of religion, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances. These, our great natural rights, we keep to ourselves; we will not have them tampered with; respecting them, we give to you no commission whatsoever. And rights which Congress itself, the entire Legislature, consisting of the President, the Senate, and the House, acting in their combined functions in the enactment of a law, is forbidden to abridge, can this House alone undertake, by a mere resolution or vote, practically to deny, abolish, and destroy? Sir, if we can successfully do it, I have greatly misconceived the democratic ancestry, the democratic principles, and the democratic energy, of the people whom we are appointed to serve in this House.

The right of petition, I have said, was not conferred on the people by the constitution, but was a pre-existing right, reserved by the people out of the grants of power made to Congress. To understand its nature and extent, we must, therefore, look beyond and behind the constitution, into the anterior political history of the country.

And, in the first place, I beg of the House, and especially of the gentlemen who so ably represent Virginia on this floor, to remember how this article found its way into the constitution.

You well know, sir, that when the constitution was submitted to the people of the respective States for their adoption or rejection, it awakened the warmest debate in the several State conventions. Some of them, in accepting the proposed plan of government, coupled their acceptance with a recommendation of various additions to the constitution, which they deemed essential to the preservation of the rights of the States or of the people. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts insisted, among other things, on the adoption of that memorable amendment, to the effect "that it be explicitly declared that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid constitution, are reserved to the several States, to be by them exercised." Having attained this object, and thus clearly ascertained what powers it was that she parted with to the Federal Government, she felt less anxious in regard to some things which, in other States, were deemed important. Especially, she did not, for herself, demand the insertion of those general clauses of political doctrine, popularly called, at that time, after the celebrated English bill of rights, and known in some modern European constitutions by the name of guarantees. She was less tenacious on this point, inasmuch as her own constitution was very full in this respect. It contained two clauses material to the present question, in the following words:

"All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of Government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents."

"The people have a right, in an orderly and peaceable manner, to assemble to consult upon the common good; give instructions to their representatives; and to request of the legislative body, by the way of address, petition, or remonstrance, redress of the wrongs done them, and of the grievances they suffer."

These clauses being in her own constitution, I say, and it being understood by her that all powers not granted to the United States were reserved to the States, she felt that she was safe in agreeing to the fundamental compact of the Union.

The people and Commonwealth of Virginia reasoned differently from this; and I will not stop to argue whether they did or did not reason more wisely than Massachusetts. They said, We choose to leave nothing doubtful which language can render certain in a matter of so much moment. We are laying the foundations of a Government, which we hope may outlast they pyramids. We know, from old experience, that the depositaries of the popular power are ingenious in the finding of glosses and interpretations to abstract from the popular rights. Let us see to it that this constitution contain such express recognition of the rights of the people, as it shall be impossible to misunderstand. We will write upon its very front the great doctrines of liberty, in characters of light, which, like the burning letters in the banqueting-hall of Belshazzar, may blast the eye-balls of whomever shall meditate treason to the democratic rights we have conquered with our blood and our fortunes. Accordingly, the convention of Virginia proposed to amend the constitution by inserting therein the following, among other clauses:

"That all power is naturally vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates, therefore, are their trustees and agents, and at all times amenable to them."

"That the people have a right peaceably to assemble together to consult for the common good, or to instruct their representatives; and that every freeman has a right to petition the Legislature for a redress of grievances."

New York, North Carolina, and Rhode Island, proposed, either literally or in substance, the same provision; and the consequence was, the addition to the constitution of the article which I am now discussing, on the right of conscience, speech, and petition. And such being the history of this clause, I look to the gentlemen from Virginia especially, constant and honorable as they are in their attachment to constitutional principles at whatever hazard, to go with me in maintaining inviolate this great original right of the people.

But we shall not fully appreciate the force and value of this provision, if we stop at this point of the investigation. The right of petition is an old undoubted household right of the blood of England, which runs in our veins. When we fled from the oppressions of Kings and Parliaments in Europe, to found this great republic in America, we brought with us the laws and the liberties which formed a part of our heritage as Britons. We brought with us the idea and the form of our legislative assemblies, composed of elected representatives of the people; we brought with us the right of petition, as the necessary incident of such institutions. For where, in the whole history of our father-land, has the right of petition ever undergone debate and question? Go back to the old parliamentary rolls, coeval with magna charta; peruse the black-letter volumes in which the early laws and practices of the English monarchy are seen to be recorded; and, so far as you find a Government to exist, you find the right to petition that Government existing also, as an undeniable franchise and birthright of the humblest in the land. The Normans came over, lance in hand, burning and trampling down every thing before them, and cutting off the Saxon dynasty and the Saxon nobles at the edge of the sword; but the right of petition remained untouched. In all succeeding times, from the day when the barons at Runnymede pledged themselves to deny to no man redress of his grievances, through every vicissitude of revolution and of war, down to the day when our forefathers abandoned their native country, the same right of petition continued without challenge. In the next reign, it is true, that of the misguided Charles I, the King invaded the public liberties; and he expiated the wrong by a felon's death. After the commonwealth had passed away, came the petition of right, and with it the statute of 13 Charles II, distinctly recognising the old right of petition, and regulating the mode of its exercise; and, again, after the dethronement and exile of James II, the bill of rights, and the statute of 1 William and Mary, again recognising and regulating the right of petition as it has been exercised at all times throughout Great Britain.

Now, I ask gentlemen to point me, in all or any of the periods under review, to the precedents of a refusal by Parliament to receive petitions. I invite them to turn over the histories of parliamentary proceeding, and cite me the examples of petitions being thrust out of the House of Commons or of Lords, at the instant of presentation, unread or unheard, on the ground that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted. Will they do it? Can they do it? Is it not perfectly notorious, on the contrary, that every subject is freely admitted to be heard in his petition, provided it be respectful in terms, even although he pray expressly for a down-right revolution in the Government, as did the thousands of petitioners who thus carried through, in our own time, the great measure of parliamentary reform! And shall the people in republican America, with its written constitution for the protection of the public rights, and by a body of strictly limited powers, shall the people here be forbidden to do that which they may freely do in the monarchy of England, having no guarantees for the public liberty except laws and prescriptive usages, all of them confessedly at the will of an omnipotent Parliament? Forbid it reason! Forbid it justice! Forbid it liberty! Forbid it the beatified spirits of the revolutionary sages, who watch in heaven over the destinies of the republic!

Ay, but, say gentlemen, if such things are not done by the representatives of the people in monarchical England, they have been done by their representatives in democratic America. We are told of precedents at home. What are those precedents?

To begin, I throw aside as wholly inapplicable to the question, or at least as evasive of it, the case of petitions refused on account of disrespectful language towards the persons or the body petitioned. Those constitute a standing exception, independent of the merits of the subject.

The proceedings of the House in 1790, in reference to petitions on the matter of the slave trade and of slavery in the States, have been cited. It is said in a note appended in print to the very respectable speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] that those petitions were not received. This is a mistake, as every gentleman may satisfy himself by recurrence to the journals of the House.

[Mr. GARLAND rose to explain. He said that the note appended to his former remarks was wrong. He was led into the error by Mr. Elliot, in his 4th vol. of Debates, page 211. Mr. E. had copied the debate, heading it "Slave Trade; on committing the memorial of the Quakers on the slave trade, H. R., March, 1790;" and closing it with "memorial rejected." From this statement of the question, the debate being upon the commitment, and the addition, memorial rejected, Mr. G. said he took it for granted, without further examination, that the memorial was rejected without commitment. Upon examination, however, he found that this statement was inaccurate, and that the memorial was referred to a committee. Mr. G. said he was indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts for the opportunity of making this explanation and correcting the error.]

I felt sure that the gentleman from Virginia would, when occasion offered, afford an honorable explanation of this error; for I myself noticed the statement in Elliot's Debates, and might have been misled thereby, if I had not followed up the subject to the original sources of information regarding it. The petitions were in fact received, committed, and debated on report, as I shall have occasion hereafter to state at length.

One other case is cited, that of the petition of Vicente Pazos, agent of New Granada, which, in the year 1818, the House refused to receive. But the printed debates of that day show clearly the ground of rejection. Mr. Forsyth moved that it be not received. "He stated that, as the petitioner was the agent of a foreign Power, and applied to Congress as an appellate power over the Executive, he thought it improper that he should be thus heard." And the question was decided upon this single point. I heartily approve the remarks then made by a distinguished statesman, now no more, who at that time represented Massachusetts on this floor.

Mr. Mills, of Massachusetts, said that "the right of petition was a sacred one, and belonged equally to the meanest and the greatest citizen in the nation; and if such a petition as this, implicating the conduct of the Executive, had been presented from the meanest citizen, he would receive it; and if it complained of grievances without pointing out redress, it would be the duty of the House to give the proper redress; but it was to our own citizens only he would turn this listening ear. What right had a foreign subject to petition this House?"

Sir, I have incidentally touched upon the argument of precedents, and shown how untenable it is; but I care not if there were a thousand precedents of refusal to receive petitions. Such a fact, if it existed, would not abate my zeal on this point, or shift, in the minutest degree, my position. Upon the constitution, upon the pre-existing legal rights of the people, as understood in this country and in England, I have argued that this House is bound to receive the petition under debate. It is impossible, in my mind, to distinguish between the refusal to receive a petition, or its summary rejection by some general order, and the denial of the right of petition. I have no such microscopic eye as to enable me to discern the point of difference between the two things. This procedure may be keeping the word to the ear, but it is breaking it to the sense; and I go upon general, abstract, original, fundamental principle, the great principle of democratic liberty, which is the foundation stone of this republic. It is for the sacred and inalienable rights of the people that I here contend. I should regard the exclusion of petitions from the consideration of the House as a high-handed invasion of the imprescriptible rights of the constituency of the country, of whom we are the representatives, not the dictators; and it is for that reason I take my stand against it on the very threshold.

Sir, I am a republican; and I desire to see this House observe the principles of that democracy which is ever on the lips of its members, and which I hope is in their hearts, as I know and feel it is in mine, and mean it shall be in my conduct. This republic was called into being, organized, and is upheld, by a great political doctrine. That doctrine is, that the people alone are supreme; that they are the fountains of power; that all magistrates are the delegated agents of the people, for the purposes limited and prescribed in their letters of appointment and the general laws of the land; that the constituents of a member of this House have the right to give instructions to him individually; and that every individual one of the people has a right to be heard by petition on the floor of this House. These are among the things which I understand to constitute the principles of democracy; those general principles, which I learned in my boyhood, with my catechism, in the bill of rights prefixed to the constitution of my own State; which, on maturer study, I have seen to be avowed more or less distinctly in all the constitutions of this republic, and of each of its constituent republics; which I perceive to be defended and applauded in the writings of the great text authors of political science in modern times; and which, after being for the first time practically exemplified in our own institutions, have gone forth over the universe, toppling down thrones, and raising up freemen, through all the nations of Christendom.

And whilst I feel impelled by such convictions to resist the summary rejection of this petition upon principle, I am irresistibly led to the same conclusion by considerations of policy and expediency. I deny that such considerations should decide the question; but seeing they have been urged into it, I shall concede to them all due respect.

We have been told that the prayer of the petition is for a thing which the constitution does not permit to Congress, and so the petition itself should not be received. I ask of the House how it appears that we have no right, by the constitution, to legislate upon the subject-matter of the petition? It may be so, and it may not. One member of the House has earnestly averred that it is, another that it is not. Which of them is right? I confess, for myself, that I cannot think it becomes the House to decide either way, upon the mere ipse dixit of individual members. Besides, the petition calls in question not only slavery, but also the commerce in slaves. And will any gentleman affirm that the slave trade of the District is among those holy things which Congress may not constitutionally handle? Is this District set apart by the constitution, under whatever changes of opinion or fact the progress of civilization may introduce, to be unchangeably and forever a general slave market for the rest of the Union? I confess that I, again, am disappointed in that, among all the confident things said in denial of the constitutional powers of Congress in this matter, there has not been, so far as I remember, any systematic argument on the perfectly distinct branches of the double constitutional question involved in it, namely, the slave property and the slave traffic of this District. And what shall be said of our constitutional power in the purchased territories, under the jurisdiction of the United States, to which some of these petitions apply? And what clause of the constitution restricts the right of petition to constitutional things? This House cannot grant beyond its powers; these are limited by the constitution; but the people may petition for any thing; for the right of petition is, by the constitution, secured forever against any and every limitation or restriction.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

But then it is said that the subject-matter of the petition does not admit of debate; that the deliberate consideration of it, and the decision of it in the ordinary course of business, would be fraught with disastrous consequences to the peace of the South and the general tranquillity of the Union. Deeming this argument of more weight than the other, I will give to it more careful attention, especially as on this point gentlemen have appealed with great force of language to the patriotic consideration of the North.

In the first place, I aver that I, and those with whom I have acted or voted, did not seek debate on this subject. We felt anxious, almost universally, to avoid it. The members from Massachusetts, at least, have not invited, and, until it had been under discussion among other gentlemen for a whole month, they scarcely participated in the agitation of the subject in this House. We sat here week after week, submitting, for the sake of public peace, to hear in silence the harshest reflections upon our constituents, and listening, with surprised curiosity, to the strangest legal and political heresies, uttered as confidently as if they were gospel truths communicated by divine inspiration. One of my colleagues [Mr. ADAMS] did, indeed, beseech gentlemen not to provoke him to a discussion of the subject; and thus it went on, untouched by us, until another of my colleagues [Mr. HORN] could no longer abstain from the temperate defence of the constitution and of his fellow-citizens.

In the second place, I do devoutly believe that gentlemen misjudge, if they suppose that agitation out of doors is to be arrested by the quashing of these petitions on their very introduction to this House. With my whole heart I accord in the view of the subject taken some time since by an honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNT], and which I know is taken by one of the wisest and most trusted of the statesmen of Virginia, now a member of the other branch of Congress. If there be any plausible reason for supposing that we have the right to legislate on the slave interests of the District, you cannot put down the investigation of the subject out of doors by refusing to receive petitions. On the contrary, you give the petitioners new force and efficiency, by giving them a new cause of complaint and of excitement. Nor do you attain any thing, so far as this House is concerned; for, by shutting out petitions you do not shut out debate; any member of the House can bring on debate any day, by moving some general resolution applicable to the subject. On the other hand, if it be so certain that Congress have no power in this matter, or, having power, ought not to exercise it, then let the House establish those points in the usual way, by a deliberate report, elaborated in the closet, by a committee of the ablest men upon this floor, and considerably adopted by the House. The argument by which this course is withstood goes upon a false assumption. It assumes for granted that the people of the United States are not to be reasoned with; that their opinions can be put down by bold and broad assertions at this or the other end of the Capitol; and that they are not to be trusted with the facts and law of the case. Here, again, as I conceive, gentlemen forget that this Government is a republican one, resting exclusively in the intelligence and virtue of the people. I, for one, am willing they should look into any of the clauses of the constitution, and be fully informed of the merits of every question arising under it, never doubting that, in the end, their decision upon it will be just, true, and patriotic. Or is it that gentlemen are afraid to meet a proper scrutiny of the subject? Do they shrink from a fair and full examination of its merits or demerits?

Sir, allusion has been made, in an early stage of this debate, to the history of the excitement which once pervaded a considerable part of the country in reference to the transportation of the mails on the Lord's day. It is undoubtedly a pregnant case, directly in point; but I have another case yet, more cogent and pertinent.

Within less than one year after the adoption of the constitution, there came to Congress petitions, chiefly from New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and especially from the Society of Friends, praying Congress to suppress the slave trade, and to interpose, in various ways, within the limits of the several States, in the melioration of the condition of the colored population of the South. I have examined the journals giving the records of the proceedings in this House; I have looked into the history of the times, to understand the grounds of the disposition then made of those petitions. In the outset, I will observe that the debates on the subject present a remarkable parallel with what has taken place under my own eyes in this House. Messrs. Jackson, Baldwin, Tucker, Smith, and some other gentlemen from the South, insisted, as we now hear it insisted, that the petitions should be summarily rejected, without commitment. They alleged the same reasons; such as unconstitutional object, and pernicious effects of the discussion upon the interests of the slaveholding States. One gentleman did, I believe, what I suppose would hardly be done at this day, enter into an elaborate vindication of the trans-Atlantic slave trade. But there was a most eminent and most patriotic member of that House, a man as calm in judging as he was deliberate in acting, who had himself been instrumental among the first in laying the foundation of this Union; who since then has successfully filled the highest stations which the laws of his country acknowledge; and who yet lives in a venerable old age, to receive the admiration of his countrymen, and to enjoy the rare felicity of surviving, as it were, a witness of the honors bestowed upon him by posterity. Serus redeat in cælum. Long may it be ere he depart from among us, to take his place among the great and glorious of other times. Sir, the House will anticipate that I have in my eye James Madison the younger, who stood forth to pour upon the troubled waves of that day the oil of peace and gladness. God grant there may yet be found among his patriotic countrymen some good and great man—a better and a greater there is not—now to perform the selfsame office for the republic.

At that crisis, in the very greenness of the immature youth of the constitution, when it was least able to bear the shock of sectional collision, Mr. Madison, southerner as he was, steadily opposed his friends from the South, and successfully advocated the commitment of the petitions. I submit to the House his speech, as I find it very briefly reported in the newspapers of that day:

“Mr. Madison observed that it was his opinion yesterday that the best way to proceed in this business was to commit the memorial without any debate on the subject. From what has taken place, he was more convinced of the propriety of the idea. But, as the business has engaged the attention of many members, he would offer a few observations for the consideration of the House. He then entered into a critical review of the circumstances respecting the adoption of the constitution, the ideas upon the limitation of the power of Congress to interfere in the regulation of the commerce in slaves, and showing that they undoubtedly were not precluded from interposing in their importation, and generally to regulate the mode in which every species of business shall be transacted. He adverted to the western country and the cession of Georgia, in which Congress have certainly the power to regulate the subject of slavery, which shows that gentlemen are mistaken in supposing that Congress cannot constitutionally interfere in the business in any degree whatever. He was in favor of committing the petitions, and justified the measure by repeated precedents in the proceedings of the House."

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

I produce this speech, not for the purpose of adopting all its views, for some of them, I confess, are new to me, and such as I have not had time or means to investigate, but in order to show, conclusively, what Mr. Madison deemed wise and proper to be done in a contingency so precisely like the present. Accordingly, all the petitions were committed to a select committee; that committee made a report; the report was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and discussed on four successive days; it was then reported to the House with amendments, and by the House ordered to be inscribed in its journals, and then laid on the table.

That report, as amended in committee, is in the following words:

"The committee to whom were referred sundry memorials from the people called Quakers, and also a memorial from the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the abolition of slavery, submit the following report, (as amended in Committee of the Whole:)

"First. That the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit cannot be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808.

"Secondly. That Congress have no power to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, within any of the States; it remaining with the several States alone to provide any regulation therein which humanity and true policy may require.

"Thirdly. That Congress have authority to restrain the citizens of the United States from carrying on the African slave trade, for the purpose of supplying foreigners with slaves, and of providing, by proper regulations, for the humane treatment, during their passage, of slaves imported by the said citizens into the States admitting such importations.

"Fourthly. That Congress have also authority to prohibit foreigners from fitting out vessels in any part of the United States for transporting persons from Africa to any foreign port."

Now, I entreat the House to call to mind the effect of these proceedings. There was no insurrection, no servile war, no agitation in the South. Congress calmly and considerately examined the whole broad question, not of the slave trade only, but also of the slave interest. It decided how far it could go, and how far it would go. Its decision went forth to the world, and settled the questions involved in it, as it were, forever. Nearly fifty years have since elapsed, and I am not aware that the points then adjudged have at any time since been drawn into debate or controversy. And I do declare my solemn belief, that if the House would now pursue the same course, and dispassionately determine what it can or cannot do, and make that determination known to the country in a respectful way, the result would be precisely the same in this vexed question of the District of Columbia.

Entertaining these opinions of the course to be pursued, I beg of gentlemen to look at the question, as I have done, in a calm review of facts and of principles. They deprecate all agitation unfriendly to the peace and reciprocal good will of the different sections of the country. So do I, most heartily; and in my own humble sphere I have earnestly exerted myself to this end. And I do, unwillingly but decidedly, avow my conviction, derived from abundant personal observation, that it is not by the summary suppression of petitions, it is not by Lynching this or any other petition, that tranquillity is to be restored, and harmony assured, either in the South or the North. And whilst I entreat of individual members of the House to regard this question in calmness, and conclude it in judgment, as they would any lesser question, I warn and adjure the House itself, as a constituent branch of this Government, to beware lest, in deciding this general question of the right of petition, it overleap the bounds prescribed to it by the constitution.

Men of Virginia, countrymen of Washington, of Patrick Henry, of Jefferson, and of Madison, will ye be true to your constitutional faith? Men of New York, will ye ride over the principles of the democracy ye profess? Men of the West, can ye prove recreant to the spirit of sturdy independence which carried you beyond the mountains? Men of New England, I hold you to the doctrines of liberty which ye inherit from your puritan forefathers. And if this House is to be scared, by whatever influences, from its duty to receive and hear the petitions of the people, then I shall send my voice beyond the walls of this Capitol for redress. To the people I say, your liberties are in danger; they, whom you have chosen to be your representatives, are untrue to their trust: come ye to the rescue; for the vindication of your right of petition, to you I appeal; to you, the people who sent us here, whose agents we are, to whom we shall return to render a reckoning to our stewardship, and who are the true and only sovereigns in this republic.

After Mr. CUSHING concluded his remarks,

Mr. GARLAND rose and said that he did not rise to inflict a long speech upon the House, particularly at this hour of the day; that he would not discuss the subject of slavery here or elsewhere; but he could not permit the ingenious and specious remarks of the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] who has just taken his seat, to go to the public without an humble effort, on his part, to parry their effects, by exposing their fallacy. Mr. G. said, that whenever gentlemen presented these petitions for interference with the local rights of the people of the District of Columbia, against their wishes, the reception was to be secured, by being wrapped in the extensive folds of the sacred, the constitutional right of petition.

Mr. G. said he proposed very briefly to examine this subject, with a view to distinguish between the constitutional right of petition and the constitutional obligation of this House to receive petitions when presented, and to prove that this House was under no constitutional obligation to receive petitions founded in abuse of this sacred right, and having in view the subversion of the rights of others. Mr. G. said, when gentlemen from the North accused members of the South of disregarding the constitutional right of petition, in voting against the reception of these abolition memorials, they did them great injustice. No people regarded with more scrupulous jealousy the right of petition, legitimately exercised, than the southern people; but it was against its abuse that they protested; and it was the invasion of the rights of others, under color of this sacred principle, which they resisted.

Mr. G. said, with due deference to the opinions of other gentlemen, he had always understood that the object of the constitution, in guarantying the right of petition, was to enable the people, or any portion of them, to assemble without interruption or hindrance, and petition for the redress of any grievance under which they might labor, and which was within the reach of the body petitioned. This was the object of the celebrated magna charta of England; it was the object of every guarantee of the right of petition in every age of the world, wherever it has existed. It was (said Mr. G.) emphatically a right, guarantied by the constitution, to petition for redress of grievances—grievances either public or private, but nothing more. Mr. G. said, to sustain this position, he needed no other argument than the article of the constitution cited by the honorable gentleman himself. It reads thus: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Can the mind of any man (said Mr. G.) be so far obscured as not at once to perceive that the object of this article was to secure to the people the right of assembling and petitioning, without hindrance or molestation, founded upon the right of all or any portion of the people to have their grievances (not the grievances of others) redressed? He said he thought not. He thought the article too clear to need the aid of argument for elucidation. Mr. G. said, every people knew their own grievances best, and he thought it a most extravagant claim, under this article, to assert that it gave the right to one set of people to interfere with the rights of another, and that Congress was bound to receive such petitions, and gravely act upon them. The constitution meant (said Mr. G.) no such absurdity.

Mr. G. said he would, by offering a few hypothetical examples, illustrate the absurdity of this extravagant claim under the constitutional right of petition, broad as it is, and broad as it should be. Mr. G. said the constitution of our Government was strictly federal; that to its action and control were confided particular, specified, defined powers, in which there was a general and a community of interest between all the States; but that the domestic rights of the States were under their own exclusive jurisdiction; and that the Federal Government could, constitutionally, no more interfere with them than could the Government of France or England. In the domestic relations of the States, they are not only independent of the Federal Government, but of the several State Governments. Among the several domestic concerns of the States, over which the Federal Government has no jurisdiction whatever, is the institution of slavery in the slaveholding States. It is an admitted principle, (said Mr. G.) It is a constitutional guarantee that the jurisdiction of the States in which slavery exists is exclusive over the subject, and that neither the Federal nor any State Government has the right to interfere with it. This principle being true, (said Mr. G.) as it undoubtedly is, he would ask whether the people of any portion of the State of Massachusetts had the right to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the State of Virginia, because the right of petition is guaranteed by the constitution, and that Congress is bound to receive their petitions, and gravely consider the subject-matter of them—a subject-matter over which there is not only not delegated any power, but over which their power is expressly restricted. To what end are they to receive it? Merely to get a report from a committee, and a grave decision of this House that it has no right to legislate upon this subject? Surely this is an absurdity (said Mr. G.) for which no member of this House will contend. It would be an idle waste of time.

Sir, said Mr. G., (for the principles would be precisely the same,) suppose these people were to petition Congress to interfere with the domestic relations of France or England: ought their petitions, or, in other words, would Congress be bound to receive and gravely consider the subject-matter of such petitions? Certainly not. Again, said Mr. G., suppose they were to petition Congress to alter the law of descents in Virginia—and they have the same constitutional right to do this as they have to petition Congress to abolish slavery in Virginia—will gentlemen say that Congress would be bound, under the constitution, to receive and gravely consider the subject-matter of such a petition? I humbly think not.

According to the latitudinous views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] the good people of Massachusetts have the constitutional right to petition about every thing and any thing, either in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America; even, Mr. Speaker, that this House should hang you, for some of what they might please to call your religious, or political, or moral sins; and that the constitution imposes upon Congress the obligation to receive and gravely to consider such petition. When it is seen that the right of petition, and the obligation of receiving and considering such petitions on the part of Congress, as contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts, drives, in practice, to such absurdities, Mr. G. said he regarded the position he had taken proven to be true—that the constitution intended to give protection to the people in petitioning for a redress of their own actual grievances, and to impose upon Congress the duty of receiving only such petitions as come within the sphere of their constitutional power of redress. Mr. G. said he hazarded but little in saying, if this case could be reversed, and the people of Virginia were petitioning Congress to compel the State of Massachusetts, or any other non-slaveholding State, to establish slavery, that every northern member would rise in his place and protest against the reception of such a petition, as impertinent, obtrusive, and without the legislative jurisdiction of Congress. The principle is precisely the same.

Mr. G. said if he had succeeded in proving, as he humbly thought he had, that the constitution did not secure to the people of Massachusetts, or any other State, the right to petition for the abolition of slavery in Virginia, or for any interference with any of its acknowledged domestic rights, or impose on Congress the duty of receiving and considering such petitions, it only remained for him to prove that, in relation to the domestic rights of the people of the District of Columbia, they were as independent and as foreign to the people of Massachusetts as were those of Virginia, and that they had no more right of interference with the one than the other. Mr. G. said that the cession of the District of Columbia made it incompatible with the successful operations of the Federal Government, and the just protection of the rights, of the life, liberty, and property, of its citizens, that the States of Maryland and Virginia should retain the legislative jurisdiction over the ceded territory; hence it was committed to the legislative care of Congress. But it never entered into the heads of those who ceded, nor of those who accepted the cession, that the people of the ceded territory, by the cession, lost the protection of life, liberty, and property, guaranteed to the people of the several States, and which they enjoyed prior to the cession; and that each was to be subject to the uncertainty which would necessarily arise out of the conflicting religious and political notions and discordant interests of the people of this extended empire. On the contrary, all supposed, and none can doubt, that they were left by the cession in the same state of security which they enjoyed previous to the cession, and that they had exchanged simply the legislative jurisdiction of Virginia and Maryland for that of Congress. He said that the article of the constitution giving to Congress "exclusive legislative jurisdiction" was adopted before the cession was made, and hence could have had no particular reference to the condition of the District afterwards ceded; and could not, therefore, abridge any of the domestic rights of the people of the District, as they existed at the time of the cession. But the cession having been accepted with the guarantee of the right of property to the people of the District, contained in the constitution and acts of concession, these guarantees afford ample protection, and are restrictions upon the jurisdiction of Congress as the local Legislature of the District. Mr. G. said that the people of Massachusetts had no more connexion or concern with the domestic rights of the people of the District than they had with those of the people of Virginia or Maryland, and that any attempt at interference with them was as impertinent and obtrusive as interference would be with those of Virginia and Maryland, or any other independent State. Mr. G. said he contended that the people of the District, in relation to their domestic rights, occupied the position of a State, and were entitled to have their rights respected as such, and protected from interference from other States as such.

Mr. G. said, having thus examined the principle growing out of what has been termed the constitutional right of petition, the extent of the obligation of Congress to receive, and established, as he thought, beyond reasonable doubt, that Congress was not bound to receive petitions from people who did not seek the redress of some public or private grievance affecting themselves, he would very briefly canvass the claim of the petition now under consideration to that character. He said he would emphatically ask, what was the grievance affecting the petitioners, for which they sought redress, and in aid of which they so clamorously invoked the sacred right of petition and the spirit of liberty? Why, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) the grievance is, that the people of this District, some hundred miles removed from the petitioners, hold slaves, (a property guaranteed by the constitution,) and they modestly ask that the people of the District may be deprived of their property without their consent. Surely, (said Mr. G.,) this is no grievance, either public or private, to the petitioners. But what is the grievance complained of in the petition, and for which a remedy is sought? It is, sir, that the existence of slavery is incompatible with the religious notions of the petitioners, and they simply ask (a very small matter, certainly) that the Congress of the United States should forcibly wrest from a portion of the people their property, for the very important object of gratifying the religious scruples of those very devoutly religious people. Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) this is as bold and daring an attempt as was ever made among a free people, to compel, by force of law, one set of people to conform their practices and their consciences to the religious notions of another set; and this, sir, is the whole grievance. Sir, once commence this work, and by then you have legislated conformably to the peculiar notions of all our religious sects; there will be little of liberty left to the people. You will have established a complete clerical despotism. Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) the very clause of the constitution quoted by the honorable member from Massachusetts contains this valuable provision: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." If this provision (said Mr. G.,) is of any value at all, it secures to every man the right of maintaining his own religious opinions, and conforming his practices to them. I emphatically ask every member here, ay, every American freeman, if Congress should carry out the prayer of these petitioners, whether, in practice, it is not directly at war with the right of religious freedom guaranteed by the constitution as above quoted? Some men think, and pious men, too, that slavery is not incompatible with the strictest notions of religion. I then ask (said Mr. G.,) if they are to be forced by law to surrender their own opinions, and be compelled to conform to those of the petitioners? I answer, no. You cannot so far violate the principles of the constitution securing religious freedom. Mr. G. said no man or body of men had the right, nor should they force him to take their peculiar notions of religion. He was responsible to none but his Creator for his religious opinions or moral practices. The Creator himself had given a guide by which all were to be directed; it was a wise and unerring guide. But he disclaimed, for himself and his constituents, the right of bigoted and despotic teachers of religion to gull down their throats their notions of religion or any thing else. They are as frail and as fallible as himself, and he did not choose to be compelled to follow their guidance when he deemed them in error.

Mr. G. said it was unreasonable to act upon such petitions as this, because the petitioners were not affected with the evils or reproaches of slavery. They lived under laws and institutions in which it was not tolerated. Hence they have no practical grievance to redress. I protest, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) that the people of this District, who complain of no grievance, who have none to redress, should be violently deprived of their rights, to satisfy the religious scruples of their kind friends, these petitioners.

Mr. G. said that, having said thus much upon the constitutional right of petition, and the grievance sought to be redressed in the petition now under consideration, he would say a few words as to an exception of the general obligation of Congress to receive and consider petitions, if in every other respect unexceptionable. Mr. G. said this was an exception due to the body itself; he alluded to the right of this body to require that every petition presented to it should be couched in decent and respectful language. This (said Mr. G.,) is an acknowledged right, and it would be a useless consumption of time to detain the House with any arguments as to its necessity and propriety. Mr. G. asked if the petition now under consideration was couched in such decent and respectful language as to address itself to the favorable consideration of the House? Sir, (said Mr. G.,) in this, as in most of the petitions which have been presented, the people of the South are characterized as pirates, man-stealers, merchants in human flesh, and gross violators of the laws of God and man. Mr. G. said that the honorable gentleman who had just taken his seat, and who professed to be opposed to the abolitionists, (no doubt sincerely,) but who had made a most excellent abolition speech, complained of the terms of opprobrium which had been used in this debate towards the northern people, insomuch that he acknowledged his zeal against abolitionism much abated. Mr. G. said he asked that gentleman how it was that he could feel so sensibly the epithets employed against the abolitionists, and not feel the severe reflections upon the whole southern people contained in these petitions? Sir, (said Mr. G.,) are these terms of reproach, such as piracy, man-stealing, &c., so mild, and so gentle, as to be totally innocent, totally inoffensive? Surely the gentleman cannot so think.

Mr. G. said that the institution of slavery existed at the time of the formation of the constitution. The free States, so called, entered into the constitutional compact with the full knowledge of this state of things, and solemnly engaged not to interfere with it. The South has faithfully and devotedly performed its constitutional obligations for upwards of fifty years. The southern representation have the same claim to protection from insult and reproach, when they come here to legislate, as the northern representation. Is it to be patiently borne, then, Mr. Speaker, that the representation of the South are to sit here, day after day, and hear themselves and their constituents reproached as pirates? No, sir; it is more than southern feeling and southern blood can bear. It cannot, it will not, be submitted to. It had been said (said Mr. G.,) by an honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] that it was almost impossible to speak of the subject of slavery without using terms which may be deemed insulting and reproachful. Then, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) why speak of it here at all? It is no reason why the South should submit to insult, because gentlemen say they cannot present the subject to the consideration of Congress without using terms of an insulting character. Sir, these petitioners have no right to interfere, nor has Congress the right to interfere, with this subject; and these petitioners have only to abstain from an unwarrantable interference with the rights of others, to avoid insulting and reproaching the whole southern people. Mr. G. said he could readily perceive why gentlemen did not feel the force of these terms of reproach applied to the South, and appreciate their insulting character. It was because they themselves were not the subjects of these epithets. They were not addressed to them, and their resentment was not, therefore, excited. But (said Mr. G.) he was well satisfied that if any portion of the southern people were to present petitions designating the whole people of the North as Tories, or applying to them some other harsh and libellous epithet, the northern members would readily feel the insult, and refuse to receive such petitions. The terms of reproach employed in these petitions were no less insulting, and deserved at the hands of the South the utmost indignation.

H. OF R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[JAN. 25, 1856.]

But (said Mr. G.) he was much astonished to hear from two gentlemen of such intelligence as the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Messrs. ADAMS and CUSHING,] any argument drawn in favor of the reception of this and other like petitions, because they prayed for the abolition not only of slavery, but of the slave trade, as they are pleased to call it, in the District of Columbia. Upon what principle it is (said Mr. G.) that the African slave trade can be assimilated to individual sales and purchases of slaves in the same State where slavery exists, he said he was utterly at a loss to conceive. Surely the gentlemen were too learned not to know that the right to hold a slave as property involved necessarily the right to alien. It was a necessary and inseparable consequence.

Mr. G. said the sales called the slave trade by these holy petitioners were oftener the result of necessity than of choice. They were sometimes made to satisfy debts, sometimes to divide dead men's estates, sometimes from one cause and sometimes another; in no case, however, changing the condition of the slave, except so far as in the character of their masters; and if sometimes mother and children are separated, it is only that which frequently happens with the master and his family. Every day events are transpiring and scenes taking place which are deeply afflicting to our feelings, but they are the results of human frailty and human imperfection, and cannot be avoided.

Mr. G. said another strong, and, to his mind, conclusive argument, that the mere fact of presenting a petition did not impose the obligation of receiving it, was the very propounding of the question, "Shall the petition be received?" It implies in itself the power not to receive; and the reason of the rule seems clearly to be that the power not to receive had reference as well to the subject-matter of the petition as to the language in which it is couched. But it is asked, how is the House to get in possession of the subject-matter of a petition, unless it be received and read? Mr. G. said the answer to this inquiry was quite easy. By a rule of the House, every member who presents a petition is required briefly to state the subject-matter of it. In this way the House becomes possessed of its object, and may, upon ample information, determine upon the question of reception. If the petition asks Congress to do what it is palpably forbidden by the constitution to do, is there any reason why it should be received? Certainly none.

Mr. G. said that the precedent relied upon by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] of the reception and rejection of the petition of the Society of Friends in 1791, did not apply. Mr. G. said that the material object of that petition was the regulation and ultimate abolition of the African slave trade. This was a subject, in part at least, which belonged to the constitutional authority of Congress. The right to regulate the African slave trade was, in effect, the right to regulate commerce, which properly belonged to the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. Hence the propriety of the reception of that memorial, although it was subsequently and properly rejected. But that case does not apply to this petition. This petition asks Congress to do what it has no power to do.

Mr. G. said he begged the indulgence of the House for a few moments, while he briefly recurred to the question of the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He said there was only one article of the constitution upon the subject, and that is as follows:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States," &c.

It will be perceived (said Mr. G.) that this clause is a part of the original draught of the constitution, and that it was adopted before the cession of the District of Columbia, but expressly in anticipation of such an event. Of course, as I before remarked, this constitutional provision could not have been intended to apply to the question of slavery, or to grant any power over it, for it was not certainly known that the anticipated cession would be made by Virginia and Maryland, or any other slaveholding State. Nor could this clause secure the cession from such restrictions as the State or States might think proper to impose for the protection, in relation to their persons or property, of the citizens inhabiting the territory which should be ceded. By the constitution (said Mr. G.) all power over slavery is taken from the Federal Government, and they cannot abolish it without an express delegation of power to do so. That has not been given, even as regards the District of Columbia.

But (said Mr. G.) it has been contended, and with much plausibility too, that the article of the constitution conferring on Congress the power of "exclusive legislation" embraces this subject, because, by conferring exclusive legislation, gentlemen contend that unlimited and unrestricted legislation was meant.

Mr. G. denied the legitimacy of this conclusion entirely. He said the article itself contemplated a cession from a State or States, and the word "exclusive," here used, meant the power of legislation, exclusive of the legislative power of the State or States making the cession, or of any other State. Exclusive jurisdiction (said Mr. G.) simply means a jurisdiction exclusive of every other jurisdiction; that it shall not be concurrent with any other jurisdiction. But the article in question was never intended to convey the idea of an unrestricted and unlimited power of legislation. This view, Mr. G. said, he regarded as conclusive, independent of the restrictive clauses of the cession acts of Maryland and Virginia. The power, then, of Congress over this subject having been, without exception, restricted as to the whole subject of slavery, the people of the District of Columbia are as clearly within the reason of the restriction as they are entitled to its benefit in common with all the people of the slaveholding States. Mr. G. said, take from the people of the District the protection of the constitutions and laws of the States which ceded it, take from them the restrictions imposed by the constitution of the United States on federal legislation, and you at once determine that the Government of the District is an absolute despotism. The people have no representation, and will have no security against tyranny and oppression, save in the discretion of Congress-- a state of things opposed to the genius of our institutions, and an inequality which ought not to be tolerated.

If, then, (said Mr. G.,) this power cannot be derived from the constitution, is it derivable from the cession acts of Virginia and Maryland? Certainly not in terms. Nor could he perceive a single word or sentence in those acts from which such a power is fairly inferrible; on the contrary, the acts are restrictive, and the circumstances in which Virginia and Maryland were placed, being large slaveholding States, conclusively prove that they did not intend, by these acts, to confer this power; they could not have so much disregarded their own security as to have done so. From whence, then, is this power to be derived? Nowhere, sir; nowhere. But this is not all. These cessions were made by the ordinary Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, and they could not grant any further powers over the people of the District than they possessed themselves; they could not disfranchise this portion of their citizens, and transfer them, bound hand and foot with unmitigated chains of despotism, to any Power whatever. It will be admitted that they could not. I then ask, had the ordinary Legislature of Virginia, which made this cession, the power to abolish slavery in Virginia? I say no, it had not. It may be asked, where is the restriction? I answer, in the bill of rights of the people of Virginia, which restricts and controls the powers of the Legislature, and in her constitution.

Can it be for a moment seriously contended (said Mr. G.) that though the Government of Virginia cannot take from its citizens any portion of their property, except for public use, and not then without adequate compensation, yet they have the right to confiscate or abolish property? The idea, to me, (said Mr. G.,) is preposterous. Slaves were held as property in Virginia when the bill of rights and the constitution were both adopted, and were the subjects, in part, to which the protective principles of these instruments had reference. But now (said Mr. G.) it is gravely contended that, instead of protection and security to property, these instruments admit the unqualified power of its destruction. This, sir, cannot be so; it is too absurd for serious refutation. I do not deny (said Mr. G.) that the people, by a primary act of sovereignty, may confer on their ordinary Legislature the power of abolishing slavery in the State; I only deny that the Legislature is now clothed with that power. With these remarks, referring to what I said on a former occasion, and to the able and unanswerable arguments of one of the Senators of my State in the other House, I forbear any further remark upon this branch of the subject.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (said Mr. G.) has intimated—not intimated, sir, but directly declared—that he and these petitioners will regard the refusal of this House to receive this petition, and others of like character, as a violation of their rights, and destructive of their liberties—as anti-republican. Sir, (said Mr. G.,) if the rights and liberties of the people of Massachusetts depend upon their right to have petitions received and considered by this House, officiously seeking to subvert the rights and liberties of the South, by destroying their property, and exciting, by their incendiary petitions, southern slaves to insurrection and rebellion, then, indeed, sir, ought their liberties to be endangered. The liberty of violent interference with the rights of others, secured by the constitution and laws, if they be so, ought not only to be abridged, but entirely eradicated, as dangerous in the extreme. But, sir, the gentleman must excuse us when we refuse to recognise in them a right which is actually subversive (not in theory, but in practice) of our own liberties, destructive of our property and our lives.

Mr. G. said he would ask, however, what liberty has been invaded, what right of these petitioners has been violated? The right of petition? They have assembled and petitioned without interruption. The freedom of the press? They have presses in full operation. The freedom of debate? God knows they have debated here and elsewhere with perfect freedom. The next thing will be, we must abolish slavery, or the liberties of the northern people will be endangered. Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. G.,) I indulge the hope that the gentleman himself, and his constituents, will think better upon this subject, and come to more rational conclusions about liberty.

It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing,] said Mr. G., that the refusal of this House to receive these petitions would give force and efficiency to the efforts of the abolitionists, and greatly increase their strength. I hope not, (said Mr. G.) But if it were so, he had only one thing to say, and that was, that he who for such insufficient cause would become an abolitionist, is an abolitionist already at heart, and only waits a plausible pretext to throw off his guise and enter upon his work.

Mr. G. said that there were many remarks of the gentleman which he forbore to reply to, although susceptible of a very ready answer, but would bring his remarks to a close. He said that he himself had been the object of some peculiar attentions from some of this gentle and benevolent tribe of abolitionists. They had transmitted to him many papers, pamphlets, and a little poetry, no doubt with a view to insult him; but he said he regarded them, or whatever they might say or do, with as little concern as he did the dust under his feet.

Mr. G. said that the gentleman from Massachusetts had truly said that the agitation of this subject had created a degree of excitement which endangered the Union itself. Why, then, do gentlemen, holding this opinion, if they value the Union as they ought to do, and would cherish free institutions, agitate this subject? Why do they not throw themselves into the breach, and save this holy ark—this ark of safety and of freedom, this last hope of liberty in the world—from the destroyer's hand? I leave them to make the answer to their consciences and their country. One thing I will say—not to the northern people, (for in them I have an abiding confidence—I yet believe that, by legal means, and the force of public opinion, they will frown these disturbers of our peace into the insignificance and contempt which they merit,) but to the abolitionists. I do not believe their leaders have any concern about emancipation, but that their main object is to get up and keep up this excitement, for selfish purposes. Many of them are clergymen, and want agencies and missions, at forty or fifty dollars a month; some are editors, and wish to secure profitable patronage for magazines, newspapers, and pamphlets. The others are the deluded victims of the treachery of these leaders. But they may rest assured that, without force, they can never effect their object. Whenever they shall resort to force, they may be assured that every field over which they march will bleach with their bones, and every rivulet be crimsoned with their blood.

Mr. GARLAND then moved to lay the preliminary motion of reception on the table.

Before the question was taken, at the request of Mr. HAMMOND, who expressed a wish to address the House on the subject, Mr. G. withdrew it; and, on motion of Mr. HAMMOND,

The House, at half past 4, P. M., adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution:

H. of R.]

Appropriation Bills.

[JAN. 26, 1836.]

Resolved, That from and after Tuesday, the 2d day of February, the several bills making appropriations for the support of Government, the naval and military service, fortifications, and the Indian department, at the hour of one o'clock each day, except on Fridays and Saturdays, shall take precedence in the order of business, and shall be considered until the same shall have passed the House.

Mr. HARDIN rose to a point of order. He said it had been the habit of standing committees to report resolutions in violation of what he conceived to be the spirit and intention of the rules. The present proposition could with as much propriety have been submitted by the Committee on Claims, over which his honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESSEY,] presided with so much ability and renown; and with equal propriety could the Committee on the District of Columbia report a bill settling the boundary between Ohio and Michigan. The Committee on Foreign Affairs had undertaken to regulate the business of the House, and he hoped the question would be decided, whether this innovation upon the rules and usages of the body was to be tolerated. He had been looking for such a resolution for a week past, and he was not surprised when it was presented.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs did propose to change, in some respects, the order of business in the House. He should have preferred that it should be decided without debate. It was an important proposition, and its purpose and object was to put it in the power of the House to act promptly upon the bills providing supplies for the support of Government, and for the military and naval service. While he did not desire to avoid debate, it must be obvious that, on this proposition, beneficial discussion could hardly be anticipated.

He did not understand the precise form of objection which the gentleman from Kentucky made to the resolution. Does he intend to dispute the authority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report such a proposition? Mr. M. would remind the House that the President of the United States, in his message of the 18th of January, had used the following language:

"The return of our chargé d'affaires is attended with public notices of naval preparations, on the part of France, destined for our sea. Of the cause and intent of these armaments I have no authentic information, nor any other means of judging except such as are common to yourselves and to the public; but, whatever may be their object, we are not at liberty to regard them as unconnected with the measures which hostile movements on the part of France may compel us to pursue. They at least deserve to be met by adequate preparation on our part; I therefore strongly urge large and speedy appropriations for the increase of our navy and completion of our coast defences."

This message was referred by the House to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Its recommendations, thus referred for examination, rendered it the imperative duty of the committee to report the resolution that the House should day after day consider the bills of appropriation, ordinary and extraordinary, and make the provision for public defence called for by the exigencies of the country. The committee, acting under the most solemn sanction, had executed the instructions of the House, and he could not believe that the objection taken would be sustained. The usage of the House justified the resolution; and, if ever there was a time when such a standing order was required by the public interests, Mr. M. thought all would agree that it was called for now.

Mr. HARDIN reduced his point of order to writing; which was, in substance, that the resolution was not within the line of duty or jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but belonged to the select committee on the rules.

The CHAIR decided the resolution to be in order; but that it must receive the vote of two thirds to pass it, inasmuch as it proposed to give precedence to certain business.

Mr. BELL said that the Chair having decided that it was for the House to determine whether the resolution was in order or not, he supposed no member would appeal from the decision, and he would therefore proceed to discuss the expediency of adopting it. As to the question of order, (said Mr. B.,) it is clear that the Committee on Foreign Relations has no more right to report or offer such a resolution at this time than any individual member of the House, or any other standing or any select committee of the House. If any committee had such a right under the rules and practice of the House, it would be the Committee of Ways and Means. Such an order as that embraced in the present resolution had been resorted to heretofore, in relation to particular and separate bills, on subjects before the House, but it had always, so far as his knowledge extended, been done under such circumstances as to command the general assent of the House, and then it might be more properly said to be conceded from courtesy, and a general sense of the propriety of such a course, than from any idea of authority or power in the committee. The deposite question had been given precedence in this manner over all other business. But the proposition before the House is not only to set apart the whole time of that House to the consideration of a particular bill or measure, nor to bills of the same nature in all respects, but to all the appropriation bills, including the bill for the support of the Indian department. That is a bill which the Committee on Indian Affairs may and will claim the right of examining before it shall pass this House, at least so much of it as shall propose the appropriation of money not specifically authorized by existing laws. As to the army and navy bills, there may be some semblance of right in the Committee on Foreign Affairs to urge their consideration, since that committee may be presumed to have some more knowledge of the state of our foreign relations than the other committees of the House; and may thus see more clearly than others the propriety of proceeding without delay to their consideration. But why include all the appropriation bills? Why ask the House to come to a determination to take up, not the army, not the navy bill, nor both together, but all? What must be the consequence of this course of proceeding, if it shall be adopted by the House? It proposes the exclusive attention of the House to dry and not very interesting detail—to figures and calculations—for months and months together. No measure of a local or other nature, however interesting to large sections of the Union it may be, will be suffered to be taken up. It is known that there are many measures of this nature before the House, and that a large proportion of the members feel a deep interest in taking them up; but it will not be in their power to do so, until all the appropriation bills are voted. The consequence will be, to create a feeling of restlessness in the House, to wear out its patience, to cut off and suppress discussion and investigation into the various items in the appropriation bills, and finally to force them down, without a proper examination into their correctness. The previous question will be the instrument by which those bills are to be forced through en masse. It is an unusual and unparliamentary mode of proceeding. The substance of the proposition is to take up all the appropriation bills on Tuesday next, and to admit no other business to interfere until we agree to all of them. This is what is asked.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Mason] has read, rather artfully, though, doubtless, without intending any artifice, a passage from the late special message of the President, in which large and immediate appropriations are recommended, in order to show this House, not what the President requires it to do—oh, no—but what the country expects from it. We all know, and feel, that the recommendation of the President is a powerful argument in this House at this time; but, sir, is it fair to be always holding up such argument to influence the action of this House? I will not say that it is unfair; but why have we such things eternally pressed upon us? If there is a real necessity for immediate action upon those bills, from what cause has proceeded the delays which have already taken place? Why bring forward this measure to-day? Where has slept the recommendation of the special message until now? What has called the attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations to this subject particularly at this time? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had got it into his head, some two weeks ago, that it was important to take up the appropriation bills. He was at that time so anxious and impatient to get at them that he could not spare a few hours or a day for the discussion and amendment of the rules of the House; though, for want of such amendment, we have already lost a full month of the time of this House during the present session; but before we had prepared the rules and orders of our proceedings—before we had got ready the machinery, the tools, by which we were to work—he called upon the House to proceed to the appropriation bills. Well, sir, what happened then? Some discussion arising upon the first bill which was taken up, it was laid aside, and the navy bill was brought up for consideration. That was considered one day, and the next it was slipped away from us—no, sir, I will not say slipped away, for I mean nothing disrespectful—but, sir, the navy bill was in turn laid down unfinished; and, on the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the bill for the relief of the New York sufferers by fire was taken up, and after speaking some days upon this bill, it was laid aside, according to the practice of the House; for this, sir, is now our practice. There is no remedy under the present rules and order of our proceedings. Every one must see and feel that every decision that is made by the Chair, or by the House, upon the rules, only makes “confusion worse confounded.” I know, sir, the embarrassment produced by this state of things. I know, sir, that an honest man in that Chair must feel greatly embarrassed by the present state of the rules of the House. If he is partial, or prejudiced, or desires to favor one side or the other in the House, he has it completely in his power to do so; he has the command of the business of this House. Sir, I do not doubt that you feel this embarrassment.

But to return to the subject. After the New York relief bill had taken its turn, and been discussed a day or two, what did we next see in this House? What did we see on Friday morning last? Why, sir, on that morning, without waiting to receive reports from the standing committees of the House—a most necessary course of proceeding—the House, by an overwhelming vote, set aside all the rules of the House, put aside not only the private bills for that day and the next, but for each succeeding day, and all this for the purpose of taking up for consideration and discussion the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] the strongest party movement I have ever seen in the course of eight years, during which I have had the honor of a seat in this House, made by any member of the House. Where, then, sir, was the special message, and the recommendation of immediate and large appropriations by the President? This resolution, from its nature and necessary connexions, must call for the discussion of every party question or topic which agitated the country during the last summer and fall. Every gentleman who voted to consider that resolution must have seen that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would not be allowed to make a speech upon the subject of it without a reply. We all know that great political consequences are expected to grow out of the subject of this resolution, by those who manage the interests of party out of this House. We know what use has already been made of this question in the country and before the people. We know where and upon whom it has been attempted to fix responsibility for the failure of the three million appropriation, for political effect. Sir, could less than a month's discussion be expected to arise upon this resolution? Now that the subject is up, and has been partially discussed, can gentlemen mean by this movement to suppress further discussion? Would such a design be consistent with a reasonable liberty of speech in this House? Well, sir, who are they who have brought this measure into the House? It required a vote of two thirds of the House to get the subject before it, and that vote was given. Look at the yeas and nays, and you will discover who are responsible for this movement. Sir, the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts is now the business properly in order. It was also the business in order on Monday. Even petitions could not be regularly admitted until this resolution was disposed of. Sir, under such circumstances, the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and his movement in favor of immediate and large appropriations, strike me with some surprise. If there is nothing new, if there is no very recent news from abroad, how is it this proposition is made now and urged upon the House? It will soon be three years since the French Chamber of Deputies rejected the treaty, or refused to make the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect. It is said that the country is in a defenceless condition now; so it has been for the last three years, and no steps have been taken to put it into better condition. No steps were taken or recommended at the commencement of the session. The navy bill, when once taken up, was laid aside. How happens it that there is so great an alarm just at this moment? Has a war panic come upon us so suddenly? Must we vote all the appropriation bills without further delay? Are gentlemen afraid that, if these bills are suspended until the 15th of February, some other information may be received from the other side of the Atlantic, which may satisfy us that extensive preparations for war are not necessary? Do gentlemen mean to get up all the appropriations, and force them through this House, under a war panic, and to throw them before the Senate, that that body may, in turn, be forced to vote every dollar in the Treasury before it is certainly known that any extraordinary preparations for defence will be necessary, or to incur odium with the country of rejecting necessary appropriations? Is the Treasury to be depleted at all events, war or no war? Must the whole revenue be expended? Is there a plan to distribute the surplus revenue, under the pretext of preparation for war, without waiting to know that the special message, if not the first message of the President, may not produce a more conciliatory feeling on the part of France? I do not charge the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] or the Committee on Foreign Relations, with any of these designs. I have no right to do so; but, sir, will the gentleman explain why it is that he proposes that all the appropriation bills shall pass immediately. I must confess, sir, that, under the circumstances, although I do not charge such purposes as I have alluded to as the motive which has influenced the committee, yet, sir, unless such designs are at the bottom of the movement, it is to me wholly inexplicable.

I have said that it appeared extraordinary that the Committee on Foreign Relations should report such a resolution. It is entirely contrary to all the rules and order of proceeding heretofore known in the practice of this House. But as I find myself again upon the subject of the rules of the House, I will venture to allude to another abuse which exists in the practice of the House. I am aware, sir, to what misconstruction every thing I say upon the subject of the rules and order of proceeding in the House is liable. I know that I am represented by some to be actuated by very improper feeling, but this shall not restrain me from speaking whenever I think the public interest requires that some one should speak. The abuse to which I allude, and which has obtained to some extent, during the present session, is this: honorable chairmen of committees often submit a resolution or other proposition to the members of the committee separately in this House, sometimes in these chambers, and get their consent to report it to this House. This is unparliamentary, and a great abuse; it prevents all investigation and consultation in committee, and leads to great inconvenience and error in the action of the House itself. Reports so made are not the reports of a committee, and ought not to be received by the House.

H. OF R.]

Appropriation Bills.

[JAN. 26, 1836.]

That I may not be misunderstood in the remarks I have made, before I sit down I wish to state that I stand here ready to vote all necessary supplies for putting the defences of the country upon a proper footing, whenever the appropriation bills shall be brought forward and moved in this House according to the regular ordinary forms of proceeding. I will vote, sir, all the money in the Treasury, if it be necessary, to prepare for war, and to resist the attacks not only of France, but of all Europe. But I wish to see upon what grounds extraordinary appropriations are required. Sir, so far as appropriations are necessary for the immediate service of the navy or the army, so far as the finishing and repairing of our vessels of war, and for our fortifications already in a course of construction, I will vote them even without estimates, and upon my own judgment, if gentlemen upon any punctilio, are averse to furnishing estimates for those objects. And in a question of this kind I am not disposed to weigh the money I would appropriate, in golden scales, as a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] insinuated, in reply to my remarks upon the navy bill the other day. Nor, sir, would I be anxious to bring down the sums total to the accurate limit of a few dollars or a few cents. I would take care that the amount should be liberal, and over the mark, rather than under it. Whenever it becomes necessary to pass any particular bill for this purpose, I undertake to say that there will be found patriotism enough in this House—in all parts—in every party in this House, to take it up and vote it through. Sir, there will always be found patriotism enough in the House to do this, without the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON.] I stand pledged to do it, whenever gentlemen shall call upon us to act in the usual mode of making or voting appropriations. But when I am asked to vote all the appropriation bills en masse—when I shall be called upon to make an appropriation for new forts, which cannot possibly be made effective in defending the country in any war in which we can be soon engaged, as is proposed; when we are called upon to lay the foundation for the expenditure of at least fifty millions in the commencement of new fortifications and an increased military peace establishment, the necessary consequence of these new works, then I shall meet gentlemen, panic or no panic, war or no war. I will contest every inch of ground with them upon these questions. But why have not gentlemen pressed these bills sooner? Why did they not finish those bills which they had once before the House? And when they were laid aside at one time, why did they not move to take them up again, upon the first opportunity which presented itself? The course taken by gentlemen certainly requires an explanation. A satisfactory explanation is due to this House and to the country upon this point.

As to the war, if we have one, I shall be ready to support it. I shall not stop to inquire into the causes which may have produced it, if it be necessary to the honor and dignity of the country that we should wage it. I can readily imagine that nations, as well as individuals, may, by their own blunders and follies, and for want of diplomatic skill or proper forbearance, find themselves engaged in a quarrel, no matter how frivolous the cause or ground of it, and become so far committed that they cannot apologize, but must fight, no matter at what hazard. Sir, in such a case, I will not shrink from the support of a war. I will remember that it is our country that is concerned; but at the same time I will continue to hold the political agents who may have brought on the war responsible to the country. They shall not escape their due responsibility.

Mr. BELL concluded by expressing the hope that the resolution would not be agreed to by the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said, if we did not fall in with the suggestion of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it would be uncertain when we would be able to get through the appropriation bills.

The abolition question was outstanding, and would elicit a very warm discussion. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts was also in a suspended state, and how were we to progress in the business before us, unless something of this kind should be adopted?

We must rid the House of the many pending propositions before it. Pass the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and we cut the Gordian knot at once. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had said that the present condition of the business of the House was very onerous to the Speaker. It must be so. Next week we will commence with petitions, on Monday and Tuesday the abolition resolution of the gentleman from Maine will be up, and that abolishes every thing like business for the day. On Wednesday, the greater part will be devoted to the committees making reports. Thursday will go for public business, and Friday and Saturday for private. We must there take a stand for the appropriation bills, if we seriously intend passing them. The proposition before the House merely requires that the appropriation bills may have precedence of other business. Some gentlemen say that we must not pass the appropriation bills until we hear from France. We have heard enough from France already. Those gentlemen think it wrong to agree to the bills now, because we might pass them with too lavish a hand. Mr. S. said we ought to wait no longer. Congress had already tarried long enough. We should put our forts in order, to meet any emergency that might occur.

A charge has been made from another quarter, that we were the cause of the loss of the fortification bill of last year. He considered it an absurd question, to be inquiring where the bill was lost, and yet refuse permission to take up the fortification bill now before us. He cared nothing for the dead bills. He was for providing for the living ones, and then, at our leisure, if it was deemed expedient, the House might search after the miscarried bills of last year.

What was asked by the Committee on Foreign Relations? Merely to have those bills taken up by the House; and if gentlemen think the appropriations too large, meet them and vote them down; but do not stop them from being taken up. It was the height of folly to be disputing and quibbling about technicalities, instead of going to the great question of appropriation. Local matters should give way to national ones; and we should come to the determination to carry the appropriations which would put the country in a proper state of defence. Gentlemen had complained that the House had before it a political question, which was discussed to the exclusion of other business, and might be closed by the previous question. Now, he must say, so far as related to the number of speeches made on that topic, that both parties had an equal chance. The debate had been opened by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] and had been replied to by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise.] Another complaint urged is, that the previous question is sometimes resorted to to stop debate. That is, however, unavoidable. It must be apparent, that since the increase of members in the House, and so many voices were to be heard, there was no other means of getting many of the measures through the House, than by administering the previous question. All parties occasionally vote for it. He trusted that the resolution might pass to take effect on Tuesday next; and, before it went into operation, we might dispose of what small matters we had on hand. We must take up the appropriation bills for the purpose of sustaining the country; and particularly such bills as will put the country in a position to maintain its honor and dignity against any and every nation that might assail them.

Appropriation Bills.

Mr. PATTON said he did not intend to occupy any time in considering whether there was any irregularity in such a proposition being made from the Committee on Foreign Relations—whether it was apposite to their functions, and embraced by the reference made to them of the President's special message. He would, however, as that objection was urged as a reason against adopting the resolution, remark that no practical evil can result from this irregularity, supposing it to be one; no such indirect violation or evasion of the rules of the House as seems to be apprehended from it. It was certainly competent for any individual member to have offered precisely the same resolution as the one presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations. If objected to, he could move a suspension of the rules to offer and take it up, and a vote of two thirds would remove all difficulty. Now, the Chair has decided (and no doubt correctly) that it requires a vote of two thirds to adopt the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If there be a majority in favor of adopting that resolution, of two thirds, doubtless the same majority would vote in favor of suspending the rules, if such a vote were requisite to accomplish the object.

No matter how the question is presented, then, we may consider its merits without any embarrassment from the source from which it comes.

Mr. Speaker, we have now been in session some seven or eight weeks, and we have passed none of the appropriation bills.

It is unnecessary, it would be, perhaps, out of order, and certainly premature, to enter into minute details of the circumstances in which we are placed in regard to our relations with another country, showing the propriety and necessity of our proceeding promptly to provide the means of placing the country in a state of preparation to meet all contingencies which might arise. Let us take up, with all convenient speed, and consider with all due deliberation, the various propositions for ordinary and extraordinary appropriations. After so large a period of the session had passed, and especially when, to say the least, our relations with France are not in the most satisfactory state; when it is known that, in the opinion of many, and in the apprehensions of all, a war is impending with a foreign country, it is not time that we should act on the subject in that way which, while it can give no new cause of aggravating the irritation, and increasing the difficulties, will yet place us in a condition to maintain the rights of our citizens and the interest and honor of the country, if, unfortunately, these difficulties should be inflamed into armed collision, and prepare us to maintain the conflict, whether in defence or assault, creditably and successfully? It is hardly possible that any man can doubt that it is peculiarly important that our appropriations, either ordinary or extraordinary, ought to be speedily made; and is there any sufficient objection made to proceeding to do so at the period proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations? Shall we refuse to do this for the purpose of continuing and indulging, ad libitum, what the gentleman from Tennessee calls a mere partisan debate; and for the continuance of which he seems anxious, for the purpose of enabling those who take interest in this party contest, to defend or attack? I agree with him that it is a mere partisan discussion, the introduction of which I most deeply regret. Now, when a foreign country, between whom and our own angry controversies are depending, when she has refused to do that which this House unanimously declared ought to be insisted on, except upon terms which will certainly never be granted—when we have information that this foreign country is increasing her armaments, fitting out a fleet, and sending it on our coast—under such circumstances, I appeal to the patriotism of the House to say whether we ought to postpone acting on the appropriations until this contest between the two Houses about the fortification and three million bill shall be fought out? Instead of proceeding at once to consider the possibility of averting so deplorable a calamity as war, or, if not to be averted, the means of conducting it with honor and credit, a subject requiring harmony, good feeling, and united patriotism, instead of this, we are to employ ourselves in an angry, irritating, party debate, about whether something was not done last session which ought to have been done; and who is or who is not to be blamed for the loss of the three million appropriation and the fortification bill—a discussion calculated to lead, which had already occasioned personal reflections, to exasperate the party passions and inflame the party prejudices of Congress and of the country; to occasion crimination and recrimination between the two Houses of Congress, destructive of harmonious action and respectful feeling.

Let me not be supposed to deprecate the thrusting forward this debate, and the continuance of it, from any indisposition to meet and to bear my full share of the responsibility of voting against that three million appropriation. I gave that vote at the time with some doubt and hesitation. The circumstances under which it was presented precluded all deliberation, gave no time for reflection, and might well excuse any person from very strict accountability, and especially from any harsh imputation of bad motive, for voting either one way or the other. I do not believe that there was one single member of either House of the last Congress, nor one in this House or in the Senate of the present Congress, who would hesitate to empty the Treasury and exhaust the resources of the nation, in defence of the country and in maintaining its rights, whenever they see that it is to be assailed, or that it is necessary to adopt such means for such purpose. We may differ about the best mode of attaining these objects; we may conscientiously differ as to the expediency, constitutionality, and necessity of it; party feelings and party prejudices may warp our opinions and bias our decisions upon the subjects we are called on to act about; but, at heart, I believe no party is entitled to claim for itself the merit of exclusive patriotism.

As to the loss of the fortification bill, it is much to be regretted, and such is the universal sentiment. Who is to blame for this miscarriage, I know not. Whether the Senate or the House, or some member of this or the other House, is to be censured, I know not. I shall engage in no discussion about it. But as to this three million appropriation, which has been so strangely disturbed in the grave to which it was consigned last session, and whose ghost is made to walk amongst us now, I beg leave to say the phantom "frights not me." I am ready at all times, and in all places, without fear or apprehension, and without any "compunctious visitings of conscience," to vindicate myself for contributing to its success. I am better satisfied now, after full opportunity of deliberation and reflection upon this extraordinary, and, I believe, unprecedented appropriation, of the propriety of the vote I gave on that occasion; and while I wish to cast reproach upon nobody else, I will maintain and defend that vote whenever I may be arraigned, at any proper time and before any competent tribunal. I shall make no apology, offer no excuse. I stand upon my justification before my constituents and the country. But I will not be provoked now to encourage and keep up this untimely and misplaced debate here, about what was not done, or ought to have been done, or not done, by the last Congress, to the delay, and probably almost indefinite postponement, of action upon matters involving deeply the rights and interests and character of the country.

Appropriation Bills.

I believe it impossible to ascertain the precise facts necessary to be ascertained for determining who is to blame, if any person be particularly to blame, for the failure of the fortification bill. We must rely upon the vague impressions, the contradictory recollections, of members about the time of the happening of particular events, upon which little reliance is to be placed, not from any want of confidence in the veracity of any members, but because of the existence of circumstances which you and I, Mr. Speaker, and every man who was here, know were well calculated to prevent any very accurate observation or remembrance of the occurrences which took place on the last night of the last session. Nearly one half the present House have no interest in this question. They know nothing about the facts; but it is proposed that this discussion shall supersede the consideration of the appropriation bills, in which we are all interested, in which the country is greatly interested, and for the action upon which the eyes of the whole people are anxiously looking. Let us take them up; let them be soberly, deliberately examined, with full discussion, with full examination, with the recommendations and the estimates of the proper Departments, and with proper and constitutional restrictions of executive discretion, limitations of purpose, and specifications of object. Let us approve what is worthy of approbation, and demanded by a wise policy, and reject what we may not be satisfied is proper or necessary. I feel much solicitude that we should do so. There is one subject now depending before the House, in relation to which he felt a deep and must painful anxiety, in which the rights, interests, and property of the whole southern country are most seriously implicated. I have (said Mr. P.) most strenuously exerted myself to bring this subject to decisive action, to a direct vote. I hope, though not with confidence, that we may get that vote without much more delay. But while I will postpone that subject to no other business, I should feel myself impelled, by the obligations of duty to the whole country, to put off even that decision, for the purpose of taking up and acting upon the appropriations essential for the support of the Government, for remedying the evil of the failure of the fortification bill, and for preparation for possible, if not probable, contingencies that may arise.

I should be sorry, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as intending to express the opinion that war is impending. I know the importance which is given to such opinions in some quarter or another, uttered on this floor, even from so humble a member as myself. I do most sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that this deplorable calamity may, in the providence of God, be averted consistently with the rights and honor of the country. But I cannot shut my ears and eyes to what is passing around us, calculated to weaken the confidence I might otherwise have in these hopes. If they should be falsified, let us endeavor to be prepared to meet it when the war comes.

Mr. REED said he felt the force of the remarks of the gentleman, when he said the country needed defence; he perfectly agreed with him; but he thought it would be the best course for the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present its own measures to the House, and let the House proceed to the appropriation bills in their usual mode.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that it had not occurred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs that they would have rendered themselves obnoxious to the charges which had been brought against them. The resolution proposed interfered with the duties and jurisdiction of no committee of the House. It related to the business in the House, or in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It would be remembered that, when, some days since, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposed an extraordinary appropriation to the naval bill, in reference to the peculiar posture of public affairs, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] in a strain of fervid eloquence, objected to the proposition, as resulting from subjects peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That gentleman had also declared that, if the occasion required, he was ready to exhaust the Treasury in a patriotic defence of the rights and honor of the nation. Mr. M. believed that these were the sentiments not only of that gentleman, but of the whole of the gallant and chivalrous people represented on this floor.

He was sensible of the delicacy and responsibility of his situation. Humble and comparatively unknown to the country as he was, he was yet aware that, in the state of anxiety at present existing, whatever proceeded from the committee of which he was the organ would be regarded with some degree of interest. The committee had not intended to agitate the public mind, by declaring any belief that the differences between this country and France, were to terminate in war. But they felt that they would be equally criminal to encourage a fatal apathy, a false security, by crying peace, peace, when there might be no peace. Entertaining these opinions, all that they meant to say was, that the relations of our country, not only with France, but with another nation, independently of our Indian affairs, were so equivocal and critical as to make it the duty of Congress to use its constitutional power in preparing to resist aggression and to protect our rights. To what extent appropriations for these objects should be made, was left by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the decision of the House.

It has been said, more than once, that this country is unprepared for war. This is true. But it is strange that such an argument should be used against measures of preparation. In time of peace the country will hardly ever be prepared for war. The genius of our institutions is opposed to large military establishments, and it is not expected that they can be collected at a moment's warning. The panoply of war is not suited to the full exercise of our energies in pursuit of individual happiness in the season of peace. But when our country is surrounded by circumstances of danger, when our relations with foreign Governments render it possible, not to say probable, that we cannot preserve the honor without disturbing the peace of the country, it seemed to him to be the highest, the most solemn duty of republican statesmen, to put in requisition the vast resources of the country, and to assume an attitude of preparation which would enable us to protect our rights, and to resist the aggression of others. These were the feelings and motives of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They did not say that there would be war. He prayed God to arrest such a calamity; but great as the evils of war were, there were greater still which might befall the country—the loss of its honor, and, with it, the loss of national security.

It was not for him to say that there had been no errors in our negotiations with France. In the arduous, protracted, and delicate diplomatic intercourse which had occurred between the two Governments, the President of the United States might congratulate himself on singular good fortune, if no step had been taken which it would be desirable to retrace. Mr. M. said that he believed this congratulation might be offered; but this was not the occasion to discuss that subject. He certainly would not, with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] admit that our Government had fallen into errors in common with France. He believed the present occasion required all the energies of this vigorous republic to be put into requisition; and he should, by his vote, endeavor promptly to effect that object.

Mr. M. said that the objections urged by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] were of a character which he had not expected from that quarter. That gentleman says, no doubt with perfect sincerity, that he is prepared to vote supplies for defence, when the honor and interest of the country require them. I may ask, (said Mr. M.,) does the proposition of the Committee on Foreign Affairs require him to give such vote, unless called for by those high considerations. The adoption of the resolution only puts it in the power of the House to act promptly and speedily on these important measures, and the necessity of each must be considered as it is proposed.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee has animadverted on what he has been pleased to call abuses which have grown up in the House; to one of which he has especially referred: the practice of chairmen of committees going to members of their committees in their seats in the House, separately, and obtaining their consent to report certain measures.

[Mr. BELL said he had not made a charge against any one. He had said the practice was unparliamentary, and had led to error.]

Mr. MASON said that he had understood the gentleman to disclaim the application of his remark to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. M. said, though he was sure such was not the gentleman's purpose, others might suppose that such application was appropriate; and he therefore took occasion to say that he had, on his own sense of duty, more than a week since, presented the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, when all the members were present; and that it had been considered and discussed from day to day, until its adoption, in a spirit of harmony and patriotism, which gave him the highest satisfaction.

The gentleman from Tennessee considers the circumstances under which this resolution is offered inexplicable, unless to be explained in some one of the modes suggested by him. These suggestions did not appear to imply very worthy motives on the part of the committee; but the imputation of such motives was not intended by the gentleman, because they were disclaimed. They seemed to be all connected with an approaching election by the people to the highest office of the republic. Mr. M. said that, for himself, he could safely say that he would never, in the discharge of the responsible duty which he owed his constituents on that floor, introduce propositions, or give his vote, or conduct debate, with the purpose of operating on elections by the people. This morbid illusion disturbed the fancy of some gentlemen, but with him it had not so paramount and absorbing an influence. He did not consider it compatible with his duty, and he believed such to be the sentiment of the committee.

The gentleman from Tennessee asks, if the purpose be to stifle discussion on the great subjects before the House? Mr. M. said that, in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, such was not and could not be the object, because he had submitted his proposition to the committee some days before he knew that such a proposition would be presented to the House.

On the other great question, the abolition subject, Mr. M. said he was happy that the allusion had been made. He considered it one of the highest duties of the House to decide the questions involved in that subject. He had uniformly acted with that view, and still earnestly hoped to see a decision, calculated to allay excitement, and meet the just expectation of the public. He must be excused, if, with entire deference to others, he did not see the advantages which were supposed to result from an elaborate discussion of that subject here. He wished to see it decided; and, to accomplish this desirable object, the Committee on Foreign Affairs had postponed the commencement of the order proposed for a week. For himself, he could safely answer, and he believed he could for the committee, that this late day was fixed to give to the House an opportunity to dispose of that subject especially, and to adapt its business generally to the operations of the new rule.

Nor was it the purpose of the committee to deplete the Treasury, and thus forestall the consideration of the proposition to divide the surplus revenues of the Government. The measure and extent of preparation and expenditures would be for the House to determine, when the subject was presented for consideration. The gentleman asks why this resolution is suddenly brought forward, under the influence of the panic of a French war. That committee was as little under the influence of pusillanimous fear as any other; and is this the term by which the desire to provide for the necessary defence of our beloved country, in the hour of her danger, is to be designated? Does the gentleman see in our foreign relations any thing showing so great a certainty of a pacific result, that the introduction of this resolution is only to be explained by a groundless panic, gotten up for sinister purposes?

[Mr. BELL said he had made no charge against the committee, in relation to a war. He had said that the tendency of the resolution would be to push all the appropriation bills through at once, before we could find out that they were needed.]

Mr. MASON said that he would not misunderstand the gentleman, much less misrepresent him. The gentleman supposes that one effect, if not an object, of this resolution will be, to "push through" the appropriation bills. I submit it to the honorable member, whether, if an inquiry were addressed to him, if such an intention was entertained by him, he would consider it very decorous, especially when the committee introducing the proposition had no charge of the bills. But no reflection on the committee, I am sure, was intended. But to show that this apprehension was wholly unfounded, Mr. M. had only to advert to the fact that the appropriation bills mainly embraced by this resolution were in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where they must be freely discussed, uncontrolled by the will of a majority, however large, or the application of the previous question.

Appropriation Bills.

[JAN. 26, 1836.]

It is objected to this resolution, that it embraces bills making appropriations for departments of the Government not connected with our foreign affairs, and therefore ought not to be adopted. This might seem to be a good reason for amendment, but not rejection. The committee, however, entertain the opinion, that in making appropriations for the support of Government, and to meet its diversified wants, it is convenient, if not essential, that the House should have the whole subject before it; thus contemplating, at one view, the resources, the exigencies, the necessary expenditures of the Government, the means of the Treasury, and the drafts to be made on them; and thus the appropriations for the Indian department had an important connexion with those for the naval and military service. But we are told that we must wait until we hear from France. It appeared to him wise to wait, before we took any decisive step on the subjects in controversy between the two nations; but it indicated fatuity, rather than a wise forecast, to postpone all measures of preparation in our unprepared state until the arrival of intelligence, which might disappoint our hopes and our expectations, and require the vigorous use of all of our resources.

The gentleman had said that the reference to the President's message was an artful appeal to the influence of a name, which was dragged in on many occasions not very appropriate. The honorable member disclaimed any offensive meaning in the term employed, and, Mr. M. said, he was sure that, if the gentleman did not, the House would perceive that the reference was rendered necessary by the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky, as giving the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. M. concluded by saying, that if, under the ingenious and accumulated objections which had been urged, the resolution should not find favor with the House, he and his honorable colleagues on the committee would have done their duty. And if future events, which none can foresee, shall show that its adoption might have saved our country from shame and disaster and outrage, they will deserve no portion of the deep and loud condemnation of the country.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was happy that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] had introduced the resolution to call up the appropriation bills; he had only anticipated the wish of the Committee of Ways and Means. As to the question of jurisdiction, at a crisis like the present, it was mutual with the Committees on Military, Naval, and Foreign Affairs, and Ways and Means. When he had first proposed to take up the appropriation bills, some time since, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] wished to interpose, doubtless from proper motives, a discussion on rules and orders. Subsequently the abolition question came up. In that state of the case, Mr. C. said he did, feeling the extraordinary and urgent necessity of the measure, ask the consideration of the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York, never dreaming that it would be opposed day by day, and inch by inch, as it had been. He had supposed that the House would meet it and pass it promptly, as the Senate had done.

We had, however, been disappointed; but he still believed that, but for the debate on the bill, it would have been ordered to a third reading on the very day it came from the Senate. He felt too anxious for the passage of that bill to detain the House by debating the question whenever it should come up again. With regard to the question introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] duty to himself compelled him to speak upon it. He should not shrink from the discussion, but should meet it fearlessly and honestly, let the responsibility fall where it might.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had also inquired what course the Committee of Ways and Means would pursue. As one of that committee, he would say that it was his design to separate the bills for ordinary appropriations from those for extraordinary purposes, understanding that these appropriations were first required. The gentleman from Tennessee would, next in order, have full opportunity to oppose or to discuss the extraordinary appropriations which would be required to put the country in a proper state of defence. It was not proposed to resort to the previous question; the very object of fixing an early day was to afford gentlemen every opportunity to discuss the appropriations as they ought to be, and not driven through, from necessity, and without debate, at the close of the session. One word as to the objection to the manner of introducing the resolution. The interests of the country had suffered last year from too nice an attention to forms; and the country was left defenceless. He trusted that the time had arrived when the great interests of the country would no longer be sacrificed to the miserable consideration of forms, forms, forms.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said he would vote for the resolution, because he had just learned from the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WHITE] that he had an amendment to add to one of the bills, authorizing the President to enlist a regiment of one thousand mounted men for the protection of Florida from the inroads of the Seminoles. He was fearful that that war was not speedily to be put down; and he felt that every consideration ought to give way to prompt and efficient measures to put an end to that bloody strife. He was opposed to appropriating money, unless for specific objects, and he could not do so unless the Department sent in statements showing what money was actually needed. He had not the remotest idea that France would commence hostilities; but if she did, he would not treat with her until the whole nation should be clad in armor; and, so far as he was concerned, he would not only empty the Treasury, but he would empty every American vein, in defence of the just rights of the country.

Mr. HOWARD said, that being under the impression that this resolution ought to pass, and moreover ought to pass to-day, he would give the House an opportunity of terminating the debate, if such should also be its opinion. But being a member of the committee from which this resolution emanated, and therefore conversant with the views which induced that committee to propose it, he felt it to be his duty to say a few words in explanation. That that committee had been actuated by a view of producing any result upon the presidential election, or that the idea had ever occurred to them that any person could draw such an inference, he utterly denied, and could not have been more astonished if the earth had suddenly yawned at his feet, than he was when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had supposed that it would affect that delicate subject. The committee had been guided alone by their sense of duty to the House and to the nation; and he took leave to say that, in his opinion, Congress was far behind the public feeling of the nation, in permitting our fortifications and other means of defence, to continue in their present condition. We had a thousand miles of seacoast, more unprotected than it ought to be, exposing hundreds of thousands of lives and hundreds of millions of property to a danger which, however slight, could not be totally overlooked. Having the state of our foreign relations committed to their charge, the committee had anxiously devoted their attention to the existing attitude of the country; and although he believed that the committee did not expect war, nor were they desirous to take any step which ought to bring it on, yet it was impossible to contemplate the posture of affairs without feeling the propriety of employing some of the surplus money of the Treasury to wards objects of public safety. Without entering at all into the examination of our relations with France, he might be permitted to say that the present unequal condition of the two nations, one in the full enjoyment of the benefits of the treaty, and the other not, ought not to continue; and should the Committee on Foreign Affairs even propose to disturb this one-sided condition of our commercial relations, who can say that it would be looked upon with complacency, and not resented, by France? Her sensitiveness on the subject of her produce and manufactures was well known; and no member of this House could undertake to predict her future course with such certainty as to postpone the passage of even the ordinary, much more any extraordinary, appropriations. The whole of the special message of the President, with all its recommendations, had been sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and that committee could be enabled to take a wider view of the condition of the country, after the House should have passed upon the appropriation bills, than they could now. The eyes of the whole nation were earnestly fixed upon Congress; and the committee were fully sensible of the extreme delicacy of the task committed to their charge. Having nothing in view but a sincere zeal to promote the honor, dignity, and interest of the nation, they had submitted to the House the proposition before them; upon which, he hoped, they were now prepared to vote.

Mr. H. then demanded the previous question; but, at the request of several members about him, waived it for the present.

Mr. HARDIN said he had hoped, with his friend from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that we might have taken up, discussed, and adopted, rules for the government of the House. Rules were intended as a protection to the minority, the weaker party. The strong and powerful needed no protection; but the weak and powerless did. So far as the protection of Florida was concerned, from the inroads of a savage foe, he would to God that five thousand of the best bloods in America were in the midst of them; and he had looked for a proclamation from the President, calling on Tennessee and Kentucky for volunteers. We would then see that those States would furnish ample force to put down the Indians, and put them down in a way that would be a guarantee for the peace of that country. And so far as our foreign relations were concerned, he would say that, if the country was brought into collision with France, he would never stop to inquire how we got into it, or to argue about constitutional rights, but would go for the United States, right or wrong. He was opposed to appropriating money for fortifications, and was opposed to the fortification system. We needed no bulwarks along our steeps. We had already appropriated forty or fifty millions for fortifications, and we are now told that we had not one hundred guns mounted. If that money had been appropriated for our navy, we might have had one that would have been able to protect our coast from invasion. He felt that our foreign affairs were standing on a slender foundation, upon a mere nothing; and when it came to be either a war or an apology, he would rather spend a hundred millions than that the President should make an apology; and he was aware, from the well-known character of the President, that there would be no apology from him. But he was opposed to our arming at present, because it might be considered just cause of war. France might, according to her former practice, strike the blow the moment we commenced arming. He would go a reasonable length, but it was difficult to say how far we should go. He would at present vote against any appropriation bill that looked like a war measure, but he did not say that in two weeks he might not vote for as large appropriations as other gentlemen.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would not expose the motion he was now about to make to the objection that had been urged to the motion a short time ago, submitted by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD.] About two speeches against the resolution had been made to one in its favor; and, without making an argument, he moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded: 113 to 86.

The question, Shall the main question be now put? was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CRAIG asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered, and were:

SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making an additional appropriation of $50,000 for repressing hostilities on the part of the Indians in Florida.

Mr. C. adverted to the propriety of a speedy action on the bill, and, by unanimous consent, moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the same; which was agreed to.

The House then went into committee, Mr. HOWARD in the Chair, upon the foregoing bill.

Mr. WHITE moved to amend the bill by adding a section authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be enlisted a regiment of 1,000 mounted riflemen, by and with the consent of the Senate, for twelve months, if, in his discretion, he should deem it necessary.

Mr. W. briefly supported the amendment. He said all accounts from Florida represented the Territory to be in a most distressing condition. Three entire counties were already desolated by the Indians. Their numbers were not known, and the melancholy information received from the inhabitants of those counties, as well as the destruction of the detachment of the United States troops, showed that these men had been equipped for action for a long time. A portion of them had been armed by the Government of the United States, with a view of their going to the west of the Mississippi river, and another portion had received arms from smugglers and others. Mr. W. knew that the number of Seminole Indians had been greatly underrated, and it was known there were not less than 1,200 or 1,500 men, who had captured already about 250 slaves, and those slaves who would not operate with them they intended to transport to the island of Cuba.

Now, the first question was, what was the best mode of putting an end to these disorders? It was impossible to draw the militia in the southern States this season, nor in the spring of the year; and if the Indians were not entirely subjugated before the warm season, it would then be rendered impossible. He believed that in the course of three or four weeks a sufficient force might be raised to put an end to these hostilities by June or July; and if these troops should be unemployed, he understood that other portions of the United States wanted them at that time. Information had been received by the Secretary of War, that the Creeks were in a very troubled state. He could assure the House that the whole Territory of Florida would be desolated in a very short time, unless the Indians were repressed. Under these circumstances, he hoped there would be no opposition to the amendment. He believed it proposed the best and most efficient means of putting an end to a war which had already caused a great sacrifice of lives, both of officers and men, on their march from Tampa Bay to join General Clinch. Mr. W. had himself received letters from officers at Tampa Bay, stating that the attack was made by no less a force than eight hundred Indians.

Mr. HUNTSMAN was for receiving volunteers as well as regulars, and spoke of the advantages of that description of troops over persons enlisted. His own county would raise five hundred men.

Mr. HARDIN offered a proviso authorizing the President of the United States to disband the force at an earlier period than twelve months, in case their services should be no longer required.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to add the word "required" to the amendment; which Mr. HARDIN accepted as a modification.

Mr. ADAMS opposed the modification, as an unprecedented requisition upon the Executive.

Mr. VANDERPOEL begged to inquire if the amendment of the gentleman from Florida had the consent of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WHITE believed it would have, and pledged himself to withdraw it when the bill came into the House if it had not.

Messrs. ASHLEY, RIPLEY, and UNDERWOOD, opposed the amendment; and, after a few words in its favor by Mr. GLASCOCK, Mr. WHITE withdrew it.

Mr. SHIELDS then moved an amendment authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of 1,000 volunteers, for the period of nine months; which, after some remarks from Messrs. SHIELDS, W. C. JOHNSON, CRAIG, and WHITE of Florida, was negatived.

The committee then rose and reported the bill without amendment to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, having been engrossed, was then read a third time and passed.

After doing some other business, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27.

LAST YEAR'S FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of the present session as relates to the failure, at the last session of Congress, of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into, and report to the House, the causes and circumstances of the failure of the bill.

The question being on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend the bill by adding "with power to send for persons and papers?"—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it was not his design to detain the House long in discussing this very grave question of the loss of the appropriation of three millions for the defence of the country—the true issue between the two Houses. Concerning the bill making ordinary provision for new fortifications, there was no contest. The controversy between the Senate and the House was not about fortifications to be finished, perhaps in 1840, but about the three million appropriation in 1835, for arming forts already completed, and for increasing our navy afloat. The inquiry was, who left the country defenceless, after the message of the President communicating the correspondence with France, and after the unanimous resolution of the House, that the execution of the treaty should be insisted on; and at a crisis, too, when the question of peace or war depended on the caprice of a Government denying us justice, and regardless of its faith. That was the appropriation to which the attention of the nation was directed, and in the fate of which our national interest and honor were directly involved; that was the only issue now pending between the two Houses, and on which the country had already and very justly decided.

He regretted that he was obliged to engage in an inquiry after lost appropriations, when the time of the House could be so much more profitably employed in devising measures for the national defence, war or no war; but (said Mr. C.) I am not at liberty to be silent in this debate: the combined attacks on me in both Houses oblige me to defend myself. In doing so, I shall be compelled to notice some of the statements of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] I shall not, Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question, introduce names—they are of little moment in any debate. Not even the illustrious name of the gentleman from Virginia could add the weight of a feather to my argument. You would never tolerate it, sir, and I am sure the House would be astonished at my indecorum, were I to designate the gentleman as "Mr. Wise;" and courtesy would certainly not permit me to call the gentleman otherwise. No, sir; I hope I shall never be tempted on any occasion, even by the wild rant of disappointed ambition, to forget my own self-respect, or my regard for the dignity of this House, so far as to treat any gentleman with disrespect. In the present instance, Mr. Speaker, I shall not only treat the gentleman with the utmost respect, but even with tenderness. It would be unkind, indeed, to treat otherwise the innocent, the unsuspecting, the penitent victim of that stupendous fraud which the gentleman from Virginia has so recently discovered; that stupendous conspiracy which the President, you, and I, were plotting last year, to betray the gentleman, undermine our constitution, and destroy our Government. No, sir; it is far, very far, from my purpose to engage in any parliamentary tournament with the gentleman from Virginia; but, should I ever be forced into any such contest with any gentleman, I hope it will be my fortune to encounter some more formidable antagonist than "Buckingham with his rash levied strength."

JAN. 27, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this question, I must do an act of justice to an honorable Senator from Massachusetts. A day or two since, I announced my intention to notice an attack made upon me in the National Gazette of Philadelphia, in March last, founded upon information derived, among other sources, "from Senators of the highest character." In that journal it was stated that the Vice President and Secretary of State had advised me to let the fortification bill die in the House, to prevent the responsibility of its failure from falling on the President—a statement which was immediately pronounced, both by the Secretary of State and myself, to be false, upon whatever authority founded. And now, sir, for the origin of this poor slander. The Vice President and Secretary of State were in this House, and about leaving it, when the committee of conference returned to it. The Secretary of State, from whom the estimate for the three million appropriation had been received, inquired the result of our conference, and, on learning it, expressed the opinion, in which I entirely concurred, that eight hundred thousand dollars was a pitiful appropriation for the defence of a nation. Not one syllable passed between the Vice President and myself. Sir, there was no secret, no mystery, about the matter; it was in the presence of the whole House, and every syllable uttered might have been heard by every gentleman near. As chairman of the committee of conferees on the part of the House, whatever may have been my opinion as to the inadequacy of the appropriation, I should have immediately reported the compromise, but for the obstacles which I shall state in their proper order. Every gentleman near me, without reference to party, knew that such was my intention.

Such was all the foundation for the statement in the National Gazette. That statement I ascribed to the Senator from Massachusetts, the authority referred to being a Senator of "the highest character." I am happy to say, sir, that, since the last day's debate, I have received the most satisfactory assurance that that honorable Senator was not the authority relied on by the editor; and I take far more pleasure in doing justice to that gentleman than I should have done in defending myself from the attack. I make the acknowledgment with the greater pleasure, because, throughout the remarks of the honorable Senator, he has not condescended, he has not stooped, to notice this miserable scandal; he has resigned all the honor of nourishing and cherishing this poor and contemptible slander to some unknown Senator, and to others who have no loftier ambition.

Gentlemen who feel themselves accountable to the nation for leaving our country unprepared to meet any emergency which might have grown out of our relations with France, have pleaded their utter ignorance of the necessity for any such preparation, and of any proposition for defence, till the last night of the session. What, sir, is the notorious history of this appropriation? Our affairs with France remained in an uncertain attitude till the last days of the session; and this House suspended its action upon the question, in the hope that some intelligence would arrive. None reached us of a pacific character. The minister of France had been recalled, passports had been tendered to our minister, and he had also been recalled. Every thing wore a belligerent character. At that crisis, the President, in his message of the 25th of February, communicates, as soon as it was received, the correspondence with the French Government, and in conclusion says:

"The subject being now, in all its present aspects, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued in that event, [Mr. Livingston's return,] I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires."

Thus the Chief Magistrate of the nation submits this question at a critical period to Congress, "confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country which the occasion requires." When that message came to the House, on the 26th of February, I submitted three resolutions, which had been previously considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The third resolution recommended contingent preparation for any emergency which might grow out of our relations with France. These resolutions, and the President's message, were referred to the committee. The next day the committee made a report, which contained the following extract:

"The bill now before the House, authorizing the sale of our stock in the Bank of the United States, would, if adopted, afford all the revenue necessary. The committee is of opinion that the whole, or a part, of the fund to be derived from that source should be appropriated for the purpose of arming our fortifications, and for making the military and naval preparations for the defence of the country, in case such expenditures should become necessary before the next meeting of Congress."

The third resolution appended to that report was, that contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France. That report, and the resolutions, were adopted by a majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and proposed, not merely an appropriation of three millions, but of the whole proceeds of our stock in the Bank of the United States, if necessary, for the public defence.

When these resolutions came up the day after, I stated that, to secure unanimity, I should withdraw the third resolution, as I intended, when the Senate's amendments to the fortification bill should be under consideration, to offer an amendment appropriating three millions, which I had learned would be all that was deemed necessary by the Executive; thus substituting, for a mere declaratory resolution, an actual appropriation for the defence of the country. Such, sir, is the published history of this preparation for defence, about which gentlemen seem to have been so utterly ignorant. The President's message, the report and resolutions of the committee, and the unanimous resolution of the House to insist on the execution of the treaty, were before the world; still gentlemen were ignorant of the whole affair, and waited for estimates from the Departments, and an executive order. Journals on all sides were calling on Congress to place the country in a state of defence; the fire of patriotism was kindled throughout the land, and lighting every spot in the Union, save one dark chamber, into which that light could never penetrate; there all was midnight.

Other apologies are made to the country, sir: estimates were not submitted by the Department, and the form of the amendment was unprecedented, unconstitutional, and monstrous. I shall presently show on what foundation, legislative or historical, this latter objection rests. As to the estimate, you will recollect that you, as chairman of the committee of Ways and Means, united with me in a note to the Secretary of State, inquiring what amount would be required, and that his answer was,

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 27, 1836.]

one million for the army, and two for the navy, including fortifications, ordnance, and increase of the navy. It was upon that estimate the proposed amendment was founded. And now, sir, for this formidable amendment; here it is, sir:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy, provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

This infernal machine, which was to blow the gentleman from Virginia, the constitution, and the Government, to atoms, was contrived here, sir, in concert with a former Representative from Virginia, and a member of the opposition, a gentleman of the highest standing for ability, honor, and integrity, and universally esteemed in this House. I mean a gentleman who was formerly chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I drew the section, and submitted it to him. He proposed an amendment, and here are the words, "shall be rendered," in his own handwriting. As originally drawn it reads, "provided he shall deem such expenditures necessary." As amended by the gentleman from Virginia, it was, "provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary." Such, sir, was the origin of the celebrated section which startled the Senate, and shook the Government to its foundation.

And what, sir, was the history of this appropriation? I proposed it in the House; it was adopted by a large majority, including some fifteen opposition votes. It was sent to the Senate; and how did they receive a mere proposition to put the country in a state of defence, should it become necessary? Was it treated with ordinary respect, and referred to a committee? No. Was it examined in form or substance? Was the slightest disposition evinced to make any contingent provision for defending the country in case of war? No, sir; no effort was made to modify the section in form or amount—none whatever to defend the country. The Senate seemed outraged at the American spirit of the House; they appeared to receive it as a rebuke of their resolution to oppose the recommendation of the President, and to reject every measure designed "to maintain the rights and honor of the country." It was not the form, nor the objects, nor the amount, of the appropriation; it was the predetermined resolution of the Senate, upon a question between this country and a foreign Power, to resist the House, the President, and the country. That was the origin of the motion to reject the appropriation, and of the violent and extraordinary movement of that body. It was rejected. The House insisted on its amendment, and sent the appropriation to the Senate a second time. Had the Senate, even at that hour, treated the House with ordinary courtesy; had it insisted, and asked a conference, the bill and the appropriation, or a part of it, might have been saved. Contrary, however, to all parliamentary usage, and animated by a determined spirit of resistance, that body would not condescend to ask a conference; but, in the second stage, adhered to its disagreement, and left the bill, appropriation and all, to their fate. When that message was announced, I immediately moved to adhere; and if this House had done itself justice, the motion would have prevailed. But the motion was superseded by one to insist and ask a conference. The House yielded, and solicited a conference, notwithstanding the repeated indignities of the Senate, and the committee was appointed on the part of the House.

The committee of conference waited only till the message was sent to the Senate, and to learn whether that body had, on its part, agreed to the conference, and even of that no official notice was ever received. In the mean time, the Cumberland road bill was on its passage, and two of the members of the committee voted on it immediately before leaving the House.

The hour when this committee was appointed has been much discussed, and gentlemen are appealing to their recollections. Whatever confidence I may have, sir, in their integrity, they must pardon me for rejecting their testimony, resting as it does on their memory of the transactions of that night. I rely on the journal of this House, recorded as it is by the Clerk, and corrected by the Speaker, and on the reports of our proceedings in the public journals. These prove unanswerably that the first business of moment after the appointment of the committee was the Cumberland road bill; and although that bill was taken up some minutes before 12 o'clock, the ayes and noes occupied some thirty minutes or more, and it did not finally pass till after that hour.

But the gentleman from Virginia has made a new discovery. The committee, it now seems, had time to wait till our Clerk could carry the message to the Senate, to learn the Senate's agreement to the conference, to meet the conferees in the other wing of the Capitol, debate and adjust this most difficult compromise, and return to this House in time to vote on the Cumberland road bill. To support this new and extraordinary position, we are gravely referred to our journal, containing two pages of proceedings; and what is this mass of business recorded? Two reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills!—occupying probably two or three minutes, and made undoubtedly (for such reports are usually made in that way, during the last night of the session) while the Cumberland road bill was under consideration. The only other item upon the journal, and the only business intervening between the appointment of the committee and proceeding to the consideration of the Cumberland road bill, was the concurrence of the House to the Senate's amendment to a military bill. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] and myself left the House as soon as we had recorded our votes against the Cumberland road bill. But, sir, this question is settled by the journals of the day, and even by the journal of this House. However it may suit the purposes of gentlemen to take new ground, they cannot destroy the record of the proceedings of that night. I then stated, in the presence of all the members of the committee of conference, and of the members present, what appears upon the face of our own journal: "that from the vote on the resolution granting compensation to Robert P. Letcher, which was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference," &c. The arguments of gentlemen can never destroy the record.

I will now ask the Clerk to read the proceedings of the House, from the time of the appointment of the committee till its return, as reported for the National Intelligencer. The name of Mr. Hubbard is accidentally omitted as a member of the committee.

[The Clerk then read from the Intelligencer a long account of the proceedings, from which the following are extracts:

"The motion to ask a conference was agreed to; and Messrs. Cambreleng and Lewis were appointed the committee of conference on the part of the House.

"Mr. Hardin asked if the House was not virtually dissolved by the expiration of the term for which this Congress was elected.

"The Chair said it was not a question in order, and the Chair could not decide it.

"The Cumberland road bill was taken up, and read a third time.

JAN. 27, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

"Mr. McKay moved that a message be sent to the other House, informing them that this House, having completed its business, is now ready to adjourn.

"The Chair said the motion was not in order, the question being on the passage of the bill.

"The Clerk proceeded to take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill to continue and repair the Cumberland road; and

"Mr. Gilmer, when his name was called, rose and said he considered that he had no right to vote, the term for which he was elected having expired at twelve o'clock this night; and he therefore declined voting."

After the passage of the Cumberland road bill, the report gives an account of a desultory conversation between the Chair and various members, on the constitutional dissolution of the House, motions to adjourn, &c.

The following are further extracts from the report:

"Several members addressed the Chair.

"Mr. Clay said the motion to extend the judiciary system was the business next in order.

"Twenty members addressed the Chair at the same time; the Chair in vain attempting to preserve order.

"The confusion in the House increasing,

"The Chair called upon members to assist him in preserving order and decorum.

"At length,

"Mr. J. Y. Mason said, as the House was about to separate, he hoped they would render an act of simple justice to one of its members, by passing the resolution to pay the honorable Robert P. Letcher his compensation for the last session. He moved a suspension of the rule in order to take up the resolution. The motion was agreed to, and the resolution proposing to direct payment to Mr. Letcher, for attendance at the last session, was read.

"Mr. Vanderpoel moved to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

"The question being on motion of Mr. R. M. Johnson to amend the resolution by embracing the name of Thomas P. Moore,

"Mr. Wilde moved the previous question; which was seconded, 69 to 65.

"The main question was ordered, [on agreeing to pay Mr. Letcher,] and was taken by yeas and nays, when there appeared, yeas 113, nays 3; several members refusing to vote, though present, on the ground that it was past twelve o'clock.

"No quorum voting, the resolution was lost."

Gentlemen certainly cannot object to their own witness, particularly as the evidence here extracted from the Intelligencer was published after the first attack appeared in that journal, charging the House with the loss of the fortification bill, and almost in the very language of a recent attack made in the Senate.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the record of our proceedings, as reported for the Intelligencer. The very first question noticed in that report, after the committee was appointed, is the Cumberland road bill. And on the return of the committee, what was the condition of the House? The Chair calling upon members to assist him in preserving order and decorum—the gentleman from Virginia rising and making an appeal to a House "which was about to separate," even before the return of the committee. And yet, sir, we hear gentlemen who would sacrifice the interest of our country because the words "army" and "navy" are inserted in an amendment—who are alarmed at the slightest deviation from the most rigid constitutional forms, denouncing a chairman of a committee for not reporting and submitting an appropriation of $800,000 at one in the morning (for it was near that before the vote was announced on the Letcher resolution) to the fragment of a quorum of a dissolved body, in which the Speaker was not able to preserve order and decorum! Sir, it was at no time practicable to make the report after the committee returned from the conference. I returned to the House just in time to record my vote in favor of the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher. It was five-and-twenty minutes after that before the result was announced, and it was known that no quorum had voted. The question actually before the House then was: whether a quorum could be obtained for the purpose of passing the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher. Had a quorum been obtained, the question would have been on that resolution; and, sir, had ten fortification bills been ready to be reported, the friends of Mr. Letcher never would have given way at that hour of the night. But no quorum was ever obtained from that time till the adjournment of the House, and the only motion in order was a motion to adjourn. That motion was made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Jarvis,] and the yeas and nays were again ordered. I voted against adjournment, still anxious to obtain a quorum, but no quorum voted. Thus, sir, was another five-and-twenty minutes exhausted. Another struggle commenced for a quorum, to pass the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher. Tellers were appointed to count the House: the Speaker was requested to ascertain whether there was a quorum present. Sir, it is impossible to describe the scene. At length, abandoning all hope of obtaining a quorum, the House prepared a second time to adjourn. A gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] was permitted to report a mere resolution of inquiry of the War Department; the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. White,] to lay on the table a copy of an act of that Territory; and the Speaker asked leave to dispose of the communications upon his table. On a motion to print the last of these, which was "a letter from the Postmaster General, vindicating himself from aspersions," &c., there was no quorum voting; and, as the journal states, the letter "was not further acted on." Sir, this business preparatory to adjournment was all that was done after the passage of the Cumberland road bill till the adjournment of the House at about three o'clock in the morning. Not one dollar was voted, no amendment of the Senate was agreed to, and no act of any description was passed, after the passage of the Cumberland road bill. Nothing was done but to hear reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and to send and receive messages to and from the Senate and the President.

I have been charged, Mr. Speaker, with another unpardonable offence. Although I objected to measures to compel others to vote after 12 o'clock, yet I voted myself on every question after that hour, and even against the motion to adjourn. Sir, the gentleman from Virginia might have gone back for fifteen years, and found my name recorded on every question till the hour of adjournment. I believe that our constitutional term does expire at 12 o'clock, but I have had no scruples about remaining and attending to the closing forms of this body, and even of voting for laws, in cases of indispensable necessity. If there is any offence in this, sir, I have no apology but in the universal usage of all legislative bodies; and I believe that my opinion and my practice have been the opinion and practice of a majority of every Congress elected since the adoption of our constitution. Whether after the hour of twelve we have a quorum or not, depends entirely upon the number of members who choose voluntarily to remain in session.

The gentleman makes another grave charge—that we had the power to command a quorum, and that the bill was lost by an intrigue of the friends of the administration on this floor, who declined voting. Sir, I deny, utterly deny, that the refusal to vote was a party measure, or that the want of a quorum had any reference whatever to the fortification bill or the three millions appropriation.

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 27, 1836.]

Was the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] who first inquired "if the House was not virtually dissolved," a friend of the administration? Was the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER,] who declined voting on the Cumberland road bill, a friend of the administration? Was another gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JONES,] who moved an adjournment while the conferees were still in session, a friend of the administration? Did these gentlemen intrigue to destroy a quorum on the fortification bill, to prevent it from reaching the President, to shield him from responsibility? Sir, the question of a quorum had nothing whatever to do with the fortification bill. The struggle commenced on the Cumberland road bill; it was continued by members of both parties on the judiciary bill. Forty members had retired after the passage of the Cumberland road bill; and before the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher was called up, the number was reduced from 174 to 134. It was the struggle between the friends of Mr. Letcher and Mr. Moore which destroyed the quorum. Subsequent to that, no quorum could be obtained, even on a motion to print the Postmaster General's letter vindicating himself. As well might it be said that the want of a quorum on that proposition was owing to an intrigue among the friends of the administration!

Mr. Speaker, it was after that vote had been taken on printing the Postmaster General's letter, after the Speaker had disposed of the business on his table, preparatory to an adjournment, and with a perfect knowledge, on the part of the Senate, that the House had been more than one hour in vain struggling for a quorum, and that they were making final preparations for adjournment; it was, sir, under such circumstances, and at two in the morning, the following extraordinary resolution was received from the Senate of the United States:

"Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference, appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States."

When that message was read, sir, I stated, what I now repeat, that, when I came into the House from the conference, the Clerk was calling the yeas and nays on the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher, on which there was no quorum; that, on a subsequent proposition to adjourn, the yeas and nays were called, and again there was no quorum. Under such circumstances, I did not feel authorized to present to the House an appropriation of eight hundred thousand dollars. That the House had discharged its duty to the country by twice voting an appropriation of three millions for its defence, which the Senate had twice rejected; that the bill was evidently lost, and the Senate must take the responsibility of leaving the country defenceless; that it was no longer in the power of the House to compel members to vote, to call them here, or to command a quorum; that I did not feel authorized to report the bill, situated as the House was; but that, if any other member of the committee of conference proposed to do it, I should make no objection, though I believed such a proposition utterly ineffectual at this time. Mr. Lewis took the report, and, as the journal states, made it. But, sir, in what manner did he make it? When the gentleman from Virginia read from the journal the paragraph about the report, I was astonished. When I came, however, to examine that journal myself, when I observed a paragraph which had escaped the vigilant eye of that gentleman, my astonishment ceased. Here it is, sir: "The item proposed by the conferees, in lieu of the amendment of the House, was then read, and the question was stated that the House do adopt the same; when it was objected that a quorum was not present." We shall see, sir, who it was that objected. "And thereupon Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Lewis were appointed tellers, to return the House; and the House being counted, the tellers reported that a quorum was not present." Yes, Mr. Speaker, the tellers appointed to return the House reported that a quorum was not present. This, sir, is Mr. Lewis's report. Was not every member present counted, whether refusing to vote or not? If any member had "skulked," would not Mr. Lewis have reported that fact? But, sir, the journal does not state the case precisely as it occurred, though I presume the officers of the House felt obliged to place the report upon the journal in some form. There appears, sir, to have been some doubt about the fact; for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILLIPS] inquired of the Chair about it, and the report states that "the Chair stated, in reply, that, as he understood, the report was made." [Mr. PHILLIPS here rose and stated that the report was not correct; that he understood the Chair to reply that the report had not been made.] The gentleman's recollection corresponds with my own as to the fact that the report was not, strictly speaking, made. In saying this, I by no means design any imputation against the officers of the House. It could not be overlooked in the account of our proceedings. But, sir, the Intelligencer's report of what actually occurred accords precisely with my recollection of it, viz:

"Mr. Lewis (another member of the committee of conference) took the report from Mr. Cambreleng, with the apparent intention of offering it to the House; but he first asked the Chair"—(for no man better understands his parliamentary duty)—"he first asked the Chair whether there was a quorum present or not." There was not, sir; and Mr. Lewis laid the bill upon the Clerk's table, and there it remained.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that when that extraordinary message was received from the Senate—when we witnessed the solemn farce of hearing announced a grave message from that dignified body, rebuking the few members remaining, and who, it is well known all over this Capitol, were taking steps preparatory to adjournment, I felt, sir, some of the indignation so warmly expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] But, sir, had we then known, as we have been since informed—as we are now, indeed, told by honorable Senators themselves—that, before that message was sent to this House, they had received a message from the President of the United States, announcing to them that, as the functions of Congress had ceased, he could receive no further communication from them—had we been aware of that fact, sir, by what name should we have designated this extraordinary proceeding? Might it not have been denounced as a miserable artifice, to attempt to shift the responsibility of leaving the country defenceless from the Senate to the Executive? All such expedients, sir, were in vain, as well as all these speeches upon this subject. The country well know where this responsibility rests. The story of the three million appropriation is briefly told. It was the proposition of the House, in pursuance of the President's message, and for our country's defence—it was sent to the Senate, where it was rudely rejected—it was sent there again and again—it was unceremoniously returned to the House. It then received its death-blow in the Senate; it lingered for a time between the two Houses, it perished in the committee of conference, and its poor miserable remains were brought and deposited here, the gentlemen from Alabama and New Hampshire and myself acting as pall-bearers.

But, sir, I dismiss all these details, which I have been compelled to go into in self-defence. I come now, sir, to those great constitutional objections which honorable

JAN. 27, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

Senators have urged against the three million appropriation, proposed for our defence in the contingency of war. We have been told, sir, that the amendment specified no objects—that every thing was left to the discretion of the President—that he could do every thing touching the naval service, without control—and that he would have an absolute power to raise and employ land forces; and we are asked whether our legislation, under our constitution, furnishes any precedent for all this.

Mr. Speaker, these objections are made, and these questions are asked, by Senators distinguished as statesmen; gentlemen of great experience, having been in the public councils some twenty or thirty years, in peace and in war. Such bold declarations of gentlemen of experience and reputation, though entirely unsupported by the history of our country, may sometimes mislead, especially when put forth with an air of confidence and authority.

The history of our legislation, sir, is replete with precedents, notwithstanding the bold declarations of gentlemen to the contrary. I have in my hand a list of some forty or fifty, a few of which I will only notice. In the early history of our legislation, in Washington's administration, all our expenditures for the civil list were in one line, and for the army in another, without any specification whatever. I know that we have long since departed from that rule, but I doubt a little whether we have consulted true economy by such a course, for every branch we have lopped off has become a tree; till, finally, one, two, and three hundred thousand dollars have mounted up to two or three times as many millions. Such, sir, are some of the results of too much specification.

On the 20th March, 1794, one million of dollars was placed at the discretion of President Washington, without specification of any kind whatever, to defray "any expense which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations."

In the next administration, sir, on the 3d of May, 1798—and, lest gentlemen should be alarmed at the period referred to, I shall, before I sit down, give them more republican authorities)—in 1798, sir, 250,000 dollars was placed at the discretion of President Adams, for certain fortifications, "and to erect fortifications in any other place or places, as the public safety shall require, in the opinion of the President of the United States; to be erected under his direction, from time to time, as he shall judge necessary."

1798, May 4. $800,000 for cannon, small arms, ammunition, and military stores, for "the public safety and defence, at the discretion of the President," who was by the same act authorized to establish armories and foundries, &c.

1798, May 28. The President authorized to raise ten thousand troops "in the event of a declaration of war against the United States, or of actual invasion of their territory by a foreign Power; or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered, in his opinion, to exist before the next session of Congress;" and authorized to organize them into corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, with a suitable number of major generals, &c.

1798, July 16. $900,000 for the increased army.

1799, March 2. The President authorized to raise "twenty-four regiments of infantry, a regiment and a battalion of riflemen, a battalion of artillery and engineers, and three regiments of cavalry, or such part thereof as he shall judge necessary, in case war shall break out between the United States and a foreign European Power, or in case imminent danger of invasion of their territory by any such Power shall, in his opinion, be discovered to exist." Two millions appropriated, and the President authorized to borrow the money.

We now come to the administration of Mr. Jefferson, when, sir, I believe there was no disposition to violate the constitution, or destroy the Government with the battery of an appropriation.

1803, February 26. Two millions of dollars in addition to former appropriations, without any specification whatever, "for the purpose of defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," "to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States." Authorized to borrow the money.

1803, March 3. President authorized, "whenever he shall judge it expedient," to require of the Executives of certain States to organize, arm, equip, and "hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, a detachment of militia not exceeding eighty thousand."

One million five hundred thousand dollars for pay and subsistence of such as may be wanted, for ordnance and other military stores, "and for defraying such other expenses as, during the recess of Congress, the President may deem necessary for the security of the territory of the United States, to be applied under the direction of the President."

1804, March 26. For equipping such armed vessels "as may be deemed requisite by the President," and for "defraying any other expenses incidental to the intercourse with the Barbary Powers," against Tripoli, "or any other of the Barbary Powers which may commit hostilities," &c. Mediterranean fund established by this act: $1,500,000 appropriated—President authorized to borrow it.

The following act is so important, comprehensive, and indefinite, and applies so directly to the case of secret service money, (never contemplated in the appropriation last year,) that I give the whole section. The President was also authorized to borrow the money.

1806, February 13. That a sum of two millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who shall cause an account thereof to be laid before Congress as soon as may be.

1806, April 18. The President authorized, "at such time as he shall deem necessary, to require of the Executives of the several States" to organize, and "to hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning," one hundred thousand militia. Two millions of dollars appropriated.

1808, February 24. Thirty thousand volunteers, "to be called upon to do military duty at any time the President of the United States shall judge proper." Fifty thousand dollars appropriated.

1808, January 8. $1,000,000 for such fortifications "as he may deem necessary" to repair, and for "such other fortifications, &c., as will afford more effectual protection to our ports and harbors," &c.

We now come down, sir, to Mr. Madison's administration, and approach a period with which some of the distinguished gentlemen of the Senate must be familiar, even if they had no hand in framing or voting for these laws.

1809, January 14. $750,000 "for certain purposes, and erecting such fortifications as may, in the opinion of the President of the United States, be deemed necessary for the protection of the northern and western frontiers," &c.

1811, March 3. $131,046 30, generally, for completing fortifications.

1812, January 14. $1,500,000 to purchase, under the direction of the President of the United States, ordnance, ordnance stores, camp equipages, and other quartermaster's stores for the army.

1812, January 8. President authorized, "whenever

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 27, 1835.]

he shall have satisfactory evidence of the actual or threatened invasion of any State," &c., to raise six companies of rangers.

1812, March 20. $50,000 additional, "for the purposes of fortifying and defending the maritime frontier of the United States."

July 5. $500,000 more.

The following were appropriations simply:

1813, January 20. $1,000,000 for the military establishment; $1,000,000 for the naval.

1814, March 9. $500,000 for floating batteries.

November 15. $600,000 for any number of vessels, not exceeding twenty, which, in the President's opinion, the public service may require.

The act of 20th April, 1816, appropriates a million annually, for eight years, for the navy, and the President is authorized to build ships, or to cause them to be framed, &c.; and never, sir, till 1821, was there an appropriation made for fortifications, except generally, and without specification.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some few of the precedents for appropriations in sudden emergencies, and to prepare our country for the contingency of war. Instead, sir, of making all these objections to forms, instead of resorting to all these expedients to avert responsibility, and making unfounded appeals to the history of our legislation, would it not be more candid, more manly, nay, more honorable, sir, to take the honest ground which some gentlemen have occupied, and say they would not make the appropriation through fear of a war with France? Sir, these timid counsels never have succeeded, and never will. It was the unfortunate decision of the Senate, that it was inexpedient to do any thing, that produced the prompt rejection of the three million appropriation for our national defence; it was their unfortunate and unchangeable resolution to oppose the House, the President, and the country. France exulted at this division in our national councils; the result is, the treaty is not executed, and we are now preparing for any emergency.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate, in former days, was not found, in any question between our country and a foreign Power, uncourteously and rudely resisting measures of this House designed for our national defence, in case war should come upon us in the recess of Congress. They did not reject propositions without examination, and adhere without previous conference. They did not scruple about forms, specifications, and estimates of Departments, when called upon by the President to adopt measures "to maintain the rights and honor of the country."

But, sir, it is time to dismiss this inquiry. It is a matter of little moment now to the nation which House destroyed the three million appropriation, or who the fortification bill. I am glad to learn, from almost all sides, that we are now determined, in both Houses, to unite with the Executive in putting our country in that strong attitude which she ought to assume, whether we have peace or war. This is no time, sir, for continuing a war between the House and the Senate. The crisis demands that there should be no differences between the different branches of our Government. We are in the midst of an Indian war; we are threatened with a border war on our Mexican frontier; we are engaged in a controversy with one of the most powerful nations, and the scales are so equally balanced that a feather would decide the question of peace or war. France has told us the conditions on which only the treaty will be executed; she now stands pledged to exact conditions which this country never will submit to, though it should be desolated from Maine to Louisiana. I am still not without hope of peace; but when a French fleet is abroad upon the Atlantic, it is not a time to inquire about lost appropriations.

We should be looking promptly to measures of defence; we should be developing the vast resources of our country, and erecting upon the ruins of our fortification bill a fabric of defence which will do honor to this Congress. Let us arm our fortifications, multiply our steam batteries, and in less than twelve months put upon the ocean, as our great maritime resources will enable us to do, a fleet capable of successfully contending with the naval power of France or of any other nation.

When Mr. CAMBRELENG had concluded—

Mr. REED rose and said: I feel embarrassed in rising to address the House on the present occasion. The subject is painful, but I am allowed no choice; and I proceed, without introduction, to state such facts as I deem important and relevant, concisely and plainly.

The President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, alludes to the loss of the fortification bill in the following words:

"Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the national Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other. This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation, inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive, in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been most usefully applied during the past season."

The complaint is somewhat indefinite, (said Mr. R.) as the bill referred to passed both Houses of Congress, but not in concurrence. I presume it was intended to make the charge against the Senate. Though respectful in form, it is a grave and weighty charge. Appropriations were not made. We did some things we ought not to have done, and left undone many things which we ought to have done. I hold the President himself deeply implicated, and will not therefore answer to his charge. But I will suppose the charge comes from the people of the United States, and then I hold myself bound to render an account of my stewardship to my constituents and country. I will consider the charge as made against the Government—the President, Senate, and House of Representatives. I plead not guilty, and mean to exculpate myself. I intend to do more—to criminate others, and fix upon them the guilt, so far as guilt there may be, of defeating the passage of the fortification bill. I charge the defeat of that bill to the President, or a majority of the House of Representatives of the last Congress, being administration men.

In examining this painful subject, I determine to bear testimony to the truth—to state what I saw, and heard, and know. I intend to express my opinion upon the subject frankly, firmly, and temperately.

The President, in his message at the opening of Congress, in December, 1834, sounded the war trumpet, and it did not give an uncertain sound. The following are his words:

"It is my conviction that the United States ought to insist on a prompt execution of the treaty; and, in case it be refused, or longer delayed, take redress in their own hands. After the delay, on the part of France, of a quarter of a century, in acknowledging these claims by treaty, it is not to be tolerated that another quarter of a century is to be wasted in negotiating about the payment. The laws of nations provide a remedy for such occasions. It is a well-settled principle of the international code, that where one nation owes another a liquidated debt, which it refuses or neglects to pay, the aggrieved party may seize on the property belonging to the other, its citizens, or subjects, sufficient to pay the debt, without giving just cause of war. This remedy has been repeatedly resorted to, and recently by France herself towards Portugal, under circumstances less unquestionable."

JAN. 27, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

The President's advice and recommendation, if not war direct, could not fail to result in war with France. What man believes we could have made reprisal, or seized upon a single ship of France, without producing war? A powerful nation may seize upon the property of a feeble and timid one, by way of reprisal, without resistance; but not so as to France. The message was a war message, and notified us to make the necessary preparation. But I desire to thank God our voices were not for war.

This message was referred to the appropriate committees. What was had upon the subject? What preparations and what appropriations did the committees propose for fortifications and for defence?

I hold the bill, called the fortification bill of the House of Representatives, in my hand. It proposed to appropriate for fortifications, in all, the sum of $439,000. The journal of the House states:

"Mr. Edward Everett moved to amend the bill by striking out these words, viz:

"For the preservation of Castle Island and repairs of Fort Independence, in addition to the balance of former appropriations, $8,000, and, in lieu thereof, insert the following, viz:

"For the preservation of Castle Island, and for repairing the fortifications on Castle Island, in Boston harbor, according to the plan adopted by the board of engineers on the 24th of March, 1834, in addition to the balance of former appropriations, $75,000."

That all the forces of the House of Representatives might be rallied, we had a "call of the House," and then the vote was taken by yeas and nays: for the amendment 87, against it 120. These yeas and nays are in the journal of the House of Representatives, page 225. Few administration men can be found among the yeas. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Polk,] and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs himself, who figured so much in the three million amendment, are among the nays. They and others would not consent, notwithstanding the threatening aspect of war, to appropriate $75,000 for the defence and protection of the harbor of Boston, and Boston itself, and the immense public property at the navy yard at Charlestown.

We of Massachusetts, and those who acted with us, were accused of extravagance and profusion for pursuing a course that would increase the expenditures, and render the administration unpopular. There was no predisposition to the three million appropriation at that time, or the money was intended for a very different object from that of the defence of Massachusetts and Maryland, &c.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McKim] moved to amend the bill by adding, "for the repair of Fort McHenry, at Baltimore, and putting the same in a proper state of defence, $50,000." The yeas and nays upon this amendment were—yeas 66, nays 129; and gentlemen voted as on the former amendment. The mover, though a good administration man, in the present case fared no better than others. Impartial injustice was dealt out to all propositions for amendment.

Again: Mr. Thompson moved an amendment, "viz: $44,000 for the protection of St. Augustine." For the amendment—yeas 67, nays 115. This happened on the 15th January, about 45 days before the memorable 3d of March, when $800,000 (in addition to the amendments of the Senate, doubling the appropriation of the House) was pronounced by the Secretary of State (Mr. Forsyth) to be a "pitiful sum."

Another motion was made by Mr. Parker, on the 19th January, to strike out "For a fort on Throgg's Neck, East river, New York, (in addition to a balance of former appropriations,) $30,000." The yeas and nays were—yeas 86, nays 113. The bill passed precisely as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. We in the minority (said Mr. R.) were not allowed to increase the amount a single dollar. The bill, having passed the House of Representatives, was sent to the Senate. How did the Senate treat the bill? Did they attempt to reduce the amount proposed by the House? No. And yet one not informed upon the subject might well be led to think so, from the complaints from various quarters that the Senate defeated the ordinary appropriations for fortifications. On the contrary, the Senate considered the bill of the House of Representatives as wholly inadequate and deficient, in not providing for the defence of the most important and defenceless parts of the country. Their amendments to the bill of the House of Representatives were essential to the defence of the country—so all-important, that I name them particularly, viz:

For Fort Delaware, instead of $70,000,
$150,000; being an addition of -	-	$80,000
For Fort Mifflin, &c. -	-	75,000
For Castle Island, &c. -	-	75,000
For defence of Maryland, -	-	100,000
For armament of fortifications, -	-	100,000
Amounting to -	-	$430,000

The bill was returned from the Senate with the above amendments; and, being so amended and returned to this House, it was absolutely within the power and control of this House. We had only to adopt the amendments, and the bill would have become a law, with the signature of the President. In that event, we should have added to our appropriation of - $439,000
The further sum of - - 430,000

----------------	---	------------------

All for fortifications, except $100,000 for armament for fortifications. By the Senate's amendment, several States were to be protected and fortified. But this House neglected and refused to pass the bill, and were therefore guilty of defeating the ordinary appropriation bill for fortifications, and ought honestly to acknowledge it, and justify themselves as far as they may be able.

The House of Representatives of the last Congress must be responsible for the consequences. I speak of the ordinary appropriations. The extraordinary—the three millions—I will consider by and by. The President very justly makes the distinction in his charge; and I intend to make it, and keep it distinctly in view, though the resolution we are considering proposes to inquire as to the cause of the failure of the ordinary appropriations only.

Although this bill was perfectly familiar to this House—our own child—we could not adopt it with the Senate's amendments. We took time to consider; in a session of 93 days, when there was no time to be lost. The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, that every dollar of appropriation should be scanned and scrutinized, that not a brick or stone should be laid upon our fortifications, unless it were absolutely required, and the cost counted. But the committee would not consent to appropriate for Massachusetts, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, &c. They reported amendments to the Senate's amendments, and the bill was reported to the House, with the amendments, on the 3d day of March; but the House finally agreed to

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 27, 1836.]

the amendments of the Senate. What next? At 8 o'clock on the 3d of March, the last night of the session, still holding and detaining the fortification bill in our possession, an amendment was proposed of an entire new section. It deserves not the name of amendment. It was a proposition, at that late hour, entirely to change a bill we had been examining for months. It was in the following words:

"And be it enacted, &c., That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided, Such expenditure should be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

This amendment was proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The appropriate Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs, and even Ways and Means, were all superseded. The three million amendment came upon us as sudden as a thunderbolt, without report, or estimate, or explanation. We were called upon to vote. There was no time for debate; and all we could do was to call the yeas and nays, and record our names upon the journal. Well might we be astonished; and our astonishment was not a little increased to see the very men, chairmen and all, who would not consent to add $175,000 to defend two of the principal cities in the Union in an exposed and defenceless state, ready in a moment to vote three millions. But so it was. And we Representatives, not intrusted with executive secrets, were left to wonder what could have produced so sudden and extraordinary a change. The tables were turned. Profusion and extravagance took the place of parsimony, and precipitation that of tardy delay. I repeat, without stopping to deliberate, for we had no time, we voted and adopted the three million section, and called it an amendment to the bill. It passed: Yeas 109, nays 77. We then sent the bill so amended, to the Senate, for their approval. And here, give me leave to say, it is all-important to the correct understanding of this controversy to inquire at what hour we sent it to the Senate. We sent the bill, to the Senate at eight o'clock P. M., four hours only before the close of the session, according to the opinions of some of the members of the House of Representatives. Well might the Senate be astonished. But we are told that "the Senate did not receive it in good temper."

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who just closed his speech, has tendered what he calls the true issue, and it is this: "Who defeated the three million appropriation?" intended, as he says, to provide for a contingent war. I must remind the gentleman that he has wholly forgotten the resolution we are discussing. The resolution proposes to inquire into the causes of the failure of the ordinary appropriation for fortifications. Surely the three millions was not ordinary, but most extraordinary. I will examine that subject before I sit down.

The President secretly and improperly interfered, to induce the House of Representatives to act "in accordance with the will of the Executive." We have just learned in this debate that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. POLK] was an agent to that effect, and enjoined secrecy upon some, at least, of those whom he informed that the President wished to obtain the three million appropriation. The then chairman (now Speaker) being called upon, has stated it from his chair publicly, and it has been publicly confirmed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. LEA.] The President, in so doing, greatly erred. There can be no justification for such secret interference and influence in this House. I saw we were swiftly swept along against the apparent current, by a strange undertow, the cause unseen and unknown. Those who would not vote for $50,000, or $75,000, in addition to the $439,000, were now ready for three millions; and ready to denounce any man as regardless of his country's danger and country's honor who would refuse to vote for that sum.

The proposition to annex a section to the appropriation bill for fortifications, of three millions, was most extraordinary. The President had not recommended it. The Committee of Ways and Means had not examined it. There was no report of any committee in favor of it; no estimate from any body; no specification; no precedent. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has just read a number of cases which he considers precedents—cases of general appropriations of money to a considerable amount. I have now no opportunity to examine the cases he has referred to. They seem all to be of ancient date, and most of them specific. The case mainly relied upon is that of two millions, in 1806, and which the gentleman informs us is "so important, comprehensive, and indefinite, and applies so directly to the case." If my recollection be correct, that appropriation was called "secret service money," put into the hands of the President to purchase Florida. There was, I think, at the time, loud complaint against that appropriation. It was answered, that the object of the appropriation must be kept a secret, or the purpose for which it was appropriated would be defeated. Does the gentleman view that case like the one we are considering? Was the three millions of last year, proposed to be added to the fortification bill, considered secret service money? I defy the gentleman to find a case like the three million proposition of last year. The history of our legislation does not furnish it, in my opinion—an appropriation of such vast amount, made without time for examination and without specification.

The three million amendment was first presented to the notice of Congress six hours only before the close of the session, without report, or time for examination or discussion. Sir, for such a precedent I am quite sure gentlemen will search in vain. Things ought not so to be. We are bound to examine and consider before we decide such important subjects, and vote away such large sums. We want time, and facts, and estimates, and specifications; and we ought not to act in the dark, under the influence or dictation of any man.

But my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] has discovered a reason and foundation for the three million appropriation to me as novel and extraordinary as was the proposition for the appropriation itself. It was, he says, founded on his resolution; which I will consider hereafter.

In presenting the resolution now under discussion, the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague, saw fit to indulge in a course of remarks wholly unlooked for, and of the most painful character.

The resolution is one of inquiry; its object is the ascertainment of facts; it asks a special committee. By the usage of this House, should the resolution pass, the mover would be appointed chairman. But my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] has seen fit to give a minute and detailed history of what he supposes facts, in the very case to be investigated. He has done it in a spirit and temper ill calculated to inspire confidence in his impartiality. Was it necessary, or expedient, or commendable, or justifiable, to use such language of violence and abuse towards Senators and the Senate of the United States?

The rule in what is called Jefferson's Manual, our book of rules, is as follows: "It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said upon the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses." This rule is not an empty form. How all-important to maintain kind and respectful feelings between two bodies, who must act in unison, or the operations of the Government must cease! With this rule before him, and with strong and reiterated professions of a desire to promote harmony between the different departments of the Government, my colleague has quoted in this debate the votes and speeches of Senators, and denounced the Senate with unmeasured severity, and thereby violated most palpably the rule above named, and set at naught all his professions in favor of harmony and a good understanding. His speech is a poor commentary upon his professions, and I listened to it with regret and pain.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

My colleague, throughout his speech, has had much to say about man-worship. I never heard him accused of that idolatry. But there is another kind of idolatry, of which, perhaps, some are in more danger—I mean the worship of—what my colleague was pleased to call, a few days since, in this House—our noble selves.

Next to being right, we all desire to be consistent. That desire is lawful and commendable; but we are in danger of putting the consistent before the right, and that is a sore evil under the sun.

My colleague, in his speech, in reference to the fortification bill, 1st, defended himself throughout. Of this I do not complain. I mean to imitate him. 2dly. He defended the majority of the House of Representatives, even when opposed to himself. 3dly. He defended the conduct of those who urged constitutional scruples in opposition to him, and his opinions, in relation to the hour of adjourning, and who broke up a quorum, and defeated the bill. But my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] is very indignant at two things: 1st. An expression used by a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who, after showing, in an able and masterly argument, the unconstitutionality, danger, and inexpediency, of voting for the section proposed by the House of Representatives, "adding the three millions," observed, "if the proposition were now before us, and the guns of the enemy were battering against the walls of the Capitol, I would not agree to it." And he immediately adds, "the people of this country have an interest and property, an inheritance, in this instrument, (the constitution,) against the value of which forty Capitals do not weigh the twentieth part of one poor scruple."

My colleague quoted the first sentence, and used language in reference to the quotation, and in reference to the great and distinguished man, the author of those remarks, which I will not repeat, wholly unjustifiable, and without foundation. But I stop not to eulogize or defend the distinguished individual referred to. He needs not my aid. I merely ask my colleague why he did not quote the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, and why he selected a single isolated sentence? I ask my colleague, if he had entertained the same opinions as did the Senator referred to, that the "three million section was unconstitutional, inexpedient, and of most dangerous tendency," whether he would have voted for it to save the Capitol or his own life?

The other thing that excited my colleague's hot displeasure was, a resolution sent by the Senate to the House of Representatives, on the 3d of March, as follows, viz:

"Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States."

And my colleague makes the following comment: "When that message was delivered, he must confess, if ever a feeling of shame and of indignation had filled his bosom, it was at that moment. He felt it as an insult to the immediate representatives of the people; and if it had been sent at a moment when the House yet existed, with the power to resent unprovoked insult, he verily believed that, imitating the example of our Congress in a somewhat similar case, during the revolutionary war, he should have moved that a message be sent by two members of the House to cast the Senate's message on their floor, and tell them that it was not the custom of the House to receive insolent messages. It was, perhaps, well that he had no opportunity to give vent to those feelings."

The above message was sent after anxious waiting in the Senate to hear from the House of Representatives. The conference committee had separated, and the Senate's committee had long before reported to the Senate, but nothing was heard from the House of Representatives. Was there just occasion for such a burst of indignation as my colleague describes, and which agitated his breast, and urged him to do that which, if done, must have dishonored both him and the House of Representatives? And yet he takes frequent occasion to complain of the Senate that they received the amendment of the House of Representatives in bad temper.

I was here, Mr. Speaker, upon that abasing and mortifying occasion. It was a painful night. Though subject to like passions as other men, I desire to be thankful that I was not on that occasion so filled with "anger and indignation." I felt humbled by the gross misconduct of some in this House. I saw things here that were wrong and wholly unjustifiable; and if I felt anger rising in my breast, that feeling was tempered, moderated, and repressed, by the high and responsible obligations of duty to my country. These obligations had an influence paramount to passion. I was for the fortification bill. I was for substance, and not form. I was not for war with the Senate, but for the defence of the country.

I beg for a moment to consider certain resolutions which are supposed to materially affect the present controversy: I refer to resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported to this House on the 27th of February, four days only before the close of the session. These were the war resolutions, the foundation of the three million appropriation.

On the 2d day of March, late in the day, the war resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs were brought before the House by a motion of the chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] to discharge the Committee of the Whole. This motion, as every body knows, was made to facilitate and hasten the adoption of those resolutions. The vote was taken by ayes and noes: Ayes 104, noes 92. The administration party were too strong; we were beaten. How did we vote? Was my colleague, then, in favor of passing resolutions as the foundation of war appropriations? No: he voted with us. But the committee were discharged, and the resolutions were brought before the House; and the journal states the House then proceeded to the consideration of the said reports, viz: the reports of the majority and the minority; and the resolutions recommended by the committee were read, as follows. I here read from the journal, page 496:

"1. Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th of July, 1831; and that this House will insist upon its execution as ratified by both Governments.

"2. Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Af-fares be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals on the commerce of France.

"3. Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France.

"Mr. John Quincy Adams, on the 27th February, ultimo, proposed to amend said resolutions, by striking out all thereof after the word Resolved, in the first resolution, and inserting the following:

"1. Resolved, That the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the Government of France, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, ought, in no event, to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States.

"2. Resolved, That if it be, in the opinion of the President of the United States, compatible with the honor and interest of the United States, during the interval until the next session of Congress, to resume the negotiations between the United States and France, he be requested so to do.

"3. Resolved, That no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time."

The resolution of my colleague was modified; the words "at all hazards" were stricken out, to make it entirely pacific, and leave not the semblance of a threat, to hazard nothing; and, so amended, it passed unanimously. I give the words of my colleague:

"This sentence, from which, with the general assent of the House, the words 'at all hazards' had been withdrawn, was finally approved by me; and every member present, two hundred and seventeen in number, answered, at the call of his name, ay.

"The resolution was in these words:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty with France of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on."

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has stated some conversation about this resolution, as a substitute for the resolutions of the committee, I trust I may be permitted to say a word in relation to myself. I took no part in the debate; but if my life had been at stake, I could hardly have felt more interest. The war resolutions were combated with argument and spirit. It was on that occasion that my colleague was said to have made his peace speech, when he declared he would have dodged the war question himself, and he approved the course of the Senate. I was delighted with it. It was peace, and not war. But the conflict was severe, and the House very nearly equally divided, and I feared war resolutions, by possibility, might pass; I went across the chamber to see the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. CAMBRELENG]; I proposed to him to take the resolution of Mr. ADAMS as amended, which we afterwards adopted. I observed, you may entirely fail. He asked if my side, or party, would vote for it. I replied I could answer but for one; I would vote for it. This resolution was adopted unanimously. But, judge what must be my astonishment, when I hear my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] say:

"He hoped he had shown that the section making the appropriation of three millions was introduced from absolute necessity, on the last day of the session, because it was in consequence of the unanimous vote of the day preceding. Was he now to be told that this and the other House must not appropriate money unless by recommendation from the Executive? Why, sir, the Executive has told us now that that appropriation was perfectly in accordance with his wishes. He again repeated, why was it that the House must be charged with man-worship and unconstitutional conspiracy, because they passed an appropriation of three millions for the defence of the country, at a time when imminent danger of war was urged, as resulting from that very resolution which but the night before passed by a unanimous vote? Because, forsooth, that appropriation had not been called for by the Executive, and yet because it was approved by the Executive."

Does my colleague mean to say that any body in the House of Representatives ever pretended that his harmless, peaceful resolution was the foundation of a war appropriation? Does he pretend, after all that passed, that any body ever said or thought that "imminent danger of war" resulted from his peaceful resolution? Had that been the fact, and had it been so understood, would he, or any man, pretend that a unanimous vote could have been obtained? Mr. Speaker, precisely the reverse was the fact in relation to myself. I believe it was so as to a majority, if not all of that House, excepting my colleague. I am quite sure it was so in reference to those with whom my colleague acted, called the peace party, the party opposed to executive recommendation, as to the dispute with France. We resolved that the treaty with France of 4th of July should be maintained, and its execution insisted upon. How? By war, or war measures? No. By negotiation. By explanation. By giving France an opportunity to see and feel that her honor is pledged to fulfil the treaty, and that we will continue to urge and insist upon its fulfilment.

It will be long remembered that my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] made a speech in the House of Representatives, I think on the 7th February, in reference to our difficulties with France, and a few days before the "war resolutions" I have been speaking of had been presented. That speech was considered an unjustifiable attack upon the Senate for their pacific course in relation to France, and was called a war speech. I was among those friends who believed, from various circumstances, that my colleague's views had been in some measure misunderstood; and I so represented it here and elsewhere. I found difficulty in understanding the phrase used in his speech, "dodging the question," as applied to the Senate, in a good sense; but I had the highest authority for so understanding it. In about one week afterwards, my colleague made a speech in this House, called "a peace speech," in which he approved the course the Senate had pursued in relation to France, and said he would "dodge the question himself." His pacific resolutions were in accordance with his peace speech. Are we now to be told that "imminent danger of war was urged as resulting from the resolution we adopted, and that the adoption of that resolution was good and sufficient cause for the three million appropriation?" I heard no such argument then. My colleague's various speeches and resolutions in relation to our dispute with France seem so contradictory, that I leave to his own genius and learning the labor of showing his consistency. I affirm, if the resolution contemplated war, or preparation for war, it was to the House of Representatives war in disguise.

And, again, my colleague says, referring to said third resolution: "The resolution was laid on the table at the motion of the chairman of the committee who had reported it, and who then, in my hearing, and in the hearing of all in the House who chose to hear him, gave notice that he should, in its stead, move an additional appropriation in the fortification bill then before the House. Whether he named the sum of three millions as that which he should propose, or not, I do not recollect. He had openly spoken in the House before, as contemplating a larger sum. Considering the contingent and possible danger against which it was to provide, I thought the sum certainly not too large."

I believe it because my colleague says so, and because the gentleman from New York declared it in his speech a few minutes ago. What was the mighty import of such a declaration, made by a disappointed chairman, defeated in his projects, and by the efficient aid of my colleague, too? He and his friends were defeated and disappointed. Peace prevailed over war. But the gentleman from New York threatened, as he retreated, to ask for additional appropriations, &c.; and this happened on the evening of the 2d of March, and that was notice of the three millions. I purposely, on this occasion, avoid going into a consideration of the value and importance of preparation for defence in time of peace. It does not appertain to this debate; but those who are now accused of neglect have steadily pursued that policy to a reasonable extent, and by so doing have subjected themselves to the reproaches of their present accusers.

But my colleague quotes the third resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as follows: "Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France;" and he says: "This was the resolution intended to sustain at once the spirit of the President's recommendations, and the sincerity of the resolution just adopted by the House." I perfectly concur with him that the above resolution was intended to sustain the recommendations of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but, be it remembered, those resolutions were virtually rejected, and my colleague's peace resolution substituted. I deny that the three million appropriation ever was intended to sustain the sincerity of the resolution adopted. Never—never. I again refer to the resolutions I have read—Foreign Affairs, and my colleague's substitute:

Third resolution of Foreign Affairs.

"Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

Mr. Adams's substitute for the third resolution.

"Resolved, That no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time."

According to my recollection, the speeches were more at variance, if possible, than the resolutions themselves.

Let us for a moment examine the defence of those who professed to have constitutional scruples as to the time of the termination of Congress; and here I read my colleague's argument, as follows, viz:

"He was not one of those who believed that the session ended at midnight. In his opinion, the two years' duration of Congress was from the time of day at which the House commenced its session—say the hour of noon on the 4th of March. He believed that to be the true construction of the constitutional term of two years; but it was a constitutional question, and it was not for him to judge of the motives of men who conscientiously believed that the period of their political existence had expired. When the Cumberland road bill passed, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and the vote was ninety-four to eighty, making one hundred and seventy-four votes. Here was a quorum voting, which showed that the House, at 12 o'clock, was doing business; but in ten minutes after that, no quorum could be found—not in consequence of there not being members present, but in consequence of their conscientious scruples. He recollected the instance of a gentleman from Georgia, [MR. GILMER,] a man as conscientious and as intelligent as any member of that or the present House, who, upon being called, refused to answer, and gave as his reason that he was no longer a representative of the people, and, immediately after the vote was taken, went out of the House at that door, and never returned. It was not therefore the want of a sufficient number of members present, but from the conscientious conviction of so large a number of the members, as reduced the remainder to less than a quorum, that they had no right to vote on any thing in the House. After that took place, the committee of conference returned to the House, but no report was made; and what was the reason? Because there was no House. The roll was called, and no quorum was to be found.

"He said that he did not consider that the constitutional term of two years, assigned to the members of the House of Representatives, and the term of four years, during which the President holds his office, commence or expire at midnight. The services of two and of four years commenced running from the time when the members of the first Congress assembled to commence the operations of this Government under the constitution of the United States, which was on the 4th of March, 1789, at noon. The two years from that time expired, not on the 3d of March, 1791, at midnight, but on the 4th of March, at noon. The expiration of a year is not from noon to midnight, but from noon to noon. It is so, astronomically, by the law of nature. The time at which a day shall commence and terminate is a matter altogether arbitrary and conventional. Some nations have, in their civil computation, commenced the day at sunrise, and some at sunset—some at midnight, and some at noon. Astronomers and navigators always reckon the day from noon to noon; and why should not the constitutional computation of time follow the same law, which is the law of nature? The principle, once established, could be attended with no sort of inconvenience; whereas the computation from noon to midnight must be subjected once every two years to a solution of continuity for twelve hours by the non-existence of a House of Representatives, and once in every four years to an interregnum or vacancy in the office of President of the United States. Emergencies might easily be foreseen, perhaps even precontrived, in which either of those events would be attended with very great public inconvenience. Monarchical Governments are always guarded with the utmost possible care against every solution of continuity: their kings never die. It would be a radical defect in every republican Government not to be invested with the same official immortality—the office always filled, however frequently the individual incumbent may be changed. It was therefore my opinion that the House might have sat transacting business till noon of the 4th of March; and, accordingly, my name will be found and recorded on every taking of the yeas and nays until the adjournment, after it was announced that the Senate had adjourned.

"Mr. A. said that was his opinion then, and he had then expressed it to the House; but it was not the opinion of a large number of members of the House. The members were in the House, ready to vote, but in their opinion the time had passed. Now, whatever was doing at that time in the House might have been known to every member of the Senate, if they had seen fit to make the inquiry. It was perfectly known that after that time no quorum of the House could be found. No vote was taken. The House was de facto dead."

I will only add, that the usage and construction as to the time of the expiration of office, I believe, have been uniform; that it has happened very frequently, I know, that Congress have been in session hours after 12 o'clock, the 3d of March, and at the expiration of their respective terms of office; and so of all our Presidents. General Washington, as I have been informed, and believe, at the expiration of his first term of four years, arose, after he had been in bed, at 2 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March, and signed many bills, which, in consequence of his signing, became laws, affecting life and property. Have we not all heard of the midnight judges, &c. of the elder Adams? Mr. Jefferson did the same. Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe, and my colleague himself, unless I greatly misremember, imitated the example of all his predecessors. Who ever seriously called it in question until the 3d of March, 1835, when the appropriation for fortifications was before us, and the three millions could not pass the Senate?

Yet, after presenting the above unanswerable argument in defence of himself, as well as others, my colleague is at no loss to find a perfect apology for those who violated the constitution and their duty, and defeated the bill. My colleague says, after the return of the committee of conference, "there was no House—not for the want of numbers;" the roll was called, and no quorum. Why? Because a number refused to answer. He states "a large number were ready to vote, but the time had passed; and it might have been known to every member of the Senate, if they had seen fit to make the inquiry." Again: "the House was de facto dead." But my colleague has himself shown, conclusively, it was not dead de jure. It was rightfully and constitutionally alive, and the Senate were bound so to consider it, and govern themselves accordingly. They did so act; and their notice and attention to the House, after they chose to consider themselves dead, though present and noisy, seems to have incurred the peculiar displeasure of my colleague and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] who has just resumed his seat.

But Mr. Gilmer, of Georgia, refused to vote, on account of conscientious scruples. His case, I believe, has been named by every speaker on this subject. I knew Mr. Gilmer, in this House, for a number of years. I believe he is a pure, honest, and honorable man. He entertained, we thought, many singular opinions of the constitution, and he widely differed from us in its construction. Mr. Gilmer had scruples; and what did he do? Arose, declined acting, and left the House, and has never since returned. The very praise and commendation bestowed on Mr. Gilmer is censure to those who entertained the same doubts, and yet remained here to vote, or not to vote, as circumstances made the constitution more or less dear in their estimation. But Mr. Gilmer is the standing witness of honest scruples. "Exceptio probat regulam." Where were the other Mr. Gilmers, or those who trod in his steps? The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] was so pressed with conscientious scruples that he refused to report and act upon the fortification bill; but his conscience was less scrupulous as to other matters, and he staid to vote and act, and did vote and act, upon other subjects before the House, long after he refused to act upon the fortification bill. Let him reconcile such inconsistency.

The House was reduced, in a short time, by scruples, from 174 to 111, and this appears on the yeas and nays; and, by looking at the names on the yeas and nays at the two different periods, those "noisy dead men" my colleague speaks of may be known as absentees, though present.

I most solemnly aver to my constituents and country that I was in favor of the fortification bill; that I thought the original bill insufficient, and tried to increase it; that I voted against the three million amendment with pain, because I wished a liberal specific appropriation; but I believed the three million section a violation of the spirit of our free Government, and of dangerous tendency. I well remember a conversation on that night with a worthy member, not now here. He asked me why I did not vote for the three millions? I replied, that three millions was a great sum; the use to be made of it was not specified, &c. He answered, General Jackson will not spend a dollar of it, &c. I then rejoined, if that be so, it ought not to be voted; you have confidence in the President, which I have not; but if three millions may be so voted without specification, twenty millions may be so voted; or words to that effect. It may not be safe, even in your opinion, hereafter to trust it with other Presidents. It is a dangerous and unsafe precedent, and ought not to pass.

I had been educated to believe that the President of the United States had not too much power. I had heard much said of the dangerous tendency of presidential power, and of the increase of that power. But I never witnessed so much evidence of the truth of that democratic apprehension as on the night of the 3d of March, 1835. I declare most solemnly, that, in my opinion, (and I saw those who were counted and who were not,) there was a quorum until we adjourned. I believe I had the honor to make some of the last remarks upon a motion to call the House. I then stated that there was a quorum present, and it was well known to all; that when gentlemen chose to be counted, they were present; and when they chose not to be counted, they retreated or refused to vote; that the most important business of the session yet remained undone, &c.

Much has been said by my colleague and others in regard to a vote of the Senate to adhere against the amendment proposing the three millions. It is said that that vote of adherence was contrary to all parliamentary usage, and was the cause of all the evils we experienced on the 3d of March, and the loss of the bill itself. The gentleman who has just sat down [Mr. CAMBRELENG] has made the same complaint.

As gentlemen speak with confidence, I will refer them to a case in point, and precisely the reverse of what they suppose the parliamentary usage; and I trust the authority will not be questioned by my colleague, or the gentleman from New York. The case I refer to is found in the journal of the Senate, 19th Congress, 1st session, pages 306 and 307. Here Mr. REED read the case. [Mr. ADAMS called aloud to know the book and page.] The House of Representatives and Senate disagreed as to a judiciary bill, and "Mr. Van Buren, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, drew up a report, which concludes with resolving not to insist, but adhere, and but twelve dissented; and the report states, it is expressly within the rules, and best to prevent the unprofitable formality of a conference at this advanced period of the session." Mark, sir, this happened fourteen days before the close of the session. In the case of the fortification bill, the Senate had determined not to agree to the three millions section, and a few hours only must close the session.

Mr. Cambreleng then moved that the House insist on said amendment; which motion was agreed to. The Senate then voted to adhere as to the three millions. A motion was again made in the House of Representatives to recede, and give up the three millions. We voted nearly as before; my colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] and other colleagues, and myself, voting to recede: Ayes 88, noes 107. A conference with the Senate was then proposed and passed, and conferees appointed. The conferees of the House and Senate agreed upon a compromise. The bill was to pass with all amendments, and, instead of $3,000,000 in gross, it was agreed to add $800,000, and make it specific, viz: $300,000 for arming the fortifications, and $500,000 for repairs and equipment of ships of war. And my colleague finds fault even with this compromise, and says: "The appropriation was made positive, instead of being contingent upon a necessity not certain to come; and it was confined to two objects of permanent ordinary appropriation, still leaving the possible contingent danger unprovided for." I confess I am wholly at a loss to know what my colleague did desire. I can see one thing very distinctly—that he does not desire to agree with the Senate.

The appropriation bill, as agreed upon by the committee of conference, might have passed before or after the hour of 12 o'clock. I have no doubt the conferees returned before half past 11. I have every reason to believe it. It might have passed after 12 o'clock, but for the improper interposition of a few members of this House, the friends of the Executive.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

The bill was then returned to the House, and "a motion was made by Mr. Gholson that the House recede from its amendment, proposing to insert an additional section, as the second section of the bill, containing an appropriation of $3,000,000." On this question there were yeas 87, nays 110. All my colleagues, including Mr. A., voted to recede and strike out the $3,000,000, upon the success of which one might suppose some men thought the salvation of the country depended.

The report of the committee of conference was delayed by the chairman. After much delay, (the precise period I cannot state,) Mr. Lewis, another member of the committee, made the report; but objections were made that there was no quorum, and therefore it could not be adopted. The business was intentionally delayed, and the little time we had, wasted. Tellers were appointed; Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Lewis, on counting, found there was not a quorum; not that a quorum was not present, but a sufficient number took care to be out of the way to defeat a quorum. And my colleague says we had not the power of Joshua of old, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still. We wanted no such power, but the power to move in the discharge of duty.

I have overlooked one fact of some importance; it is this: "Mr. Jarvis moved the following resolution, viz: 'Resolved, That the hour having arrived when the term for which this House was elected has expired, we do now adjourn.' The said resolution was read, when the Speaker decided that it was not in order, to offer it at this time, unless by unanimous consent, or a suspension of the rules; but suggested that the object aimed to be attained by the resolution could be accomplished by a motion that the House do adjourn. Mr. Jones, of Georgia, then, for the purpose of trying the question, and ascertaining whether the House thinks itself authorized to continue in session, and to transact business after 12 o'clock at night on the 3d day of March, moved that the House do adjourn. And the question being put, it was decided in the negative." This negative is a negative pregnant, affirming that we did think ourselves authorized to do business after 12 o'clock; thereby setting the seal of our deliberate vote to our own condemnation. But remember, the memorable report of the committee of conference had not then been made, though it should have been done, and there was a press of business that many members were desirous of transacting. The main pressure of constitutional scruples was upon the fortification bill, without the three million amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the fortification bill was reported to the House of Representatives January 2d, and passed the House January 21st, fifty-two days from the commencement of the session. We took fifty-two days out of the ninety-three to prepare the bill. It was then sent to the Senate, and returned February 24th, after thirty-four days, and seven days before the close of the session.

Our bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, contained appropriations for fortifications, - - - - - $439,000

Senate's amendments, as finally agreed, - - - - - 430,000

Had we agreed to those amendments without adding a section of three millions, it would have passed without dispute.

By the conference, it was further agreed to add $300,000 for arming the fortifications, and $500,000 for repairs and equipment of ships of war, making - - - - - 800,000

$1,669,000

In all, one million six hundred and sixty-nine thousand dollars; a respectable sum; very respectable, compared with $439,000; and one would think, of all others, a majority of the House of Representatives ought not to complain.

Mr. Speaker, I perceived, before the hour of twelve o'clock on the 3d of March, a determination not to pass the bill. The report of the conference was held back. The bill was delayed. The chairman would not report, but voted, and spoke, and acted upon other business. Mr. Lewis at last reported the bill, and then constitutional scruples were interposed as to the hour and minute, and gentlemen would not answer when called. I believe the bill (the motives that influenced gentlemen I leave to themselves) was defeated intentionally by those who were known and called administration men.

Why did they, under various pretences, detain and defeat the whole bill? No change had taken place in our relations with France. There was no cause for change in appropriation, unless the secret will of the Executive produced that change. The House of Representatives acted a most singular and inconsistent part. They could not be induced to add a dollar to their bill appropriating $439,000, until March 3d in the evening, and then they insisted upon adding three millions, and it must be that or nothing. My colleagues and myself voted for all amendments and all increase, except the three millions, and would gladly have added the $800,000. But it must be three millions in addition, or the whole bill must be destroyed. It was destroyed. I could not vote for three millions. It was large in amount, indefinite in its object—for military and naval service, generally, under the direction of the President. The President's message was a war message. He had frequently, as far as I know, with every body, spoken of his desire for reprisal and war; and he knows how to accomplish his purposes better than any other man. I feared the consequences of putting the money in his hand.

I deeply lamented the failure of the fortification bill. Though I have long been a member of the House of Representatives, I never witnessed there such strange proceedings as on the 3d of March, in regard to the fortification bill. If the President believed the public good actually required an appropriation of three millions, which he informs us in his message "was inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive," he ought to have so informed us—not privately, to a few, but publicly—and to have presented the reasons for his views, that we might judge and act as responsible, free, and independent representatives of a free people. But three millions was "inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive;" a less sum was not in accordance with his views. And when a less sum was agreed upon by the committee of conference, and the chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had returned to this House to make report of the result, (as he has just informed us in his speech,) he met in this House Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State, who inquired whether the committee of conference had agreed; and when informed that a compromise had taken place, and that $800,000 had been agreed upon instead of the three millions, Mr. Forsyth pronounced it a pitiful sum. It will be understood that the President and his cabinet sit in a room appropriated for the purpose in the Capitol, during the last night of the session, to facilitate the business. The Secretary of State sits at the right hand of the President, as an adviser. He had just left the room, and might well be presumed to know and express the will of the Executive. It was not in accordance with the will of the Executive; and that was well understood by the chairman, by the remarks of the Secretary of State, if he heard nothing more; and he, and others who acted with him, seemed most suddenly to lose all interest in the bill. It was determined that the bill, as finally agreed upon by the committee of conference, should not pass the House; that, as the Senate had refused to agree to the "three million amendment" proposed by the House, the loss of the whole bill, including ordinary appropriations for fortifications, should be charged to that body. This decision came with a weight and energy not to be withstood. The House would not pass a bill, the provisions of which the President's first Secretary had just pronounced pitiful. Then came the last scene—delay, constitutional scruples, refusal to vote, threats against the Senate, &c. &c.; and so perished the fortification bill in the House of Representatives.

As soon as this debate shall have been closed, (I hope and trust others who were present will not fail to express their opinions,) I am desirous of attending to the appropriation bills and other important business before the House. I trust some good may result from the evil of which there is so loud complaint; that we may not hereafter neglect the important business under our charge to the last few disputed hours of the session, when there may be neither time nor means to perform such duties with fidelity and sound discretion; when it may be in the power of a few, even a single individual, to defeat the most important measure.

I have always considered the fortification bill, with the three million amendment proposed, as a subject of vast importance, as involving more or less the question of peace or war—a question of vital importance to those whom I have the honor to represent. Since the President, in his annual message to Congress, has seen fit to complain of the loss of that bill; since the administration presses and administration men reiterate the complaint; since my colleague has seen fit to bring the subject before this House by a resolution and speech, I have felt bound to vindicate my own conduct, and the conduct of those with whom I had the honor to agree and act, and present the case to this House and the people, and especially to my constituents, to whom, without distinction of party, I am under obligations I shall never be able to cancel. I feel and acknowledge the weight of those obligations, and I trust, when my conduct shall be understood, their justice and candor will acquit me of negligence or want of fidelity in the discharge of my duty.

When Mr. REED had concluded his remarks,

Mr. HARDIN took the floor, and moved an adjournment.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28.

GRANT OF THE HALL.

Mr. McKENNAN asked the consent of the House to present a resolution, granting the use of the hall of Representatives to the Historical Society, on Saturday evening next, for the purpose of holding a meeting of said society. Mr. McK. said it was understood that the Secretary of War would deliver an address on the occasion.

Objection being made, Mr. McKENNAN moved to suspend the rule; which was agreed to—114 to 42.

Mr. McKENNAN then submitted the resolution indicated in his motion.

The SPEAKER said he had received a communication from a member of the Historical Society, making a request similar to the proposition before the House, which, if permitted, he would present at that time.

It was objected to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. HAWES rose in opposition to it.

Mr. BOND inquired whether it was in order to discuss the resolution.

The CHAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HAWES said he had always given his vote against every proposition granting the use of this hall, which was built with the people's money, and for the exclusive use of their Representatives, for the purpose of holding meetings of certain societies. He should continue to oppose these indirect inroads upon the public Treasury. He understood the object of the members of these societies, in asking permission to hold their meetings in this hall. It was to save their own pockets. There was another building in this city, which was peculiarly suited for such meetings; but, by procuring permission to use this hall, two or three hundred dollars were taken from the public Treasury on every evening of such meeting, to pay for candles, wood, &c., which ought to come out of the pockets of the members of these societies. If it was an object of those gentlemen to save this expense, it was also his right and duty to object that it should be paid out of the public Treasury. It was perhaps a small matter; but if the House yielded to these applications for the use of the hall, they might expect, after a while, an application from a dancing society. He was opposed to granting this privilege to temperance, colonization, abolition, or historical societies. He considered them all upon a par. He concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were not ordered.

The resolution was then agreed to.

LAST YEAR'S FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of the present session as relates to the failure, at the last session of Congress, of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into, and report to the House, the causes and circumstances of the failure of the bill.

The question still being on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words "with power to send for persons and papers"—

Mr. HARDIN rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it was either my good or ill fortune (for, at this time, I know not in which point of view to consider it) to obtain the floor last evening. To have consulted my own feelings and wishes on the subject, I ought instantly to have proceeded with what I had to say; it was late, and, to accommodate some gentlemen around me, I moved for the House to adjourn; which motion was agreed to. Gentlemen in more remote parts of the hall voted for it, as a favor accorded to me. I owe, and now tender to them, my most profound acknowledgments for their kindness manifested on that occasion.

Sir, the time, manner of presenting, and the subject-matter of the resolution now under consideration, seem to be a phenomenon in legislation. To review our proceedings for some days past is neither pleasant nor instructive: they contain nothing to feed our pride, flatter our vanity, or redound to the honor of this House; there is something in them so strange, so unaccountable to an ordinary observer, nevertheless so much in character with some of the leading members of the administration party in this House, that I hope to be indulged until I recapitulate them.

The appropriation bills have been reported to this House, and, put them all together, amount to something like ten millions more than for the same objects was appropriated last year, and near that amount more than an average year since the commencement of the administration of General Jackson. This excess may be considered by this House as a war measure, and will be so viewed by the nation and the world.

These bills were, by an order of the House, at the instance of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made the special order of each day until they are all disposed of. The first bill taken up was that appropriating money for the navy; the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that bill. A war speech was made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in his usual bustling, swelling manner. Several other speeches followed; and, towards evening, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BURN] commenced a warm, animated, and eloquent, speech in favor of the bill, in a high-tone war spirit. The speech was about half finished when the gentleman gave place for a motion for the committee to rise, as it was late in the evening. Next day, the whole House came prepared to enter with spirit into the discussion of our relations with France, and all the measures which were about to be taken connected therewith. The party of the little Kinderhook hero seemed brimful of fight. We had been denounced, the evening before, by the gentleman from North Carolina, as the French party, which he declared now existed in this nation. The imputation we considered as unmerited, and intended to vindicate ourselves from so foul an accusation. Never did this House assemble in a higher state of excitement than was manifested on the next day: it was expected that the debate would progress with increased animation, and many a parliamentary lance would be hurled, broken, and shivered into pieces. The galleries were crowded at an early hour. When the time arrived for the House again to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the navy bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] moved to dispense with the orders of the day, to take up the bill to relieve the sufferers by fire in New York. The motion prevailed; the orders of the day were dispensed with; the navy bill was laid down, and the bill to relieve the sufferers by fire in New York taken up. Some progress was made in that bill; but, before it was finished—nay, hardly commenced—the House adjourned. The next day, the House was not permitted to begin where it had stopped. No; what, then, was the course of business? The same gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG],—who is the leader of the Jackson-Van Buren party in this House, or, if not the leader, is put in a position by the Speaker to lead—got up, addressed the House, and then read or alluded to a paragraph in a newspaper, which, he said, had attacked him personally; as if this House had any thing to do with the newspaper controversies of the honorable gentleman. As usual, he pompously commenced a vindication of himself; but, before he had uttered more than one or two sentences, wound up by saying that the source from which the alleged slander came was beneath his notice and unworthy of him. I beg the House not to forget that, at the same time, he intimated that the subject referred to in the paper would be brought before the House in another shape by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS], who instantly took the floor with the resolution now under debate in his hand, already cut out and made up to order. The rules of the House were again dispensed with, the gentleman from New York voting for it, and the present resolution was offered. I will not say that there was a secret understanding between those two gentlemen that the resolution should be brought before the House in this very extraordinary and unprecedented manner. The reason I will not aver that to be the fact is, because I do not know it; yet, there seemed to me to be something inexplicable in the matter, if there was no such understanding. Why did he rise, allude to the paragraph, and stop short, without proceeding with his vindication? He was too well acquainted with the rules of this House not to know that he was out of order. I have asked, and again repeat it, why, after he had commenced his defence, did he stop? and why did he intimate that the gentleman from Massachusetts would bring that subject before the House in another form? They must have conferred together, and the whole was a manoeuvre to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to exhibit his resolution; which I consider an indictment, with one count against the members in this House who voted against the three million appropriation last session, another count against the majority in the Senate; but these two counts are only nominal; the real intent and meaning of the whole is to reach two of the honorable Senators, [Messrs. WHITE and WEBSTER,] who are now before the people as candidates for the presidency. It looks like a Van Buren trick; the hand of the magician is surely in this whole matter. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is capable of blushing or feeling one sensation of shame, that blush or sensation ought to be exhibited upon the present occasion. I call upon him to review his past life, the high and dignified offices he has filled, during a space of fifty years, with so much credit to himself and honor to the nation; and now but to behold his present fallen condition—the instrument of a vile intrigue. Self-debasement and degradation is a fatality which frequently awaits the inordinate ambition of an old man—that ambition which outlives his faculties.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will pardon me for this short digression. I will proceed with the history of this resolution, and its progress in the House up to the present time. The gentleman from Massachusetts, in support of it, addressed the House for nearly three hours, in a most elaborate speech, alike famous for its length, violence, and vituperation of his former political friends; filled to overflowing with the bitterest invective. Some of his remarks I intend to notice hereafter. He was followed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who addressed the House at length on the opposite side; and who, in his speech, exhibited great industry, research, and talents. But the ability he displayed, although very great, did not so much attract my admiration as his bold and manly bearing in delivering his sentiments. He forcibly reminded me of what that stern republican Roman said: that

Is worth a whole eternity in bondage."

When the gentleman from Virginia resumed his seat, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] with great pomp and parade, took the floor, and announced what he intended to do when he should address the House. He said it was too late to proceed that evening; but, before he moved an adjournment, with great arrogance declared he would not reply to the gentleman from Virginia; that he intended to encounter a champion more worthy of his steel—alluding to Mr. WEBSTER, of the Senate. I admired his courage; and felicitated myself that my eyes, at least once in my life, would be gratified by a sight of the battle of giants. There was something to command my admiration in his high resolves; it was a laudable ambition, even if he perished in the conflict. I love to see men matched fairly: let footman fight with footman, squire with squire, knight couch the lance and spur the fiery steed against knight: Fingal never left his rock and mixed in the strife of heroes, until Lathmon was in the field. When the gentleman took the floor on yesterday, I expected efforts commensurate with the undertaking; I listened to hear Jupiter

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

thundering from Olympus's cloudy tops, or, if not the thunder of Jove, at least the music of the spheres. But was there ever man so disappointed! Instead of the grandeur, magnificence, and sublimity, of thunder rolling along and shaking the earth from pole to pole, my ears were grated with the miserable sounds of a wretched performer on a Jew's harp! If an enlightened stranger were to visit this city during the sitting of Congress, and attend to the debates in the Senate and here, how this House would suffer in the comparison! If he should chance to hear the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate [Mr. WEBSTER] developing, in his usual lucid manner, complicated questions of finance, and unfolding the almost exhaustless, although somewhat hidden, resources of this nation; and, after that, come into this hall, and hear the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on the same subject; whether the efforts of the great moneyed officer of this House would most excite his laughter or contempt, I cannot tell: the sublime and ludicrous are so nearly allied. His feelings would be not unlike those of an amateur of the great and awful workings of nature, who had just been a spectator of Vesuvius or Etna in the appalling grandeur of a tremendous eruption, and then turning on the plain below, and seeing a mole or ant-hill emitting a pale smoke, and occasionally a feeble and sickly blaze.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of this House, or the Legislature of Kentucky, for nearly twenty-five years. I do not profess to have an intimate acquaintance with the rules and regulations which govern, or rather ought to govern, parliamentary bodies; yet I do profess to know enough of the order of proceeding as will enable me to do, and understand how to transact, the business confided to me either by my constituents or this House. I never made more of the rules my study than was needful for the doing of business. My ambitious aspirations have never been directed towards the Speaker's chair. I cannot give in to the modern doctrine, that, if the force of party, or the desire to propitiate the White House, should take a man from amongst us who is not above the mediocrity of this House, and make him Speaker, he thereby becomes one of the wise men of this land: it is the man who is to do honor to the chair, and not the chair to do honor to the man; if he does not fill it, his littleness, by his elevation, only becomes more visible and striking. If the same man, when in the chair, should select a man below the mediocrity of this House, and put him at the head of the most important committee, I am equally disinclined to believe that he thereby becomes "a very Daniel of a man." Sir, since Elijah went to heaven in a chariot of fire, and cast his mantle on Elisha, and he thereby became a prophet, God has not vouchsafed for any other man on this earth to be thus gifted.

Mr. Speaker, I declare to this House that such a resolution as the present I never before saw. Does it propose any thing for the action of this House? I answer, no. Does it present any thing for the action of the Senate? It does not. We are to raise a committee in this House to inquire and report why a certain bill, which was before Congress at the last session, did not pass. Let the committee report as it may, no action of this House can be based thereon or grow out of it. Can we impeach the members of the Senate, or of the last House of Representatives, who voted against the three million appropriation? Every man in this House knows we cannot.

One of the main objects of this resolution is to raise the committee. Will that committee examine witnesses? No. The gentleman from Massachusetts will draught a report, based upon his distorted view of the transaction; for I well know the part he took in it last session.

It will be filled with bitter denunciations of his former political friends and associates, to conciliate the opposite party, and make his peace at the palace. I have no doubt the report will not exhibit any one fact exactly as it took place: to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is far from the object of the gentleman concerned in this matter. A war is to be made on the Senators, to cheapen and lessen their standing with the people of the United States. Messrs. WEBSTER and WHITE are to be assailed without mercy in the report, and food furnished for all the administration presses in the Union, next summer, to abuse those who voted against the appropriation in either House. I ask, does it become the dignity of this august assembly, the wisest and freest on earth, to degrade itself for such a vile purpose—the inglorious one of becoming panders to collect and imbody slander for the office-holders and office-hunters, some of whom are now feeding, and others expect shortly to feed, upon "the spoils" of this nation, as if we were a conquered enemy; and who are the only self-styled, self-created democracy of the country—a word justly dear to a republican, and only used, in these degenerate days, by designing knaves, to flatter and deceive the people?

I boldly and fearlessly pronounce the resolution to be unparliamentary, unprecedented, and disgraceful to those concerned in it. No man can misunderstand its object: it is an inquisition of entitling for Van Buren. If, Mr. Speaker, I had no other reasons than those I have this moment assigned, I would vote against the resolution. If the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to cut a somerset, let him do it as a clown in the pit: do not give him a spring-plank to leap from; I want to see him turn a somerset as a ground, not a lofty tumbler: he is not unaccustomed to these things; he has frequently done it before, without the aid of a committee, and let him do it again.

I will endeavor now to give a brief and rapid sketch of the history of the fortification bill, as it is called, and of the three million appropriation attached to it, by way of amendment, in the last stages of the progress of the bill.

The fortification bill was reported to this House by the proper committee; and, after remaining here some fifty days, it passed, and was sent to the Senate for the action of that body. The appropriations in the bill, at that time, amounted to $559,000; this being the sum then deemed sufficient by the Department of War. The bill was sent to the Senate, and there met the prompt attention of that body. It passed the Senate with amendments making additional appropriations to the fortifications of the country to the amount of $430,000; making $989,000. On the last day of the session, the bill, as amended, came from the Senate for the concurrence of this House in the Senate's amendments. If the friends of the administration only wanted the fortification bill, all they had to do was to agree to the amendments of the Senate. It contained $430,000 more than was asked for originally by the President and War Department, and more than the usual and customary annual appropriations for the same objects. The annual appropriations for fortifications since the war amount, each year, to these sums:

But on the last day of the session, and about sunset on that day, did the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] move to agree to the Senate's amendments, with an amendment; which amendment contained the famous three million appropriation.

Had the President sent us any communication on the subject? No. Had we heard that the War Department wanted it? No. Some few favorites, it seems, had been so informed; but they kept it a profound secret. Why did they not communicate it to the House, if it was an executive measure? If General Jackson desired the money, for the purposes of carrying on the Government, why not say so? He has never heretofore been backward in telling us what he wished done. Did he want the money, and yet not dare "to assume the responsibility" of asking for it? Upon all these subjects of information we were left in the dark. The Executive of this and every other Government informs the legislative department what amount of money is necessary to carry on the Government; and the legislative department is never in fault, until they refuse to appropriate the money after it is demanded.

The appropriation of the three millions was asked by the gentleman from New York too late for any of us to make inquiry of the President, or the War Department, as to the fitness and propriety of the measure; and, if we had made the inquiry, it is evident no information would have been given; or why did the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. POLK] keep it a secret, and request some few others, who knew that the President wanted the money, not to divulge it? Surely, the leaders of the administration party intended to sport with and mock the House.

Mr. Speaker, if there had been no other cause than the want of time and of information on the subject, we did right to vote against the three million appropriation. I, for one, will never give away the money of my constituents, unless I know the why and wherefore it is asked and demanded.

About dark, on the last day of the session, the bill went back from this House to the Senate, for the concurrence of that body to the three million appropriation. The Senators had no information of any kind on the subject, either official or informal; they had no time for investigation; they must either vote the money instantly, without light or knowledge on the subject, or reject the appropriation and disagree to our amendment. They, as became sages and patriots, chose the latter alternative: they acted with becoming dignity and manly independence, in true character with themselves. The bill came here with the disagreement of the Senate to our amendment; we insisted, and sent it back to the Senate: the Senate adhered to their disagreement; we again insisted, and asked a committee of conference; and a committee was accordingly appointed. The Senate agreed to the conference, and appointed a committee on their part. The conferees met, and agreed on reducing the three millions to eight hundred thousand dollars; thus making the whole bill contain appropriations to the amount of $1,789,000. After the conferees had agreed, the chairman of the committee on the part of this House [Mr. CAMBRELENG] refused to report to the House, and the whole bill was thereby finally lost.

Mr. Speaker, after this short history of the origin and progress of the bill through both Houses, the next inquiry will be, why was the bill lost? and, if there be blame and cause of censure any where, who is in fault?

This part of the inquiry has been somewhat anticipated by what I have already said. I maintain the proposition, that those in this House who voted against the three million appropriation are not to blame, nor can any censure be alleged against the Senate. The administration party had a decided majority in this House, and the complete and entire control of the standing committees; they could bring forward a measure when they pleased, or keep it back as long as they pleased. Then, I ask, nay, demand, why did they not bring forward the proposition for the three million appropriation sooner? Our relations with France were then in about the same situation they had been for some weeks before; no change; no recent information had been received on the subject; there is nothing in the whole matter to justify the withholding the demand for the appropriation to so late a period; and, if it was really lost for want of time, who are answerable for it? The answer is obvious. Those in power, and whose business it was to bring forward the proposition. This House and the Senate acted on the subject with unusual promptitude and despatch.

The gentleman from New York has said that the hour of 12 o'clock had arrived before the committee of conference met, and that he believed the House dissolved by the constitution at 12 o'clock. If this was his opinion, why then meet at all? When he was called on for a report from the committee of conference, he gave this constitutional opinion as one of the reasons why he would not report, which reads in these words:

"Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of the conferees on the part of this House, then rose and stated that he declined to make report of the proceedings of the committee of conference aforesaid, on the ground that, from the vote on the resolution granting compensation to Robert P. Letcher, which vote was decided at the time the committee returned into the House from the conference, it was ascertained that a quorum was not present; and, further, that he declined to make the said report on the ground that the constitutional term for which this House had been chosen had expired."

I will now, Mr. Speaker, turn the attention of the House to the journal. In page 519, it reads as follows:

"A motion was then made by Mr. Hubbard that the House do ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said amendment.

"And on the question, Will the House ask a conference?

"It passed in the affirmative. And

"Mr. Cambreleng, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Hubbard, were appointed managers, to conduct the said conference, on the part of this House."

The committee of conference was appointed, I think, about 10 o'clock at night. I had the honor of then being a member, and an attentive observer of all that passed. The House then went on to do business to such an extent as to fill up two pages and a half of the journal, when the Cumberland road bill was taken up; and on that bill two of the committee of conference, Messrs. Cambreleng and Hubbard, voted in the negative; see journal, page 522. It will be perceived that, at this time, the committee of conference was in the House and voting. About 1 o'clock A. M., the House voted on the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher his per diem allowance when contesting his seat with Major Moore. Mr. Cambreleng voted on that also; see the journal, page 324. I ask the gentleman from New York, when did the committee of conference meet? He says, after he voted on the resolution to pay Mr. Letcher. I ask him again, if you were in earnest about this whole matter, and intended no trick, why did you not go out before? Why did you stay, after your appointment at 10 o'clock, until one, before you attempted to meet in conference, when, from your own statement, you were of opinion the House was dissolved at twelve? Is there not a palpable dereliction of duty in not attending the committee of conference sooner? The fact and truth is, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was not remiss in meeting in conference. He did go after his appointment, and returned before the Cumberland road bill was taken up; but, not liking the result of the conference, or perhaps from some lurking desire to injure the Senate, and cast the odium of the loss of the bill on that body, would not report.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

There is, evidently, a piece of political jugglery in this whole business; and the gentleman from New York and his confederates were the prime movers and actors in the whole scene. The gentleman says that there was no time to hold the conference, after his appointment, until the Cumberland road bill was taken up. I repeat again, what I have said before, that there was business transacted, enough to fill two and a half pages of the journal; and three speeches were made—one by the gentleman from Missouri, [MR. ASHLEY,] to take up a bill relative to his State; and two by gentlemen from Maryland, against the bill from the Senate which abolished the Maryland and Delaware judicial circuit. That reason of the gentleman is unfounded in fact. The gentleman has one of the two horns of the dilemma to take—either to stand convicted of not going to conference until after twelve o'clock, when he then believed the House dissolved; and going after that time and conferring, when he admits he had no power to act as a member: the other alternative is, that he went in time, returned in time, and then refused to make the report.

So, take it any way that the question can be presented, the loss of the bill is attributable to the gentleman from New York, and none else. The gentleman has one pleasing consolation left to him; he stands, in relation to this House, and this great and wide-spreading republic, in the same position that the ancients believed Mount Atlas did towards the heavens—he can bear it all upon his own shoulders.

The gentleman from Massachusetts attempts to throw the loss of the bill upon those who believed the House to be constitutionally dissolved at 12 o'clock on the 3d of March last. Although I then entertained that opinion, and acted on it, which opinion I have not since changed; yet, even if we were wrong, the gentleman ought to recollect that that error of opinion does not exculpate the gentleman from New York, [MR. CAMBRELENG.] I ask the gentleman, [MR. ADAMS,] if it would not be wise and prudent in him at least to see who is to be most affected by entertaining that opinion! If there be error in it, will it fall heaviest upon your old and now deserted political friends, or your new allies, whom you are now courting with such marked attention and assiduity, and who, after they use you, will not give you your expected and hoped-for reward; no, not even the thirty pieces of silver? General Jackson entertained that opinion, and acted on it; Mr. Van Buren entertained that opinion, as a matter of course—by instinct, I suppose. If my memory serves me right, he held a short conversation in this hall that night with a gentleman from New York, [MR. BEARDSLEY,] who directly afterwards refused to vote, as appears by the journal, which reads in these words:

“A motion was made by Mr. Jarvis, that the House do now adjourn.

“And, in deciding the question by yeas and nays, the name of Samuel Beardsley, of New York, being called, he declined to answer, on the ground that the term for which the members of the twenty-third Congress had been elected had expired; and that, according to the constitution of the United States, this House had ceased, at 12 o'clock to-night, to exist.

“After some remarks and suggestions from various members, and from the Chair, it was informally agreed to pass the name of Mr. Beardsley.”

This argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts is a two-edged sword, and, when wielded by him, cuts ten of his new associates for one of his old friends.

I, however, do not much censure the gentleman for entertaining the opinion that the President and Congress can each hold their offices, one after the four years, and the other the two years expire. How long after the time shall expire they can continue in office, he does not state; at least long enough, I suppose, to do what they desire, and to finish what they have on hand. This question revives his ancient recollections and reminiscences. I once heard of a President who, between midnight and day, and that, too, after his four years had expired, made a batch of judges, to reward some of the high-toned federalists of the old school for past services.

I have remarked, Mr. Speaker, that I differed on that night with many of my friends about the time when Congress was dissolved by the constitution. If I can obtain the indulgence and patient attention of the House, I will submit a few remarks in support of my opinion. The constitution of the United States, in relation to Representatives, in the second section of the first article, reads in these words:

“The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.”

And, in relation to the election of President, article second, section the first, reads as follows:

“The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows,” &c.

The time, place, and manner, of electing Representatives, are, by the constitution, left to the States. The provision on that subject reads in these words:

“The times, places, and manner, of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.”

From these provisions in the constitution of the United States, it is clear and manifest that a Representative is elected for two years, and the President for four years. When does the time commence? is the next subject of inquiry. Not at the time of the election, for the President is elected the fall before the 4th of March; his election is complete when the electors give him a plurality of votes: the mode of ascertaining that fact has nothing to do with the time of election. Representatives are chosen for two years: the two years cannot commence from the time of the election, because the States regulate the times of the election of their respective members, and hardly any two States elect at the same time; consequently, there would be no uniformity as to the time of commencement or termination of the two years. Frequently members are elected more than a year before the Congress commences of which they are members, and the same man who is elected is, at the time of election, a member of a preceding Congress, and serves one session in it after his election to a succeeding Congress.

The constitution did not, in the body of it, say when the time should commence, and when end. The reason is obvious. The convention did not know when nine States would ratify the constitution; and, until then, the time when the Government under it should commence could not be fixed; hence, no time is fixed on in the constitution for the commencement of the Government. The convention adopted a resolution, in these words:

JAN. 28, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this constitution. That, after such publication, the electors should be appointed, and the Senators and Representatives elected. That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed, as the constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting, the votes for President; and that, after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this constitution."

This resolution declared that Congress, when the ratification of nine States took place, should fix on the day when the Government should commence. Congress did designate the day by a resolution, which reads in these words:

"Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States which, before the said day, shall have ratified the said constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States, and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday in March [4th] next be the time, and the present seat of Congress [New York] the place, for commencing proceedings under the said constitution."

By this resolution of Congress, the 4th of March, 1789, was the day fixed on by Congress. On that day, the present Government was to commence under the constitution, and on that day it did commence.

The caption to the acts of the first Congress proves that the Government of the United States commenced on the 4th of March, 1789; which caption reads in these words:

"Acts of the first Congress of the United States, passed at the first session, which was begun and held at the city of New York, in the State of New York, on Wednesday, March 4, 1789, and ended September 29, in the same year."

The 4th of March, 1789, after being fixed on by Congress, in pursuance of a resolution of the convention, is just as binding as if it were inserted in the constitution itself. It is the execution of a power; and when the execution takes place, in strict conformity to the power, it then becomes the act of those giving the power.

The term of each President is for four years, the first term having commenced on the 4th of March, 1789. When did General Washington's first term commence? The answer is, on the 4th of March, 1789; his second term on the 4th of March, 1793; and the term of office of each of his successors has been computed in the same way, from that time to the present. The same rule of construction is to be resorted to as to Representatives, except that their term of service is two years. Surely, Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt, dispute, or controversy, as to the day when the time shall commence to run.

What is the time that completes one year? Suppose we begin on new year's day: the answer is, the last day of the December following, which completes the three hundred and sixty-five days. Every negro that has been hired out on a new year's day for a year knows the year is out on the last day of December following. The week has seven days: suppose we begin with Monday, are not the seven days completed on Sunday? I am elected for two years: if my time commences on the 4th of March, is it not out on the 3d of March two years thereafter? Let us see how the law computes twenty-one years, the age of maturity, for a man or woman. Blackstone's Commentaries, first volume, page 463, reads in these words:

"So that full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the anniversary of a person's birth."

That the Representative's term of service commences on the 4th of March every two years, and expires on the 3d of March two years afterwards, is a position so plain that none can gainsay it--no one attempts to dispute it. The whole question comes to this at last: when does the 4th of March commence, and when does the 3d of March, two years afterwards, end? The law makes no fraction of a day; the legal time, as universally settled, is, that the day begins at midnight, and ends at midnight: in the computation of time, the law knows no night. Suppose a man were under trial for Sabbath breaking, and the proof was he broke the Sabbath on Sunday morning between daybreak and sunrise: would any judge or jury let him off, upon the ground that it was on Saturday he committed the act? Or suppose it was proven that the person under trial did the deed alleged against him (say, went to ploughing) on Monday morning, ten minutes before sunrise; would any judge dare say that was Sunday, and he was guilty of Sabbath breaking? Our constitution must be construed as any other part of our law would, for it is a part of the law of the land. This mode of computing time has been long regulated by mankind, and it is now too late to dispute it.

The conduct of gentlemen, who contended last session that the computation should be made from sunrise to sunrise, and that Congress could continue its session till sunrise the 4th of March, distrusted their own opinion; and it was only as the last alternative that they were driven to assume that ground.

On the last night of the last session there were a number of bills on the Clerk's table; each bill had its friends. About ten o'clock, it was perceived that the bills, or some of them, would be lost for want of time. A clockmaker in this city was procured, and conveyed behind the clock of this hall; he moved the hands back eighteen minutes. I saw it done, and announced the fact to those who sat near me. Immediately afterwards, when the eyes of fifty gentlemen were on the clock, its hands were moved back one hour more; then, a member from North Carolina proclaimed the fact to the House. I have since been informed that the man who had this done was then a member of Congress, and has since boasted of it; and that he procured it to be done to get a favorite measure he was interested in through the House. Why did he do it? Because he was of opinion that the time would expire at midnight; yet the same man was arrayed with those who afterwards contended that sunrise next morning was the time, and not midnight.

Mr. Speaker, I had on that night the consolation to find I did not stand alone in my opinion. A large part of the members present agreed with me, and some of the ablest constitutional lawyers of the House were of the number; among whom I now recollect were two members from Georgia, Messrs. Foster and Gilmer, Mr. Archer from Virginia, and a gentleman from Ohio, who is a member of the present Congress; and on that account I cannot designate him by name. He is a man of great talents, and an able lawyer. This description, I fear, will not enable me to point him out to the House, as it is equally applicable to a number of gentlemen from that State.

Sir, as it respects myself, I voted against the three

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

million appropriation, because I did then, and do now, believe the amendment, as drawn up, was unconstitutional, and highly impolitic. To this point I intend, in a few moments, to call the attention of the House; but, before I do it, a remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts demands some notice. It was intended as an apology for the administration party in not asking Congress for the three millions sooner, and why the Executive did not require the money, and that it devolved on Congress to act without such requirement. He said it was the unanimous vote of this House, given the day before the amendment was offered, that superinduced the necessity of the appropriation. I deny the fact. What was that vote which was alluded to by the gentleman? It was nothing more nor less than this: that we would stand by the treaty, and insist on its execution. We intended to say to France, Our demands against you are closed by the treaty; the sum you are to pay is settled definitely; and we will not open the contest again, and reinvestigate our demands. That was what was intended by the first member of the resolution, which resolution reads in these words:

The second member of the resolution, that we would insist on its execution, means no more than this: that we held the highest and most solemn obligation on France that a nation could give, and that we would insist on its fulfilment. But did it point out how and in what manner we intended to insist? Did it say we intended to resort to arms, the last argument of nations? I answer, no. We carefully forbore to say, or even to intimate, what we intended to do. Our intention was to regulate our conduct by the subsequent action of the French. We, in truth and fact, designed doing nothing until the French Chambers should have an opportunity again to act on the bill appropriating the twenty-five millions of francs. We were desirous to wait, and suspend action until we should see what a sense of justice would do with the French people, or what the feelings of shame would do when the reprobation of the nations of the civilized world was pointed towards them for a breach of national faith in not fulfilling the treaty stipulations on their part. I, for one, never thought of such an appropriation being asked for, and of this demand being based on the resolution of the House. I believe it is an afterthought of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that he himself did not then suppose that such an appropriation became necessary in consequence of the adoption of the resolution.

Connected with the observations of the gentleman just noticed, he made another, on which I feel bound to animadvert. It was to this import: that for three days a number of members spoke against the resolution, and then, in a crouching spirit of pusillanimity, turned round and voted for it, not daring to meet the just indignation and reprobation of their constituents at home. I was one of those members who spoke on that occasion against a resolution, and then voted for that which passed; but I deny that that debated for three days was the one which passed. The one that was adopted and passed by the House was worded to meet the views of all the gentlemen; because, upon a great question of national difficulty with a foreign nation, and particularly with a nation of tremendous power, nothing could be more desirable than unanimity. The resolution against which the speeches were made contained, among other things, an expression that we would insist on the treaty "at all hazards." That expression we thought becoming the dignity of this nation. To say we insist on the treaty was enough, and all we ought to have said; let the rest and residue be understood, which is no less nor more than this: that we knew our rights, and would, in a becoming spirit of moderation and true dignity, maintain them; that the pride of the people should not be wounded and humbled in the affair; and that the honor of the nation should come out of the contest, be its results whatever it might, unstained and untarnished. Did it become us to vapor, like a bully, by using the words "at all hazards?" It is no certain indication that a man is going to make a desperate battle in defence of his rights and honor because he gasconades, and deals out menaces and blows in the empty air, before he begins to fight. I have ever considered it as the certain sign of a coward; that fear is his ruling passion; and that he either wants to intimidate his adversary, or goad himself up to the fighting point by his rage and fury. The words "at all hazards" as little became us as it suited the occasion. To whom was it addressed? To the most sensitive, powerful, gallant, and chivalrous nation upon the earth. We wanted France to do us justice. We did not want war, although we did not fear it. The Americans know not fear. The bullying expressions of "at all hazards" would have produced an effect directly opposite to what we desired.

I well recollect what took place in those days, ever memorable for the debates which took place, and not less memorable for the part the gentleman from Massachusetts played on that occasion; and certainly no expression, when applied to his conduct during that time, suits as well as the word play. He would speak on one day on one side of the question, as the House understood him, and the next day explain it away, and advance a contrary doctrine. He alternated in this manner some two or three times. I had the honor of addressing the House after his last speech. I commenced my remarks by saying that the law in relation to wills always considered the last will as controlling or revoking all other wills made on the same subject; or, if there was but one will, with contradictory provisions, the last clause controlled the previous ones; and, with that rule as my guide on the then present occasion, I should consider the speech which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts had just made as his last will and testament of and concerning our French relations. Mr. Archer, of Virginia, immediately remarked that the rule I laid down was correct, but one explanation ought to be given: that was, that the testator, when he made his last will, was of sound mind and disposing memory; and when that rule was applied, he doubted whether the gentleman had made a will at all.

Mr. Speaker, I remarked, a few moments ago, that I intended to question and contest the constitutionality of the amendment to the fortification bill which contained the appropriation of three millions of dollars. The constitution of the United States has the following provision in it:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

From this clause in the constitution, no money can be drawn from the public Treasury unless Congress shall first appropriate it by law. To do that in the true spirit and intention of the constitution, the law appropriating the money must say to which object of public service it shall be applied. The more particularly the objects are described and designated, the better does the law fulfil the requirements of the constitution. If Congress were not bound in duty to name specially the object to which the appropriation was made, why not pass a general law, and say the whole revenue of the country should be used by General Jackson for the general welfare of the nation, as he may deem proper and expedient? or say that

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

twenty-five millions, or any other given sum, was set apart for the Government of the nation, to be expended at the will and pleasure of the President?

The members of Congress come here to assist in administering this Government; to see to every part—the army, navy, and civil departments, and every subdivision of each; how many men are wanted for the army; what pay they shall have; how many vessels of war, and what description of vessels, the public service requires: in short, nothing that concerns the nation, in its most minute details, ought to be overlooked or neglected by Congress; but each branch of the public business attended to and provided for: to see just as much money is appropriated to each as is necessary, and no more; and that every dollar which is expended is rightly applied, as directed by Congress.

The clear and certain meaning of the word appropriate, from the force of the term taken in connexion with the subject-matter, means a specification of each object to which the money is to be applied; and too much care cannot be taken in the details of the appropriation, and in their rigid application to the specific objects. We are but the agents of our constituents; it is their money we vote away. We are bound to know the why and wherefore it is asked and granted. Let us apply these rules to the amendment which proposed to appropriate the three millions. The amendment reads in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of three millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy: Provided, Such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of Congress."

It is for the military and naval service, including fortifications. As to how much is to be expended on each object, the amendment is totally silent. The whole sum may be expended on the army, navy, or fortifications, at the will and pleasure of the President; or he may, at his like will and pleasure, refuse to expend one dollar on any one of these objects.

But suppose all or a part was to be expended on the army; for what part of that service was it to be expended? How was it to be applied? The amendment is silent. The same remarks will apply to the navy and fortifications. Where is the difference in the amendment, as drawn, and a general standing law giving to the President a sum in gross, say twenty-five millions a year, to carry on the Government as he chooses?

It is, sir, a duty which we owe our constituents to see to the proper application of every dollar of their money to their Government; for it is their Government yet, at least nominally, and not the President's.

Mr. Speaker, there are momentous and mighty considerations which ought to induce Congress to be watchful over the purse of the nation. Recollect the President, by the constitution, already has the sword of the nation; give him the purse also, and we are an undone people. I do not speak with reference more to the present President than to any other who may come after him. The power and patronage of the President are enormous and alarming to all lovers of civil liberty. The Executive of this republic has more real and substantial power this day than any crowned head in Europe. Satiated with the enjoyment of his power, he is about to retire; and, to show his contempt for the American people, he is about to put one of his minions into his office as his successor, whose only merit is his servile boast that "it was glory enough to have served under such a chief."

What way is left to us by the constitution to diminish, check, and control it? No way but one: that is, not to give one dollar of the people's money away more than is necessary to carry on the Government, and every dollar we give to see how and in what manner it shall be expended, and to guard with great vigilance that it shall be expended in no other way.

The Government of Great Britain is a monarchy; but the King of that great and mighty nation has not the tenth part of the real power that the President of the United States has, and which he exercises in its fullest plenitude, day after day. In that country, the people govern and control every thing; here, the will of General Jackson is almost omnipotent. There, the people can say to their King, emancipate your Catholic subjects; and their chains burst from around them. They can say what law they want passed, and he is obliged to sign the bill: no veto there; he dare not exercise it, at the peril of his head. They can bid him make peace, if the nation be at war; and peace he must make. They can tell him to dismiss his ministry; and they must go out of office. The power of the people the Duke of Wellington, the favorite of the King, the pride of the nobility, and the conqueror in a thousand battles, has experienced upon several occasions.

You will ask, Mr. Speaker, how is it that the voice of the people reaches the King on his magnificent throne, and makes the nobility tremble at its footstool? I answer, by the simplest principle imaginable, which is ingrafted in their Government: that is, to withhold the appropriation bills until the King and ministry do as they command and order to be done. I tell to every man in this House, and to every man in this nation, this solemn truth: either to abridge the power of the President by altering the constitution, or control the President by the appropriation bills—refuse him the money, and he will be as powerless as Samson was after his hair was cut off. The vile creatures who now administer to his power go in for "the spoils." Cato the elder, in the Roman Senate, for a number of years, regardless on what subject he made a speech, concluded them all alike—that "Carthage must be destroyed;" so, the members on this floor ought to conclude every speech with these words, until the object is effected—that the President's power has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

I have made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, upon the constitutionality of the amendment, drawn in the general terms in which it was; and that it did not, in consequence of its generality of expression, and its manifest want of specification, conform to the spirit and intention of the constitution.

The next point to which I contemplate inviting the attention of the House is the impolicy of the appropriation. It will be recollected that all the appropriation bills for the current expenses of the year had passed, containing appropriations for every part of the public service, to the full extent of the estimates. The fortification bill, as amended by the Senate, was for a larger sum than usual. If this House had concurred in the amendment, without adding the three millions, the bill would then have passed both Houses; and nothing would have been necessary to make it a law but the signature of the President.

The three million amendment must therefore be considered as a war measure; not positive, absolute, and certain, but left to the President for him to adopt, or not, at his pleasure. War preparations and war itself belong alone to Congress; to adopt the one, and make proclamation of the other. In no event, should the President be permitted to hold in the palm of one hand war, and in the other the olive branch of peace. The people are to do all the fighting, and they alone should determine on war. Of all the men on this earth, a military man is the last to be trusted with this power. His character has been made by war; he has studied it as a science, followed it as a profession, and considers it necessary to his popularity and glory.

It was impolitic to confide such a power in the hands of General Jackson. The fitness of every man for the trust about to be confided to him ought to be considered and weighed well before the act is done. What I might be willing to confide to Jefferson, were he President, I might be unwilling to intrust to Jackson. I might be willing to leave peace or war to Jefferson, and unwilling to commit the same power to Jackson. So, on the other hand, I would confide to Jackson the command of an army, when I would not to Jefferson. But, in truth and fact, as I have before said, I would not leave the alternative of peace or war to any President. Nevertheless, this House proposed, by the amendment, to commit to General Jackson that delicate trust and duty, which, of all men living, he was the worst qualified to discharge. Had the amendment passed, instead of being at peace with France, as we now are—and there is every hope and prospect of its continuance—we should this day, no doubt, have been in the midst of a wide-spreading and bloody war.

To decide impartially upon the conduct of those who voted against the appropriation last session, (for the gentleman from Massachusetts has arraigned us all at the great bar of public opinion,) let us see and examine the position of this Government and that of France, in their relations with each other, at the time the appropriation was asked for.

During the Imperial Government of Bonaparte, aggressions and spoliation to a great extent were committed by the subjects of that Emperor upon the private property of our merchants, on the high seas. The amount of injury was variously estimated by the two Governments. These injuries were inflicted near thirty years ago. Satisfaction was demanded by this Government of Bonaparte, which was denied. After his dethronement, and the restoration of the Bourbons, a like demand for reparation was made by this Government of Louis XVIII. He refused to make satisfaction. After his death, and on the accession of Charles X to the throne, indemnity was demanded of him, which he delayed and failed to render. When Louis Philippe was made King, in 1830, indemnities were demanded of him by our Government. He immediately opened a negotiation on the subject, and ultimately agreed to pay twenty-five millions of francs, out of which were to be deducted one million five hundred thousand, which the United States owed a subject of France, leaving four millions seven hundred thousand dollars to be paid by the Government of the French to the citizens of the United States; that being twenty-three millions five hundred thousand francs. This money could not be paid by the King of the French until the Chambers should appropriate it. The constitution of France is exactly like our own, on this subject; and I have no doubt Lafayette, who was concerned in making it, had our constitution in his view.

The King and his ministers can make treaties, and stipulate for the payment of money; but it is the constitutional right of the Chamber of Deputies alone to vote the appropriation, or not, as they please. So with our Government: the President and Senate can make treaties, and stipulate for the payment of money, but Congress alone can appropriate it. The part of the French constitution to which I refer reads in these words:

"13. The King is the supreme head of the State; he commands the forces by land and sea, declares war, makes treaties of peace, alliance, and commerce, appoints to all employments in the public administration, and makes the regulations and ordinances necessary for the execution of the laws, without ever having the power either to suspend the laws themselves, or to dispense with their execution. No foreign troops, however, can be admitted into the service of the State but by virtue of a law.

"14. The legislative power is exercised collectively by the King, the Chamber of Peers, and the Chamber of Deputies.

"15. The proposition of laws belongs to the King, the Chamber of Peers, and the Chamber of Deputies. Nevertheless, every law of taxes must be first voted by the Chamber of Deputies.

"16. Every law must be freely discussed, and voted by the majority of each of the two Chambers."

The French King and his ministers presented the bill for the appropriation to the Chambers; and, after a long and angry debate, it was rejected by a vote of one hundred and sixty-eight for it, and one hundred and seventy-six against it.

The moment the bill failed in the Chambers, the French Government sent an apology to ours for the failure, and pledged the faith of the Government again to bring the subject before the Chambers at its next session.

Thus the matter stood at the time this war measure was about to be adopted, and those extraordinary powers confided to the President, at the last session. For voting against this bill, thus circumstanced, has the newborn zeal and patriotism of the gentleman from Massachusetts prompted him to file this his bill of indictment against us; and, for one, if there be guilt in it, I plead guilty.

The minister of France who negotiated the treaty informed our minister that the power to appropriate the money belonged to the Chambers alone, and that he was fearful there would be great difficulty in procuring the passage of a law to pay the money. All that the King and his minister promised to do, or could accomplish, was done. An unnecessary delay is alleged, in presenting the bill to the Chambers. I am not able to say whether there was such delay, or not, as would subject them to the imputation of negligence, as I have no acquaintance with the forms and rules of proceedings in the Chambers. In fact, none can tell, situated as we are, whether there was this unnecessary delay or not. In presenting a bill for the action of this House, or the French Chambers, I presume some attention must not only be paid to the forms of proceeding, but a well-exercised prudence and discretion would require an attention to the more material and substantial part: that is, to see that Congress, or the Chambers, were well-disposed towards the measure. This circumspection and vigilance is absolutely necessary in the French Chambers, where the ministers are in danger of being turned out of office, if the bill be rejected. One rule is never to be overlooked: delay the bill until there is a well-grounded hope of its passage.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, the President and Senate were to stipulate, in a treaty, to pay a sum of money, say five millions of dollars, and Congress should refuse to appropriate the money: would there be any cause of war against the United States on that account? Surely not. It is the constitutional right of Congress either to vote or refuse the money; and if that were known to the nation to which the money was to be paid before the treaty was made, then there would not be the shadow of a pretext for a resort to war. The faith of the treaty-making power would be violated, it is true; which faith all nations should be careful to preserve. Let us apply this position to the French Government. The constitution of the French, and ours, are alike in this particular. It is the sole republican feature in their constitution. And shall the only republic in the world go to war with this nation for exercising the great and unalienable right in the people either to give or refuse their money as they pleased?

I have remarked, Mr. Speaker, that the refusal to appropriate the money at the last session has, I do verily believe, saved this nation from the horrors of war at this moment. France might have considered it as a war measure pointed at her, and have immediately struck the blow; as, by the usages of nations, she would have had the right to do. When two nations have difficulties and collisions with each other, in this situation, if either commences preparations for war, the other has the right to commence hostilities immediately. This principle has been considered as the settled law of nations in Europe, for one hundred and fifty years past.

The probability is, that the French, who have never refused to accept a challenge, would in this light have considered our law, had it passed, and instantly have made a dash at our extended, wide-spreading, and immense commerce, with her whole navy.

On the other hand, when an extraordinary number of our ships should have been put in commission, manned, officered, and sent to sea, flushed with the spirit of enterprise and panting for war, would there not have been great danger that some of our young Hotspurs might have brought it on by firing into a French vessel? And one gun fired on either side upon the ships of the other, in the irritated state of public feeling, would have lighted up the flames of war, which would have been seen and felt all over this world.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that, instead of standing as criminals at the bar of public opinion, and the gentleman from Massachusetts prosecuting those who voted against the measure, they are entitled to the thanks of the nation, and the gratitude of the humane, philanthropic, and religious part of the world. The brave man and the soldier equally look on war as an evil, and the scourge of mankind.

I have, Mr. Speaker, taken but one view of the impolicy of the measure; there are other and more important considerations connected with this subject, to which I now intend to call the attention of the House. These considerations are applicable as well to our relations with France last session as the present; and, as we have now on our tables bills containing avowedly war appropriations to the amount of ten or fifteen millions, I shall, in my vindication of our conduct last session, occasionally refer to the present war measures now in agitation; and, in doing that, I shall only be following the example set me by others.

By the postponement last session of all war preparations, the bill to pay the five millions of dollars passed into a law by the law-making power of France. The payment of the money is withheld until some explanations shall be made by the President, that, in his message to Congress last session, he did not intend to impeach the integrity of the French nation, or question the honor of the King. The President says, individually, he did not; but, like a technical lawyer, specially demurs, and says: what I said was in my message to Congress; it was not addressed to you, and you have no right to notice it; it is a departure in pleading. And thus the matter now stands, alike reproachful to both parties. What an extraordinary spectacle is presented for the world to look upon and marvel at! Two of the most powerful and most enlightened nations in the world, old friends and allies, about to spill each other's blood in torrents, when this day there is nothing left to dispute about—nothing between them but ministerial etiquette, diplomatic jugglery, and special pleading!

Mr. Speaker, it requires no small portion of moral courage for a man on this floor to speak his sentiments freely and independently on the great question now before us. We are in the minority in this House, which to some men is disheartening. Our opponents are flushed with the victories gained at the late elections over the Union. The majority, with which we are surrounded and overwhelmed, cries aloud for war. We heard it last session repeatedly; and have heard the same tocsin of alarm and intimidation sounded this year. It has been proclaimed that there were two great parties in the House, an American and a French party; the patriot and the traitor; one ready to defend and the other to betray and destroy his country. When we are virtually charged with treason, the charge is received with shouts of applause by a part of the members of this House; and, instead of being the hall in which assemble the congregated wisdom of the United States, it wears every appearance of a place for a mob to meet. I will not be dispirited; I will not be brow-beaten; my constituents shall be heard; they have faced the enemy in the field, and I will face them here. I will speak nothing but what, if here, I believe they would approve. It becomes every man, on this great and momentous question of peace or war, to come out full and fair; if for war, say so; if for peace, let it also be known. Those of us who are against war ought not to stand back and be silent, but do all we can to stop it. But if the time shall come when a majority shall declare war, then opposition ceases to be a virtue, and all sides and parties ought to unite and fight it out like men. Should any one then give back, denounce him as a traitor. If that awful day of trial shall come, and our foes are to be met on the battle field, my constituents will be able proudly to compare with those of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and North Carolina; and in the comparison they will not suffer.

My opinion and advice is, that we ought not to be hasty and rash in this matter. Let us wait, at least, until towards the end of the session, when we can hear from France. There is every hope, every probability, that the dispute will be amicably adjusted, and the money paid. Delay last session effected the passage of the bill to pay the money by the French Chambers. There is nothing of real difficulty between the two nations. All the supposed grounds of quarrel are the veriest diplomatic cobwebs. The opinion of the civilized world is against going to war for such a trifle; and public sentiment in a few months, here and in France, and among the other nations of the earth, may do a great deal towards the restoration of peace and harmony.

Gentlemen say we must fight, or the national honor will be tarnished, and we shall be disgraced in the eyes of mankind. If I believed the honor, fame, and character of the republic required the sacrifice of war on our part, I should not hesitate a moment. No honorable man, no proud, high-minded nation, can pause one second between dishonor and war. But I do not believe the character of the American people will suffer, even if we should not plunge headlong into this war.

Mr. Speaker, let us again call to mind what this dispute is about, and not in high-sounding phrases and pompous heroics, played off in this House, lose sight of it.

The insult which was offered to our flag, was offered by Bonaparte near thirty years ago. The American property which was captured on the high seas was his act; it was done by his orders, under his Berlin and Milan decrees; and by his courts of admiralty were the vessels and cargoes condemned and ordered to be sold. If the honor of the nation suffered, it suffered then. He would make no atonement for the insults offered to us and injuries done to our property. We did not then think of war; we pocketed the insult, and turned it into a money business, by demanding a pecuniary indemnity. Even that was refused by that proud and haughty Emperor. The like satisfaction was demanded of his successors, Louis XVIII and Charles X, which they refused. Louis Philippe, after a lapse of near thirty years, has agreed to pay for the injuries done; and, because some delays have taken place in the French Chambers in relation to the appropriation of the money, we now declaim about the insults originally offered, and describe pathetically the sufferings of our merchants one or two generations ago.

A man is injured and outraged in his person and property; he has two remedies before him: either to fight for the insult, or to go to law, and demand an indemnity in money, commensurate to the extent of the injury sustained. If he demands satisfaction in money, he waives the other remedy. It is in vain to talk about honor afterwards, in that affair. But suppose we carry the comparison and parallel still further. Suppose the original offender should die; an executor is appointed, and he dies; and then an administrator de bonis non is appointed, who gives his bond for the money, but does not immediately pay at the day appointed: is it an insult if any delay takes place? Certainly not. If my debtor owes me, and is able to pay, and still delays payment, whose character suffers in the transaction, his or mine? Most assuredly, his.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to show that, in the pursuit of the demand against France, it has become a moneyed affair altogether. If I have been to any extent successful in establishing the position assumed, the next point of inquiry will be, is it worth while to resort to the desperate remedy of a wager of battle to recover the amount admitted to be due? I pause, and ask the gentlemen on the other side, if they have any expectation of getting the money if they go to war? Candor will compel them to acknowledge that they have none. It is an admitted principle, that a war for the money annuls the treaty; and some even contend that it imposes on the United States an obligation to pay the amount to the respective claimants. Should the claim thus be destroyed by war, then what are we to fight for? Some will say, honor. I say, revenge, and nothing else, unless there be in this war crusade a desire to gratify the feelings and appease the rage of one man.

But, suppose the war we are about to engage in will not abrogate the treaty, and release France from her obligation to pay the money: can we enforce payment by arms? Of that there is not the remotest probability. France has no territory for us to invade and conquer. It would be worse than folly—nay, Quixotic madness—to believe we could invade the dominions of France. On our part, it must be a war on the ocean altogether. Who will win most laurels there none can tell. When men equally brave, and equally matched, meet in battle, victory is in the hands of the Almighty alone.

Our navy, including vessels of all descriptions, amounts only to fifty-two ships of war; the French have about two hundred and eighty-four. Our navy, notwithstanding the heavy annual appropriations for that Department, is wretchedly out of repair. What is the condition of that of France? I know not, except report says it is in fine order. Of success on the sea we ought not to be sanguine. Count the item of expense in blood and treasure, and it will be enormous—not less, in three years, (if the war should last so long, and none can tell when it will terminate,) than one hundred millions of dollars and the lives of fifty thousand men. The revenue, from all sources, will be measurably dried up; and taxes, direct and indirect, excises, and loans, will follow, with all their train of evils, vexations, and oppressions. None can recount the calamities of war, nor can I describe them. Our exports and imports will average, annually, two hundred and fifty millions of dollars. Not less than one thousand vessels besides are engaged in the fisheries, the sealing business, and other adventures. The injury this great commerce will sustain will be enormous; in fact, it will be literally swept from the seas. France has the largest navy, and can do our commerce most injury; and especially as her commerce is comparatively nothing. All the daring spirits of the world, who wish to privateer, will hoist French colors; because we have most commerce, and it will be more exposed on account of its extension and want of protection. What will be the deplorable situation of the South? Her whole crop is cotton; the exports of that staple form more than one half of our whole export trade. Scarcely a bale will be able to cross the ocean for market; and even the cotton which will finally get there will have so heavy an insurance to pay, as ultimately to yield little or nothing to the grower of the article. The cotton lands of Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, have just been brought into market; the owners are now opening and preparing them for cultivation; men have gone largely in debt for lands, negroes, and stock; heavy anticipations have been made on the growing crop and the crop to be planted the ensuing season. Should this nation unfortunately be hurried into a war, all these men are ruined; they are generally young, enterprising men, who need, at this moment, the fostering care and protection of Government. Kentucky is a grain-growing and stock-raising State; she depends on the cotton planters in the South to buy her grain, produce, and stock; she has scarcely any other market. At this time her agriculture is prosperous, her prices are good and fair, the hum of business is every where heard, and the bustle of industry is to be seen all over the land. A war prostrates every thing. Place the nation in a situation that cotton cannot be transported across the ocean, the cotton planter cannot buy; the stock and products of Kentucky fall, in price, to little or nothing. The expenses of Government, and individual sacrifices of life and property, will be enormous, and almost incalculable.

This is not the only point of view in which I look at this question: there are yet other considerations of high and deep import. France is our oldest ally, firmest and best friend, among the nations of the earth. When we were in the midst of our revolutionary struggle, and our fate seemed to hang on a thread; when the fleets of Great Britain covered the ocean and her armies our land, aided by the Powers of Germany; we were then in our infancy, few in number, and destitute of every thing but real patriotism; our armies had been defeated, and we were retreating before the victorious enemy; all foreign Powers refused to assist us, save one. None here will inquire what foreign Power was that. The world knows that was France; her young men, with Lafayette at their head, poured into America, and helped to fight our battles; the colors of the two nations, ranged on the same side, floated in the air together; and many a noble Frenchman died in our cause, fighting for us, and winning the liberty we now enjoy, nominally, at least.

In the assistance which France rendered to the United States during the revolutionary war, and until peace was made by her with Great Britain, her losses and sacrifices, in men, ships, and money, were immense. Thousands of lives were lost, and hundreds of millions were expended; and, for all these losses, sacrifices, and disbursements, she never charged one cent. And now, after all that, shall we go to war with that nation for four millions seven hundred thousand dollars? Gentlemen may say, what will you, then, do? I say, repeal the laws we passed in compliance with the treaty on our part; and, if that will not do, I would go further—I would impose additional duties upon her wines, silks, and brandies; we can obtain the same articles elsewhere. I have no doubt these commercial regulations would effect the desired object. There is yet another consideration why a war with France is to be deprecated. One of the States in this Union once belonged to France; its population is principally French. Suppose a French army were to invade that State and occupy it; the whole valley of the Mississippi and Ohio is shut out from all direct communication with the residue of the world; situated as that country is, it would take a great deal of hard fighting to dislodge them. I beg gentlemen not to be precipitated either into war or war measures; for there is no real difference between them, as war measures will lead to war itself. The most disastrous battle that was ever fought in Kentucky was that of the Blue Licks, August 19, 1781; that was brought on prematurely by the bravadoes of one man. The Indians were on the north side of Licking river; one detachment of the Kentuckians was on the south, waiting for the main body to come up, which was under General Logan. The Indians showed a few warriors on the north. This man insisted upon crossing the river and pursuing them; he was admonished that there whole force was immediately on the other side, in ambush, ready for the combat, and that it was advisable to wait until the main army came up. The man, who was a Major McGary, spurred his horse, dashed into the river, called on all brave men to follow him, and declared that none would stay behind but cowards. This conduct induced all to follow him. The ambuscade was sprung, the detachment was defeated, and nearly all cut off save McGary himself. The men who followed had the physical courage to die, but not the moral courage to bear the imputation of cowardice, and that from a man who, as the sequel proved, was peculiarly careful of his own life.

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

It is not the man of words and boasting that is the brave man, that fights hardest, and is soonest to sacrifice his life in his country's cause; to that man "it is not sweet to die for his country." We are informed that France has assembled a large navy in the West Indies, and will shortly either insult our flag or make a descent on our coast. I do not believe that either event will take place; however, the moment France shall add insult to the injustice of the delay of payment, then it becomes an affair of honor, and our reputation will be injured by submitting to it. When that event shall arrive, I will then agree with gentlemen to go to war.

I recollect to have once read, when, upon a wager of battle, one of the combatants, after he got into the ring, declined the combat; the other vauntingly called him a coward—he resented it—and swore he lied—and said, I did not fight you at first because I had no cause of quarrel, but now I will fight you, for the present insult, to the death. He made good his words, and slew his adversary.

We are told that France requires us to make an apology before she will pay the money. I am against any apology. I would not degrade the nation so low for one hundred millions; nay, no sum could buy me to consent to an apology. To apologize for the insult of demanding what France agreed to pay, is absurd and preposterous; and to apologize for the message of the President to Congress, is equally inadmissible. It was not spoken in our national character, in our exterior and foreign relations. France had no right to notice it.

It is worthy of a passing remark to inquire, to whom are those four millions seven hundred thousand dollars to be paid? To our own citizens, nominally, I know; but, in reality, four fifths of it will go to the insurance offices in Great Britain, stockjobbers, and speculators. The vessels captured by the French were principally engaged in the carrying British goods into the ports of Europe, in contravention to the Berlin and Milan decrees. The presumption is, that policies of insurance were effected on the vessels and cargoes in London.

I have remarked, Mr. Speaker, that I believed that this resolution was got up for effect in the canvass now going on for the next President; and that I believed that this war and war panic are intended for the same unholy purpose.

It has been visible to the whole American people for some years past, that General Jackson has been, and is now, ambitious of designating his official successor; and that all his power, influence, and patronage, have been directed to the elevation of his favorite, whose only recommendation is his servility, sycophancy, and abject flattery of the President; one who weeps when he frowns, and laughs aloud when he smiles; and who has no merit but what is reflected on him from General Jackson. Like the moon, he shines by a borrowed light altogether.

War, or even the preparation for war, with the patronage connected with it and growing out of such a state of things, give an immense additional power to the Executive. Suppose, instead of disbursing twenty millions next year, which will be about a fair peace expenditure, we are plunged into a war; or, under a war panic, we disburse forty or fifty millions. The additional expenditure of twenty or thirty millions will enable the office-holders's party to influence and control, in the approaching elections, three hundred thousand votes; and all this to be done for the glorious purpose of continuing, for eight years longer, the power of the present party which is at the head of the Government.

This view of the subject is further verified by the fact that there are bills on the table to expend near five millions on fortifications for the ensuing year, not one of which can be finished time enough to answer the purposes of defence, if we should shortly get into a war. One of the bills contains appropriations of about two and a half millions for forts not yet begun—nay, even the sites are not selected. We know that these new forts cannot be finished in time; and the commencing of them will, if we have war, only invite the enemy to land and destroy the materials as fast as they are collected to erect the forts. This last new fortification bill awakens in me a kind of suspicion that the administration party does not expect war; but wishes, with war preparations, war patronage, and war appropriations, to carry the election in favor of the pet of General Jackson: which may God, in his mercies manifested towards this afflicted land, prevent. Who are the candidates before the people, and who are intended to be affected by this resolution? White, Webster, Van Buren, and Harrison. Harrison, Webster, and White, are men whose deeds will live after them; and whose memory will be handed down to after generations yet unborn. Their actions are of a kind to be claimed by the nation as public property, and as identified with their country's honor and glory. Little Van has nothing to boast, except "the honor of serving under such a chief as General Jackson."

Van Buren claims the presidency as a paternal estate by descent; he arrogates to himself, by a magical kind of inheritance, the glories achieved by Jackson in the late war. The party cannot meet to do any thing for him, unless it be on the 8th of January, the day when the western hunters won the victory at Orleans. I do not know whether it is most calculated to excite our laughter, or indignation and contempt, at seeing the glory obtained on that day transferred from the West to New York—a State, during our revolutionary war, only famed for torries.

Is there any scene in this world so ridiculous as to see Van Buren's friends place him before the people as the war-party candidate, and denounce Harrison and his friends as pusillanimous, cowardly, and ready to betray their country—Harrison, who spent his youth, his manhood, and the prime of his life, in camps and in battles, in fire and smoke, combating in his country's cause? As for Van Buren, he never smelt gunpowder in his life.

H. of R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

Many a bloody field can attest Harrison's achievements, and emblazon his fame and glory abroad. Kentucky has won laurels with him and under him; he always did her brave sons, living or dead, justice in the field and justice in his reports to the War Department. In this approaching election the world will bear witness that Kentucky, amongst her other great virtues, boasts the proud one of gratitude. I know that one of her sons, in whom she is well pleased, has been selected to run on the Van Buren ticket for Vice President. This is a New York manoeuvre: it is sop to Jowler. Kentucky will not bite at the bait. We would delight to do honor to the candidate for Vice President; he has also won his fame in deeds of noble daring; but he must recollect that if a man marries a woman below him in the grades of society, he elevates her to his level: if above him, he brings her down to his own caste. So is the fate of the candidate for Vice President. The candidate for President on the same ticket regulates the votes altogether.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has said that those who voted against the appropriation of the three millions last session had but one step more to take, and that was to open the doors of the Capitol to the enemy, and then join them; that he was prouder of his vote last session in favor of the appropriation than any act of his whole life. How flaming is the zeal of the new convert. He was Secretary of State eight years during the administration of Mr. Monroe, and was four years President himself; during all which time the French refused to indemnify us for our losses, and yet then he was not so full of fight. I recollect in the play of Cato, when he called his little Senate together at Utica, just as Cæsar was marching on the city, the fury and impetuous zeal of Sempronius; how he exclaimed—

"My voice is still for war.

Gods! can a Roman Senate long debate
Which of the two to choose, slavery or death!
No, let us rise at once, gird on our swords,
And, at the head of our remaining troops,
Attack the foe, break through the thick array
Of his throng'd legions, and charge home upon him.
Perhaps some arm, more lucky than the rest,
May reach his heart, and free the world from bondage."

And how Lucius modestly replied—

"My thoughts, I must confess, are turned on peace."

I also well recollect the sequel, and I beg the House to mark it, and I hope it will somewhat attract the attention of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts: Sempronius deserted to Cæsar the next night, and Lucius remained with Cato, and fought it out like a man. This same Sempronius whispered to Cato to beware of Lucius—that he was a traitor.

Who are the men the gentleman from Massachusetts has attacked in his resolution? Whom has he abused in his speech, and whom has he denounced as traitors? for I disdain to notice his pitiful subterfuge, by saying he meant no one—it was only a personification—a figure of speech. They were his old friends and political supporters, who stood by him in former times, and faced the battle and the breeze; who, on account of their supporting him, have been proscribed by the Government and party in power, and are now in a state of exile as it respects their own Government and the administration thereof; they are an abused and vilified set of men; their only fault, endeavoring to sustain him. In this situation, what a deplorable spectacle does the gentleman exhibit: the very man for whom they are now suffering has turned against them, and joined the ranks of their enemies; has become their fiercest assailant, most inexorable foe; driving them to the wall, and then attempting to pin them up against it. How base the treachery, how black the ingratitude, and, at the same time, how melancholy the sight, to see an old man, with the frost of seventy winters on his head, pushed on by a blind ambition and love of office, or rather the emoluments of office, thus to prostrate and degrade himself, and forever blast the reputation acquired by fifty years of honorable public service!

When I recollect how, in 1828, in the contest for President between the honorable gentleman and General Jackson, I labored in his cause, rode over Kentucky, and addressed the people for hours together, with what indignation am I fired at his conduct now! In a spirit of true repentance do I declare, that if God will forgive me for what I then did, I promise never to do the like again.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says we (meaning himself and others) have been accused of man-worship—alluding to his worshipping General Jackson. I do not believe that any gentleman ever accused him of such devotion to any man or friend in the world as to amount to man-worship. Cæsar, Bonaparte, and Washington, were said never to forget a favor or desert a friend; if any person has ever charged the gentleman with that quality of the heart, I never heard it. I expect it is not man the gentleman worships: it is office and its emoluments.

The gentleman from North Carolina said there were two parties—the democracy and the aristocracy of the country; and that the battle had to be fought between them one day or another, and he was willing to engage in the rotundo of the Capitol. These remarks seemed to me to have a direct allusion to the Senate. It is certainly unparliamentary to use such language. Would the gentleman wish to engage in a conflict with two hundred and forty young men against forty-eight old ones? I hope not.

The Senate has been alluded to in very abusive terms by the gentleman from Massachusetts. What has wrought this wonderful change in his opinion of that body, here of late, I cannot imagine. Last summer was a year, when he was invited to participate in a public dinner given to the Senators of Massachusetts; the answer of that gentleman, and his toast, read in these words:

"QUINCY, July 29, 1834.

"SIR: I have received your obliging invitation, in behalf of the whigs of Salem, of my attendance at a dinner to be given to the Senators of the Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States. Cordially approving the conduct of those eminent citizens, in the station assigned to them by the confidence of their constituents, I regret that my engagements will deprive me of the pleasure of joining with you in the festivity by which you propose to signalize your approbation of the firmness and ability with which they have discharged the trust committed to them. Of the importance of the services rendered by them to our common country, in the trying emergencies which mark the present era of our history, I entertain the liveliest sense. It is in the Senate of the confederated nation, (and I regret to be obliged, from the deepest conviction, to add, in the Senate alone,) that the friends of our Union, and of its free, republican institutions, can find a solid foundation for the cheering hope that they will be preserved and redeemed from the imposture of pretended reform, from the frenzy of senseless experiments, and from the rapacity of executive usurpations.

"With this impression, I tender to the whigs of Salem, with my thanks for their friendly invitation, the following sentiment:

"The constitutional check of the Senate, fearlessly and faithfully applied to the executive simple machine."

"And remain, very respectfully,

"Sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"LEYERETT SALTONSTALL, Esq., Salem."

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

The Senate, late on the night of the last session of Congress, sent a polite note or resolution to this House, appraising it of the result of the agreement of the conferees, and inviting the attention of the House to the subject. This, the gentleman says, was a gross insult to this House; and, if there had been time, he would have asked of the House to have sent him with the resolution back to the Senate, and, if he had taken it there, he would have thrown it on the floor with ineffable contempt; (accompanying that expression with a remarkable contortion of his body, by squatting, and then jumping up with a jerk, and a violent inclination of the body to the left.) How ridiculous would such behaviour have been in a gentleman of his age and standing; and with what pity would that dignified body have witnessed the impotent rage of an old man displaying such fantastic antics!

Mr. Speaker, when we take a view of the present condition of the United States, there is every thing to deplore, and nothing to console us. We appropriate every year millions upon millions for our navy, and it has gone to decay; scarcely a vessel fit for service. We have appropriated since the last war about fourteen millions for fortifications; they are now in a state of wretched dilapidation, but few guns mounted, and generally unmanned. No energy in our army, as our late disasters in Florida bear melancholy testimony: no spirit and love of enterprise in the officers. While the war is raging in Florida with all its horrors, and in its most frightful forms, and we are in the daily expectation of a war with France, what do we behold here, in this city, and in this hall? Day after day are we importuned to surrender this chamber to the Secretary of the Department of War, to deliver a lecture on history; I suppose the ancient history of the Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Persians, Carthaginians, and Grecians. Instead of studying the plans of campaigns, marches, and battles, he is poring over the history of nations twenty-five hundred years gone by. The general-in-chief of our army is president of the assembly balls, as our daily papers tell us, and, report says, night after night waltzing with little misses in their teens; and, when not at that, writing miserable plays for the stage. There is no laudable spirit of enterprise and emulation in the army, navy, or any part of the public service. Why this state of things? Because promotion to office does not now depend on merit, but by bowing, fawning, and cringing, in the palace; for all power is there. When the chief there frowns, and stamps his foot, the whole mental pack fear and tremble. We are thrown upon evil and degenerate times: our Government has every symptom of a speedy dissolution.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts charged treason upon a part of this House, the majority huzzaed, clapped their hands, and shouted, enacting just such scenes as took place in the convention during the jacobinical times of the reign of terror, in the days of Marat and Robespierre. When a man was denounced in the House by either of those blood-thirsty tyrants, the members of the convention applauded in a tumultuous manner, and immediately voted the arrest of the member denounced, however innocent; before night the guillotine received its victim, and he was numbered with the dead.

The storms of misfortune and adversity have been threatening us from every quarter—east, west, north, and south. They have gathered over our heads, and threaten every moment to burst upon us, and destroy our liberties forever. I put my hope and trust in God, who has saved us in all our trials and difficulties heretofore, that he will yet preserve us free and independent, and dispel the clouds now lowering over us; and that he will give us once more a clear, serene, political sky.

When Mr. HARDIN had taken his seat—

Mr. EVANS rose and addressed the House. He was very glad, he said, after several unsuccessful efforts, at length to have been recognised by the Speaker. It would have been much more agreeable to him to have said several days ago what he now proposed to say upon the subject under discussion; but all his attempts to obtain the floor had been fruitless. Indeed, he had begun to fear that he should fail altogether, for he had perceived evident indications that this debate was not much longer to be permitted. He warned his friends, who had a wish to be heard, that the time allotted to them was short; and he apprized the majority of the House, such at least as did not already know it, that they would soon be called upon to wield that convenient instrument for suppressing freedom of debate, now so frequently resorted to—the previous question—to arrest the further discussion of the topics involved in the resolution. He availed himself, therefore, while he could, of the opportunity to submit a few remarks upon them; though to do so, and to say what he was about to say, was painful to him in a high degree.

The subject which has already engrossed the attention of the House for several days, (said Mr. E.), whatever range it may take, or whatever space fill, had an exceedingly humble origin. It sprang, ostensibly at least, from an inconsiderable paragraph in one of the newspapers of the city, which an honorable member from New York [Mr. CAMBRELEN] deemed of sufficient consequence, as it related to himself personally, to bring to the notice of the House. The charge, which he conceived to be made against himself, was by no means a new one; and the repetition of it, at this time, would scarcely have attracted any additional notice, if the honorable member had not deemed it suitable to invest it with some importance, and to found upon it the novel measure proposed by the honorable mover of this resolution. The important measures for the interest and welfare of the whole country, which are required at our hands, must stand still; the embargo, which we have been so frequently told hangs over the great commercial city which he represents, must continue yet longer; public and private business both must give place, in order that the honorable member, upon whose Atlantean shoulders the Government seems to rest, might have the opportunity of attempting to free himself from charges neither new in themselves nor supported by new evidence, and now put forth in a paper which he affects to hold in great contempt. The gentleman has been indulged with the opportunity which he sought; and with what success he has met it the House have witnessed. Such, Mr. Speaker, was apparently the origin of the weighty matters we are considering. I was one of those who voted with the majority, thereby separating from most of those with whom I usually act, in giving permission to the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. ANAXES] to introduce this resolution. I did so with the distinct perception that the resolution had been previously prepared, and was offered in close connexion with, and founded upon, the remarks of the member from New York; and I thought I could not be mistaken in the belief that it was a matter arranged and concerted between the honorable gentlemen. I could not, therefore, be in doubt as to the object of the gentleman, nor as to the character of the report which might emanate from the select committee contemplated in the resolution, should one be appointed. I knew it was an object I could not approve, and that it would be a report which would not have my concurrence. Nevertheless, I voted to admit the gentleman's proposition; useless though it was—extraordinary though it was. I did so, simply because I would not be seen shrinking, or in a position which might be represented

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

as shrinking, from such a discussion or investigation as I perceived to be challenged. Gentlemen may have it, so far as my consent goes, just so long as they desire it. Let me not be understood, however, for a moment, as intimating that the minority on that occasion, who voted against the introduction of this resolution, are to be supposed, in the smallest degree, or under any circumstances, capable of shrinking from any discussion or inquiry suitable to be entertained. I doubt not, sir, their motives were far higher, and will commend themselves much more to the approbation of the country than will the purposes had in view by those who have sought this discussion. Sincerely desirous of promoting the public business, and seeing the utter uselessness, and worse than uselessness, of such a proceeding, they were ready to do their duty to the country, regardless of all imputations which might be cast upon them, and every misrepresentation of their motives. Such sentiments were highly honorable to my friends, and I feel the force of them fully. But at the same time, sir, I could not but perceive the position in which we were placed; and, at a time when upright motives are little appreciated, I knew how easily we might be made to bear the responsibility or the odium of thwarting and suppressing investigation for political and party purposes. For one, I was, though not desirous, yet willing to meet this matter, here or elsewhere. The fortification bill of the last session failed; every body knows it. How it failed is of exceedingly little consequence; but, as every body does not know it, I have no desire to keep back that information, let the effect of it be what it may. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] endeavors to avoid the question presented upon this resolution, and to turn the debate in a new direction. He says, "the true issue is, not who defeated the ordinary fortification bill last session, but who defeated the appropriation of three millions," which was inserted in it by a vote of the House. This is the question which he has chiefly spoken to; and all the precedents which he cites are only for the purpose of showing that the form in which the three millions were appropriated was not justly liable to the objections made to it. Is the gentleman conscious that the charge against the Senate of having defeated the bill cannot be maintained? And is he, therefore, solicitous of raising a new question—of presenting a new issue? Is it a question any where mooted, who defeated the grant of three millions? Certainly not. Do not the Senate now claim it as a merit? Does any body deny it? Does not every body know that the House was ready, far too ready, to vote the money? Sir, it is no question who defeated the three millions, and the gentleman has labored to little purpose in proving what is nowhere denied. As to whether the Senate ought or ought not to have voted the money, in concurrence with the House, I shall have very little, if any thing, to say in the course of my remarks; nor shall I enter at all into a discussion of our relations with France. When the proper period arrives to speak our sentiments on that interesting topic, I may be inclined to do so; but, at present, my business lies with the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] with the resolution he has offered, and with the speech he has made; and I propose "to join conclusions" with him upon several of the matters he has brought into the discussion. Sir, almost every thing connected with this subject is novel and extraordinary. It is true, a bill of great importance failed to become a law at the last session of Congress; that is not an unusual occurrence. It happens at the close of every Congress that bills fail of being finally passed. It happened at the last Congress, in relation to several, which, if not of equal importance with the fortification bill, were yet of very great consequence to the country. It would have happened to others also, if that making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service had not been converted into an omnibus, to take up all the wayfaring and the tardy. And yet, often as this has occurred, it has never before been thought a fit occasion for executive interference, nor for investigation by a subsequent Congress. The movement in relation to it is altogether unprecedented, and the purposes to be gained do not lie very deeply concealed. Where it originated I know not, but the occasion seems to be seized upon as a very fitting one to throw an additional responsibility upon one branch of the Government, in relation to which the feelings of the President have not, I believe, been much disguised. It is, in my judgment, very extraordinary that the President should have regarded it his duty to introduce this subject into his message in the terms he has used. His duty lies with such bills as Congress send to him for approval, and with those only. He can have no just interference with the legislation of Congress; and upon what ground does it stand that he can inspect the journals of the Houses, examine the unfinished business, and undertake to arraign before the country, or before their successors, either or both Houses for neglect of duty? What proper object, connected with the administration of the Government, is to be promoted by it? What purpose is to be gained? Was it to bring the weight of the executive arm to bear upon the independence of that branch of the Legislature which it is known he does not regard with very especial favor? Whether such an object be a fit one for the Chief Magistrate of the nation to pursue, I leave for others' consideration. And, sir, if the reference to this subject in the message was strange and extraordinary, the introduction of it to the House is no less so. An inquiry into the doings or the omissions of a preceding Legislature! For what purpose? To what end? If we may do so in regard to one Congress, why may we not as to all which have preceded us? If we may vindicate the reputation on the one hand, or impugn the motives on the other, of the last legislative body which assembled here, and it be an object worthy to engage our attention, where will our labors of that description probably terminate? Far better for the country will it be that we now perform our own duties, than to employ ourselves in the vain inquiry why our predecessors did not perform theirs. The member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] manifested unusual indignation in reference to the message sent by the Senate, on the last night of the session, reminding the House of the report of conferees upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses respecting the fortification bill: he found no precedent for such a proceeding. He had examined the journals of Congress from the organization of the Federal Government, and of the British Parliament for I know not how many centuries, and he called upon the Speaker and all the members of the House, old and young, to say whether they had ever heard of such an indignity offered by one branch of a legislative body to the other. Allow me, sir, to inquire of the honorable member, if, in the course of his very profitable and interesting researches, he discovered a precedent for such a resolution as he has now offered? If not, I presume, upon reflection, he will not consider the want of a precedent merely, so entirely objectionable as he seemed to regard it: his resolution, like the message he reprobates, will stand alone—unprecedented in the past, and, I trust, unsupported by any thing in the future. But, sir, most extraordinary of all, most unexpected, were the speech of the honorable member, and the objects avowed to be sought by the proposed inquiry. "To restore harmony between the Houses!" Such was the declared purpose. What an adaptation of means to ends! To restore harmony, to promote a good understanding, by charging, in the bitterest terms, gross dereliction of duty upon the

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

Senate, and individual members of it with little short of treason! Such were the pacific means which the honorable member deemed suitable to employ "to restore harmony." Early in his remarks, the gentleman found himself transgressing a rule well understood, and, hitherto, generally observed—a rule whose purpose is to preserve harmony—which interdicts any allusion, in one branch, to what has been said or done in the other. He declared, upon his responsibility, before the House, and upon higher responsibility than any he can owe to this House, that he would observe, not merely the letter but the spirit of the rule. In what manner this promise was redeemed we have witnessed. He "would transfer the location of the place where these things had happened from the Senate of the United States to the office of the National Intelligencer," and then quoting, with literal fidelity, expressions used in a debate of the Senate, he proceeded to comment upon them in a tone which I forbear to characterize. On the following day, the gentleman interrupted the remarks, pungent and conclusive as they were, of the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. Wise] "to explain." In what he had said the day before, he alluded to no individual whatever; he had no person in his mind; he only "personified a sentiment;" and to that personification he addressed himself. Such was the explanation. Now, sir, it is not for me to question the sincerity of the gentleman, however difficult I may find it to comprehend the distinction which he attempts. But I must be permitted to say, if he was not replying to what had been said in the Senate—if he had no reference to particular members of it—in his own language, "all that eloquence was gratuitous, and all that indignation wastefully squandered away;" and I may add, too, the time of this House was also wastefully squandered away. He either had reference, and pointed reference, too, to a distinguished member of that body, or he had not. If he had, then he violated as well the rules of the House as his promise to observe them in letter and in spirit. If he had not, then was his speech an effusion of unmeaning bombast, aimed at nothing, accomplishing nothing, proving nothing but the ill-suppressed feelings which prompted it. The great business of the nation must stop, to allow the gentleman to run a tilt against "the personification of a sentiment;" and the House exhibits the disgraceful spectacle of boisterous applause at his fancied success in overthrowing "a personified sentiment!"

Mr. Speaker, the honorable member, if I do not wholly misunderstand him, charges the Senate with the failure of the bill at the last session containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications; and, under this general head, he enters into several specifications. He complains of the temper of the Senate; of its indecorum and disrespect to the House, manifested by its prompt rejection of the three million appropriation "with but little debate;" of its adherence to that rejection, and of its message to the House in the last moments of its existence, reminding it of the report of conferees, by which the bill could even then have been saved. He goes farther: he assigns motives, and degrading motives, too, for the action of the Senate, or rather of "those who lead it;" and he finds matter for grave complaint and accusation, and for holding that body responsible to the country for the failure of the bill in question. How widely different the same objects appear to different minds! We are all liable to be swayed by passion and prejudice; and no truth is more generally acknowledged than that the powers of the intellect—the reason—the understanding—are susceptible of the greatest influence and the grossest perversion from the qualities of the heart. Now, sir, to my mind, the particulars which the honorable gentleman has singled out as proof that the Senate are responsible for the loss of the bill, are precisely those which demonstrate incontrovertibly their extreme solicitude and desire to pass it. What, in few words, is the history of that bill? It passed the House some weeks before the close of the session, in the usual form, making the ordinary appropriations. Every attempt to increase the sums appropriated by it was voted down by the majority of the House, under the lead of the friends of the administration. We of the minority struggled for larger means of defence, but in vain. The bill went to the Senate. Large and important additions were made to it there, under the recommendation and estimates, as is understood, of the executive Departments, and the bill passed and was returned to the House. So far, surely, the Senate are not responsible for defeating the ordinary appropriation for fortifications and means of defence. Their control over the bill had ceased. It rested with the House, and the House alone, so far as Congress was concerned, whether it should become a law. It reposed more than a week quietly upon the Speaker's table, and until the last day, and very near the last hour of the existence of that Congress, before its slumbers were broken. At about eight o'clock in the evening of the 3d day of March, it was called up for consideration. No objection was raised to the amendments of the Senate, which went to enlarge the sums to be expended in fortifying exposed points of the country. But the extraordinary and unlooked-for proposition was made of appropriating three millions of dollars, in addition to all which had already been appropriated for specific objects, to be expended under the direction of the President, and at his discretion, in the military and naval service. The minority of the House, opposed though they were to arming the President with the enormous and dangerous power—dangerous to the peace of the country—which this grant of money would have conferred, yet contented themselves with a silent vote. The time was short. They were anxious that the bill should pass, and that other bills then pending should pass also. A single speech would have defeated the proposed amendment, but it would have defeated the bill also; hence no man raised his voice against it. We permitted it to go through Committee of the Whole, and to pass the House, but we never approved it. We gave proof of the sincerity of our desire to provide the ordinary means for defence, in silently submitting to that extraordinary, and, as we viewed it, alarming proposition. The bill went to the Senate. Objections were made to this appropriation, in the particular form it stood, resting chiefly, if not entirely, upon a question of constitutional power, as to appropriations so indefinite and unlimited, and applicable to no specific objects. These objections, and the grounds upon which they stood, were well known to the House; and the House might have obviated them if it had been disposed. I do not say that they were or were not well founded. I do not touch that point. It is enough for me, that Senators, competent to judge, bound by their oath to support the constitution, regarded them as fatal obstacles. It was their province to determine for themselves. They had the same right, and lay under the same high obligations to exercise their judgments fairly and dispassionately, as pertained to the House; and there is no reason to doubt that they acted in obedience to their solemn convictions of duty. That duty compelled them to disagree to the amendment of the House, and they fulfilled it promptly, and perhaps, as the gentleman says, "with but little debate." The House then insisted upon its amendment. The next step of the Senate was to adhere to its disagreement, passing over the intermediate stage of insisting also. Why was this? What is the true reason for these prompt proceedings on the part of the Senate? The gentleman sees in them nothing but disrespect, and indecorum, and insolence, and a determination to defeat the bill. More time should have been taken—debate should have been had—all the forms of parliamentary etiquette should have been observed! Why, sir, does not the honorable gentleman recollect that the hours, nay, that the very minutes, of that Congress were numbered, and were fast wasting away? In addition to its business of legislation, the Senate was pressed with business of an executive character, and every moment of its time was actively employed. Was that an occasion to stand upon questions of mere punctilio and matters of idle ceremony? No, sir; the Senate, entertaining objections of a character which can never be abandoned by men who respect themselves or deserve the respect of others, but which might have been obviated on the part of the House, lost none of the time, more valuable than all the precedents of ceremony which the gentleman can find in his labored researches, in bringing the subject of disagreement to direct issue; and with all the “indecent haste” they are accused of, a conference, the usual parliamentary mode of reconciling disagreeing votes, was not obtained seasonably to have reported, as is now contended, during the life of that Congress. To my mind, these proceedings manifest an earnest solicitude to save the bill, rather than a willingness to defeat it. The Senate overlooked all minor considerations—disregarded all inferior and subordinate matters, in the great object of appropriating largely for works of defence and security. They exposed themselves to this very charge of precipitation and indecorum, or what under other circumstances might be so considered, in their zeal to get the bill so framed as to be acceptable to both Houses. What could they do? Compelled to vote for an amendment which they regarded as unconstitutional, and which they could not, therefore, under any circumstances agree to; or to see a measure they were anxious to adopt perish before their eyes, with no power to save it—how were they to act? The steps taken by them, standing in the emergency they did, were the only ones possible by which the bill could have been rescued from the destruction that awaited it; and if they had been met by the House in a corresponding temper, it would have become a law. How it failed, I shall consider presently. But, sir, “the message” to which the gentleman refers, and upon which he has expended his warmest indignation—what was it? A message from the Senate “respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses” in respect to the fortification bill. It may have been unusual and without precedent—I do not dispute it. But that it was insolent and contemptuous towards the House, or was so designed, or so regarded, I utterly deny. If it was unusual and without precedent, it was because the condition in which the business between the Houses stood was new and without precedent. Emergencies—extreme cases—make their own precedents, and furnish their own justification. What was the condition of the bill to which the message referred?

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

The two Houses had disagreed in relation to the three millions. A committee of conference had been appointed. A report had been agreed upon unanimously, as was then supposed, and which it was not doubted would be satisfactory to each House. The chairman of the committee of conference [Mr. CAMBRELENG] retained the papers, with a view of making the report to the House first; after which it was to be sent to the Senate, and, until thus sent, the Senate had no power over it. A considerable time elapsed, and no intelligence was received by the Senate from this branch. Few moments only remained. The bill was every where deemed of great importance. The report of the conferees, if adopted by the Houses, would save it. Nothing had been done in this body, nor, as they feared, would be done, upon the report of the conference. To meet a state of things so new, so unusual, so extraordinary, demanded new and unprecedented proceedings. Deeply solicitous for the passage of the bill, the Senate, regardless of forms, not studious of precise rules of ceremony, made a last effort for its safety. Surprised they doubtless were, that the conferees on the part of the House, who had so lately agreed in a report, should fail to present it, and that no information should be afforded them of its final disposition. In this view of the matter, sir, I can perceive nothing in that message, against which the gentleman has directed his sharpest indignation, but a respectful though earnest intimation that the Senate was ready to pass the bill in the shape which the conferees appointed by the House had agreed to recommend. They could not do it until the papers should be sent to them. Where was the disrespect and the insolence of such an intimation? I confess, sir, I have not a perception keen enough to discern it. One sincerely searching for the truth, unheated by other considerations, would not be very apt, I think, to discover it.

The honorable member, sir, has furnished us with a history of the introduction of the three million appropriation into the fortification bill. He says it was founded upon a resolution of the House, unanimously adopted on the preceding day, in these words:

“Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty with France of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on.”

I perceive nothing in this leading to hostilities, and requiring measures, and extraordinary measures, too, of defence. Yet it is said the appropriation was consequent upon this resolution—growing out of it—part and parcel of it, and absolutely necessary to give it efficiency.

[Mr. ADAMS interrupted. He hoped he should not be misrepresented. He had not said so. He said the appropriation was proposed in consequence of the resolution unanimously adopted the preceding day.]

I shall not, sir, designedly, misrepresent the gentleman. There is quite as much in the speech which I have before me, without misrepresentation, as can be maintained. The gentleman has said: “It was well known to every member of the House, and he believed to every person out of the House, that the appropriation of three millions was introduced in consequence of the vote on that resolution the night before. It was well known that the resolution, which finally passed by that vote, had been contested by a debate of several days immediately before its passage, upon grounds that such a resolution would occasion war. If you look, said he, to the journals of the House for the resolution which passed, and to the several resolutions proposed as substitutes for it, you will see that it was admitted with extreme reluctance by many members of the House, that it was ardently and perseveringly contested, and upon the grounds that it would occasion a war. Under these circumstances, although the House were not of opinion that it would give just cause for war, still, how was it possible for a statesman, looking to the interests of our common country, not to see that these reasons so pressed upon the consideration of the House, and looking to the action of another Government, might have that tendency? The conduct of a foreign Government, to be predicated upon this act of our own, was matter of foresight and conjecture. There was misunderstanding and irritation between our Government and that of France. The members of the House who had resisted the passage of the resolution, intelligent and patriotic men, had urged the House against it; and all the tender sympathies of our nature, and all the sentiments of humanity in our bosoms, had been appealed to as warnings against that resolution. The image of war, in all its terrors and with all its calamities, had been held up before us to deter the House from the assertion of the nation's rights and of the nation's honor contained in that resolution. Conscious that the resolution could not give any just cause of offence, the House did not believe that it would offend or endanger the peace of the country; yet in deference to the fears of the minority, and as an earnest of their sincerity in the determination to insist upon the execution of the treaty, it was deemed fitting that the country should put itself in an attitude of defence, to meet the worst possible contingency, and to sustain that resolution which they unanimously passed. These were the grounds upon which that item was introduced on the last day of the session. And why on the last day? Because it was only the night before that the unanimous vote had passed.

"In all the debate in the National Intelligencer to which he had referred, there was no more trace of such a resolution as having passed the House, than if it had never existed."

Now, sir, I am not sensible that I misunderstand or misrepresent the gentleman. He certainly attributes the appropriation of three millions to an apprehension somewhere existing that the adoption of the resolution might lead to measures requiring defence on our part—to a determination on the part of the House to sustain that resolution. The resolution was the ground-work—the basis of the appropriation. Sir, I take issue upon these assertions. The appropriation would have been moved, I doubt not, and agreed to, whatever resolution had been passed. The particular resolution was passed unanimously, not because it looked to war, and involved contingent appropriation, but because it looked to peace, and was a rebuke upon hostile designs. If it was not so designed, and so to be regarded, if it enfolded within itself any thing which might by possibility lead to war, and which demanded corresponding preparations, then I will say, with my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] that we were deceived and betrayed into its support. We agreed to it as a measure of peace. The abandonment of the treaty nobody dreamed of. Even France had not intimidated it. Hostile movements, or movements tending in any degree to hostilities, were never intended by us. We would not have moved an inch in that direction; least of all would we have done any thing to place the question of peace or war in the sole hand of the President. The resolution, therefore, was not the foundation, I repeat, of the appropriation of three millions. It was not so understood, as the gentleman says it was, on all sides of the House. On the other hand, so far from being regarded as a "consequence"—a "consummation of the resolution," it was looked upon as directly repugnant to it. A distinguished member from Virginia, [Mr. GORDON,] who I regret is not now here, and who represented the principles of the ancient Commonwealth with great ability, then said: "Yesterday, the House had voted unanimously that there was no occasion to make war; and now, just before the moment of adjournment, the extraordinary proposition is made, to remove all the guards from the Treasury, and to give up that and all the legislative power to the President, in order to carry on a war." The same sentiment prevailed among many members of that House. The appropriation was considered utterly inconsistent with the object and the spirit of that resolution, which is now represented as having been the basis of it. Nor, sir, is the gentleman any more correct in the remark that "the resolution which finally passed by that vote had been contested by a debate of several days immediately before its passage, upon grounds that such a resolution would occasion war." The truth is, the resolution which passed was hardly debated at all. It was scarcely resisted. The reference to the journals, which the gentleman challenges, does not bear him out. But this is a matter, sir, about which there need be no controversy. The journals show the facts. On the 27th day of February, the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a report, accompanied by these resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th of July, 1831; and that this House will insist on its execution as ratified by both Governments.

"2. Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

A minority of that committee made a separate report, offering no specific resolutions, but expressing the sentiment that the execution of the treaty should be insisted on "at all hazards."

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] then offered his resolutions, as substitutes for those proposed by the committee, in these words:

"1. Resolved, That the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the Government of France, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, ought, in no event, to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States.

"2. Resolved, That if it be, in the opinion of the President of the United States, compatible with the honor and interest of the United States, during the interval until the next session of Congress, to resume the negotiations between the United States and France, he be requested to do so.

"3. Resolved, That no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time."

These various resolutions and the reports from the committee were debated on Saturday, 28th February, and also on Monday, the 2d day of March; and these were the resolutions which, upon the one side or the other, were "contested" and "resisted." The animated debate to which the gentleman refers, and the spirited resistance, were not upon his resolution which finally passed—for it had not then been proposed; but it was to some of these, and chiefly to that which looked to contingent preparations. Objections were made to the phraseology employed in the report and resolutions. The expression "at all hazards" was regarded as minatory, and so also the words "in no event," which occur in the first of the gentleman's proposed substitutes. Milder language was sought. Various unsatisfactory amendments and suggestions were offered, all going to soften down the asperities which were thought to exist in the language and spirit of the reports and resolutions. Finally, at a late hour in the evening, the House having been in continued session fourteen hours, a new resolution, or perhaps a modification of one which had been already offered, was proposed. Very little, if any, debate occurred upon it. None is reported. It was unanimously adopted, with but two slight efforts to substitute others in its stead. These are the facts. They cannot be controverted. The House will now judge whether that resolution, which is asserted to have been the foundation of the appropriation of three millions, was debated and resisted several days, upon the ground that it would or might involve the nation in war—whether it was agreed to under any expectation that it was to be followed up by measures for defence. As to the notice said to have been given by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that he should submit a motion for large contingent appropriations, I lay it out of the case. Few heard it. But what of it? Was the House thereby pledged to vote any appropriation he might choose to propose? Above all,

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

was the Senate bound also to take notice, to know that it was the consequence, the consummation of our resolution, and, despite their constitutional objections, to grant the money accordingly? Did the resolution which had been already adopted thereby change its character, and, from being pacific, become all at once belligerent, because the member from New York took upon him to give notice to the House of what he should propose? I repudiate all such conclusions, utterly, entirely.

The honorable member, sir, [Mr. ADAMS,] has proceeded a step farther. He impugns the motive of the Senate in withholding the three millions. Their proceedings upon the subject of our difficulties with France at the last session were, he says, a "do-nothing policy"—a "paralytic policy." The unanimous resolution of the House was considered "a pungent, though tacit, rebuke of that policy;" and if the appropriation had been agreed to, it "would have made the Senate the unwilling accessory to implied censure upon its own quietism under foreign wrong." "The system of the Senate" was, "to do nothing." A resolution had passed that body, unanimously, in these words:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at present, to adopt any legislative measure in regard to the state of affairs between the United States and France."

"This was," says the gentleman "a resolution not only declining to do that which the President had recommended to vindicate the rights and the honor of the nation, but positively determining to do nothing, not even to express a sense of the wrongs which the country was enduring from France. Such was the system of the Senate."

Does the honorable member perceive, sir, upon whom his censures fall? Does he recollect his new-found friends and allies, the leaders and supporters of the administration in that body, must come in for their share of responsibility, if any justly attaches to the proceedings of the Senate? Does he not remember that "the system of the Senate" was unanimously adopted; that it was understood to have the concurrence and approbation of the Executive himself; that it was approved by the official organ of the administration, which has now become the chosen channel of communication of the gentleman's own opinions? Does he forget that the presses throughout the country—the party presses and others—held the language of approbation upon that proceeding of the Senate? What responsibility, then, I pray to know—whose indignation had they any apprehension of incurring? A unanimous vote, for which each member was equally responsible; approved by all parties, complained of by none; what had they to fear? The load of reproach attempted to be thrown upon them falls upon broad shoulders.

At what period of time, sir, may I ask the honorable member, did he make the discovery that so weighty a load of responsibility lay upon the Senate? When did he find out "where the real sting of the three million appropriation lay?" Something was said about arguments which had been used elsewhere being the fruit of "nine or ten months' meditation." What has "nine or ten months' meditation" done for him, in the way of memory or argument? Does he forget what his own sentiments were at the last session, as to "the do-nothing policy" of the Senate? Allow me, sir, to refresh his memory a little. On the 7th of February, certain papers touching our relations with France were transmitted to Congress by the President. A discussion of considerable interest ensued. The gentleman gave his opinions at some length. I was so unfortunate as to differ from him, and some words passed between us on that occasion. Among other things, the gentleman charged the Senate with "dodging the question"—doing nothing; at least he was so understood and so reported. The tenor of his remarks impressed every one with the belief that he was prepared to go far, very far, in the support of executive measures tending to hostilities. So it stood until the 14th of the same month, when the gentleman again favored the House with his views. I will not say he retracted or denied what he had said before; but at least he explained and modified. As to the policy of the Senate, "the do-nothing policy," what did he say? Having requested permission to explain, and having stated the circumstances under which he had charged the Senate with dodging the question, he proceeded—

"That explanation he now wished to make, publicly disclaiming all intention of any thing disrespectful to the Senate. He disclaimed it in the most explicit manner; and, had the debate proceeded, it had been his intention ultimately to recommend that the same course should be taken by the House. He should have recommended to the House to 'dodge the question' for the present, in the existing state of our information.

"He thought the Senate had acted as was their duty to do; and the conclusion to which they had unanimously arrived was the conclusion which he should have been desirous that the House should adopt. But the Senate had acted; they had not gone to sleep on the state of our relations with France."

So much, sir, for that part of the gentleman's remarks which goes to assign motives for the proceedings of the Senate, founded upon their reprehensible policy; and further I deem it unnecessary to reply.

The gentleman has spoken of "the imminent danger of war" which impended over the country at the close of the last session, and which he thinks justified and required contingent preparations for defence. "Imminent danger of war!" Was that, indeed, the condition of our affairs? Was it so understood? Did the gentleman himself consider it in that light? The only real danger of war which I perceived grew out of this very appropriation of three millions. If the power which this grant of money would have vested in the President had been conferred, I am by no means sure that we should not, at this very moment, have been in the midst of a war. But, sir, what did we think at that time upon this subject? Let me refer again to the remarks of the honorable gentleman, on the 14th of February:

"But, in conclusion, Mr. ADAMS wished to give notice (if such a notice could be necessary) to all merchants of the United States, that there was not the slightest danger; that any thing which might by possibility lead to war should proceed from that House, or from the other branch of the Legislature. He now said, upon his responsibility to the nation, that there was no danger of any thing being done by either House, which might by possibility lead to war with France."

Now, sir, in such a state of things, one would hardly suppose that the danger of war was very imminent. How was it at a still later period? The third resolution moved by the gentleman, on the 27th of February, doubtless expressed his own opinion at that time, which was, "that no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time."

I have already said that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was made the same day. It became immediately a question what disposition should be made of the third resolution, which had in view "contingent preparations for defence." The particular means of providing "contingent preparations" which the committee had in contemplation, we shall discover by referring to their report. It is in these words:

"The bill now before the House authorizing the sale of our stock in the Bank of the United States, would, if adopted, afford all the revenue necessary. The committee is of opinion that the whole or a part of the fund to be derived from this source should be appropriated for the purpose of arming our fortifications, and for making other military and naval preparations for the defence of the country, in case such expenditures should become necessary before the next meeting of Congress."

A strong solicitude was manifested, and an effort made, on the part of certain gentlemen, to adopt that third resolution forthwith; so that the bill for the sale of the bank stock might immediately be passed, it being the last day on which bills could be sent from one House to the other. The friends of "contingent preparations" and warlike measures urged speedy action. The effort on the other hand was, to discuss that resolution in a Committee of the Whole House, where we knew latitude of debate could be secured, and where the previous question could not be applied. The gentleman from Massachusetts was with us on that occasion. He advocated the motion made by a highly distinguished member from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] to commit the resolution to the Committee of the Whole. He said "it was the only constitutional course." "The resolution proposed to spend the money of the nation; but its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was objected to, because, if it went there, the House could not be bound to pass it by the previous question. It was, in effect, a proposition to tax the people; to take seven millions of their money, and appropriate it to certain purposes." "He now discovered that war with France was to be connected with the war upon the bank. The two wars were to be united, each supporting the other." "Is this a proceeding touching an appropriation of money, or not? It was certainly a proceeding by which seven millions of the public money was to be taken and expended in a windmill war against France, in favor of which, he thanked God, there had yet been no expression of opinion on the part of this House." "It was now for the first time disclosed that these two wars were to be blended together—the war with France, and the war with the bank; one was to carry the other, if either was too heavy to sustain itself." Yes, sir, the war with the bank found favor in the House; it was popular. It was to carry the heavy load of the war with France. So thought the member at that time. Other gentlemen spoke also. The then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. POLK] said: "The third resolution of the committee should be acted on forthwith, to the end that the bill to sell the stock should be acted on to-day. He suggested the propriety of acting on the resolution forthwith. To commit this subject was to bury it." Certainly it was. That was precisely what we desired to do. The gentleman from Massachusetts was with us. He desired no preparations for "a windmill war;" a Quixotic expedition to be sure it was, in which at one time we had strong fears that the member from Massachusetts was to act the subordinate part. Well, sir, we succeeded. The resolution was buried. The war was defeated, as well that against the bank as that against France. In all the debate, the honorable gentleman made no allusion to any other means of defence or preparation. His objection was directed not to the particular mode of supplying the means then recommended, but it went to the whole matter of hostile measures. The war itself was held up to ridicule, and justly held up. And yet, sir, it is now said we were then in "imminent danger." On the following day (28th of February) the gentleman again spoke to the questions growing out of our French relations. He expressed his regret that orders had been given Mr. Livingston to leave Paris, in the event of the rejection of the bill of indemnity by the French Chambers. Such a course, "according to the usage of nations, might be construed into an act of hostility."

[Mr. ADAMS. That was a sufficient reason, then, for the appropriation of three millions.]

Unfortunately, sir, no such reason was then assigned or thought of. But that is not what I am now considering. I am showing, sir, that the honorable member did not, from any cause, at the close of the last session, consider the danger so imminent as to require preparations for defence; for, immediately following the expression of his disapprobation of the recall of Mr. Livingston, he proceeds: "We should therefore be left defenceless all over the ocean for many months—at least until Congress could be convened, and take measures for the defence of the country." Now, sir, although the gentleman spoke with much earnestness, and at some length, disapproving this step of the President, and expressing his opinion that, by possibility, it might lead to hostilities, he nowhere gave the slightest indication of a wish that Congress should provide for such an emergency; on the contrary, he distinctly avowed the opinion that nothing would be done "until Congress could be convened." Three days only before the termination of that session, when the whole subject of our French affairs was before us, was discussed, and was understood in all its aspects, did the honorable member anticipate any necessity for such an appropriation as was subsequently made? Did he recommend it, or advise it? No, sir. I submit, then, whether the danger was so imminent, the emergency so pressing, the necessity so overshadowing and irresistible, as to have required that appropriation in the objectionable form it was proposed? But, sir, it has been said that the constitutional objections of the Senate finally "melted down to a mere question of dollars and cents," whether the appropriation should be three millions or eight hundred thousand dollars. Is it possible that the honorable member does not perceive the true ground upon which these objections stood? Has the intellectual acumen for which he has been distinguished become so utterly blunted under the influence of feelings and passions which he seems to cherish? Nothing is plainer to the most obtuse understanding than the difference between the appropriation of three millions as it passed the House, and the proposition agreed upon by the conferees to reduce it to eight hundred thousand dollars, which, doubtless, would have received the sanction of the Senate. It is not in the amount, but in the form of the appropriation. In the one case, it was indefinite, loose, limited to no specific objects, undefined as to purpose. This was the objection. In the other case, it was a proposition for a precise, defined, limited appropriation, in the usual form, and for ordinary purposes—"three hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications of the country; five hundred thousand dollars for the repair and equipment of ships of war." The purpose is clearly expressed, the object declared. Now, sir, does not the gentleman perceive the wide difference between these forms of appropriation? Is he so blind as not to see that the constitutional objections which lay in the one case did not apply to the other? And will he then say that it all "melted down to a question of dollars and cents?" Sir, I put it to his candor, I put it to his sense of justice, to answer.

Much indignation has been expressed by the honorable member [Mr. ADAMS] at the charge he supposes to have been made by the "personified sentiment," in the columns of the National Intelligencer, against the last House of Representatives, of "man-worship" and subserviency to executive dictation. Whether such a charge be well or ill-founded, I shall not discuss. I wish only to produce some authority upon which it may be maintained: an authority having weight in certain quarters, and possibly which may be of some consideration with the gentleman himself—it is the authority of his own assertions and opinions. In the debate I have already referred to,

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

(of the 27th of February,) the gentleman expressed himself in these terms: "In the first place, it was evident the question was to be managed on party grounds. The supporters of the administration were alone to be heard on the subject; and what they proposed was to be carried. The minority was to have no right to say any thing but 'yea' or 'nay' to the propositions of the leaders of the majority. The bugle-horn of the party will be sounded, and its friends will be told that they must pass the bill, in order to support the administration. When all the liege men of the administration have answered to their names, as they ought, according to the politics and morals of the party, the question will be put and the bill passed." Now, sir, these are not charges, in so many words, of "man-worship;" but they are so in substance and spirit. They are precisely that same subserviency which has been elsewhere denominated "man-worship;" and, for any thing I know, that same charge which he reprobates so severely was founded upon his own description of a portion of the last House. It may suit the purposes of the gentleman now to profess a high respect, as he has done, for those he then denominated "liege men"—rallying at the blast of the bugle—following submissively the dictation of party leaders, and doing as they were bid, "in order to support the administration." If "man-worship" can go farther than this description, I am at a loss to know how to define it.

Mr. Speaker, I have said I would not discuss the question whether the Senate ought or ought not to have concurred in the appropriation of three millions. A word or two only is all I design to say. I voted against it in the House, and I have no wish to retract the vote: not because I was unwilling then, or am unwilling now, to appropriate money largely, amply, to put the country in a state of entire defence; I desire it of all things; but because I perceived, as I thought, something beside the defence of the country lurking under that plausible pretext: means of aggression, opportunities of exciting collision, and of kindling up in the public mind warlike dispositions, were feared to be enveloped within it. Sir, I desire as much as any man to defend the country. Since I have filled a seat here, I have voted, I hazard little in saying, uniformly voted for the largest sums which have been proposed for the military and naval service. I well recollect the efforts of a distinguished member from South Carolina, [Mr. Drayton,] formerly at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, to increase the annual expenditures for fortifications; I voted with him from year to year, in common with my friends who are now charged with having left the country defenceless. We thought it sound policy, in a time of peace, to prepare for those emergencies which every nation may at some day or other reasonably anticipate. Peace is a blessing which no country can assure to itself for a long period of years to come. By whom, sir, was that prudent forecast thwarted and defeated? By the party which now claims the exclusive merit of putting the country in a posture of defence, by a midnight vote of three millions, on the eve of hostilities! Sir, we did not believe in the potency of midnight appropriations for next day's security. The watchwords of the party were "economy," "retrenchment," "saving of the public money;" and we saw the extraordinary spectacle of a Government boasting, not how much it had done, but how little, for the benefit of the country; not how much it had expended for the public good, but how much it had hoarded up in the coffers of the Treasury. It pointed to no impregnable muniments of defence; to no works of wide-spread and lasting improvement, as testimony of its watchfulness and protection of national interests and welfare, but to a miserable array of figures annually displayed for the gratification and laudation of all the faithful, showing only with what a miserly grasp it could hold on to the public treasure; and all the while, amid the loudest boast of retrenchment, the annual expenditures were largely increasing. Sir, I am glad to see, at last, something proposed in the way of defence—glad to see something doing, among others, for the State to which I belong. Some two or three years ago I moved in this matter, and endeavored to call the attention of the War Department to its exposed and defenceless condition. I received no encouragement or countenance, and I have never seen the time when I could have proposed, under favorable auspices, any measures of defence for that exposed frontier. Now, sir, as to the propriety of large and unusual appropriations at this time for naval and military service—appropriations which would not be thought expedient but for the aspect of our foreign relations—we are placed in an attitude by no means free from embarrassment. If there be really a danger of war, if hostilities are in any degree probable, and likely to ensue, I will go as far as the foremost in providing the means of defence and security. But if, as we are repeatedly assured, the prospect of a speedy and pacific adjustment of our difficulties grows brighter daily—for one, I am not disposed to nurse and feed a warlike passion; to encourage, what I greatly fear needs to be restrained, a desire elsewhere to terminate by an appeal to arms these needless differences. Sufficient, however, to meet these questions when the period for their consideration arrives.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the question presented in the resolution—"the cause and circumstances" of the failure, at the last session, of the bill making the ordinary appropriations for fortifications. How did it happen? By whose means? In what way? These are questions gravely put, and must be as gravely answered. The bill, we all know, passed the House, containing only the "ordinary appropriations," and, in the usual course of business, was sent to the Senate. It passed that body also, in due season, with a considerable increase of ordinary appropriations, made, it is understood, upon estimates furnished by the proper executive Departments, and was returned to the House a week before the close of the session. So far, surely, the Senate cannot be justly charged with a disposition to defeat the bill. All its control over it had ceased, as I have already said, in another connexion. Its fate was in the hands of the House. Did it pass this branch of the Congress? How did it pass? With the three million appropriation, already so often adverted to, suddenly, not to say rashly inserted—objectionable in point of form—uncalled for and unwanted, so far as we had any information, by the Executive. Does any body doubt that, but for this amendment, the bill would have passed, and become a law? This was the fatal blow, of which it lingered, and at last died. The bill was returned to the Senate, embracing this new and, till then, unheard-of provision. The Senate, under the views which it took of its constitutional power, could not agree to it, and the bill came back to the House without a concurrence in the amendment. It was in the power of the House to have waived its amendment, and to have passed the bill. It chose not to do so. The gentleman himself has given the true cause of its failure. He voted to recede, he says, because he was aware, if the House pertinaciously adhered, the bill would be lost. It did adhere, and the bill was lost. It is unquestionably true, if the Senate had voted the three millions, the bill would have passed; and it is no less true, if the House had waived it, it would have passed also. It failed, therefore, from a disagreement. Pausing at this stage of the history, I cannot but inquire, looking at the safety of the bill merely, what was the most reasonable course to be pursued? Which branch could most rationally be expected, for the success of the bill, to recede from its position? It will be recollected this was a bill making ordinary appropriations; the House encumbered it with an extraordinary one. It ran against constitutional objections—the very last to be surrendered. Could it reasonably be expected or required of the Senate, in violation, as they believed, of their duty and the plain injunctions of the constitution, to adopt that provision? Was it unreasonable to expect and to require of the House that the bill, in its ordinary form, should be permitted to go along unobstructed? In some considerable portions of the bill, both branches concurred. Why not agree, then, and, so far as they did agree, pass the bill? The House, and the House alone, refused to do it. It said to the Senate, We agree with you that the ordinary fortification bill ought to pass—the country requires it; but we will not pass it, unless you will agree to an extraordinary appropriation, which you hold to be unconstitutional and inexpedient; and, if you refuse it, you will be responsible for our failure to pass the ordinary bill. It seems to me, sir, there can hardly be two opinions upon such a proposition. The Senate would not agree to so unreasonable a demand. But what did it do? It agreed, for the purpose of securing the passage of the bill, to meet the House upon some middle ground. A compromise was effected by conferees, appointed by each body. The Senate waited and waited, as we have seen, to adopt and carry this compromise into effect. The House neglected or refused to do so, and thereby the bill was lost. Can there be a doubt in which branch it failed, and by whose means it was lost? But it is contended that, before this arrangement was effected, the House was dissolved—its constitutional functions ceased; and, for that reason, it could not adopt the compromise recommended by the conferees. Suppose it had been so; are the Senate therefore responsible for the failure of the bill? But it was not so. I agree entirely in my recollections with the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] who has just spoken, and with my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED.] There was time, after the report had been agreed upon, and before 12 o'clock, to have made it to the House, and procured its adoption. The conferees did return, as the gentleman says, before the Cumberland road bill was put upon its passage; and it is agreed, on all hands, that the midnight hour arrived while the eyes and noses were being called on that bill. In this, I am confident I cannot be mistaken. Why, then, it may be inquired, was not the report made? Why did not the bill pass? I cannot pretend to answer. But this I will say: that I discovered, early in the stages of disagreement, as I thought, a willingness to permit the bill to be lost. I do not say with a view to throw the responsibility of it upon the Senate; but with a distinct avowal that its loss would be justly chargeable to that quarter. As early as nine or ten o'clock in the evening, when the first notice was received from the Senate of its disagreement to the appropriation, on a motion to recede, the member from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] said, “he hoped the House would not recede. If the Senate had taken the responsibility of defeating the appropriation, it might remain with them. He would take no part of it.” This was the first intimation that the responsibility must be cast upon the Senate. Others took the same view, and spoke with warmth, to say the least of it. The House did not recede; and the bill again went, its oft-travelled path, to the Senate. In a short period, between 10 and 11 o'clock, according to my recollection, it came back, with a message that the Senate adhered to its disagreement to our appropriation. What occurred then, sir? A very strong and decided disposition was expressed by leading gentlemen that the House should adhere also, and thereby cut off all opportunity of passing the bill, and every means of compromise. The only other alternative was, by asking a conference; and by that mode the bill might even then be saved. The member from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENGE] moved “to adhere;” in other words, to destroy the bill beyond the power of revival. An honorable member from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] moved “to recede;” thereby preserving the power to pass the bill. An honorable member from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. POLK,] said, “the motion to adhere had priority to the other;” undoubtedly signifying thereby his desire that the motion should prevail—that the bill should be lost. An honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. LYTTLE,] who had no hesitation to speak freely and fearlessly on all occasions, as he did eloquently, his opinions, addressed the House in these words: “He objected entirely,” he said, “to any conciliatory proposition. The House had gone as far as prudence and patriotism would justify them in going to conciliate the Senate. The only question was, where the responsibility of the loss of the bill should lodge? Let the other body take the responsibility of defeating it”—the appropriation of three millions. He conjured the House not to depart from the stand it had assumed; declared it would be pusillanimous to do so; and urgently and eloquently rallied his friends to stand firm upon that question. Now, sir, I can readily perceive in these proceedings a strong solicitude, and determination, too, to hold the Senate responsible for the loss of the bill; I look in vain for evidence of an anxiety to save the ordinary appropriations for fortifications. They were, apparently, very readily given up, for the other object, which was possibly regarded a much greater one—of prostrating the Senate. The majority of the House, however, did not sustain the motion to adhere, but adopted the wiser course of requesting a conference. It was seen that the majority which passed the appropriation was giving way. It passed, at first, by a majority of 32. It was insisted on, in the next vote, by a majority reduced to 23; a third vote reduced it to 19; and if another vote had been allowed to be taken, I doubt not the whole amendment would have been abandoned rather than the bill should fail. Another vote upon it was not permitted from that hour to the present. The conferees were appointed, and, I have already said, returned to this hall in season to have reported before 12 o'clock. The compromise which they had agreed to recommend was immediately known to the members, and privately discussed. There was but one voice, so far as I heard, in the House, and that was in favor of its adoption. We were anxiously waiting, from moment to moment, for the report to be made; when, suddenly, as by an electric shock, a thrill was sent through this House, agitating and moving the countenances and voices of members; little squads were collected here and there, and all at once we heard it echoed and re-echoed on all sides that the report could not be made; the bill must fail, and the responsibility would rest upon the Senate. From what quarter this came, by whose agency brought about, I do not pretend to say—I do not know. But it was familiarly spoken of at the time, that a certain high personage, in accordance with whose views, it now appears, the three millions were voted, upon being apprized of the result of the conference, manifested exceeding indignation that his faithful Commons should succumb in any degree to “the factious Senate.” Rather would he lose the bill altogether, and they would be held responsible for it. This, or something very like it, was soon known in this hall; and it was also known that the President had closed, or was about to close, his official relations with Congress; its constitutional functions, in his judgment, having ceased. Certain it is, that the report of the conferees was not offered by the chairman, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] and, when called upon for it, he declined to produce it, upon the ground that the existence of the House had ceased, and, also, that a quorum was not present. The report was then offered by another member of the committee, [Mr. LEWIS,] the third [Mr. HUBBARD] having very suddenly disappeared from the House, although he had previously expressed considerable anxiety for the passage of the bill. I shall not discuss the question whether the powers of Congress terminate or not at 12 o'clock at night on the 3d day of March, in every alternate year. I thought otherwise, and remained, and was willing to remain after that hour, to transact the business of the nation. It is true, we found it difficult, very difficult, to obtain a quorum within the bar of the House. Still we did so, whenever one was wanted by certain leading gentlemen. Just before the adjournment, and long after the "conscientious scruples" of gentlemen began to operate, a motion was made by a member from Virginia [Mr. MASON] to take up the resolution making compensation to Mr. Letcher, a member of the House. A quorum was present, and the motion prevailed. A motion was made to strike out the preamble; a quorum was present, and that also prevailed. The precise question then pending was upon an amendment providing compensation also to Thomas P. Moore, who had contested, unsuccessfully, Mr. Letcher's seat. The previous question was moved and carried—a quorum present and voting—134 in all. The amendment was thus cut off, and the resolution was likely to pass, without providing compensation to Mr. Moore. Instantly the quorum was broken up; 21 vanished, as in the twinkling of an eye, and but 113 were found voting. A much larger number were about these walls, and lobbies, and avenues; but they could not be had when a vote was to be taken. Who the individuals were, thus appearing and disappearing, as occasion might require, I have made no examination of the journal to discover. I seek not to know. This, however, I will say, they were not of that minority which resisted the appropriation of three millions; who were anxious to pass the ordinary fortification bill; who desired rather to defend the country than to heap responsibility upon the Senate. Undoubtedly there were some who entertained sincere and deep-founded convictions that the constitutional powers of Congress terminated at midnight. Not more, I think, however, than four or five assigned that reason for not voting. It was a perfectly satisfactory, and an honorable reason, for those who sincerely held that opinion. An honorable and valuable member from Georgia, [Mr. Gilmer,] of as upright intentions, as pure a heart, and as brilliant an intellect as any man who sits within these walls, entertained that conviction. And what did he do? Departed, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, at that door, through which he never again returned. He did so; and honorable was it to him that he did so. Enjoying and acting upon his own constitutional opinions, in which no man was more sincere, though I often differed with him, he left others to enjoy and act upon theirs, and to perform their constitutional duties according to their own judgments. Did he remain within these walls to offer vexatious motions; to defeat business; to create confusion; to make and unmake a quorum, as occasion and for purposes I will not name should require? By no means. And if all who declined to vote upon the ground of constitutional scruples had followed his example, there would have been higher reasons for holding their opinions in respect. Sir, if a quorum of that House could have been formed for five minutes only, after the report of conferees was made, it would instantly have been adopted. The bill would have passed the House, and the Senate also; and if it then failed to become a law, the responsibility would have rested elsewhere—upon one who professes never to shun responsibility. It was well understood that the President had left the Capitol, declaring (I will not say with an oath) that he would hold no further communication with that Congress. The disorder and confusion which I have described prevailed; and, whether designed for that end or not, did defeat the bill. The honorable Speaker, [Mr. BELL,] who presided with so much dignity, firmness, and impartiality, during the period he filled the chair, did what human means could do, in preserving order and promoting the despatch of business on that trying night. He deserves high credit for the ability he displayed in that station. Various motions to adjourn were made by those who seemed willing to defeat the bill, and who possibly feared that it would pass if the House continued longer in session. That the bill was defeated here, and by these means, was openly charged upon this floor at the time by many members. A motion having been made "that a message be sent to the Senate, to notify that body that this House, having completed the business before it, is now ready to close the present session by adjournment," the honorable member from New Jersey near me, [Mr. PARKER,] who is a friend to the administration, but who was not, therefore, quite ready to abandon the bill, inquired, "did the gentlemen who formed the committee of conference on the part of the House mean to report or not?" Again: "How can we pretend to say that we have completed the business before us? And how can we adjourn without passing the fortification bill? This House had passed the bill. The Senate made a large addition. The House had added another appropriation. The Senate disagreed to it. A committee of conference had been appointed, and that committee had refused to report to this House. Shall we go away," said he, "and leave this bill, at a time when there is an apprehension of war?" This is a summary, and a true one, of the whole matter. The gentleman was entirely right. Have we completed the business? can we adjourn without passing the bill? can we go away and leave the bill? were all pertinent questions, and pregnant questions, founded in facts before us, and to which we could not close our senses. The honorable member, however, was mistaken in one respect—that the committee had refused to report. The chairman, it is true, had refused; another member was among the missing; and the report was made by the third member, [Mr. LEWIS,] and was so stated by the Chair immediately after the gentleman had closed his remarks. My honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] anxious for the passage of that bill, also addressed the House in these words:

"The committee of conference had agreed upon a report, and, as a quorum was undoubtedly present, it ought to be acted upon. He was opposed to the adjournment, because the House had not yet done its duty. The proposed amendment declared what is not fact. There is a quorum present." And how was he answered, sir? By loud calls of "order! order! order!" vociferated from all quarters of the room, and by those who had been foremost in the scenes of disorder and uproar which defeated, if they were not designed to defeat, the fortification bill. The fact that a quorum was present was no otherwise controverted than by clamorous demands for "order!" We then designed to put that question to a test, and to ascertain whether or not a quorum was present, and, if not, to compel the attendance of members. Accordingly, a motion was made for a call of the House. Who resisted it? Who gave the signal and the watchword to the party, which was determined to destroy the bill? I read from the reported proceedings:

JAN. 28, 1836.]

Fortification Bill of Last Session.

[H. OF R.]

"Mr. Cambreleng. I protest against the right to call the House. What member will answer to his name? [I will, I will, exclaimed many members.] I am as much in favor of the fortification bill as the gentleman from New Jersey; but I say the responsibility of its failure rests upon the Senate, and not upon us. The bill was defeated by the Senate." [No, no, not so, was exclaimed by many voices.] After such a direct warning from such a quarter, is it to be wondered at that a quorum could not be found? An honorable member from North Carolina, [Mr. Barringer,] faithful to his duty, and observant of all that occurred here, had no hesitation in expressly charging the loss of the bill to an intrigue carried on in the House, and he offered the names of the individuals concerned in it. If we may have any access to the ear of the select committee who may be appointed to investigate this grave affair, I pray the honorable member from Massachusetts to call upon this gentleman to testify. Mr. Barringer said, "the bill was defeated by an intrigue here—in this House. If gentlemen desired names, he would give them. But if this was declined, he would say that there were members who now sat in their seats, and would not answer to their names, who did so in consummation of the intrigue." Names were not demanded. They might have been had. Amid these scenes of disorder and confusion, which we of the minority vainly strove to repress, passed the last night of the last session of the last Congress; and, for the honor of the country and its institutions, I hope such another may never be witnessed. And, in the midst of these scenes, the fortification bill drew its last breath, and heaved its expiring throes. That it was destroyed in the House, and for purposes known to those who had an agency in the proceedings of that night, it seems to me no rational mind can doubt. Examine as we will, investigate as we will, vituperate as we will, these plain facts stand out; and no sophistry can elude, no ingenuity pervert them. Sir, I have done upon this matter. I have but another topic to touch.

The honorable member, with a precision of aim which leaves nothing of doubt as to whom his shafts were sped, and whom he describes as "the Achilles" of the Senate, essays to bring down from his high standing: one representing his own Commonwealth, with unsurpassed ability, in the other branch of the Legislature. The attack was little to have been expected from that quarter. A scene of disgraceful disorder, such as the Speaker says he had never witnessed in ten years' experience here, doubtless gratified the cherished feelings of the member into the delusive fancy of a triumph worthy his achievement. Sir, I shall not attempt encomiums upon that distinguished statesman. It is unnecessary for me—it cannot be required of any man—to come forward in his defence. His character, his services, his actions, his opinions, the efforts of his transcendent powers, are before the world. They speak out for him in a voice that cannot be silenced. They stand forth in full view, and no man can obscure or blot them from the history of this country. It has been exceedingly painful to me to take a part, and especially the part I have taken, in this debate. Recollections of the past are thronging in my mind, and weigh me down in sadness—almost in silence. Gladly would I have been spared this day. But, sir, when those whom I hold in honor and respect—whom the country holds high—high in its estimation, are made the object of attack such as we have witnessed, I should miserably fail in my own sense of duty were I to sit in silence. The day has not long gone by since I saw those who now give sanction to this attack, and the party to which they belong, gladly, ay, anxiously, seeking the aid of the powerful arm of that great champion and defender of the constitution; since I saw this administration, reeling and tottering as it did under the tremendous blows of men of giant strength from the chivalric region of the South, beseeching the unfailing support of that same undaunted hand. I refer to no preceding administrations, which leaned, and leaned with confidence, upon him, as upon a pillar of immovable strength; but I wish to tell the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] that not one of the friends who now rally round the object of his attack will falter in his course. Not one will be shaken in his confidence and attachment. We shall stand by him, let who will desert, let who will vituperate. But after all, sir, how little is there, upon merely personal considerations and preferences, to justify the feelings of anxiety which we cannot repress, for the advancement of any man, however able, however estimable. We are admonished of the frailty of human attachments and human hopes. How wise is it that the future is hid from our view; that we cannot lift the veil which shuts out from our observation the end of our own best and wisest exertions! Much, how much, of our ardor might be abated; how might our arms be paralyzed, if we could look beyond the present hour, and behold the fulfilment which the future holds in store! If, sir, I could raise this impenetrable curtain, and look forward to the future as I can look back upon the past, ardently as I desire, for the good of our common country and his own fame, and much as I would now do to promote the elevation of that distinguished statesman to the highest places of power—every desire might fail—every effort cease. Yes, sir, if I should see him descending from that lofty eminence, soured, disappointed, vindictive—forgetful of his own character, and of the friends who had stood by him in the hour of need; if I should see the infirmities of our nature—the lower and baser passions—mastering and expelling all the noble and generous properties which I know belong to his heart; if I should see him betraying and abandoning the cause which he now upholds, making his friends to hang their heads in very shame and confusion—I do not say, sir, that I would pray Heaven to blast all our efforts in the cause of our country—but rather would I see his sun go down now, even from its high noon, so that it leave us a glorious light to cheer, and animate, and guide, and to which we could turn our eyes with high and heart-stirring pride: rather would I see this, than to behold him putting off the mighty armor of Achilles, which no man can wear, to act his perjured part who by fraud levelled the proud walls of Troy to the dust; rather this, far rather, than to see him lingering on the stage of political action, behind his time, "the derision of his enemies—the melancholy pity of his friends."

Note by Mr. Evans.

Some expressions are quoted in the preceding remarks as having been used by Mr. Adams, which are not contained in the report of his speech which was published in the National Intelligencer. To enable those who have had access to that report only to understand the propriety of the quotations, the subjoined extract is given from the speech published in the Globe, where it first appeared, under his revision, as it is understood. Some other differences also exist between the two reports, but they are not material to be noticed, to the understanding of these remarks.

Extract.—"It was said, sir, that there had been thrilling and unexampled eloquence of indignation at this conspiracy of man-worship, servility, and corruption, displayed by the House of Representatives in that appropriation of three millions for the contingent necessary defence of the country from foreign aggression; but I trust that I have already shown, to the satisfaction of this House, that all that eloquence was gratuitous, and all that indignation wastefully squandered away; some small portion of which might have been profitably expended upon the foreign treaty-breakers, under whose injustice our own country was smarting. This indignation, and the temper with which it was manifested by these repeated insults to the House, did strike me as so extraordinary, and, I must add, so unreasonable, that it was impossible to avoid the inquiry, where the real sting of that three million appropriation did lay, and what it was that had excited this tempest of passion against it? And I thought the true motive was discernible in that unanimous vote of two hundred and seventeen ayes, in the House, demanding that the execution of the treaty should be insisted on. That vote, however overlooked then, or now, had been neither unseen nor unfelt. It was not only a departure from the do-nothing policy of the Senate, but might be felt to contain a pungent, though tacit, rebuke upon that paralytic policy. The three million appropriation was the complement and efficient energy of the unanimous vote of the preceding day. That vote was exclusively the act of the House. The appropriation required the concurring vote of the Senate; and that vote would have made the Senate the unwilling accessory to implied censure upon its own quietism under foreign wrong. The vote of the House could not be nullified, but its efficient operations might be unnerved, by the refusal of the appropriation; and so the bloodless ghost of executive dictation, and man-worship, and servility, were conjured up; and the overbearing arrogance of votes to adhere, and messages to remind, was substituted, for the deficiency of better reasons, for refusing the appropriation."

When Mr. EVANS concluded his remarks, several members rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. BYNUM obtained the floor, but, the hour being late, he moved an adjournment; which was carried.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29.

LAST YEAR'S FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President of the United States to Congress at the commencement of the present session as relates to the failure, at the last session of Congress, of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into, and report to the House, the causes and circumstances of the failure of that bill.

The question pending being the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend the resolution by adding thereto the words "with power to send for persons and papers"—

Mr. BYNUM said it was with sincere regret that he found himself compelled to address the House on the present occasion; but he had rights which he was bound to sustain, whenever they were invaded by friend or enemy. He had not risen for the purpose of making any thing like an electioneering speech. He protested against electioneering for Presidents in the House, and in every other legislative body. The people of the United States, in their sovereign capacity, had the exclusive right to do that; and the House of Representatives never should make a President. He knew that there was an opinion abroad, that in the Congress of the United States was combined the greater part of the intelligence, and some had thought that it contained the greater part of the virtue, of the country; but he was not one of those who subscribed to that doctrine. He believed there was to be found more virtue and intelligence out of Congress than in it; and he felt proud that it was so.

So long as the people were intelligent and virtuous, he feared no usurper in the White House, nor league of demagogues in any other branch of the Legislature. He would not be the Cato on that floor to electioneer for any man for President, nor did he believe that any effort made there would make one. The present Congress stood redeemed on that subject. Not many years since a President was attempted to be made in another quarter. Denunciations of a serious nature were made against him, and the people were called upon to sustain them. What did the people say? They said, away with your denunciations; we call for facts, and will be governed by facts; and the people did decide. But, nothing daunted with that, they were trying to play the same game over again. The batteries had been opened on that floor, for the purpose of firing away on public opinion. He came here for the purpose of discharging his duty as a representative of the people, and would do that fearlessly; but he did not come here to make a President, or to unmake one. The gentleman from Virginia had told us that, upon the issue of the question under consideration, depended the presidential election. He admitted the superior sagacity of that gentleman; but for the life of him he could not determine how its termination would either make Judge White or Mr. Van Buren President. The gentleman from Virginia had said that he (Mr. B.) had thrown obstacles in the way of an examination to prove corruption in certain gentlemen of the House. He was at a loss to know what the gentleman meant. He would go into an investigation as far as that gentleman dare go.

Mr. WISE said he did not charge the gentleman with throwing obstacles in his way. The gentleman could throw no stumblingblock in his way. He did say that the gentleman had been very particular to say that it was not proved that the House was responsible for the failure of the appropriation bill. He did not know whether that was meant or not meant; and he was not disposed to join issue with the gentleman.

Mr. BYNUM was glad to find that the gentleman did not accuse him of throwing obstacles in his way. He was opposed to no investigation. But the gentleman from Virginia had made a serious charge against some of the most prominent members of the House, and against the President of the United States. He understood the gentleman to say that the three million appropriation was procured, or attempted to be procured, by certain individuals in the House, for secret service money.

Mr. WISE said he repeated that he understood that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means knew that the President desired it, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs had told us that he knew of it; but, instead of communicating it to the House officially, they only informed a few individuals of it, and told them to say nothing about it.

Mr. BYNUM said the gentleman had not answered him at all. He would go with the gentleman, if he would accept of his feeble company, in the investigation. He asked him again if he understood him right when he said the appropriation was to be procured for secret service money?

Mr. WISE said he had answered the question, and he thought the gentleman from North Carolina was in the secret; but, as he was not, he would ask the honorable Speaker of the House, who ought to tell; he would ask honorable members of the House if the appropriation was wanted for secret service money, or was it wanted for the defence of the country?

Mr. BYNUM said he asked for a direct answer. He had understood the gentleman to have made the assertion directly. If the President had attempted to impose on the House for the purpose of extracting three millions for secret service money, he was for carrying the investigation to the White House. He was for probing it to the bottom. If he understood the gentleman right, he was for purging the House of corruption, and the White House of despotism. Mr. B. said he had not the ability, he had not the intellectual power, to do that; and if the gentleman from Virginia had, Judge White might step aside, and he would go for him for President, because he could do more than any other man in America. But he thought he understood the gentleman to oppose the resolution under consideration. He thought the gentleman ought to have seen the necessity of adopting the resolution, or something like it, for the purpose of enabling him to carry on his investigation. The gentleman from Virginia had also said that there was a trained band in the House; but the gentleman did not tell us who belonged to that trained band. It was but a short time since the gentleman professed to belong to that same band.

Mr. WISE said, let me plead not guilty of belonging to that band—never in my life.

Mr. BYNUM said that the gentleman had been elected by professing to belong to that party; and, if Mr. B. understood him rightly, he was favorable to the principles of the present administration, and came to Congress a supporter of the President; and he appealed to the members who were in Congress at that time to sustain him in the assertion.

Mr. WISE said, when he spoke of the trained band, he meant the trained band of the party on the night of the 3d March, 1835; and he begged leave to make a distinction between the friends of the President and the friends of the party.

Mr. BYNUM said he confessed that the gentleman had got into an inexplicable difficulty. He had divided the friends of the President from the friends of the party. He saw that the gentleman's perspicacity was too keen for him to follow. The gentleman had stated, in the commencement of this harangue, that he would tell the whole truth. But he had not told us that there were presidential partisans on the other side of the House. There were other parties besides the Van Buren party. There were a number of gentlemen elected under the influence of the President's name, but when they came to Congress they were suddenly changed to the other side.

Mr. B. was proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. ASHLEY called for the orders of the day.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. WHITTLESEY, BELL, PATTON, WISE, PEYTON, ADAMS, EVANS, and the CHAIR, as to the right of the gentleman from Missouri to submit the motion for the orders of the day, the House having suspended the rules, in order to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to introduce the resolution under discussion.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was in order, and that the pending debate, under the rules, could only be continued, at that time, by a vote of two thirds.

Mr. WISE then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of permitting the discussion on the resolution to progress, and called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Bell, Bond, Bunch, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Cushing, Denny, Rice Garland, Granger, Grayson, Griffin, Hammond, Hardin, Harper, Ingham, Jarvis, Lincoln, Love, Samson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, McKeon, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Muhlenberg, Franklin Pierce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Rencher, Robertson, Russell, Shields, Spangler, Storer, Waddy Thompson, White, Lewis Williams, Wise—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Banks, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Boyce, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Burns, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Crane, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Dickson, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Evans, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, James Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Hard, Harlan, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hoar, Holsey, Hopkins, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Jabez Jackson, James, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Lawler, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Luke Lea, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKim, McLene, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Owens, Page, Parker, Patterson, Patton, Dutee J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Roane, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shinn, Sloane, Smith, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Sutherland, Tlaiaferro, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turner, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Weeks, Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams—160.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Several engrossed bills were then read a third time and passed.

Mr. HAWES, of Kentucky, moved that when the House adjourn, it should adjourn to Monday.

The motion not being in order, he moved that the rules of the House be suspended to allow of the resolution.

The vote being taken, there were, yeas 84, noes 61.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. ANTHONY moved that the House do now adjourn.

The vote was taken by tellers, and the result was, yeas 62, noes 59.

So the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30.

The question of order arising on the appeal from a decision of the Chair, taken by Mr. ADAMS on the presentation of a petition praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, having been postponed to this day,

Mr. ADAMS said that the House had already decided the question of appeal upon another petition. He should therefore move to lay the motion on the table.

After some conversation between Messrs. BRIGGS, ADAMS, and the CHAIR, Mr. ADAMS withdrew his appeal, and the question on the reception of the petition was laid over to Monday.

SUFFERERS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, asked leave to introduce a resolution relating to the unfortunate situation of the Territory of Florida at this time.

Objection being made,

Mr. WHITE moved to suspend the rules; which was agreed to; and he then submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause rations to be delivered from the public stores to the unfortunate sufferers who have been driven from their homes by Indian depredations, until they can be re-established in their possessions, and enabled to procure provisions for the sustenance of themselves and families."

Mr. WHITE hoped the House would direct the resolution to be engrossed without commitment. The documents which had been laid on our tables had afforded all the requisite information on the subject. He would not occupy the attention of the House longer than to say that five hundred families had been driven from their homes in consequence of the war, and had been reduced from a state of comfort and affluence to the utmost want. They were now hanging on the remnant of our army for protection, and were without provisions, or the means of obtaining them. After the vote of the House making appropriations to repress the hostilities of the Indians, for which he was very grateful, and after the repeated appropriations of money for the relief of these very hostile Indians, when they were starving, one appropriation of $30,000 having been made at his instance, he trusted that the House would not object to relieve the necessities of these unfortunate people, until they could find means of providing for themselves. He had called upon the President, and asked him if he would not give an order to furnish them with provisions from the commissariat, and he replied that he could not, but that it would afford him much pleasure to do it if Congress would give him the power.

Mr. WHITTLESEY rose, not, he said, to oppose the resolution, but to suggest to the gentleman the propriety of rendering it more definite in its terms. It was too indefinite as to the amount of the rations, and the time for which they were to be furnished. The inhabitants ought not to be subsisted by the Government longer than their indigent circumstances rendered it necessary.

Mr. BOON thought the latter clause of the resolution too indefinite. They should be provided for until they were able to sustain themselves and families.

Mr. BEALE moved to amend by striking out all after the word "possessions."

Mr. WHITE accepted the amendment as a modification.

Mr. PARKER said the resolution ought to be limited to some definite term, say two or three months. He hoped it would be postponed till Monday, in order that Congress might act more advisedly upon the matter.

Mr. WHITE hoped, he said, that it would not be postponed. The resolution only contemplated relief until the inhabitants could be re-established in their homes, or fly to some place of safety. At present they were pressed on all sides by the savages; their houses were burned, their plantations laid waste, their negroes carried off, and, in fine, they were starving for bread. If any relief was to be afforded to them, it must be done promptly.

Mr. PARKER was not, he said, opposed to the object of the resolution; but, while we provided relief, we should take care that the public service was not prejudiced by it. He would rather vote for some specific sum, say $50,000.

Mr. EVERETT said he would submit to the gentleman from Florida the propriety of extending the same relief to the friendly Indians near Fort Brooke. By a letter received yesterday from that quarter, he was informed that three hundred Indians had been in that vicinity for six or eight months, prepared to emigrate; that provision had not been made for their removal, nor for their subsistence in the mean time; that, in view of their emigration, they had been ordered not to plant the last season; and, from their destitute condition, fears were entertained of their going over to the enemy; that even surprise was expressed that they yet remained faithful.

Mr. WHITE stated that they had now joined the army, declared war against the hostiles, and drawn rations as attached to the army.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to insert, after the word "sufferers," "who are unable to provide for themselves;" which was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS inquired if there was any precedent for this resolution. It struck him that it set a precedent of no trifling importance—one under which a hundred millions might be taken from the Treasury. He felt as much for the distresses of these people as any one could; but he thought the House ought to reflect a little before they established so dangerous a precedent. He hoped the resolution would lie over till Monday, to afford time for consideration.

Mr. PATTON was very glad, he said, that the gentleman from Maine had made the inquiry whether there was any precedent for this measure; and he thought it proper also to make the further inquiry, whether there was any principle by which it could be sustained. He had very little doubt that the difficulty suggested could be removed, for he did not believe there was any considerable error or abuse in legislation that could not be sustained by some precedent, real or supposed. Precedents, instead of being guides to direct, ought to be beacons to warn us. He adverted to the act for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, and to the abuses practised under it.

Mr. GRANGER, of New York, rose and said: Mr. Speaker, in the little observation I have had of men and things, I have learned that precedent is often used to restrain our generous impulses, but seldom to impel us to generous action. In the little time I have been here, I have not been so much gratified with any thing that has occurred, as I have been at the prompt manner in which this House has stepped forward to provide means for carrying on the war in Florida. Whilst we have been without any official information from the executive department of the Government, whilst the newspapers, and the newspapers alone, have been discussing the question whether censure should rest upon one of the Departments or upon the commanding officer in Florida, this House and the other branch of the Legislature have stepped forward to sustain this war, although no requisition has been made by the Chief Magistrate of the nation. Sir, I rejoice that they have done so.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to explain, and Mr. G. yielded the floor.]

Mr. C. said that great injustice had been done in the newspapers to the course pursued by the Departments. The Committee of Ways and Means had been furnished with the first communication on which they acted, by the Secretary of War. They next day received a second communication, with all the documents relating to the Indian war, and which contained all the information that was requisite. The documents had not gone forth to the public, which was an extraordinary circumstance. They certainly were sent by the committee to the House, and ought to have accompanied the bill, and been printed and sent to the Senate. If they had, the erroneous impression as to the remissness of the Departments or the Executive would not have gone into the newspapers. It was not the fault of the Executive, or of the Committee of Ways and Means, that this had not been done.]

Mr. G. resumed. If the gentleman had listened to me a little longer, he would have discovered that I intended no censure on the Executive; but as he has chosen to challenge me to speak, I do say that the history of this nation can present nothing like the silence which has existed upon this subject. I do say, that whilst this hall has been ringing with plaudits upon our administration, and whilst we have been called upon day after day to hunt up the bones of dead quarrels here, whilst your settlements have been laid waste and desolate, no communication has been made to this House, as a branch of the Government. Whatever information you have, even upon the gentleman's own showing, is a letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

[MR. CAMBRELENG. That letter contained all that was necessary.]

Mr. G. continued. Sir, I repeat that, with a war known to exist in this country, we have been occupied in hunting up the possibility, not only of a war which might take place hereafter with a foreign nation, but also to discover whether a war was last year likely to have existed. We have war enough upon our hands to take care of. The war-cry is up in the woods, the tomahawk glitters in the sunbeam, the scalping-knife is urged to its cruel duty, the flower of your chivalry is strewn along the plain, and yet every department of this administration is as dumb as the bleeding victims of this inglorious contest. This would not have been said, sir, if the gentleman from New York had not cut short what I intended to say.

The situation of Florida is unlike that of the country alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. PATTON.] If I understand the character of that Territory, it is not susceptible of sustaining a dense population within its borders. There are now but few inhabitants, and those spread over a large expanse of country; and when they are driven in from their settlements, unless the Government extends its aid, they must inevitably perish. They are not like the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, who fell back upon a country as rich in agricultural products as any other section of the Union.

I am not afraid of the precedent to be furnished by this resolution. In legislating for a suffering people, I want no precedent but that which my Creator has planted in my bosom. I do not believe that we sit here with the sympathies of our nature chilled and frozen by the mere force of the oath which we have taken. I do not believe that our duty requires that they should be thus chilled and frozen. I believe that the existence of this Government depends upon its extending its fostering hand to the unfortunate, whenever it can be done within the limits of the constitution. Especially should this be the case, where the sufferers reside within a Territory, and have no State Government to which they can look for succor. Such is the true course to be pursued in this nation; and then our people will feel that they are indeed members of one common family; and that, whilst they bear equal burdens, they are the equal recipients of the bounty and protection of Government.

Mr. LANE said he regretted the gentleman from New York, [MR. GRANGER,] for whom he entertained the kindest feelings of respect, had not sought a more fit occasion to indulge in bitter remarks against the Executive, and those who sustain him in this House.

The resolution has for its object the immediate relief of the citizens of Florida, whose country has been desolated, whose houses and property have been destroyed, by an unexpected savage war upon its innocent and defenceless inhabitants—men, women, and children, in a state of starvation—a scene that can but call for the commiseration of every sympathetic bosom.

Yes, sir, upon this resolution, calling for action and unanimity, the honorable gentleman from New York has deemed it his duty to arraign the Executive for neglect of duty, for being deaf to the cries of women and children, while the scalping-knife is urged to its bloody office; that this House, instead of suppressing this war, and defending the country, have been seeking other cause of war, and hunting for the buried of the last session.

Mr. Speaker, with what justice are those charges made? The honorable gentleman from Florida [Mr.

WHITE] has informed the House again and again that the President of the United States has promptly done all in his power to suppress the savage and relieve the country. And whenever the subject has been presented to this House, it has been taken up and acted upon with a promptness unknown to legislation. To consider the present resolution, the rules of the House have been suspended.

No matter, however, what the subject or the occasion, a dash at the Executive or his friends is to be expected from some one of the opposition.

Sir, if ever there was a time or an occasion in legislation when men might indulge all the nobler feelings of the soul—when, to pause for precedents in legislation, or to consult the letter of the constitution, would be cruel—this is that time and that occasion. If aught could have dried up the sympathies of my heart, (always, and I trust ever will be, open to the cries of distress,) the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York would have done it. But, he trusted, neither the injustice of the remarks, nor the spirit of party it was so well calculated to awaken, will influence a single vote on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOLSEY said, when a suffering people had been driven from their homes, and left without the means of sustaining themselves, that then it was the duty of the Government to extend to them relief. In the present case, the inhabitants of a portion of Florida were cut off by the savages from any settlement where they could have an opportunity of supporting themselves by their own exertions, and surrounded on all parts by a wilderness. In such a state of the case, he considered it to be the duty of the Government to support those people until they could be restored to their homes. If the inhabitants of Florida had been thrown back on a frontier teeming with all the luxuries of the earth, then the application of the strength given them by their Creator would have been sufficient for their sustenance, without the aid of Government. If the inhabitants had been thrown on the frontiers of Georgia and Alabama, then we might apply the principle of the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. PATTON.] There are about 500 soldiers in that country, and they cannot procure the necessities of life; and when men, with arms in their hands, cannot procure subsistence, how was it to be supposed that the suffering inhabitants could survive without the aid of the Government? A Government that will not extend protection and relief to its own citizens is unworthy the name of a Government.

Mr. HAWES proposed to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "sufferers," and inserting in lieu thereof, "women, children, and men unable to bear arms."

Mr. H. said it would be apparent that his object was to confine the operation of the resolution to those who were incapable of bearing arms in defence of their country. If individuals capable of bearing arms were in the field, rations would be issued to them as a matter of course, and they should be nowhere but in the field of battle, in defence of their firesides and their homes. Feed men up, and stuff them with rations, and, my word for it, (said Mr. H.,) there is no fighting. But let them depend upon themselves, let them have the soldier's rations as the soldier gets them, in the field; let them be hungry at times, and then they will fight fast enough. Those who were unable to arm in defence of their country he would relieve; those capable of bearing arms should earn their rations by being found on the field of battle.

Mr. BOULDIN said he wished to relieve these people from their deplorable condition, but was not willing to violate the constitution or transcend the powers of the Government about it. He should never give a vote preicated on the idea that this House was a charitable institution. He had often felt his heart warmed with the mere imagination of what he would do for the relief of the suffering, were these splendid resources his. They not being his to dispose of, he could give nothing from them on the ground of sympathy or charity. But this Government is bound to protect its citizens against invading enemies—the people of Florida just as much as any others—no more, no less. If, from the suddenness of the attacks, or want of men or arms, we are not able to protect them in their houses and at home, where we are bound to do it, we must do it where we can: take them under the immediate wing of the army. This protection must be real—not only from the tomahawk and scalping-knife, but from inevitable starvation caused by the enemy. The richest man might starve, if chased into the wilderness by the scalping-knife. Shall we be bound to save him from the scalping-knife and let him starve in the wilderness before he can return to his means? If these people are driven from their homes by an invading foe, and unable to sustain themselves in any other way, I feel confident it is our literal duty to defend them in that way; not only from death at the hand of the savage, but from starvation, the immediate consequence of the pursuit of the savage; and if the resolution be now framed, or shall be altered, so as that none will be provided for but such as we are bound to defend, and cannot otherwise defend, and who cannot protect or provide for themselves, I will vote for it.

Mr. GLASCOCK had hoped, at least, that, upon a subject like this, nothing would have transpired to have disturbed the harmony of this debate, and that they should have had immediate action upon it. He regretted that any thing should have been thrown out in the way of censure upon the Government; and he had no hesitation in expressing his firm belief that, so far as related to the depredations in Florida, and all which had grown out of it, no department of the Government was in any way to blame. He believed that, throughout the whole transaction, each department had faithfully performed its duty. Mr. G. felt but little disposed to say any thing on a question like that, nor should he have said a word but for the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER.] He would, however, tell that gentleman that, whatever he might suppose to influence the members of the administration on questions of this kind; yet, if a war came, whether foreign, domestic, or otherwise, the friends of the administration would be found as ready and as willing to protect the Government and their fellow-citizens as any of the gentlemen of the opposite side. The time might yet come when the country would see which would, and which would not, be ready and willing to step forward in her defence.

With regard to the resolution, he hoped it would be adopted immediately. He did not know that it was actually necessary; for if the commissary general, or the person authorized to issue rations, had acted as Mr. G. would have done under the same circumstances, he had not waited for any preliminary action on the part of the Government. If the necessities of the inhabitants demanded it, he should, without consulting any department of the Government, promptly have dealt out to them, trusting to the magnanimity and liberality of the Government for his vindication. The case, however, would be hopeless, should this resolution be delayed or rejected. The knowledge of such a disposition of it would reach that section of the country in a short time, and the consequence would be, that those who had charge of the public supplies there would refuse all aid; for they would say, Congress had refused them the power; or, if they did, they must do it at their own expense. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no further delay. There could be no necessity for postponing it.

It was a plain question, which needed no time for reflection, and he felt perfectly satisfied, in his own mind, conflicted with no provision of the constitution.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said he rose to appeal to those who intended to vote for the resolution under consideration, not to discuss it farther, as it was of the utmost importance that whatever was done should be done promptly. He could not repress the expression of his astonishment that, upon such a question, gentlemen were disposed to use such measured phraseology, and to employ such refined limitations, to prevent our excessive humanity from too great enlargement by the Executive. The resolution proposed to relieve sufferers, driven from their homes by a desolating war, in the origin of which they had no participation, but in the consequences of which their lives and property had been destroyed, to an extent almost unexampled in the history of savage warfare. Upon such a question, he wished the House to proceed to the vote, and let those who doubt about precedents look for them in the uniform practice of every year, for ten years past, as the journals bear testimony. He had been honored with a seat in the House for ten years, and he could say with confidence that a precedent was to be found at every session.

This was no party question, and he trusted that the attention of the House would not be diverted to other topics connected with it, which might be made the subject of future investigation. This bloody war, now raging on our frontier, was not produced by any acts of the people who were plundered and murdered, nor by causes which they could, by any foresight or courage, control or prevent. It grew out of the relations between the Government of the United States and these Indians. A treaty was entered into for their removal to the west of the Mississippi; they complained of this treaty, and were indulged for another year by the Government, upon a solemn pledge, signed by all the chiefs, to remove this winter. The time arrived, and they violated this convention, and commenced this scene of destruction upon the peaceable, unsuspecting, and unfending inhabitants of Florida. Whether the Government took these precautionary measures in advance of such a crisis is a matter that will be inquired into, and ought to be, and shall be, investigated. Whatever fault may have been committed, (if any, which he did not charge,) that, however, would be inquired into, and it was due to the people of Florida, and to the Government, that it should be inquired into. He took pleasure in saying that, from the moment of the commencement of actual hostilities, no Government could have taken more energetic measures for the speedy termination of the war than the President and Secretary of War had done. They have done every thing he had asked with alacrity and proper public spirit. It is (said Mr. W.) the misfortune of our country that the miserable handful of men, called the army of the United States, are scattered over a frontier of four thousand miles in extent, and could not be concentrated at any one point until a great portion of your territory is desolated. The commanding general, with fourteen companies under his command, was enabled only to bring into the fight 250 regulars, who fought with a spirit and gallantry never surpassed in a conflict with the Indians. I know General Clinch to be as prudent and as brave a man as the army can boast of, and in that desperate battle of Wythlacoochee he threw himself in front of the lines, and animated his soldiers by his example. If he had pursued the enemy, leaving his 54 wounded men, he would have most probably shared the fate of the gallant and unfortunate Dade and his brave companions, without even a wounded man to tell the melancholy story of the bloody tragedy.

We are not now to consider the conduct of the administration, nor the acts of our military commanders. The good or bad deeds of either are not now to be discussed or passed upon. All this belongs to history, and may be examined when I make an appeal, which I shall do, for an indemnification of the inhabitants who have been ruined for the want of an adequate protection of this Government. The question now is, whether the women and children of respectable planters, recently in the enjoyment of peace, happiness, and contentment, suddenly driven from their homes by a merciless and savage enemy, and forced into your military cantonments, to escape the tomahawk and scalping-knife, are to be left to starve because the President has no power to relieve them without a vote of Congress. Sir, what is the object of Government, if we are coolly and calmly to sit here talking about precedents? It is a case for a precedent, if none existed; and it is one which in all time would stand as a principle, to which humanity and justice can point as worthy of an American Congress. And are there no precedents to quiet the conscience of the gentleman from Maine? [Mr. PARKS.] Let us look for authority in our legislation. Several years ago these merciless barbarians who have committed these outrages were themselves in a state of starvation, and Congress appropriated, by an almost unanimous vote, (every member from Maine voting for the bill,) a large sum to feed these Indians, without any pretext of a treaty, law, or precedent; and yet we want to search for precedents for an important principle to feed those who have been reduced to starvation by the enemies of this Government, growing out of the acts of the United States. The gentleman would doubtless have voted for the Indians, but not for these unfortunate sufferers, many of whom have been reduced from affluence to penury by a savage enemy. If authority is wanted, let us look back to the history of the past. Congress appropriated money to send provisions to Caraccas, some years ago, to relieve the distresses of the people of South America. The President, out of an appropriation for repressing hostilities of the Indians on the Michigan frontier, ordered rations to be delivered to the suffering inhabitants until the end of the war. The settlers at New Madrid were indemnified for the damages occasioned by an earthquake; and, at every session since I have been in Congress, a vote has been taken here to distribute wood to the suffering poor of this city. If gentlemen want precedents, they have them in the repeated acts of this Government in charity for the visitations of Providence. Sir, here are precedents; and, with these before us, what are you to say to these people who have been ruined by the acts of the enemies of the country, and having escaped upon a sparse and thinly inhabited frontier, are to be told that they have only escaped the savage tomahawk and scalping-knife to perish by starvation?

I have had occasion before to express my gratitude to this Congress, and that of the generous people I represent, for the appropriations which have been made with such unanimity, and for the suspension of all the rules, to enable me to offer this proposition, and I expect a still more signal occasion for expressing it in the vote which I now confidently expect to carry consolation and comfort to the hearts of those who look to you for protection in this calamitous crisis.

Mr. TURRILL did not rise to discuss this subject, but merely to make a few remarks, that he might be distinctly understood in the vote he was about to give. With the honorable gentleman from Florida, he sincerely hoped that a party discussion would not again grow out of any proposition similar to the one before the House. Such a discussion was at all times to be deprecated, and it was to be hoped that the honorable gentleman hereafter would not adopt a course calculated to provoke such a discussion. If I understand him correctly, (said

Mr. T.,) the honorable gentleman commenced his remarks by saying that, whatever may have been the fault of the Government, it was evident that now was not the time to inquire into the causes which have produced the unfortunate state of things in Florida. He believed, however, that it was due to his constituents that the inquiry should be made, but that inquiry ought to be left for another occasion; and, sir, (said Mr. T.,) for the last two or three days, whenever this subject has been before the House, the honorable gentleman has repeatedly stated, and with great emphasis, too, that the citizens of Florida have been placed in their present unfortunate situation by the acts of this Government, and without any fault of their own. Mr. T. said if he voted for the resolution, he should not do so because he believed the Executive justly chargeable with any the slightest omission of duty, or because he supposed the citizens of Florida had any peculiar claims.

[Mr. WHITE explained. He did not say that any fault rested with the Government or its Departments. He said they had taken every measure they could since the hostilities had broken out. He was not prepared to speak of any thing before that, but it was due to his constituents that investigation should be made.]

Mr. TURRILL said that, after what had fallen from the honorable gentleman from Florida during this debate, taken in connexion with the attack made by his colleague [Mr. GRANGER] upon the administration, if he were to vote for the resolution without giving any explanation, it might be construed into a tacit admission that there was some foundation for the charges which have been preferred against the executive department of the Government. Mr. T. felt as much sympathy for the sufferers as the honorable gentleman from Florida, and would go as far as any gentleman to extend to them that prompt and efficient relief which their peculiar situation demands; but he should not vote for the resolution because he supposed that the Government was in fault, or because he believed the situation of the citizens of Florida to be such as to place them in a relation to the Government different from that of all other pioneers along our western frontiers, whose spirit of enterprise has stimulated them, with the hope of gain, to press their settlements into the wilderness, where savage tribes still linger. They locate with a full knowledge of the hardships and privations, of the difficulties and dangers they have to encounter; they are all alike entitled to the protection of the Government, and the citizens of Florida had no peculiar claims over other pioneers.

Mr. T. said the House ought not to act upon the impulse of the moment, without some investigation. He apprehended that the true state of things in Florida was not correctly understood. He believed that the numerical strength of the hostile force was greatly overrated. It would be found that, instead of having been remiss, the Executive had done more, much more, than the exigencies seemed to require. Long since, and before any serious apprehensions were entertained, even in Florida, that there would be any hostile movements by the Seminoles, fourteen companies of regular troops were placed at the disposal of General Clinch. In addition to this, that officer was authorized by the President to call upon the Governor of Florida for any force which might be necessary to meet any emergency, and, by a prompt and decisive blow, to put an effectual termination to hostilities, should the Indians attempt to make war upon the inhabitants. Orders had also been given to call upon the Governors of Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina, for any additional force that might be required. The time has been when seven hundred undisciplined militia, under a skilful commander, contended successfully against this very tribe of Indians; and Mr. T. said, from the best information he could obtain, he was satisfied that [at the battle of Wythlacoochee there were troops enough in sight to have gained a decisive victory, a victory which would have put an end to the war; but, for some cause or other, the militia did not cross the small creek which separated them from the battle ground. They remained idle spectators of the bloody contest. There has (said Mr. T.) been no fault, I repeat, no omission of duty, on the part of the Executive. All has been done, and more than could have been expected or required. If censure is merited, it must rest elsewhere, and not on the Executive. In voting for the resolution, he would do so because he believed that the relief asked for should be granted, in all cases where citizens have been expelled from their homes and made penniless by any hostile force.

Mr. HARPER could not permit himself to doubt that this resolution would pass unanimously, and he was astonished that any thing like party discussion should have grown out of such a subject as this. He would not stop to inquire who was right or who was wrong. He asked if it could be possible that, while they sat there as a legislative body, voting public money for losses which happened twenty years ago, they could refuse relief in this case? He hoped the vote would be taken without any further discussion. If a precedent was wanted, it would be found in a vote given yesterday, to pay a man for a barn which was burnt in Virginia, by the enemy, twenty years ago; and could the House hesitate to vote for the relief of these women and children?

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, then moved the previous question.

Mr. PARKS raised the question of order, whether the resolution, being one of appropriation, must not pass through the forms necessary for all appropriations, viz: that it could not be passed on the day of its introduction, and must first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR decided otherwise, on the ground that it was not an original appropriation, but directed the application of a sum of money already appropriated; whereupon,

Mr. PARKS appealed from the decision of the Chair; and, after a few words from Mr. MANN, of New York, in support of the Chair's decision, and Mr. PARKS against it, the decision of the Speaker was sustained by the House.

The previous question was then seconded: ayes 95, noes 56; and the main question, which was on the engrossment of the resolution as modified and amended, was then ordered to be put; and on the main question

Mr. PINCKNEY asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the result was: Yeas 178, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Banks, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

This being petition day, the House resumed, as the unfinished business, the consideration of the motion of Mr. CUSHING, of Massachusetts, that the petition presented by him, of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, be received.

Mr. HAMMOND, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said, that when he had first demanded the preliminary question of reception on the presentment of a similar petition some weeks ago, it was his hope and expectation that it would be decided without debate. On every subsequent occasion when he had felt it his duty to make a similar demand, he had entertained the same desire, and had himself refrained from taking any part in the discussions which had arisen. It was obvious, however, that gentlemen presenting these petitions were determined to discuss them; and, after what had occurred on last petition day, he concluded that no such petition would be offered to the House hereafter, without a preliminary speech as well as motion. As much, therefore, as he felt indisposed to block the proceedings of the House on this important day, he thought perhaps he had as well say at once what he had to say on this subject in its present stage, and by so doing he might facilitate the business of the House.

I listened, sir, (said Mr. H.,) with much pleasure to the address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] who presented this petition, and I believe I can say that I concur in every principle which he laid down. I am sure he cannot have a more sacred regard for the inestimable right of petition than I entertain. But, really, I cannot see what the discussion of that right can have to do with the question before the House.

No one here desires to "pass a law" depriving "the people of the right of peaceably assembling, and petitioning for a redress of grievances." In this instance they have already so assembled. They have petitioned for the redress of their imaginary grievances. The petition has been presented to the House. Its contents have been stated. If it had been requested, the petition itself might have been read by the Clerk. We are, sir, in full possession of its character and object. The petitioners and their representatives have performed their part without "let or hindrance," and it is now our duty to perform that which devolves on us. We may refuse to receive the petition, and record it on our journals; or we may receive and instantly reject; or commit, and, on a report, reject the prayer of the petitioners; or we may grant their prayer. Any of these courses it is fully competent for this House to adopt; and none of them, in my opinion, impugn in the slightest degree the right of petition which has been so justly denominated "sacred."

I think, sir, that this House should not receive the petition, and that is the course which I suggest. The gentleman says it is not disrespectful in its terms. I pass that by, then. But I think we should not receive it still, because it asks us to do what we have no constitutional power to do; and what, if we had the power, it would be ruinous to a large portion of this confederacy, and ultimately destructive to all our institutions, for us to do.

The constitutional power to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District is claimed by virtue of the clause which gives to Congress "exclusive legislation" here. I admit at once, that under that clause Congress has full power, so far as "legislation" is concerned, over this District, except where it is limited by the letter or the spirit of the constitution in other portions of that instrument, or by the contract made with the States of Virginia and Maryland in the acts of cession by those States. As this point has been ably and I think satisfactorily discussed, both in this House and another portion of the Capitol, I will only glance at it at this time. All the powers given by the constitution are trust-powers, and should be construed in connexion with each other, and in reference to the great objects they were intended to accomplish. Now, I ask if any member of this House—having before him those clauses of the constitution forbidding the passage of laws, even by the States, to prevent the arrest of "persons held to labor" in the other States—bidding "Congress to take private property," even "for public uses, without just compensation," and recognising slaves as property, entitled to representation only as three fifths, and not as persons entitled to full representation—can say that it will not be a violation of the letter and the whole spirit of the constitution to assume the power which you are now called on to exercise? As much a violation of it as to pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder here?

I ask gentlemen if they believe this constitution would ever have received the sanction of a single slave State, if it had been suspected for a moment that this power was given to Congress by it?

But, sir, admitting for the sake of argument that the constitution places no limitation to the power of "legislation" in the District of Columbia, I ask how far that power will, of itself, extend? What are the great objects of all human legislation? To protect life, liberty, and property. Can we, under this definition, assume the power wantonly to destroy them? It is true, property is sometimes seized as a penalty for misdemeanors, and liberty, and even life, are forfeited for crimes. But does this warrant Congress, or any legislative body in this country, at its free will and pleasure, to confiscate the estate of a peaceful and unoffending citizen, or imprison him, or take away his life? Sir, monstrous as these propositions are, they are not more monstrous, nor would they be more fatal in their consequences, than that which these petitioners ask us now to adopt. And here let me say, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing,] that I can see no difference between the constitutional power to abolish the slave trade, and the power to abolish slavery itself. If the slave owner is deprived of the full use of his property, unless that use impairs the right of others, you can as well deprive him of the property itself. The principle in both cases is the same. But, for the reasons I have already mentioned, I will not dwell on this branch of the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I object to the reception of these petitions, in the next place, because they are sent here by persons who are pursuing a systematic plan of operations intended to subvert the institutions of the South, and which, if carried into effect, must desolate the fairest portion of America, and dissolve in blood the bonds of this confederacy. It has been said, upon this floor, that the abolitionists of the North are very few in number, and of so little influence as to be unworthy of our attention. It has been said here, on the other hand, that they constitute a majority north of Mason and Dixon's line, and their influence is "tremendous." Amid this conflicting testimony, permit me to call the attention of the House to some important facts connected with the subject.

It will be recollected that during this session, in consequence of the course which has been taken in the matter, on but a single day has an opportunity occurred for a free presentment of petitions of the character of that before us. On that day, although it could not have been expected that the occasion would occur, fifty-eight of these petitions were presented, a number considerably larger than the average number presented during the last four sessions. These petitions are signed by between seven and eight thousand persons, male and female, some of them signing as representatives of large societies. I have been informed that three hundred petitions of this kind have been forwarded to Congress, and I do not doubt the fact. If they are as numerously signed, we shall have the names of some forty thousand persons petitioning Congress at this session to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. This, sir, is no small evidence of the strength of the abolition party.

But let us trace the history of the formation of the societies to which I have alluded. In 1832, less than four years ago, the New England Anti-slavery Society was formed. This I believe was the first society of this kind created on this side of the Atlantic. I remember well the ridicule with which it was covered when it was known that it had been formed by a meeting of eleven persons. Some time in the year 1833, the New York Anti-slavery Society was formed, by a meeting composed of two-and-twenty men, and two females. I remember, also, the contempt with which this announcement was greeted; but, sir, they grew in spite of our indifference and contumely.

On the 4th December, 1833, at a convention of abolitionists in the city of Philadelphia, the great American Anti-slavery Society was formed, and a bold "declaration of their sentiments" given to the world. They announced that "all slaves should instantly be set free," "without compensation to their owners;" "that the paths of preferment, of wealth, and of intelligence, should be as widely opened to them as to persons of a white complexion." And that, to effect these purposes, they pledged themselves "to organize anti-slavery societies every where;" "to send forth agents to remonstrate, warn, and rebuke;" "to circulate periodicals and tracts;" "to enlist the pulpit and the press;" "to purify the churches of the crime of slavery;" and "to encourage the labor of freemen rather than that of slaves, by giving a preference to their productions."

From this moment the infection spread with unparalleled rapidity. In May following (1834) there were sixty anti-slavery societies. By May, 1835, the number had increased to two hundred. By October, 1835, it had swollen to three hundred. And by a document which I hold in my hand, purporting to be a "protest of the American Anti-slavery Society" against certain sentiments expressed on this subject by the President of the United States, in his last annual message, it appears that there were known to be three hundred and fifty anti-slavery societies in the United States on the 25th day of December last.

H. OF R.]

[FEB. 1, 1836.]

Some of these societies contain as many as four thousand members, and none of them I believe less than fifty. On a fair calculation, it may be presumed that not less than one hundred thousand persons in the non-slaveholding States are united in these societies, and their numbers are increasing daily with a rapidity almost beyond conception—a disciplined corps, who have pledged life and fortune to the great purpose of emancipation.

That the spirit, means, purposes, and plans, of these societies may appear more fully, I will refer to the "Address of the American Anti-slavery Society," at its last annual meeting, which I have in my hand, and ask permission of the House that the Clerk may read. (a)

Here, sir, is a number of the paper entitled "Human Rights"—a neat, well-printed sheet. Here are several numbers of the "Anti-slavery Record," on the outside of each of which is a picture representing a master flogging naked slaves, and each of which contain within pictures equally revolting. Here is a handful of the little primer called the "Slave's Friend." On the covers and within each of these are also pictures calculated to excite the feelings and to nurture the incendiary spark in the tender bosom of the child. And here, sir, is "The Emancipator," a large and handsome paper. And that you may understand the spirit and principles which it inculcates, I will read to the House a paragraph from a number dated New York, November, 1835.

"The Alternative.—William Wertebaker, assistant postmaster, and librarian of the University of Virginia, gives notice that he has committed to the flames a copy of Human Rights we sent him; and very gravely asks, 'Which of the two do you prefer—a perpetuity of slavery, or a dissolution of the Union?' The latter, we say, by all odds, if we must choose. We are for union, but not with slavery. We will give the Union for the abolition of slavery, if nothing else will gain it; but if we cannot gain it at all, then the South is welcome to a dissolution—the sooner the better. The slaveholders may as well understand, first as last, that 'the Union' may have other uses to them than that of a lash to shake over the heads of northern freemen."

It speaks for itself. I make no commentary. Here, sir, is a pamphlet called the "Anti-slavery Reporter," published monthly, I believe, by this society. Here is a "Quarterly Anti-slavery Magazine," of very respectable size, edited by Elizar Wright, Jr. Here is a pamphlet entitled "Anti-slavery Hymns," of which there are nineteen. They purport to be for the use of the "monthly concerts for the enslaved" in the city of New York, and the publication of a more copious collection in Boston is announced. Here is a small book entitled "Juvenile Poems." It contains, besides a great number of doggerel articles of the most inflammatory character, some nine or ten disgusting prints; all of which are designed "for the use of free American children of every complexion." Here is a pamphlet written by a "Man of Color," and here are a quantity of sermons, essays, reports, letters, &c., all intended for the same incendiary purposes.

I hold, also, in my hand, that most powerful engine in party warfare, an "Anti-slavery Almanac for 1836." From this allow me to read two short extracts. The following will show the political tendency of this abolition agitation: "We are rewarding slaveholders for their usurpation and injustice, by allowing them to send twenty-five Representatives to Congress to represent their slave property." It has been said that "the petitioners have no further object than merely to wipe from the national escutcheon the stain affixed to it by permitting slavery to exist at the seat of Government of the United States." In answer to that allow me to quote the following passage, and there is scarcely a publication that I have exhibited here to-day in which the same sentiment is not expressed: "Should you abolish slavery in the District of Columbia alone, it would heave the foundation of the system in every State in the Union." Nor is this work without its pictures, libelling the slaveholders with their vile caricatures. To illustrate more fully the political tendency of the extraordinary excitement on this subject, although I do not intend on this occasion to discuss that branch of the question, I will refer the House to an extract from the "Anti-slavery Circular," printed at Medina, Ohio, December, 1835, which I hold in my hand, and which I again ask the favor of the House to permit the Clerk to read. (b)

Sir, while we are discussing the question of the reception of these petitions, movements are making at the North, and societies are springing up like mushrooms. Here are the proceedings of a meeting held within a few weeks past at Lowell, Massachusetts, the centre of the tariff interest, at which was formed a "Young Men's Anti-slavery Society," the preamble of whose constitution I will read. (c) Here is a circular, dated "Pawtucket, Rhode Island, January 12, 1836," calling a "Rhode Island Anti-slavery Convention," to meet shortly at Providence. It is signed by eight hundred and forty persons. I will read from it the following remarkable passage, from which it may be seen how deep the roots of this hostility to our institutions have struck into the foundations of society.

"Our country friends we hope will attend as numerously as they have signed the circular. The wealth and aristocracy of our cities are against us. They sympathize not with 'the poor and needy,' but with 'the arrogant and him of high looks.' Let our laboring men, then, the mechanics and the farmers, attend the convention. They can easily arrange their business so as to make it convenient to be in Providence at that time."

Here, sir, is the prospectus of the sixth volume of the "Liberator," published at Boston, by Isaac Knapp. Prefixed to it is an incendiary picture, and it contains the following passage, which exhibits, possibly with some exaggeration, in a strong point of view, the extent of the agitation on this subject throughout the non-slaveholding States:

"The sixth volume of the Liberator commences on the 1st of January, 1836. During the term of its existence, it has succeeded, in despite of calumny and strong opposition, in dispelling the apathy of the nation, creating an extraordinary and most auspicious interest for the oppressed, inducing a rigid investigation of the subject, and securing a host of mortal combatants, who are pledged never to retreat from the field. The wrongs of the slaves—the danger of keeping them longer in bondage—the duty of giving them immediate freedom—are the topics of conversation or discussion in all debating societies—in lyceums—in stages and steamboats—in pulpits and in periodicals—in the family circle, and between a man and his friend. The current of public sentiment is turning, and soon it will roll, a mighty river, sweeping away in its healthful and resistless career all the pollutions of slavery."

This prospectus is accompanied by an anonymous communication, for which, of course, I cannot vouch, which states that Doctor Channing has softened the asperity of his remarks on Thompson, the foreign anti-slavery missionary, in his late work on slavery. That it has, in consequence, been stereotyped by the abolitionists, and that the demand for it is insatiable. My colleague, [Mr. PICKENS,] in the course of his remarks the other day, made an allusion to Doctor Channing, which drew from the gentleman from Massachusetts who sits near me, [Mr. HOAR,] a warm and passionate eulogium. He said he was a man who had stamped his genius upon the age—a being almost too pure for such a world as this. I do not wish to wound the feelings of that gentleman, nor those of any friend of Doctor Channing on this floor, but I feel compelled to speak my sentiments respecting him without disguise or qualification. I have heard it said of him, by those well qualified to judge, that he is a man of superficial learning, a literary scavenger, whose acquirements consist of the mere offals of science, filched from those literary shambles, the reviews and magazines of Europe and America. I might assume too much, were I to pronounce this condemnation of him here. But this much I will say, that, while I have found in his writings many pleasing passages, I have rarely met with any thing evincing profoundness or originality of thought. I have glanced my eye over his last publication, which I now hold in my hand, and seldom have I seen so puerile a production from a man of ordinary reputation. It exhibits not only shameful ignorance of the subject of which he treats, but he has erected a tissue of stale, false, shallow, and declamatory reasoning even on acknowledged facts. I beg leave to read to the House the following passage:

“How far the obligation to conjugal fidelity, the sacredness of domestic ties, will be revered amid such temptations, such facilities to vice as are involved in slavery, needs no exposition; so terrible is the connexion of crimes! They who invade the domestic rights of others suffer in their own houses. The household of the slave may be broken up arbitrarily by the master; but he finds his revenge, if revenge he asks, in the blight which the master’s unfaithfulness sheds over his domestic joys. A slave country reeks with licentiousness: it is tainted with a deadlier pestilence than the plague.”—Page 92.

I will not inflict a review of this work on the House, but I must be allowed to say that he has not only enacted a second part to O’Connell, but also to Tappan, to Garrison, Wright, Knapp, Thompson, and the whole gang of abolition orators and writers on both sides of the Atlantic. He has but collected and compiled their cant, and if he has sometimes used better English, he has not added to its force, or spirit, or dignity, or decency. The terms in which he has characterized the morals of the South are gross, scandalous, and false. The licentiousness of which he speaks exists only in the impurity of his own imagination; and, in thus calumniating us, he has exhibited a lowness and malignity of mind unworthy of a scholar, unworthy a divine, and unworthy of a gentleman. I ask pardon of the House for using such emphatic language. I regret to use it towards any person, here or elsewhere; but when a man, and particularly a man of reputation, no matter how acquired, lends himself to the purposes of Arthur Tappan, and leagues with that not more detested monster, Murrell, to steep our land in blood, and cover it with ashes, it becomes every one to express, in plain language, the honest indignation of his heart.

As the last evidence which I shall offer of the extent of excitement at the North upon the slave question, I will read the following extracts from a letter from the western part of the State of New York. It is dated 12th of January, 1836. The writer of it is a gentleman who has been a close and shrewd observer of events passing around him. He is a man of talents and of strict integrity, and is one who has done and suffered something for his country. He says:

“The madness which influences our northern people on the subject of slavery is well calculated to fill the stoutest with dismay. The spirit which followed the Utica and Peterboro’ convention of abolitionists has totally changed the question from that of the emancipation of the slave to that of the continuance of the Union.”

“The North is now laboring to unite her people against you. The effort is immense and continual. The enclosed anti-slavery pamphlets and some ‘Emancipators’ were distributed at a Presbyterian prayer meeting in my neighborhood the other day, by the president of the anti-slavery society of this county, and were handed to me by the deacon of the church, through the hands of one of the men in my employ. The object is to unite the northern people in hatred of the people of the South, by false representations of the condition of their slaves, and by charges of cruelty, immorality, and irreligion. I endeavor to convince my neighbors that these pamphlets are false in every particular, and that, if they join in the cry of abolition, they must partake of the enormous sin of bringing on a civil war, of destroying our Union, and of causing a renewal of the horrors of St. Domingo. And for what do they labor to bring on their country and their fellow-citizens of the South these dreadful calamities? It is for the liberty of the slave; and in gaining that liberty, or in the attempt, they inevitably lose their own. But this view has no weight; the effort to free your slaves will be made; and Congress will be the ultimate scene of the struggle. Our next elections will mainly turn on this question, unless you settle it now and forever; that is, before this session expires. If you adjourn without so settling it, you will have to resort to the bayonet to adjust it.”

[Mr. GRANGER and Mr. LEE, of New York, demanded the name of the author. Mr. H. said, I cannot give it. I will vouch for his character. But such is the state of society around him, I fear it would prove dangerous, if not fatal to him, to disclose his name.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe what I have just read. Sir, there can no longer be a doubt of the deep, pervading, uncontrollable excitement which shakes the free States on this subject, nor of the energy and power with which the abolitionists are pressing their mad and fatal schemes. Every mail from the North brings fresh news of agitation; every breeze is tainted with it. It spreads like wild-fire in the prairies, and throws its red glare up to heaven, that all may see while it sweeps with resistless fury every thing before it. I call on every slaveholder in this House, and in this country, to mark its fearful progress, and prepare to meet it. He who falters here or elsewhere, he who shrinks from taking the highest and the boldest ground at once, is a traitor! A traitor to his native soil! A traitor to the memory of those from whom he has inherited his rights! A traitor to his helpless offspring, who call upon him for protection! And on his head be the blood which his treachery or cowardice may cause to flow.

Allow me now, sir, to examine more closely the real designs of those abolitionists, the means by which they will attempt to effect them, and the probable result. Their designs are very succinctly stated in the volume which I hold in my hand. It is a treatise on this subject, entitled “Jay’s Inquiry,” written by William Jay, a judge, I believe, of the State of New York, and a son—a most degenerate son—of the distinguished John Jay. More than five thousand copies of this work, I am told, have been sold. He says, “the society aimed at effecting the following objects, viz:

“1st. The immediate abolition of slavery throughout the United States.

“2d. As a necessary consequence, the suppression of the American slave trade.

“3d. The ultimate elevation of the black population to an equality with the white, in civil and religious privileges.”—P. 141.

Sir, the abolition of slavery can be expected to be effected in but three ways: through the medium of the slaveholder—or the Government—or the slaves themselves.

H. of R.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[FEB. 1, 1836.]

I think I may say that any appeal to the slaveholders will be in vain. In the whole history of the question of emancipation, in Europe or America, I do not remember a dozen instances of masters freeing their slaves, at least during their own lifetime, from any qualms of conscience. If they are seized with these qualms, they usually sell their slaves first, and then give in their adhesion to the cause, as has been the case with some whom I could mention.

The abolitionist can appeal only to the hopes or fears or interest of the slaveholder, to induce him to emancipate his slaves. So far as our hopes are concerned, I believe I can say we are perfectly satisfied. We have been born and bred in a slave country. Our habits are accommodated to them, and so far as we have been able to observe other states of society abroad, we see nothing to invite us to exchange our own; but, on the contrary, every thing to induce us to prefer it above all others.

As to our fears, I know it has been said by a distinguished Virginian, and quoted on this floor, "that the fire bell in Richmond never rings at night, but the mother presses her infant more closely to her breast, in dread of servile insurrection." Sir, it is all a flourish. There may be nervous men and timid women, whose imaginations are haunted with unwonted fears, among us, as there are in all communities on earth; but in no part of the world have men of ordinary firmness less fear of danger from their operatives than we have. The fires which in a few years have desolated Normandy and Angou, the great machine burning in the heart of England, the bloody and eternal struggles of the Irish Catholics, and the mobs which for some years past have figured in the northern States, burning convents, tearing down houses, spreading dismay and ruin through their cities, and even taking life, are appropriate illustrations of the peace and security of a community whose laborers are all free. On the other hand, during the two hundred years that slavery has existed in this country, there has, I believe, been but one serious insurrection, and that one very limited in its extent.

The appeal, however, to our interest, is that which might appear to promise much success; for whatever it is the interest of a community to do, that (sooner or later) it will be sure to do. If you will look over the world, you will find that in all those countries where slavery has been found unprofitable, it has been abolished. In northern latitudes, where no great agricultural staple is produced, and where care, skill, and a close economy, enter largely into the elements of production, free labor has been found more valuable than that of slaves. You will there find labor usually exercised in small combinations, under the immediate eye of a watchful and frugal master. I speak more particularly of those who cultivate the soil; but the large masses of mechanical operatives who are brought together form no exception to the principle. They are classified. There is an accurate division of their labor; each branch of it requires peculiar art, and, in the higher departments, a degree of skill must be attained, to produce which, stronger stimulants are necessary than can be ordinarily applied to slaves.

In such countries the dominant classes have also found it to their advantage to permit each individual to accumulate for himself, and to deprive him of a portion of his earnings, sufficient for their purposes, through the operations of the Government. Hence the partial emancipation of the serfs of the continent of Europe; hence the abandonment of villeinage in England; and hence the emancipation of slaves in the free States of this Union. But in southern latitudes, where great agricultural staples are produced, and where not only a large combination of labor under the direction of one head is required, but it is also necessary that the connexion between the operatives and that head should be absolute and indissoluble, domestic slavery is indispensable. To such a country it is as natural as the climate itself—as the birds and beasts to which that climate is congenial. The camel loves the desert; the reindeer seeks everlasting snows; the wild fowl gather to the waters; and the eagle wings his flight above the mountains. It is equally the order of Providence that slavery should exist among a planting people, beneath a southern sun. There the laborer must become a fixture of the soil. His task is not from day to day, nor from month to month; but from season to season, and from year to year. He must be there to clear, to break, to plant, to till, to gather, to fallow, and to clear again; and he must be kept there by a never-ceasing, unavoidable, and irresistible force. The system of "strikes," so universally practised in all other kinds of labor, would desolate a planting country in five years. If, in the heat of the crop, when the loss of one or two days even may irreparably ruin it, the laborers were to abandon the fields and demand higher wages, the owner would have no other alternative than to say to them, "work, and take enough to satisfy yourselves"—which would, of course, be all. Sir, it is not the interest of the planters of the South to emancipate their slaves, and it never can be shown to be so.

Slavery is said to be an evil; that it impoverishes the people, and destroys their morals. If it be an evil, it is one to us alone, and we are contented with it—why should others interfere? But it is no evil. On the contrary, I believe it to be the greatest of all the great blessings which a kind Providence has bestowed upon our glorious region. For without it, our fertile soil and our fructifying climate would have been given to us in vain. And as to its impoverishing and demoralizing influence, the simple and irresistible answer to that is, that the history of the short period during which we have enjoyed it has rendered our southern country proverbial for its wealth, its genius, and its manners.

Failing, as the abolitionists must do, in every appeal to the slaveholder, let us see with what probability of success they can call upon the Government to emancipate our negroes. There are about 2,300,000 slaves at this moment in the United States, and their annual increase is about 60,000. Sir, even the British Government did not dare to emancipate the slaves of its enslaved West India subjects without some compensation. They gave them about sixty per cent. of their value. It could scarcely be expected that this Government would undertake to free our slaves without paying for them. Their value, at $400, average, (and they are now worth more than that,) would amount to upwards of nine hundred millions. The value of their annual increase, alone, is twenty-four millions of dollars; so that to free them in one hundred years, without the expense of taking them from the country, would require an annual appropriation of between thirty-three and thirty-four millions of dollars. The thing is physically impossible.

But it is impossible for another reason: the moment this House undertakes to legislate upon this subject, it dissolves the Union. Should it be my fortune to have a seat upon this floor, I will abandon it the instant the first decisive step is taken, looking towards legislation on this subject. I will go home to preach, and if I can, to practise, disunion, and civil war, if needs be. A revolution must ensue, and this republic sink in blood.

The only remaining chance for the abolitionists to succeed in their nefarious schemes will be by appealing to the slaves themselves; and, say what they will, this is the great object at which they aim. For this are all their meetings, publications, lectures, and missions; to excite a servile insurrection, and, in the language of the miscreant Thompson, to "teach the slave to cut his master's throat." This will be no easy task. Sir, it is a proverb, that no human being is perfectly contented with his lot, and it may be true that some strolling emissary may extract, occasionally, complaints from southern slaves, and spread them before the world. But such instances are rare. As a class, I say it boldly, there is not a happier, more contented race upon the face of the earth. I have been born and brought up in the midst of them, and, so far as my knowledge and experience extend, I should say they have every reason to be happy. Lightly tasked, well clothed, well fed—far better than the free laborers of any country in the world, our own and those perhaps of the other States of this confederacy alone excepted—their lives and persons protected by the law, all their sufferings alleviated by the kindest and most interested care, and their domestic affections cherished and maintained, at least so far as I have known, with conscientious delicacy.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

A gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has introduced upon this floor the abolition cant of wives and husbands, parents and children, torn from each other's arms, and separated forever. Such scenes but rarely, very rarely, happen. I do not believe such separations are near so common among slaves, as divorces are among white persons, where they can be with much facility obtained. I am very sure that children and parents do not so often part as, in the ordinary course of emigration in this country, they do among the freest and proudest of our land. Sir, our slaves are a peaceful, kind-hearted, and affectionate race; satisfied with their lot, happy in their comforts, and devoted to their masters. It will be no easy thing to seduce them from their fidelity. But if, by an artful and delusive appeal to his excited passions, the abolitionist should succeed in drawing the slave into his fiendish purposes, our never-sleeping watchfulness would speedily detect every conspiracy that might be formed. Our habits in this respect have become a second instinct. Our vigilance is as prompt and personal as our courage—as faithful a guardian, and not more troublesome. It does not arise from fear, but from the fact that we ourselves, to a great extent, constitute our own police, and, in guarding against minor evils, will not fail to discover every danger of great magnitude. Such has been and such will always be the case. Every insurrection which has yet been meditated—and there have been but very few—when not discovered by some faithful slave, has been soon discovered by the whites, the unfortunate occurrence at Southampton only excepted—if that can be called an insurrection which was the bloody outbreaking of six drunken wretches.

Sir, I believe that every appeal to the slave to assist, through the horrid process of burning and assassination, in his own emancipation, much as it is (in secret at least) cherished, will be without success. I feel firmly convinced that, under any circumstances, and by any means, emancipation, gradual or immediate, is impossible. We may be disturbed in our comforts, harassed, injured, perhaps some partial sufferings may be the consequences of their mad and savage projects; but slavery can never be abolished. The doom of Ham has been branded on the form and features of his African descendants. The hand of fate has united his color and his destiny. Man cannot separate what God hath joined.

But, Mr. Speaker, admitting for a moment that the abolitionist could accomplish all his objects. Suppose the bonds of the slave were broken peacefully, and he was turned loose to choose his life and occupation on the face of the earth, what would probably be his actual state? Sir, we have some experience on this subject. I hold in my hand a paper containing an account of the situation of a colony of free blacks in Brown county, in Ohio, which I ask permission for the Clerk to read. (d)

Such, sir, are the blessed fruits of abolition; and to make such miserable and degraded wretches as these are we called on to give up our happy, industrious, and useful slaves—to strike out of existence nine hundred millions of active and inestimable capital, and impoverish and desolate the fairest region of the globe. But it is said that this is the dark side of the picture, and that emancipation, “gradual emancipation,” would produce far better consequences. Although I am perfectly satisfied that no human process can elevate the black man to an equality with the white—admitting that it could be done—are we prepared for the consequences which then must follow? Are the people of the North prepared to restore to them two fifths of their rights of voters, and place their political power on an equality with their own? Are we prepared to see them mingling in our legislation? Is any portion of this country prepared to see them enter these halls and take their seats by our sides, in perfect equality with the white representatives of an Anglo-Saxon race—to see them fill that chair—to see them placed at the heads of your Departments; or to see, perhaps, some Othello, or Toussaint, or Boyer, gifted with genius and inspired by ambition, grasp the presidential wreath, and wield the destinies of this great republic? From such a picture I turn with irrepressible disgust.

But, sir, no such consequences as either of these views exhibit can take place with us. There is no such thing as gradual emancipation, even if we were to consent to it. Those who know the negro character cannot doubt, what the recent experiments in the West Indies fully prove, that the first step you take towards emancipation bursts at once and forever the fetters of the slave. In our country, where the two classes of population are so nearly equal, such a state of things as now exist in Jamaica would not last a day, an hour. Sir, any species of emancipation with us would be followed instantly by civil war between the whites and blacks. A bloody, exterminating war, the result of which could not be doubtful, although it would be accompanied with horrors such as history has not recorded. The blacks would be annihilated, or once more subjugated and reduced to slavery. Such a catastrophe would be inevitable.

Permit me now, sir, for a moment to look into the causes of this vast and dangerous excitement; for it is intimately connected with the true merits of this important question. I am not disposed to attribute it to any peculiar feelings of hostility entertained by the North against the South, arising from position merely. It is indeed natural that a people not owning slaves should entertain a strong aversion to domestic servitude. It is natural that the descendants of the Puritans, without any deep investigation of the subject, should have an instinctive hostility to slavery in every shape. It is natural that foreigners—with whom the North is crowded, just released themselves from bondage, extravagant in their notions of the freedom of our institutions, and profoundly ignorant of the principles on which society and government are organized—should view with horror the condition of the southern operatives. And here let me say that these opinions, so natural, so strong, and so distinctly marking the geographical divisions of our country, indicate differences which, if pushed much further, will inevitably separate us into two nations. A separation which I should regard as a calamity to the whole human race, and which we of the South will endeavor to avert by every means save the sacrifice of our liberties, or the subversion of our domestic institutions.

But other causes are at work. This excitement belongs to the spirit of the age. Every close observer must perceive that we are approaching, if we have not already reached, a new era in civilization. The man of the nineteenth century is not the man of the seventeenth, and widely different from him of the eighteenth. Within the last sixty years there have been greater changes—not on the face of the earth, but in the history of civilized man—than has taken place before perhaps since the reign of Charlemagne. The progress and the philosophy of the events which have brought us to this state may be readily perceived and stated. Formerly all learning was confined to the clergy—all political power to the hereditary rulers of the people. The invention of printing dispensed knowledge among the middle classes. The clergy could no longer absorb it all. The first effect of this was the destruction of ecclesiastical despotism, which was consummated by the reformation. The next, a war of intelligence against political oppression; but the glittering temptations of power seduced it from its purposes, allured it to its assistance, and used its energies to rivet more closely their chains upon the people. At length, Government could no longer absorb all the talents and acquirements and ambition of the world. Then the effects of the contest began to show themselves. The tremendous conflicts for political ascendancy which took place in the British Parliament during the reign of George the Second were followed by the American Revolution, which was produced by the great intellects of this country, whom Government could neither conciliate to its abuses, nor purchase, nor intimidate. Next came that terrible tragedy, the French Revolution, which was confessedly brought about by the writings of the great philosophers of France. Since that period, man appears no longer to be the being that he was. His moral nature seems to have been changed, as by some sudden revelation from the lips of the Almighty, although the close observer sees that the great cause which had been so long and so silently, but surely working to effect this purpose, was the wide increase of knowledge. Bursting from the trammels of centuries of ignorance, he has been pressing onward, for good and for evil, with an energy tremendous and terrific. All nature has felt the impulse. The thin air has been converted into a resistless power. Steam, whose every definition was a useless vapor, has been made the most tremendous engine which has ever yet been placed in human hands—overcoming, in its infancy, time, space, and resistance, with a celerity and ease just not supernatural. Railroads have been thrown over swamps, rivers, lakes, and mountains, which, connecting new and distant points, open vast channels for intercourse and commerce. Labor-saving machinery of every kind has been incalculably improved: much of it perfected. In one word, we have reached a period when physical impossibilities are no longer spoken of. What was visionary yesterday, is planned, estimated, and resolved upon, to-day; to-morrow it is put in execution, and the third day superseded by something more wonderful and more important still.

During the period of this mighty change, the great struggle between the rulers and the ruled has been carried on with corresponding vigor: through the thousand channels which genius has opened, wealth has flown in to aid it in its contest with the strong arm of power. The two combined, finding themselves still unable to cope with the time-hardened strength of hereditary government, and eager, impatient, almost frenzied, to achieve its conquest, have called in to their assistance another ally—the people: not the “people,” as we have hitherto been accustomed in this country to define that term, but the mob—the sans-culottes. Proclaiming as their watchword that immortal but now prostituted sentiment, “that all men are born free and equal,” they have rallied to their standard the ignorant, uneducated, semi-barbarous mass which swarms and starves upon the face of Europe! Unnatural and debasing union! Hereditary institutions are gone. Already have the nobility of France been overthrown. Their days are numbered in the British empire. Let them go. I am not their advocate. What next? Confiscation has begun! The result is as obvious as if it were written on the wall. The hounds of Aetion turned upon their master. Genius and wealth, stimulated by “an ambition that o'erleaps itself,” have called these spirits from the vasty deep; they will down no more. The spoils of victory are theirs, and they will gorge and batten on them.

In this country we have no hereditary institutions to attract the first fury of this tempest, which is also brewing here, for the electric fluid has crossed the ocean, and the elements denote that it is expanding over the northern arch of our horizon. The question of emancipation, which in Europe is only a collateral issue, a mere ramification of the great controversy between hereditary power and ultimate agrarianism, has become with us the first and most important question; partly because the levellers here have not yet felt the heavy pressure of political oppression, and partly because they have regarded our institutions of slavery as most assimilated to an aristocracy. In this they are right. I accept the term. It is a government of the best. Combining all the advantages, and possessing but few of the disadvantages, of the aristocracy of the old world, without fostering to an unwarrantable extent the pride, the exclusiveness, the selfishness, the thirst for sway, the contempt for the rights of others, which distinguish the nobility of Europe, it gives us their education, their polish, their munificence, their high honor, their undaunted spirit. Slavery does indeed create an aristocracy—an aristocracy of talents, of virtue, of generosity and courage. In a slave country every freeman is an aristocrat. Be he rich or poor, if he does not possess a single slave, he has been born to all the natural advantages of the society in which he is placed, and all its honors lie open before him, inviting his genius and industry. Sir, I do firmly believe that domestic slavery, regulated as ours is, produces the highest toned, the purest, best organization of society that has ever existed on the face of the earth.

Against this institution war has been commenced. A crusade is proclaimed. The banner has been hoisted, and on it is inscribed that visionary and disastrous sentiment, “Equality to all mankind;” although there is no analogous equality in the moral or physical creation, in earth, air, or water—in this world, or in the world to come—if our religion be not altogether wrong! The sans-culottes are moving. On the banks of the Hudson, the Ohio, and the Susquehanna—on the hills, and in the vales, and along the “iron-bound coast” of immaculate New England—they are mustering their host and preparing for their ravages. Let them come! We will be ready. Standing on our institutions, which of themselves give us a strength almost impregnable, and rallying around them as one man, with the help of God I believe we shall be able to roll back the frantic tide to whence it came. But wo unto the men of substance in the North whose infatuation may impel them to join this fatal crusade. The blood-hounds they are setting upon us, successful or unsuccessful, will in due time come back from the chase; and come back to seize upon the accumulations of their industry, to overturn their altars, and desolate their households. Such, sir, is, in a few words, the true history, and such, I believe and trust, will be the issues of this extraordinary movement.

Mr. Speaker, I have touched on topics to-day which have not heretofore been broached within these walls. In thus departing from the usual silence of the South upon this subject, it may be thought that I have gone too far. But times have changed. They change before our eyes with the rapidity of thought. Painful as it is, the truth should now be told; for shortly it will speak itself, and in a voice of thunder. We cannot, in my judgment, avoid this danger longer, by closing our eyes upon it, and lulling our people into a false security.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Nor can we justify ourselves before the world for the course which we may be compelled to take in order to maintain our rights, without boldly declaring what those rights are, defining them, and showing that they are inestimable. All minor considerations must give way to effect those all-important objects. These have been my motives for the course I have taken here. I leave it to the rapidly approaching crisis to determine whether I am right or wrong.

Sir, if I were asked what it is, under existing circumstances, the South desire the North to do, I should say, "Pass laws in your different States, forbidding, by the severest penalties, the publication or circulation of such incendiary pamphlets as I have exhibited here to-day." This your Legislatures are fully competent to do, without infringing on freedom of speech, or freedom of the press. That freedom means well-regulated, legal freedom, and not unrestrained licentiousness. Have you not laws to punish libel and slander? If a citizen of the State of New York were to say of another citizen that he was a "land pirate," "a murderer," and a "man-stealer," would he not be liable to an action of slander? If he were to write these things of him, or caricature him by infamous and disgusting pictorial representations, would he not be indictable for libel? What violation, then, of social or constitutional right would it be to extend the benefit of these same laws to us?

We ask nothing more than the recognition of a well-known principle of international law, a striking illustration of which has happened within the memory of many who now hear me. It will be recollected that, just before the war between France and England, which broke out in 1803, the English presses teemed with abuse of the First Consul. Bonaparte complained to the English ministers: they indicted Peltier, tried, and convicted him. The declaration of war only prevented him from receiving his punishment. If England, where there have been more battles fought for the liberty of speech and of the press than in any portion of the world, felt herself bound to indict a journalist for libelling her greatest enemy, the enemy of the whole human race, on the very eve of war with him, is it unreasonable to require you to extend the same justice to the grossly slandered and deeply injured people of the South; brethren as you call us of one great confederacy, devoted to the same great principles of constitutional liberty, and who have so often mingled our blood with yours on the same glorious battle field?

Sir, I cannot believe gentlemen are sincere when they urge here this slang about the right of petition, and the freedom of speech and of the press, as though any one here had the remotest desire to curtail them. When Tappan, and Garrison, and Gerrit Smith, and such as they are, use this cant, I understand them; they wish to inflame the popular passions by false appeals to popular rights. But when such men as the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Messrs. ADAMS and CUSHING,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] who favored us the other day with eulogiums on certain abolitionists, introduce it on this floor, I do not—yes, I do—understand them. But I will not press that point, for I wish to connect this question with no political intrigues or discussions.

I will say frankly that I do not believe we shall be able to obtain the passage of such laws as I have alluded to in any non-slaveholding States. Sir, there is not a man of any note, or at least of any political aspiration, who will dare to make such a proposition. He would be prostrated, and forever. He would be covered with a mountain of public odium, under which he could never rise again. And I want no stronger evidence of the true state of public sentiment in those States than this single fact.

What, sir, does the South ask next? She asks—and this at least she has a right to demand—that these petitions be not received here and recorded on your journals. This House at least ought to be a sanctuary, into which no such topic should be allowed to enter. Representatives from every section of the republic ought to be permitted to come here faithfully to perform their duties to their constituents and their country, without being subjected to these incendiary attacks—their feelings insulted, their rights assaulted, and the falsest calumnies of themselves and those they represent thrown on them daily, and perpetuated to their posterity, and all the world, among the archives of the Union. Is this demanding any thing unreasonable, unjust, or unkind? Sir, we cannot endure it. If these things are to be permitted here, you drive us from your councils. Let the consequences rest on you.

But, Mr. Speaker, even if this House should refuse to receive these petitions, I am not one of those who permits himself to trust that the conflict will be at an end. No, sir, we shall still have to meet it elsewhere. We will meet it. It is our inevitable destiny to meet it, in whatever shape it comes, or to whatever extremity it may go. Our State Legislatures will have to pass laws regulating our police with a stricter hand. They will have to pass and to enforce laws prohibiting the circulation of incendiary pamphlets through the mail within their limits. We may have to adopt an entire non-intercourse with the free States; and finally, sir, we may have to dissolve this Union. From none of these measures can we shrink, as circumstances may make them necessary. Our last thought will be to give up our institutions. We were born and bred under them, and will maintain them or die in their defence. And I warn the abolitionists, ignorant, infatuated, barbarians as they are, that if chance shall throw any of them into our hands he may expect a felon's death. No human law, no human influence, can arrest his fate. The superhuman instinct of self-preservation, the indignant feelings of an outraged people, to whose hearth-stones he is seeking to carry death and desolation, pronounce his doom; and if we failed to accord it to him we should be unworthy of the forms we wear, unworthy of the beings whom it is our duty to protect, and we should merit and expect the indignation of offended Heaven.

NOTES.

(a) Address to the Auxiliaries and Friends of the American Anti-slavery Society.

Dear brethren: At the last annual meeting of the American Anti-slavery Society, it was

"Resolved, That an effort be made to raise $30,000 for the use of the society the present year, and that the abolitionists present pledge themselves to raise such sums as they may respectively offer."

Donations and pledges were immediately obtained, amounting to $14,500.

Additional pledges have since been obtained in Boston to the amount of $4,000. The sum of $11,500 remains to be raised. As there are known to be more than two hundred anti-slavery societies, on kindred principles with the American, we have no doubt that this sum can speedily be made up. Each society has only to raise $150, and the work is done. We believe that those societies which remain unpledged will joyfully come forward to do their proportion as soon as called on.

The plan proposed at the annual meeting, and now adopted by the executive committee, in the confident belief that the means will be furnished, is this:

1. To increase the number of agents, by appointing as many able, efficient, and thoroughgoing men as can be obtained.

2. To commence the distribution of publications on a new and extended scale.

The following publications will be issued monthly, viz:

1. On the first week of each month, a small folio paper, entitled Human Rights, to be filled with facts and arguments on the subject of slavery and its remedy, written in a plain and familiar style. Of this twenty thousand copies will be printed, to be increased to fifty thousand or more, as soon as arrangements can be made to have them promptly and judiciously distributed among the reading population.

2. On the second week, the Anti-slavery Record, a small magazine, with cuts, will be printed, to the number of 25,000 copies.

3. On the third week, the Emancipator will be printed, on a large imperial sheet, of the size of the New York Observer, or the New York Evangelist. This will contain more extended essays and descriptions, on points connected with the cause. It is expected that from 15 to 25,000 copies will be printed monthly this year.

4. On the fourth week will be issued 25,000 copies of the Slave's Friend, a juvenile magazine, with cuts, adapted especially for circulation among children and youth.

All these publications will be distributed gratuitously, by the aid of the auxiliaries, to those who are not abolitionists, or will be sold at the office, to friends of the cause, at a very low rate. * * *

The present is the time for action. * * *

Let female societies be formed. Female societies probably did more for the abolition of slavery in Great Britain than those of the other sex. They scattered anti-slavery tracts, hand-bills, pamphlets, and books, every where. They circulated petitions; they covered articles of furniture or apparel, such as pincushions, work-boxes, handkerchiefs, boxes, baskets, purses, portfolios, &c., with devices and mottoes reminding the users of the poor slaves. They made the matter a topic of conversation on almost all occasions. Several societies of ladies, in this country, have already commenced the same course with good success. Let the female sex, then, throughout the land, emulate the efforts made by their sisters over the ocean, in this work of benevolence.

Juvenile societies, too, may be engaged in the same work. Children are all abolitionists. * * *

We hope abolitionists will every where make it a personal business to distribute the publications; that they will not let them be thrown away, but put them in the hands only of those who will read and think. Let no abolitionist, at home or abroad, ever be without a supply, and be ready to embrace every favorable opportunity.

Petitions to Congress for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia should be put in circulation immediately. The minds of the members of Congress should, if possible, be enlightened as to the real design of the American Anti-slavery Society; and their prejudices should be removed, as in many it may easily be, by personal interviews with abolitionists. The way may thus be prepared for a more favorable hearing before the representatives of the people. * * *

Executive Committee of the American Anti-slavery Society.

(b) There are now about half a million that still have the liberty of holding slaves; their slaves now amount to upwards of two millions; and their landed estates are of vast extent; they have entire control over eleven States. The poorer classes of the white people are well trained to subjection, and occupy a grade a little above that of the slaves. Few nobles in Europe can command so great a retinue of servants; and no King on earth possesses more absolute authority. Indeed, such is their dignity, wealth, and influence, that, although but a half a million, they are able to control twelve and a half millions, and do in fact govern the Union; and the plan is now laid to keep up and increase their dignity, wealth, and power, to future generations. They have managed so wisely as to get the whole Union bound by the constitution to keep their slaves in subjection, and allow them a representation in the General Government in proportion to the number of their slaves. The increase of these, already 54,000 a year, will soon give the increase to one Representative every year. By the aid of the rest of the Union, the slaves can be kept in subjection until they shall have become much more numerous than the white people, provided they are prevented from learning to read, and thus kept in total ignorance. And, for this purpose, laws are passed, with heavy penalties, against teaching slaves to read. Now, it is obvious that, by those means, slavery might be extended to remote posterity, especially with what assistance the Colonization Society might be able to give them, by carrying off occasionally a little of the surplusage. Every one can easily see that these southern gentlemen have before them a magnificent prospect of wealth and power, provided the rest of the Union will continue to be their humble servants in enabling them to keep their slaves in subjection. Now, the avowed design of the abolitionists is to abolish slavery, not, indeed, by force of arms, but by forming against it public opinion, which will be even more powerful. They have combined together to propagate the doctrine, that "all men are made of one blood;" and of course are "created equal." Vast sums of money are now pledged to propagate the sentiment throughout the whole land. Agents are lecturing, papers are circulating, societies are forming, and thousands continually joining them. It seems as if the world will soon be on fire. What is to be done? Argument has been tried and exhausted in vain! Mobs have been tried with little effect! The heresy spreads like fire in the whirlwind. The last remedy is now demanded—extermination entire—nothing less will do! If matters go on as they are, the result is obvious. Every man who does not hold slaves will set his face against slavery; and then, how will half a million of men continue to hold more than two millions in bondage? Mark the design! All force is disavowed; but then the slaveholder must, so soon as the tide of public opinion rolls against him, yield up his slaves. He cannot hold them without aid; much less can he bear the reproach that will be heaped upon him.

It is not to be disguised, sir, that war has broken out between the South and the North, not easily to be terminated. Political and commercial men, for their own purposes, are industriously striving to restore peace. But the peace which they may accomplish will be superficial and hollow. True and permanent peace can only be restored by removing the cause of the war—that is, slavery. It can never be established on any other terms. The sword now drawn will not be sheathed till victory, entire victory, is ours or theirs; not until that deep and damning stain is washed out from our nation, or the chains of slavery are riveted afresh where they now are, and on our necks also. It is idle, criminal, to speak of peace on any other terms.

(c) PREAMBLE.

Whereas, unconditional slavery exists to a fearful extent amongst us as a nation, in violation of those principles that moved our fathers to the dreadful struggle of the Revolution, "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Whereas the aristocracy of the South are determined to perpetuate it by means scarcely less dreadful than the tortures of the inquisition, and the bastard aristocracy of the North are aiding their "chivalrous" compeers of the South in their inhuman endeavors, by misrepresenting, slandering, threatening, and imprisoning, those who boldly espouse the cause of universal freedom, and further by circulating publications and making speeches so highly incendiary as to excite mobs, and impel them to their ruthless work of terror and destruction.

Whereas the crisis has arrived at which the descendants of the Pilgrims must determine whether they will establish the shameful and cowardly precedent of surrendering their most sacred rights at the nod of an arrogant, domineering, and self-constituted aristocracy, or, in the spirit of their fathers, manfully maintain them.

And whereas, if we remain silent and inactive, we effectually surrender those rights, and, with them, the hopes of the slave, till the prediction of Jefferson shall be realized, and the slave, fearless and free, shall till the land of his thralldom, enriched with the blood of his master.

Therefore, resolved, Under a deep sense of duty to ourselves, to the slave, to our country, and to God, that, "sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish," we will exercise the right of discussing the subject of slavery; that we will use all constitutional and peaceful means for its speedy termination; and, to act the more efficiently, form ourselves into a society, and adopt the following, &c.

(d) ABOLITION.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

Some forty miles from Cincinnati, to the east, are two settlements of free negroes—probably near a thousand—men, women, and children, of the true ebony color, with a very little mixture of the mahogany or lighter shades. The negroes own the land occupied by them, but without the power to sell. Each family has a small farm. They are emancipated slaves, and these lands were purchased expressly for them, and parceled out among them about fifteen years ago.

Their lands are not of the best quality of Ohio lands; but, by good management, could be made very good; they are particularly well adapted to grass, either meadow or pasture.

Having been formerly slaves, and compelled to work, one would suppose they ought to have industrious habits. They have had every inducement to industry and good conduct held out to them. The experiment was to test the merits of the negro race, under the most favorable circumstances for success.

Has this experiment succeeded? No, it has not. In all Ohio, can any white settlement be found equally wretched, equally unproductive?

Farms given to them fifteen years ago, instead of being well improved, and the timber preserved for farming, have been sadly managed; small awkward clearings, and those not in grass, but exhausted and worn out in corn crops; the timber greatly destroyed; wretched log houses, with mud floors, with chimneys of mud and wood; with little timber for further farming.

They are so excessively lazy and stupid that the people of Georgetown, (near by their camps), and the neighboring farmers, will not employ them as work hands to any extent. They do not raise produce enough on their own lands to feed their families, much less do they have a surplus for sale abroad. They pass most of their time in their little sorry cabins; too listless even to fiddle and dance. One may ride through the "negro camps," as they are called, passing a dozen straggling cabins with smoke issuing out of their ends, in the middle of clearings, without seeing a soul either at work or play. The fear of starvation makes them work the least possible quantity, while they are much too lazy to play.

Why do not the zealous abolitionists go there and see the experiment in all its beauty—the slave changed into a free, but wretched, savage! Why not make something of these thousand negroes? There are not more than two or three families, out of the whole, who are improved by the change from slavery to freedom.

The negro settlements are a dead weight upon Brown county, as to any productive benefit from the negro lands, or from negro labor; and that space of country might as well to this day have remained in possession of the Indians.

If southern wealth can be applied to buy and colonize among us such a worthless population, what farmer in Ohio is safe? Has he any guarantee that a black colony will not be established in his neighborhood?

Let any one who wishes to learn the operation of emancipated negroes, visit the Brown county camps. As they sink in laziness, poverty, and filth, they increase in numbers—their only produce is children. They want nothing but cowries to make them equal to the negroes of the Niger.

When Mr. HAMMOND concluded—

Mr. HOLSEY inquired what was the question before the House.

The CHAIR said it was the motion that the petition be received.

Mr. HOLSEY moved to lay that motion on the table, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, said, as the business of the House would be interrupted by the presentation of abolition petitions from the East, and the South and West be deprived of an opportunity of presenting their petitions, he moved to suspend the rules for this day, for the purpose of moving that the order of presentation be reversed, and the call of the States commenced with Missouri, instead of Maine.

Mr. JONES, of Michigan, requested the gentleman to alter the motion so as to begin with the Territories, which were at the end of the list.

Mr. WILLIAMS modified his motion accordingly.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended: Yeas 115, nays 50.

Mr. WILLIAMS then made the motion indicated by him, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIR then called the States and Territories for petitions, commencing with Arkansas.

Mr. STORER presented the proceedings of a public meeting in Cincinnati, deprecating the course of the abolitionists; which he moved be received and read.

Mr. HAMMOND opposed the reception of the proceedings. He should object to any interference on this subject, whether in favor of or in opposition to the abolition of slavery.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to lay the preliminary question of reception on the table; which was agreed to.

TREATY OF DANCING RABBIT CREEK.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, said that he held in his hand two papers of some importance to the country generally. One was a memorial from certain Mingoes of the Choctaw nation, remaining in the limits of the State of Mississippi, praying a grant of unappropriated lands in lieu of those to which they say they were entitled under the 14th article of the treaty of Dancing

Appropriation Bills.

Rabbit creek, and of which they declare that they have been unjustly deprived.

The other was a memorial or remonstrance of a numerous and respectable portion of his constituents against the validity of these claims, denouncing the whole proceeding as fraudulent, and calling on Congress to protect them in their settlement and rights, and the country against the most stupendous fraud that was ever set on foot.

I will not now, sir, said he, pronounce any opinion on the validity of these claims. At a proper time, I shall consider it my duty and my privilege to do so. I understand that additional memorials and statements of facts are now being prepared on both sides, and will shortly be submitted. I wish the whole subject to go before the appropriate committee, and must respectfully ask the House not to prejudice the case. Let there be no ex parte statements, no wholesale denunciations of fraud. Let justice be done to all parties. It is a matter in which we feel a common interest. Whether we consider the magnitude of the claim, the respectability of the parties, or the deep absorbing interest felt in the State of Mississippi, the subject is alike worthy of a full and fair investigation. On one side are these Choctaw claimants, their agents, and assignees, citizens of different States, of every political party, and many of them gentlemen of the highest respectability, upon whose integrity heretofore not one shadow of suspicion has ever rested, and who come here, not shrinking from, but, as they say, seeking investigation. On the other side are many of the settlers of the State of Mississippi—a valuable class of men—entirely led to the highest credit, and claiming justice at your hands. I acknowledge, sir, that I have but a limited acquaintance with the subject. I candidly confess, however, to the House that, if I have any prepossession, any prejudice, any conviction on the matter, it is against these claims. Whether just or unjust, if they be confirmed, the fairest portion of Mississippi will be desolated; the stability of property will be shaken; the tide of prosperity will be rolled back, and hundreds of my best constituents, the men who support their Government in peace, and fight its battles in war, will be driven from their homes to other and distant lands. Mr. C. said he could not contemplate such a result without the deepest regret, and he could not sanction any step going to produce it. But, sir, let the whole subject go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, a committee whose ability and experience, aided by its distinguished chairman, [Mr. JOHN BELL,] furnished a guarantee to the House that the subject-matter will be ably and impartially investigated. Mr. C. hoped the memorials would be referred and printed.

Mr. VINTON moved that these memorials be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAIBORNE rejoined, and urged the propriety of the reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question was put, and the House decided to refer them to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

After the reception of a number of resolutions
The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

In pursuance of the order adopted on Tuesday last, the House proceeded to the consideration of the appropriation bills.

The CHAIR informed the House that all the above bills were before the Committee of the Whole, except the bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1836, which was on the Speaker's table.

The latter bill was taken up, the question still being on the motion to recommit the bill, with instructions to adopt some uniform regulation in regard to mileage of members of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, suggested that the bill had better be passed as it stood, and the regulation of the mileage made in a separate bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made some statements, showing that members, under the present system, were unequally compensated; some receiving more for mileage than others, who travel a greater distance. Some gentlemen, by charging according to a particular rule, received three or four hundred dollars more than other gentlemen living in the same vicinity. A direct line measured on the map, would be a uniform rule; and, if it did not afford a sufficient sum, ten per cent., or more, could be added to the sum.

Mr. JOHNSON expressed some doubt whether a regulation concerning mileage could be properly introduced into an appropriation bill for the present year, as the mileage for the present year was actually due.

After some explanations from Messrs. LANE and UNDERWOOD,

Mr. McKENNAN said he was glad that the gentleman from Kentucky had introduced this subject. If any abuses in the Government were to be corrected, this abuse of mileage charges ought to be corrected. There was no difficulty whatever of introducing a regulation on the subject in the appropriation bill, and he hoped the rule adopted would be that each member shall charge his mileage by the nearest mail route.

Mr. WARD said he would go as far as any man in the correction of abuses, but he did not think this bill the proper one for regulating the subject of mileage.

Mr. ADAMS made a few remarks, explanatory of the reasons which would induce him to vote for the motion.

Mr. HARDIN opposed the motion, and insisted that no better rule than the present could be adopted. Something must be confided to the honor of gentlemen, and it was not to be presumed that any gentleman would charge too much. The rule was, that members should charge their mileage by the route which they usually travelled, and those who came by the river thought themselves, and doubtless were, entitled to charge by the river route. He hoped the bill would pass as it was.

Mr. PEYTON remarked that he was in hopes that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would prevail. It had always struck him with astonishment that members of Congress were the only public servants who had no restraint imposed by law, but could put their hands into the Treasury and pay themselves at pleasure for their services. It amounts to this. What restraint is imposed by law? Cannot any member of Congress fix the rate of his mileage at whatever sum he may in his discretion think fit? Why should members of Congress alone be trusted with this unlimited discretion? Gentlemen say their honor is sufficient to restrain them! They are like other men. Their virtue is best preserved when least tempted. But let us see if this honorary obligation is sufficient to guard the Treasury against abuse. Tennessee, sir, you know, affords a striking instance that it is not. A Senator, who we may suppose understands the law of Congress as well as any other gentleman here or elsewhere, conceives it to be his duty to charge the river route, giving him about 200 dollars more than a gentleman now a Representative on this floor, who lives in the same city with him, receives for his mileage per session. Now, sir, no one who knows that honorable Senator as well as you do, will suppose that money had the slightest influence over him in giving the act of Congress the construction which he does; which is, that he shall receive two hundred dollars more for mileage than either of his colleagues, according to distance, per session. He thinks the act of Congress, passed at a time when the Government mail stage route was the only route known or used, makes it obligatory on his conscience to charge the river route, whether he travels it or not. Yes, sir, this shows how an honest, well-meaning man, aiming to reach the spirit of the law, may differ with other gentlemen in the same situation. Sir, when the act of Congress regulating the mileage of members of Congress was passed, steamboats were not in use. The direct mail stage route was the only one in existence. But the improvements of the age present a more speedy and much cheaper mode of travelling. We can make our election; if we take the river route, which is the invention of a subsequent day to that in which the law of Congress was passed, we have the right to do so. It is cheaper, more speedy, and in every way more comfortable. But there is the same old direct mail route, which was the usual route at the time the act of Congress was passed. If we choose to take it, very well; if not, it is our own lookout, and should not increase our charge upon the Treasury. But, sir, the Tennessee Senator, to whom I have alluded, considers himself bound to charge the long route, even if he travels the short one. Yes, sir, he may take his seat in the same stage at the seat of Government with his colleague, travel every inch of the ground together, but when they charge for each mile that they have passed over, he is bound in conscience (for if he were not, he would not do it; it is a mere difference of opinion) to charge for all the meanders of the Ohio river, notwithstanding he has never touched its waters. This is a case in point to show that it is not safe to trust an unlimited discretion to the purest and the best. I hope the committee will be further instructed to report the amount which each member of Congress has received, for a sufficient number of years to show the abuses to which this discretion has been subject in past time.

Mr. GIDEON LEE opposed the recommitment of the bill, and urged its speedy passage, as a measure of justice to those to whom the money was due. The members of Congress were drawing their own pay, but no one else for whom payment was provided in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD suggested that there would be no necessity for delaying the bill in case his motion was agreed to, as the committee could retain the subject of mileage for a separate bill, and send back the remaining portion of the bill.

Mr. MANN made a few remarks in favor of recommitment. He had found, from experience, that the only way to secure any promised reform of this kind was by holding on upon the money.

Mr. ANTHONY said that, when the present rule was adopted, it was contemplated that members could travel but twenty miles a day. And the fact was, that many gentlemen travelling from the far West were paid at the rate of two hundred miles a day, receiving not eight dollars a day, but eighty dollars a day for travel. The pay of members coming from the far West was thus made double the amount received by members coming from Pennsylvania. The present rule was not at all adapted to the modern improvements in the mode of travelling.

Mr. MERCER said he would vote for the motion, but not for the reasons given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Those who came from a great distance found their pay a poor compensation for the inconvenience of leaving their homes. But he was willing that a uniform rule for estimating the mileage should be adopted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to beg the House, and the gentleman from Kentucky, to modify his motion, so as to refer his inquiry, not to the Committee of Ways and Means, but to a select committee. The subject, as it related to accounts, did not belong to that committee; and, moreover, that committee was pressed with other business.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to amend the instructions so as to require the committee to regulate and equalise the pay of the members.

Mr. HARPER supported the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. PATTON said it had happened every year since he had been a member of the House, that while the appropriation bills were under consideration, an attempt had been made to reduce the pay on mileage of members of Congress, and he had never known one of these attempts to succeed. He considered that members had acquired a right to be paid under an existing law. If an abuse existed under the law, Congress should alter the law. But the Committee of Ways and Means had nothing to do with the subject; it was their duty to report the sum which they may suppose to be wanted for different services. He suggested that no law could be made applicable to the mileage of the present session, because that had been drawn, and was snug in gentlemen's pockets.

After some further remarks from Messrs. DUNLAP, HANNEGAN, ANTHONY, and PEARCE of Rhode Island, Without taking any question,

On motion of Mr. GRENNELL, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

The bill from the Senate, "to repeal the first and second sections of the act limiting the term of certain offices to four years, and for other purposes," having been read twice by its title--

Mr. MANN moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BELL said that no subject of greater importance than this would come before the House at the present session. None of the standing committees were peculiarly appropriate for the consideration of the subject, and he did not see that the Judiciary Committee was more appropriate than any other. It was a most singular fact, that this branch of Congress, by its rules, and the operation given to them by the decision of the Chair, sustained by the votes of the House, had become so restricted and tied down in its action, that it could not take up for consideration and discussion any great fundamental principles of the Government; no opportunity is ever afforded to bring forward propositions upon any important subject, in a distinct and separate form. This was entirely a new day in the history of the country. He was comparatively a young member, but there were members who had been here for fifteen or twenty years and more, and to them he appealed to say whether the House was ever before so bound down by rules as to prevent gentlemen from bringing forward, in the form of resolution, any important subject for discussion. But nothing could now be brought forward, because the House had blocked up the way, perhaps, for the whole session, by the adoption of the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject of executive patronage could not be brought forward, although it was connected with the best and most vital interests of the country, and with principles without which we should have neither constitution nor country of which an American could feel proud. With a view to ascertain whether there was a disposition on the part of the House to permit an investigation of this subject, he would move that the bill be referred to a select committee. Even if the majority of the committee appointed should be opposed to the principles of the bill, there would yet be an opportunity afforded to the minority of the committee to express their views on the subject of the bill. He did not know that he would support the bill in its present shape or not, but he wished the subject of executive patronage, generally, brought before the House. He moved the reference of the bill to a select committee.

Executive Patronage.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS hoped, he said, that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would prevail; and he assured the House that nothing but the consideration that he had consumed much of the time of the House had prevented him from making the same proposition. We never had, and never would have, before us a more important subject. One of the newspapers, when the bill was introduced into the Senate, remarked that it was a bill to amend the constitution of the United States. He considered it a bill not to amend, but to alter, the constitution; and he trusted that discussion would be had upon it to a great extent, and that the decision upon it would be made with great deliberation. Whatever might be the impressions of gentlemen in regard to the policy of the bill, he hoped that, after its importance had been so forcibly represented by the gentleman from Tennessee, it would be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HAMER remarked that a great deal had been said in regard to the appropriate committee of the House for the investigation of the subject. If any gentleman would take the trouble to refer to the rules of the House, he would find that the bill ought to go to the standing Committee on the Judiciary. [Mr. H. here read the rule.] Did not the rule, he asked, propose to change laws long in existence? Where, then, should the subject be considered, if not in the Committee on the Judiciary? If gentlemen were extremely desirous of getting up a report of a partisan or political character on this subject, their purpose could be answered in another way. All they wished to say in a report could as well be said in a speech, and for making speeches opportunities occurred daily. He did not very well understand the frequent lectures upon rules which the House received of late, nor did he see how the gentleman could assert that no opportunity was afforded in the House for the discussion of great principles. This was very extraordinary. What had we done here but discuss great principles? After a session of eight or nine weeks, we had passed three acts, and two of those of a private nature. During the whole time we had been constantly engaged in discussing matters and things in general. Two or three general resolutions, admitting of a wide range of discussion, were pending now, and upon them two or three unfinished speeches were lying over. Day after day gentlemen were waiting to obtain the floor for the purpose of concluding these speeches; a blaze of light, pouring from this hall, illumined the whole country; and if the session, as was predicted, lasted till July, there would be scarcely a single constitutional question which was ever agitated in this country, that the readers of debates would not be fully enlightened upon. If the rules were wrong, let us (said he) change them. But, as long as they were in existence, they ought to be observed. According to these rules, the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he had heard no good reason for a reference of this bill to a select committee. The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. ANAMS] had observed that this was a bill to change the constitution, and therefore he would vote to refer it to a select committee. Another honorable gentleman [Mr. BELL] had observed that it was a very important bill; it was one in which the people took great interest, and therefore it ought to go to a select committee, that a report might be speedily made, and gentlemen might have an opportunity of discussing this subject. Mr. V. said he hardly thought that the gentleman from Tennessee would hazard the assertion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this was a bill to change the constitution. It originated in the Senate, and many gentlemen would doubtless deem it uncharitable to that body to say that they would, by means of a mere law, change the constitution. If it was not a proposition to change the constitution, it was only a proposition to change an existing law, and therefore belonged most appropriately to the Judiciary Committee. The mere importance of the subject, upon which the gentleman from Tennessee had dwelt with so much force, was certainly no reason for referring this bill to a select committee. The Judiciary Committee was surely one of the most important committees recognised by the rules of this House. It required great ability and learning, and its members were always selected, he supposed, in reference to their requisite talents and qualifications. He did not believe that select committees engrossed all the wisdom and capacity of the House, but was rather disposed to think that a body of gentlemen, who were permanent, and chosen for the investigation of great and interesting subjects, would be apt to be quite as select for their wisdom, in reference to the subjects that came within their province, as another body, which we dignified with the appellation of a "select committee." The gentleman from Tennessee had not ventured to say that the subject-matter of the bill did not most naturally belong to the Judiciary Committee; but it was an important subject, and ipso facto, in the opinion of that honorable gentleman, it ought to be referred to a select committee. This was to his (Mr. V.'s) mind a very unsatisfactory reason for a special reference. It was, he believed, a very important law, and one which proposed to secure to the incumbents of office a freehold title in offices.

Mr. V. said the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] had given the House another lecture about the mischiefs resulting from our rules, or from the administration of them. He did not understand the honorable gentleman to impute any blame to the presiding officer of the House, but the grievance of which he most complained was, that the discussion of no one important subject was finished, before another was obtruded upon our consideration. This was no new mischief. He (Mr. V.) had felt the annoying influence of it under former auspices, and very shortly after he became a member of this House. Two years ago he undertook to make a speech upon an important subject, and proceeded with his argument for about half an hour; when he gave way to a motion to adjourn. Next morning he resumed his seat, with notes in hand, to continue his argument, and, much to his annoyance, the subject was not again announced from the Chair till after the expiration of some weeks! And most of the gentlemen here would bear witness to the agony which resulted from being laden for whole weeks with a half-delivered speech. His past experience, therefore, enabled him to bear witness that the confusion in which the business of the House was involved, by means of our rules, was not unprecedented, and therefore it was not a fit subject of rebuke to the majority of this House. He did not know that the honorable gentleman intended to rebuke the majority, but he at least took good care to remind them very often of the evils of their rules.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee seemed to think that it was vitally important to the people that this and other subjects of importance, to which he had adverted, should be here discussed. He (Mr. V.) had not, for some time past, so far as the enlightening of the people was concerned, been in the habit of attaching quite as much importance to speeches made here, and in the other end of the Capitol, as was ascribed to them by many other gentlemen. He did not believe that this was the fountain—the source of all light for the people. No; he believed that the people of this country had wisdom enough to understand their political rights and interests, and independence enough to assert and vindicate them; and if gentlemen here would more frequently yield to, or profit by, the lessons which the people taught them, they would be more apt to perpetuate the confidence, and subserve the interest, of the people. But, if gentlemen wanted to make speeches to enlighten the people, they could as well perform that duty after the report of a standing committee as after the report of a select committee. They might make their two hours' speech, print it in the Globe or "Sun," and thus illuminate the benighted people. The argument of the honorable gentleman [Mr. BELL] in favor of a select committee, because of the facility that might be afforded to make speeches, was as unsound as the argument that it ought to be referred to a select committee on account of its importance.

Mr. BELL said that it was because speeches of this nature were not thought calculated, by the gentleman and his friends, to enlighten the people, that he complained of the operation of the rules, which restricted the discussions to such subjects as those who control the business of the House thought proper for discussion. A member could not present his views on this subject without being called to order, and arrested in his remarks by a majority of the House. All discussions were shut out unless they were approved by a majority of the House, and such as were calculated to enlighten the people upon one side of the question only. Petitions, for the last three mornings, had cut off one of those resolutions upon which the gentleman said we could have the opportunity of general discussion. This was the result of a new construction of the rules of the House. The gentleman from Ohio, he said, was hardly candid in saying that an opportunity was afforded for discussion by these resolutions. The gentleman had certainly the sagacity to perceive that his friends had burned their fingers when they agreed to consider the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] Instead of affording an opportunity for the discussion of that resolution, great pains had been taken by the gentleman's friends to cut it off. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] brought forward his resolution to bind the House to the consideration of the appropriation bills from the precise hour of one o'clock each day, he saw plainly that it was intended to seal the lips of all those who wished to take part in the discussion of that subject. The abolition resolutions had slept so long that those who took most interest in them had forgotten them. The same was the case with the resolution on the Military Academy. He was sorry to allude to any political interests in this House, but he must remark that neither of these resolutions appeared to be favorite subjects with the majority of the House. The gentleman could not be sincere in saying that an opportunity was afforded by these resolutions to enlighten the people by discussions on general subjects. The gentleman intimates (said Mr. B.) that I want an opportunity to make a party report. That gentleman has known me, as a member of this House, for some time, and he never knew an instance in which I acted as a partisan on this floor. I defy him to point to a single act of mine which can justify the imputation.

[Mr. HAMER explained. The gentleman having alluded to majorities and minorities, he had only intended to indicate a mode in which the minority could present their views.]

Mr. BELL was obliged to the gentleman, he said, for his explanation, but it appeared strange to him that it was taken for granted that no speech could be made here but with immediate relation to the prospects of men for office. Was it supposed, in 1826, that the subject of Government patronage was exclusively a partisan or political subject? We had passed through a great revolution, indeed, if the friends of this administration had become champions of executive power and patronage. Times had changed, and men had changed with them. The importance of the subject was not the only reason which he had urged in favor of the reference of the bill to a select committee. On parliamentary principles, a committee ought to be allowed for the bill which was composed of members favorable to its object, but, according to the parliamentary law of the Congress of the United States, the lamb is always committed to the wolf. His object in desiring a select committee was to bring the subject before a committee which would direct its attention exclusively to the subject, and make an early report upon it. That was the only way in which the subject could be brought before the House for discussion. He did not know that even a minority of the committee appointed would be in favor of the bill, and present a report of their views on the subject. He believed that the best mode of enlightening the people on public topics was by discussion here—by open, free, manly, discussion on this floor. When gentlemen meet here face to face in debate, error will be exposed, and fallacy detected. It was far preferable to the light which issues from editorial columns of a party press, which presents only one side of a question. Here both sides are heard. He should continue his lectures on the rules of this House, but always in a spirit of courtesy to the House, and, in defiance of the taunts of gentlemen, should point out the practical purposes which they were made to serve. Sir, free discussion exists no longer on this floor. How happened it that the Senate had become the popular branch of the National Legislature? It was because every Senator had an opportunity to speak on any great subject which he might choose to introduce in that body. He should continue, from day to day, to complain of the rules of this House, and of the operation given to them, so long as they tended to defeat the object and end of the popular branch of the National Legislature. He regarded the subject of executive patronage a great one, and one which ought to be fully and freely discussed in this House, and his object was to bring it before the House in such a shape that it could be discussed untrammelled by rules. He did not know that he approved of this bill as it stood; he had no party feeling in regard to it; but he invoked discussion upon the subject as one of the greatest importance to the welfare of this country.

Mr. MANN explained that he had made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, because he believed that to be the proper course, and he saw no reason to deviate from that course, unless there was some great principle that could be brought to bear against the propriety of doing so. He agreed that the subject was one of the highest importance, and one that required the most deliberate examination. But it was not a new proposition, for it was as early as the first Congress. Mr. M. had heard no reason why the usual course should be departed from. The gentleman from Tennessee had manifested a very commendable zeal in regard to the business of the House, and told them that times had changed, strangely changed. Mr. M. would ask, was it not rather a change of the gentleman than a change of the times? With regard to the complaints made about the rules of the House, he could not perceive its application to the present question of referring this bill to a standing committee. Mr. M. had, as the principal organ of the committee of the House on the subject of the rules, made a report thereon, and had proposed to call it up; but he had as yet been unable to do so. If he waited till it became the regular order, he feared the report would not be considered during the present session; and, for the purpose of endeavoring to discharge his duty, he would ask the House to take it up every day, from that day henceforward, until a decided manifestation of the House rejected his motion. Mr. M. complained of the disingenuous imputation cast upon the majority by the gentleman from Tennessee, of wishing to evade the question.

Mr. BELL remarked that principles never changed, though men did. Principles were of all times, and no change of circumstances altered them. If those who supported the principles of 1826 now opposed them, it was a proof that men had changed. When he should have an opportunity to enter upon the discussion of this subject, he would endeavor to show who had changed.

Mr. MANN replied that it was true that principles did not change, but men changed their principles.

Mr. MERCER inquired in what length of time the Committee on the Judiciary would probably be able to report on the subject, if the bill should be committed to them.

Mr. THOMAS felt great difficulty, he said, in saying whether the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or not. In reply to the gentleman's question, he would remark that the Committee on the Judiciary was closely engaged upon several very laborious subjects—the Ohio and Michigan boundary question; the judicial circuit court system of the southwestern States, and other bills. He supposed, however, that the House would not be able to take up the subject of this bill for at least ninety days, and by that time, or before, he presumed that the committee would be prepared to make their report. Speaking for himself, he had very little ambition to take charge of the subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL made some remarks on the constitution of the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to show that the bill in question did not come within the scope of their duties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND contended that, inasmuch as the bill involved legal and constitutional questions, the Judiciary was the committee to which it ought to be referred. He referred to the rule relative to the reference of subjects to committees. There would, he said, always be differences of opinion, as long as we were a nation, and it was proper that it should be so. What was the advantage proposed to be gained by referring the subject to a select committee? Why, that a select committee would sooner be able to make a report. And from whom were the select committee to be chosen? The first would be the gentleman himself, and he was the chairman of a standing committee. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee would be the next, for this large subject required all the legal intellect of the country; then it would be requisite to take all the legal light that the House could afford, and the making of this committee would be the breaking up of several of the other committees. He was against it. The Judiciary Committee would make its report; the subject would be discussed in the House and through the newspapers; the country would have the whole of it before them. But if it were referred to a select committee, part of this committee must necessarily be selected from each side, and the result would be two reports. He was in favor of discussing it in the House, to see if it were in the power of the House to alter the constitution, if such alteration were wanted. If it was a great constitutional question, to whom should it be sent? To a select committee? No; let it be sent to the Judiciary Committee, who had been selected on account of their legal knowledge, and let them examine whether it infringes upon the constitution. When it came back, let the result be laid fairly before the people, and let them decide. If (said Mr. S.) we cannot sustain it by reason, we ought not to attempt to carry it by power. Nothing can be gained by a select committee, unless it could compel us to take it up in the House. The House will not take it up till it is ready; and there are other matters of greater importance before the House than whether John Doe or Richard Roe shall hold office in the country.

Mr. PHILLIPS acquiesced in much that had been said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] and, if he was persuaded that the subject was a proper one for judicial counsel, would concur with him in its reference. But this bill contemplated a great variety of officers. Suppose the bill related to officers of the customs alone, would it not be referred to the Committee on Commerce? But, as the bill was general in its character, embracing all the officers of the Government, there was no particular propriety in referring it to any standing committee. If it was a question of which lawyers only could judge, then it would be proper to refer it to the Judiciary Committee; but as it was a bill relating to all officers, it became a case which required a select committee. It ought to be an able committee, having the advantage of the best talent in the House. If it be a practical question, give it the benefit of a practical man; and so far as it may be a legal question, let it have the advantage of legal acquirement. He was not satisfied that it was a party question, and he expected to see parties divided upon it. He himself acknowledged no party obligations on the question.

Mr. HAMER did not wish to prevent the gentleman from Tennessee from discussing any question, and hoped his course had not been such as to prevent him or any other gentleman from discussing the question. He would ask if it was kind in him to talk of majorities and minorities, and executive patronage, and, when other gentlemen make similar remarks, to complain of it? If gentlemen would complain that they were not allowed to speak, had they a right to complain if they were replied to? It was not to be supposed by the gentleman, or by him, that the House had no political feeling. If he suspected that the majority were guided by partisan principles, was it not natural that those of the majority should suspect the minority of the same? It all amounts to a declaration by each that he is following out the measures which he supposes to be the best for the country. He was against referring this bill to a select committee. He apprehended that the gentleman from Tennessee was mistaken in supposing that it was the custom of the British Parliament to refer all propositions to committees which are in favor of them. The rule might be on their books, but it was not put in practice.

Mr. McKIM moved the previous question, and the tellers were engaged in ascertaining whether there was a second; when

The CHAIR informed the House that the main question would be on the third reading of the bill, and not on the motion to commit to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKIM then withdrew the motion for the previous question.

After some remarks from Messrs. MERCER and THOMAS,

Mr. BELL declared that he was not instigated by any party views, and that it was of importance that members should not broach the subject of executive patronage as a party question. The interest of the country required that the House should consider the subject, uninfluenced by party feelings. The gentleman from Ohio denied that it was the practice of the British Parliament to refer subjects to committees which were willing to report. He said that the rule appeared on their books, but was not adopted in practice. Well, then, (said Mr. B.) still they go before us, for they acknowledge the right.

Mr. ROBERTSON had risen, he said, solely for the purpose to state a fact which would induce him to vote against the reference of the bill to the Judiciary Committee. It had already been stated that several important subjects were now before that committee, including the Ohio and Michigan controversy, and the southwestern circuit bill. The chairman would also bear him out in stating that, after a discussion before the committee, the meeting was adjourned for one week, and they would then meet for the purpose of acting on a large mass of unfinished business, which had accumulated upon them during the session. Under these circumstances, he felt justified in saying that the committee could not give early attention to the subject. As a member of that committee, he had no desire to shrink from the performance of any duty, but the committee had already as much business as they could attend to for some time to come.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said that, from the title of the bill, he could not tell what the Senate had in view; but it was a bill which had passed in that branch of the Legislature last year, and had failed in this. The bill (said Mr. P.) required us to retrace our steps, and alter rules which were coeval with the formation of the constitution. It interfered with the rights of the Executive, and altered the form of the Government.

[The SPEAKER said that it was not in order to discuss the merits of the bill on a question as to its reference.]

Mr. P. said it was his object to show that he considered it to be a bill which involved constitutional questions. As he understood the rules, if there was one committee more proper than another to which to refer the consideration of the present subject, it was the Committee on the Judiciary, whose province it was to consider and to report on propositions of this nature. The President of the United States was required to execute the laws of the United States. He could not do it in person, but must do it by and with the assistance of others; and when he sends a notice of an appointment to the Senate, this bill required him to say why he selected A, B, or C.

[The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that he was going into the main question.]

Mr. P. continued his remarks in favor of the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said that, as the yeas and nays had been called, and he should vote against referring the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, he wished to assign his reason for so doing. It was not from any want of confidence in that committee, but because he was of opinion that the subject-matter of the bill ought to be referred to a select committee. This proposition, under the form of a bill, was, in fact, a proposition for altering the constitution, as it was first formed, in what he considered one of its most vital parts. The constitution placed the executive power in the President of the United States—

[The SPEAKER called Mr. A. to order. He was discussing the merits of the bill, which was not the subject before the House.]

Mr. ADAMS continued. One ground on which he objected to referring this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and preferred a select committee, was, that the bill involved a question relative to the constitution; and questions of this nature were subjects for a special committee, and not for a standing committee. On that ground he should vote for its reference to a select committee. The subject required profound knowledge, not only of the constitution of the United States, but also of the history of the country, and of the practice since the constitution was formed; and a report ought to be made to the House, exhibiting all these particulars. Such a report could not be made out in sixty or ninety days; and if the gentleman from Maryland had said that the committee could make a report in ninety days, he should have said that he had not taken time enough, even if the committee was unencumbered with other business.

Mr. PEYTON, of Tennessee, expressed the hope that the bill would not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee, (said Mr. P.,) to which he had the honor to belong, is at this time burdened with more important business than any other committee, perhaps, of this House—more than it can dispose of in any reasonable time. We have the important and exciting question of the Ohio and Michigan boundary—a question which has been argued before us at great length, and with distinguished ability, by the gentlemen representing those who feel so deep and lively an interest in the question. Sir, up to our last meeting, we had not even begun to form an opinion upon this solitary question, because we had not fully heard the argument. There are other subjects of perhaps equal importance before that committee, untouched, unacted upon—the constitution of Michigan, and the bill to revise the Judiciary. The whole time of the committee has been consumed on the first of these important subjects, to the exclusion of all other matters. Business of a less important character has been accumulating upon the table of that committee. At our last meeting a large distribution of such cases was made. Sir, I have not the most distant hope, if the bill be referred to that committee—notwithstanding the industry, talents, and information, which I know my colleagues to possess, and have devoted, and will continue to devote, to all business intrusted to them—that a report can be expected during this session of Congress. It will be impossible. If the House wishes action upon this important bill, then let it not be referred to that committee. But if the object of gentlemen be to give it a quêtus, and send it to sleep—if not so long as Rip Van Winkle slept, yet for a time, for a purpose, during this session of Congress—they cannot do better than send it to the Judiciary Committee.

With regard to the principles of this bill, sir, I would remark, that they were once popular with the party to which I belong, if that party has yet an existence! It is fast merging into the party! The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. J. Q. ADAMS] doubtless well recollects what were these principles in 1826, and what were the feelings of our party at that day. He, sir, is consistent, perfectly consistent. He was then, as now, opposed to the principles of this bill. But the gentleman from Massachusetts has given his friends—I mean, sir, his new friends, for that gentleman is now decidedly the leader of the party in this House—he has given his new friends a dreadful thrust. He has told them that this bill proposes an amendment, no, not an amendment, but an alteration of the constitution of the United States—a curtailing the Executive of his constitutional and necessary powers. Yes, sir, and they submit in silence, are dumb under the rebuke. Whose measure is this? Who is the father of this bill? A distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] reported it. Another distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Judge WHITE] was on the committee, and concurred with him. But there was another distinguished Senator at that time, now one amongst, though not one of, the Senators, but fills a still higher station, and is aiming at one still a little higher, [Mr. VAN BUREN.] This gentleman was on the committee, and sanctioned and sustained this very bill in 1826. This was the popular measure of the party in 1826, ushered to the world under such auspices. I call upon gentlemen, if they have principle, and go for principle, to show it; I call upon them, if they have any pride of consistency, to say nothing about principle, to come forward and meet the gentleman, [Mr. ADAMS,] although he is the head and leader of the party in this House. Your pride, your honor, your principles, your character for consistency, all call aloud upon you to meet him. Is it not the same bill of '26? Does it not contain the same provision of that bill; and will you hang your heads, and hear it denounced so broadly by the gentleman from Massachusetts, merely because he is now your leader? Remember its paternity. Who was the father of this bill? The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON;] and has he no friend here who will stand its godfather, and protect it? It is the very same bantling, in every feature. Yes, sir, verbatim et literatim, even to the dotting of the i's and the crossing of the t's, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] would say. Do you abandon it? Where are your principles? Poor off-cast. It has fallen into the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS;] and the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE;] who have always been opposed to it, and who denounce it in advance, and then send it off like a foundling to be smothered. I am opposed to this course, sir. I am glad that this question has been brought up. I wish to see tested the principles of the party. I wish to resort to the principles of the Jackson party, call them up, and see if there now exists enough of those principles to leaven the whole lump of the party. Yes, sir, I am glad to see this medicine prepared by our own party, our own leaders in 1826, presented again in 1836. He who refuses to take it, let him talk no more about his principles, about his consistency. This, sir, was the leading favorite measure of the Jackson party in 1826. Upon its principles we rallied, and carried the war to the gates, ay, even to the storming and entering the White House.

[Here the SPEAKER said the gentleman from Tennessee was taking too wide a range in his remarks. The merits of the bill cannot be discussed upon a motion to refer.]

Mr. PEYTON. I did not, Mr. Speaker, wish to transcend the rules of order. I am aware that any discussion of the merits of the bill would be out of order. I did not allude to the merits or demerits of the bill. I did not allude to any one of its provisions, except as a reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS;] I do not propose to discuss the merits, but to state that the bill now under consideration is the same, the identical bill, in form, as well as substance, reported by the Senators from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON;] from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE;] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. VAN BUREN;] in 1826; and to contend that what was principle in 1826 is principle in 1836; and to express a hope that gentlemen were willing to be tested by principle, and appeal to them, to the majority of this House, to make such a disposition of the bill as to have it brought before the House for its action at this session, and not to send it to a committee which would be unable to make a report upon it.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. He had understood the Chair to say that the merits of the question could not be discussed, and regretted that charges, so broad in their character, had been made by the gentleman from Tennessee against the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman said that, in the event of the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, it would there sleep, and be heard of no more—thereby intimating that the committee would shrink from the discharge of their duty.

Mr. PEYTON asked leave to explain. I thought (said Mr. P.) that no human being could possibly have misunderstood me; for I stated, distinctly, that it was on account of the great mass of business before the committee that it could not make a report; and to assert, or insinuate, that I said any thing else, is to do me great injustice; and for a gentleman who would so insinuate, I shall have as little respect as that gentleman seems to have for my remarks.

Mr. GLASCOCK continued. The gentleman would find him among the last to misrepresent him, and among the first to repel insinuations against the party to which it was his pride to be attached. If he had misrepresented the gentleman, it was in consequence of having misunderstood him. He entered the hall after the gentleman commenced speaking, and had not heard all his remarks. He had understood him to say that the Committee on the Judiciary would make no report in time for the action of the House. Whether he was so fortunate as to attract the respect of the gentleman, or not, was a matter of perfect indifference to him. He had duties to perform here of more importance than the attainment of the gentleman's regard; and he felt it his duty to defend the Executive from the unjust charges brought against him. With the transactions of 1826 he had nothing to do; but, long since the opinion of the Executive had been known on this subject, the voice of the gentleman from Tennessee had resounded through this hall in his praise. Why then did the gentleman charge the President and his friends with having abandoned principles which he sustained in 1826? So long as the President continued to pursue the course which he had done, he (Mr. G.) felt it his duty to sustain and defend him.

He was well apprized, from what he had seen and heard, that whenever the merits of the bill were discussed, the war-whoop was to be raised by the opposition, and the cry of executive patronage sounded in our ears. But (said Mr. G.) the gentleman may rest assured we shall not be taken by surprise, and that whenever the battle was waged, the friends of the administration would be found at their posts, prepared to defend and vindicate their principles, and the principles and measures of the President.

After Mr. GLASCOCK concluded, Mr. PATTON, of Virginia, moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PEYTON rose, and appealed to the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the motion; and after some conversation, in which Mr. PEYTON pledged himself to renew the motion of Mr. PATTON, the motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

Mr. PEYTON continued. The gentleman from Georgia saw fit to represent me as attacking the committee to which I have the honor to belong, and volunteered for their defence. He came to the defence of that committee! and from my attack! Were not those gentlemen seated around me? Do they have to look to the gentleman from Georgia for defence, when attacked from any quarter? Those gentlemen knew I had made no attack on them. No, sir; I know them well, and would be the last man in this body to cast the slightest shade of imputation upon them, as gentlemen, or as members upon this floor. The gentleman says his remarks were intended as a reply to those which I made; and yet he acknowledges that he did not hear what I said. If so, why not leave it to other gentlemen, who did hear them, to reply to my remarks? Why should that gentleman run tilting upon every subject that comes up? He must volunteer to defend all the committees of this House, and all the members of the party! And, sir, you cannot propose to discuss a great question of national policy, but you hear a dolorous lamentation about the President; it is an attack upon the President, whether the President ever said, or acted, or expressed an opinion upon the subject or not. He defend the President from my attacks! This is the miserable cant of the party, the tune played upon every jew's-harp, from Arkansas to the Atlantic, in the mouth of every demagogue and pettifogger. The venerable President! Defend the venerable President! Who were the friends of the President amidst perils and trials, at which the windy gasconading demagogues of the day and of the party would have shrunk and fled? Who stood by him, and sustained and supported his principles? Who advocated the same great principles now? Sir, I have never been the man to attack General Jackson; but, on the contrary, I have gone with him in principle. I have not, nor will I, change my political principles.

Has it come to this, that every member of the party, no difference from what ranks he may have deserted, is a Jackson? and to ask him if he is honest, if he has any principle, is necessarily a direct attack on General Jackson? Yes, sir, these little Jacksons are springing up, like May-apples in the spring season, every where, all over the country, and to attack one of them is to attack the President himself! Yes, sir, they thrust forward his name on all occasions: it is their only shield. How is it possible for any gentleman to drag, ad captandum, into this question, the name of General Jackson? Did he ever vote on this question, or make it the subject of recommendation in his message? How, then, is he, his principles, his fame, and character, involved? If assailed at all, it has been done by the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] and Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE.] What contemptible quackery! Gentlemen shrink behind General Jackson whenever pressed on any question. Yes, sir, they fly to him, take shelter under his mantle, and say, "here we are," shivering and trembling: "don't strike me, or you will hit the old chief." Yes, sir, such men are aspiring to rule the destinies of this nation. Such men promise to walk in the footsteps of Andrew Jackson: yes, sir, they are aiming to crawl into the highest stations upon the earth between the legs of a giant, one stamp of whose foot would sink them a thousand fathoms below the surface. They walk in the footsteps of Andrew Jackson! You might as soon expect to see the miserable pedlar's barge following in the wake of a man of war, while riding the mountain wave of a tempestuous ocean. These are the men who require us to yield implicit obedience to their will. These are the men whose principles, or want of principle, you cannot touch, without raising the howl of an attack on General Jackson. Yes, sir, we are gagged by that odious "previous question," whose especial province it is for certain gentlemen to move, and which is coming into such active use amongst us. But if you chance to get the floor, and appeal to gentlemen to stand to their principles, some sensitive Jackson plant, of the May-apple growth, must rush in, and offer to shiver a lance in defence of the "venerable President." I should like to compare notes with these little Jacksons, and see who is the best Jackson man upon principle. I should like to meet a better Jackson man than I always have been. Sir, I never saw the day when I would not for General Jackson, as a personal favor, meet any peril in a good cause, make any sacrifice save that of honor and independence; surrender any thing but those principles and that freedom which he would be the last man in the world to yield. But, sir, if gentlemen have no political principle, let them say so, and away this false clamor about General Jackson.

Mr. PATTON renewed the motion to adjourn, but withdrew it, in order to afford an opportunity to the gentleman from Georgia to rejoin.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he was happy to hear the encomium passed by the gentleman from Tennessee upon the venerable chief, and the declaration that he was still his friend; and he wished that this remark might be reported, and become matter of record, in order that they might be compared with other remarks which had fallen from the gentleman in the early part of the session. Mr. G. said that no one who had listened to the remarks of the gentleman but would perceive his object was to charge the President with an abandonment of those principles which he professed in 1826, and that the party were now abandoning them, and shrinking from his defence. Did he understand the gentleman to have made no such allusions? Did he understand him to entertain no such opinion in relation to the Chief Magistrate? He paused for a reply. Mr. G. said that every circumstance which had transpired in relation to this bill furnished abundant evidence to establish the fact that it was principally introduced for political effect, and will be resorted to, no doubt, for the purpose of assailing the President.

But the gentleman from Tennessee has thought proper to charge the friends of the administration with taking shelter under the old hero, whenever any question is presented which they cannot meet. This (said Mr. G.) comes with a bad grace from that gentleman; for he had no doubt the gentleman himself had often taken shelter under the old man's wing, and had, on many occasions, mounted the stumps of Tennessee, and cried aloud for him, in order to be sustained by his friends; and that he had been by them would not admit of a question. But Mr. G. said he saw a new state of things was about to take place; he thought he could foresee that the gentleman would soon abandon the President, if he had not already done so, and that he would be found arrayed against the administration, using his exertions and influence to render it unpopular, with a view to place a particular favorite in power. Yet (said Mr. G.) the gentleman professes still to be the friend of the Chief Magistrate. This may do (to use a common expression) "to tell the marines," but not this House; for, from what had taken place, he did not confide in it himself, nor did he believe a majority of the House would.

The gentleman has found it necessary, for effect, too, to charge the friends of the administration with being led by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] Who (said Mr. G.) does not perceive the object? But it will avail him nothing; for, whilst he disclaimed being led by any man, or set of men, it would afford him pleasure at all times to do justice to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, and to be found voting with him on all questions which met his (Mr. G.'s) views and approbation. And if (said Mr. G.) it be any satisfaction to the gentleman from Tennessee, he would inform him that he never listened with more pride and pleasure to the remarks of any one than he had to those which fell from the venerable gentleman a few days since, on the introduction of his resolutions. He felt as if they came from the heart of a patriot, and such as he had no doubt would be approved by every American citizen who loved his country and his Government; and he rejoiced when he witnessed the general burst of applause which followed the utterance of certain expressions, in relation to the battering down our Capitol. Sir, (said Mr. G.) it was like an electric shock, and was received with feelings becoming American freemen, and freemen determined to maintain the interest and honor of the motion.

On motion of Mr. PATTON,

The House then adjourned, without taking the question.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution relative to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. His object was to have the resolution printed, and when the pending resolutions on the subject should be taken up, he should offer his proposition in lieu of the same.

Mr. GRANGER called for the reading of the resolution; which was read accordingly, as follows:

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JAYVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institutions of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union; assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to re-establish harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of the Union.

Mr. WISE then rose and objected to its reception.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to suspend the rules, in order to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD inquired whether, if the rule was suspended, and the resolution offered, it would not open the whole subject for debate at this time.

Mr. PINCKNEY repeated that his only object was to present his resolution for the purpose of having it printed for the information of members; and that, when the subject should again come up, he contemplated moving it as a substitute for the propositions before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, again called for the reading of the resolution; which being done,

Mr. MORGAN moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. HAWES called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table was negatived.

The question on the suspension of the rules was then taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushing, Cushman, Deberry, Denny, Dickerson, Efner, Evans, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, Philo C. So the House refused to suspend the rules; two thirds being necessary.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked the unanimous consent of the House to take up and consider the report of the select committee on the rules.

Objection being made,

Mr. MANN moved a suspension of the rules for this purpose.

Mr. BELL called for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered, and were,

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ashley, Beale, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, William B. So the House refused to suspend the rules, two thirds being necessary.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WM. B. SHEPARD, of North Carolina, moved to suspend the rules, in order to receive reports from the standing and select committees of the House; which was agreed to by a vote of 114 to 51.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the nineteenth rule of this House, which appropriates Friday and Saturday in each week to the consideration of private bills, be suspended on Saturday next, and that the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York be made the special order of the day, at one o'clock on that day.

The CHAIR decided that the resolution was not debatable, as it related to the priority of business.

The question being taken, the resolution was lost: Yeas 109, nays 66; not two-thirds.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. WISE rose and said he wished to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, whether they would soon make a report on that part of the President's message relating to the transmission of incendiary publications by the mail.

Mr. CONNOR could only reply to the gentleman's interrogatory, by stating that the subject was now under the advisement of the committee, who would decide upon it as soon as possible; perhaps at an early, perhaps at a late day. It rested with the majority of the committee to say when, in their judgment, it would be most expedient and proper to bring it before the House.

Mr. MANN, of New York, inquired of the Chair whether it was competent for him, at that time, to move to take up and consider the report of the select committee on the rules, and whether it was not in the power of the majority to take up that report?

The CHAIR replied in the negative. The rules having been suspended for the purpose of receiving reports, it would require two thirds to take up a report upon the table.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations in part for the support of the Government for the year 1836, commonly called the House contingent bill.

The bill was on its third reading, with two pending motions: one by Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, to recommit to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the other by Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, to recommit to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the following instructions:

With instructions to report one uniform mode of paying the mileage of the members of this House and the Senate, or to ascertain the mileage of each member of Congress, and to report an item for paying the mileage of the members of the House, and a separate item for paying the mileage of the members of the Senate, which items shall not exceed the aggregate of the sums allowed each Senator and Representative, respectively, according to some uniform rule to be affixed by the committee.

The motion pending on the instructions was Mr. ANTHONY's amendment to insert, after the word "discretion," the "propriety of regulating," &c.

Mr. EVERETT hoped the House would proceed to pass the bill this day, without recommitting it.

Mr. HANNEGAN then offered the following amendment:

That the said committee be further instructed to inquire--

1st. Into the expediency of removing the seat of the Federal Government from Washington to Cincinnati or Louisville.

2d. Into the propriety of so amending the rules of the House as to cause a list of the absentees, whenever the yeas and nays are taken, to be entered on the journal, and published, as a part of each day's proceedings, in the morning papers.

3d. Of compelling all members, who may hereafter absent themselves during the sittings of the House, on visits to their homes and families, or for the purpose of attending their practice in the courts of this District and the adjacent States, to relinquish their pay during the period of such absence.

4th. Of requiring a relinquishment, in like manner, of their compensation from members during the time lost from the business of the House, in excursions to the neighboring cities, or in pleasure parties about this city and the surrounding country, or from any other cause whatever, except sickness or the order of the House.

5th. Of establishing a rule to prevent members from drawing their pay up to the close of the session, who leave several days prior to the adjournment.

Mr. HARDIN asked if it would be in order to move to lay the amendments on the table.

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. PATTON) said that it would not.

Mr. BOON then demanded the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 74, nays 56; and,

On ordering the main question to be put,

Mr. PARKER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Childs, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Colcs, Connor, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Grantland, Grayson, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hamer, Hard, Harlan, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Halsey, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, William Jackson, Jabez Jackson, Jones, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Job Mann, Manning, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKeon, McKim, McLenc, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parks, Patterson, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Smith, Sprague, Steele, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Webster, Weeks—133.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Banks, Bell, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Craig, Crane, Cushing, Denny, Dunlap, Evans, French, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hannegan, Hardin, Harper, Hawes, Hiester, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Joseph Johnson, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, John Y. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, Mercer, Morris, Parker, Patton, Peyton, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Roane, Robertson, Russell, William B. Shepard, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Wagener, White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise—76.

So the House determined that the main question, which was on the passage of the bill, should be put; and the bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RENCHER asked leave of the House to offer a resolution respecting the mileage, &c., of members of Congress.

Objections being made,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to suspend the rules; and

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON withdrew his motion; and

Mr. HAWES renewed it, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 158, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Banks, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Borden, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Coffee, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Evans, Everett, Fairfield, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, Galbraith, James Garland, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hamer, Hammond, Hannegan, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Holsey, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, James, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Joshua Lee, Luke Lea, Lincoln, Logan, Love, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Manning, Martin, John Y. Mason, Moses Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, McKim, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Owens, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Pickens, Pinkney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Smith, Spangler, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Shields, Sloane, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Turner, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Washington, Webster, Weeks, White, Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise—158.

NAYS—Messrs. Ash, Barton, Beale, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Burns, Campbell, Coles, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Dickson, Dromgoole, Dunlap, William K. Fuller, Gillet, Grayson, Hard, Hardin, Haynes, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Jarvis, Leonard, May, McLene, Muhlenberg, Page, James A. Pearce, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Turrill, Vinton, Wardwell, Sherrod Williams—43.

So the rules of the House were suspended. The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alteration is necessary to be made relative to the pay and mileage of members of Congress; whether any, and what, legislation is necessary to limit and curtail the contingent expenditures of this House.

Mr. HIESTER moved to insert "select committee" in place of the "Committee on Accounts;" which Mr. RENCHER accepted as a modification.

Mr. GRENNEILL moved that the committee consist of twenty-four, one from each State; agreed to: Ayes 89, noes 74.

And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved that the rules be suspended in order to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, in regard to the execution of the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, by France, approve of the President's late message recommending the prohibition "of French products and the entry of French vessels into our ports."

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, moved that the motion to suspend be laid on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS asked the yeas and nays on this motion, and they were refused.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative: 119 rising in the affirmative, noes not counted. So the motion of Mr. REYNOLDS to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose indicated by him, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to suspend the rules in order to move certain instructions to the select committee of twenty-four, yesterday ordered to be appointed, on the subject of pay and mileage of members.

Mr. HANNEGAN was not, he said, particularly anxious about the first instruction, as twenty or thirty years hence might answer for that; but, in case of a French war, the Capitol might be again sacked, and it would therefore be expedient.

The CHAIR interposed, and said that the question was not debatable.

Mr. HANNEGAN called for the yeas and nays on his motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. HANNEGAN asked the yeas and nays, and they were refused.

The motion to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table was then agreed to.

MANAGEMENT OF THE POST OFFICE.

The following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. SMITH, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the letter of the late Hon. Wm. T. Barry, formerly Postmaster General of the United States, received by the Speaker of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress, on the last day of said session, be taken from the files of the House, laid upon the table, and printed."

Mr. BOND asked whether the mover intended to found any legislation upon the resolution.

Mr. SMITH replied that he did not. He made the motion as an act of simple justice to the late Postmaster General, who thought the letter necessary to his defence from charges brought against him. The reason that it was not ordered to be printed at the last session was, that the letter was received at too late an hour of the session, when there was not a quorum present.

Mr. BOND said he was opposed to the adoption of the resolution. It was a proposition like one already before the House, of the resurrection order, and was calculated to excite ill will and warm debates, without effecting any good object whatever. The letter had been printed in the newspapers, and extensively circulated. He moved to lay the motion on the table; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. BRIGGS, who said he should vote for the motion, but did not agree with the gentleman from Maine as to the reason that the letter was not printed last year. Two gentlemen, he recollected, opposed the motion to print, on the ground that it was, in its terms, disrespectful to a committee of this House, which had made a report on the condition and management of the Post Office Department. He was in favor of printing the letter, as an act of justice, or at least of generosity, to an individual, late a high officer of the Government, and now no more. Two reports had been made from committees of Congress, which brought the Post Office Department into a notice by no means complimentary to the head of that Department. Feeling that he could vindicate himself from all imputation upon his own conduct, as the head of the Department, he had drawn up this paper, and presented it to the House. He was now beyond the reach of censure or of praise; but as he had stood accused before the country, it was due to his memory, and to his family and friends, to let his defence go forth to the country.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, called for the reading of the letter; which was objected to.

Before the Chair had decided whether the gentleman from Ohio had a right to call for the reading,

Mr. HAMER moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed till Friday next. Rejected.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, renewed his demand that the letter be read.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Ohio had a right to demand the reading of the letter; and the Clerk proceeded to read it accordingly.

The hour assigned for the consideration of resolutions having expired, the reading was suspended, and the House proceeded to the orders of the day; which were private bills.

JESSE SMITH.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Jesse Smith and others.

The question being on the passage of the bill, it was opposed by Mr. MANN, of North Carolina, and advocated by Mr. WARDWELL; when

Mr. GILLET, in order to give further time for examination, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

The motion to postpone was advocated by Messrs. GILLET, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and PARKER, and opposed by Messrs. CHAMBERS of Kentucky, and WHITTLESEY; when it was lost.

The bill was further opposed by Mr. PARKER.

Mr. HUNT advocated the bill in the following remarks:

Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the difficulty, at this late hour of the day, and upon a private claim, of giving to the subject under consideration an interest commensurate with its importance. Sir, perceiving upon my files a bill concerning the citizens of my own State, I have possibly been induced to give the matter an examination which, in another case (reposing, as does this House most justly, an entire confidence in the ability and vigilance of the gentleman at the head of the Committee of Claims) I might not have done. And the result of that examination has been a perfect conviction of the justice of the claim now presented. Nay, further, a simple statement of the case will show that, could the claim be presented as between man and man, no judicial tribunal in our country could or would refuse to sanction it. As regards the characters of the claimants, perhaps sufficient has already been said by my colleague, and I will only add that, if any reliance can be placed upon human testimony, we have ample evidence furnished by those who have long filled the high places of life, in that portion of the State of New York where the claimants reside, of their standing and integrity.

We have, also, ample evidence (not attempted to be contradicted) that whenever the drafts and due bills in question have been transferred from the original holders, they have been so at par, and in the ordinary course of business. The holders of this paper, unlike the speculators in your continental currency, have taken it bona fide at par value.

It may not be amiss, sir, to look for a moment to the history of the times which gave rise to the issue of the paper in question.

There was no quartermaster general's department established at Washington until the year 1818; previous to that time, the country was divided into military districts—Colonel Elisha Jenkins being quartermaster general of the military district embracing the northern frontiers, and having his headquarters at Albany, and Samuel Brown being deputy quartermaster general from 1813 to 1816, and stationed at Sackett's Harbor. Previous to and during the period of which I speak, the Government labored under great pecuniary embarrassments. The disbursing officers were left unsupplied with funds; and yet your armies were to be fed and supported. Work must be done. Provisions and stores were daily required. How were they to be obtained? Colonel Jenkins tells you.

In an official letter to deputy quartermaster Brown, under date of 10th December, 1814, he says, "I obtain every thing I can upon credit; I receive vouchers, take receipts, and give certificates of sums due, promising to pay out of any public funds, when the certificates are presented. This expedient must be resorted to until we have better times."

This expedient, thus sanctioned by the commanding officer, was resorted to, and enabled the Government to carry on its operations.

The practice was well understood by the Government, and these due bills, or certificates, signed in an official capacity by the disbursing officers, passed current from hand to hand, and constituted in many places almost the entire circulating medium of your country.

In May, 1816, Major General Brown gave orders for the building of the Madison Barracks, at Sackett's Harbor—the erection was deemed necessary for the troops the ensuing winter. These barracks were built under the general superintendence of Thomas Tupper, who, in November, 1816, was appointed assistant deputy quartermaster at Sackett's Harbor, taking the post formerly occupied by Samuel Brown, and well understanding, from long experience, the practice of the department.

Thomas Tupper issued, for the building of these barracks, in his official capacity, certificates and due bills to the amount of some $17,000; which due bills have never been paid, and now form the subject of the claim presented to us.

Now, sir, in reference to the well-known practice of the disbursing officers, sanctioned by the Government for a series of years—in view of the fact that, apart from some particular agreement with the individuals, the officer was from the beginning, and so remained, the agent of the Government, I hesitate not to say, as a professional man, that the Government is responsible for the acts of its agents; and if in this case the agent, Tupper, has received funds from the Government, and not paid them out to the Government creditors, we are bound to see to the payment of these creditors.

There is, sir, another feature in this case: Tupper gave no bonds, though required by law so to do. I do not mention this with a view of casting censure upon any officer or department of the Government; but it shows that, had the Government done its duty, no loss would have fallen either upon the claimants or itself, but must have been bound by Tupper's bail.

But again, sir: whatever may be thought of the legal position assumed by me above, I now present another feature of this case, which seems to me to relieve it from all embarrassment and doubt.

In November, 1817, we find Tupper at Washington, presenting the receipts taken from the claimants, amongst his other vouchers, to the proper department for settlement; and he then apprized Mr. Hagner that these due bills (now presented) were outstanding and unpaid. Nay, further, he desired to adjust the residue of his account, leaving the Government to pay these due bills when they should be presented. In answer to this request, Mr. Hagner, the Auditor, under date of 5th June, 1818, writes to Tupper: "You must take up your own due bills, and I advise that no more be issued in future on any occasion." The vouchers for these due bills were not passed to Tupper's credit until April, 1818, five months after actual notice that these due bills were unpaid.

The brief history I have attempted of this transaction is sustained by the entire body of evidence upon your table.

In view of such facts, can we say to the claimants, True, we have had the benefit of your labor, but you must look for your pay to Captain Tupper. Can gentlemen for a moment contend that the workmen who erected Madison Barracks looked at all to the personal responsibility of Tupper. Sir, he had no personal nor pecuniary responsibility. He contracted as the agent of the Government—he signed the due bills in his official capacity, and I trust, sir, we shall in our collective legislative character do, what every gentleman in private life would feel constrained to do, an act of at least very tardy justice to the claimants, and pass the bill upon your table.

Mr. PARKS now moved an adjournment; lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow; not carried.

The bill was further opposed by Messrs. GILLET and PARKS, and advocated by Mr. STORER.

Mr. PARKS moved a suspension of the rules, in order to submit a motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday. Agreed to: Ayes 112, noes 44.

Mr. PARKS then submitted to above motion; which was agreed to; and, on Mr. P's motion,

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked the consent of the House to offer the resolution heretofore indicated by him on the subject of the abolition of slavery.

Objections being made,

Mr. PINCKNEY moved the suspension of the rules in order to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. PARKER asked if it was the object of the mover to bring the subject before the House for consideration this day.

Mr. PINCKNEY replied that it was.

Mr. BROWN asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 138, nays 65.

Mr. PINCKNEY then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union; assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to re-establish harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of the Union.

Mr. PINCKNEY said he would not detain the House long. He had offered the resolution before the House upon the most deliberate reflection, and after consultation with several highly respected and judicious friends, and because he honestly believed it to be the very best course that could be adopted in relation to the dangerous and exciting subject to which it refers. Mr. P. said he was aware of the responsibility he assumed, but knowing that he was acting for the highest good of the whole country, he was perfectly ready and willing to encounter it. He was acting for the true interests of his constituents, for the true welfare of his native State and of all the South, and, he was neither afraid nor ashamed to add, with a view to the peace and preservation of the Union. But, because he had dared to adopt this course, he had been bitterly assailed by a certain print, [the Telegraph,] and that, too, before he had even had an opportunity to assign his reasons. Sir, said Mr. P., let me say once for all that I am not to be driven by newspaper assaults, or calumnious imputations upon my motives, from my settled convictions of public duty, nor from my determined purpose to take high and patriotic ground upon this subject, and to prevent it, as far as I am able to do so, from being made a perpetual source of agitation, to the ruin of the South, and the destruction of the Union. I have no fear that the assaults to which I have alluded will injure me in the estimation of the citizens of Charleston. My constituents have known me long, and they know me well. They know that I am utterly incapable of being tempted to desert my duty to them, in any matter in which their rights or interests are involved; and they will spurn the base imputation upon me, as an insult to themselves. But I do plead guilty to the heinous accusation of desiring harmony—of desiring to produce a safe, and advantageous, and honorable adjustment of this question. But how, Mr. Speaker! By evading the resolutions offered by the honorable members from Maine and Virginia, as I am charged with doing? No sir: all who know me, either here or in South Carolina, know that I never have evaded or avoided any vote or any question, upon which it has ever been my duty to act as a public representative. It is not my nature: it is not my character. I would disdain to shrink from an open avowal of my sentiments, or record of my vote, upon any question which any gentleman could make before this House. How then, sir? By retracing ground already gained, and yielding an advantage obtained from the enemy? No sir: for I know of no ground gained—no advantage obtained—but I am decidedly of opinion, on the contrary, that we have lost ground daily by the course that has been pursued, and that we shall lose more and more, the longer it is persisted in. This accusation, then, is absurd. I have evaded nothing: I have yielded nothing. I deny the imputation and every vile insinuation connected with it. But, sir, I do desire harmony—by producing harmonious, united, and efficient action—by taking higher ground than has yet been taken—by covering the whole field—by bringing up the main question and acting upon that; and by doing what no one else has yet attempted to do—by procuring a direct vote, and a practical result, upon the whole subject of the abolition of slavery! This is my object, sir. And am I to be denounced for this? Are my constituents to be incited to suspect me, because I am honestly endeavoring to bring this distracting controversy to the very best issue of which it is susceptible? Is it treason to the South, sir, that this House should declare, by a solemn and deliberate vote, that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere with slavery in any of the

States? Is it treason to the South, that this House should declare, by a solemn and deliberate vote, that Congress ought not, and will not, interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, and dangerous to the Union? Has such a point as this ever been gained before? Has ever such a vote been taken, or such a declaration made, as this? Is it treason to the South to wish to allay excitement, and to repress agitation? Is it treason to the South, that a committee should be ordered to draught a report, as ably as they can, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, on the one side, and at the same time to restore concord and tranquillity amongst the various sections of this confederacy, on the other? If this be treason to the South, sir, let my constituents judge me. I am responsible to them—but to no individual, be he who he may. If this be treason to the Union, let the people of America decide: for I cheerfully acknowledge that, as a citizen of the Union, I am also responsible to them. But, at all events, however I may be denounced for my audacity in having acted thus, I have the consolation to know that the propositions I have offered meet the cordial approbation of many members from the South, than whom there are no purer patriots, or more devoted southerners, upon this floor. Several of them have said that they would have rejoiced if this very course had been adopted at the beginning of the session; and I have every reason to believe that it will now be sustained by the almost undivided vote of the whole southern delegation. What, then, Mr. Speaker! am I and all the southern delegates who act with me, are all of us, traitors; and is the individual who has assailed me the only man who understands the interests, or cares for the rights and honor, of the South? But, sir, I feel that I ought to ask pardon of the House for speaking in this manner. It is exceedingly painful to me to speak of myself, at any time, or in any place, but especially before so respectable and enlightened an assembly as this; but, in justice to myself, I could not have avoided it upon the present occasion. Sir, I will only trouble the House with one or two observations more. I wish my constituents to understand my motives. It is my duty, as the representative of the people of Charleston, to render an account to them of every thing that I may say or do in my public capacity, and I wish them to understand me distinctly, that they may judge me correctly, and especially before any false impressions may have been created in their minds. I say, then, Mr. Speaker, that I have three great objects in offering this resolution. The first is, as far as possible, to arrest the discussion of the subject of slavery within these walls, which I believe to be useless—worse than useless—pernicious to the South, and dangerous to the whole country. The second is, to bring the whole subject of the abolition of slavery to a practical result, in a manner safe and advantageous to the South, satisfactory to the North, and calculated also to tranquillize the country and to confirm the Union. My last object is—and this, indeed, substantially includes the whole—my last object is to put down the spirit of fanaticism, to repress the spirit of incendiary agitation, by disseminating throughout the country a calm and temperate report, emanating from this body, having the high sanction of the national Legislature, and calculated, both by its own arguments and the high source from which it issues, to produce that sound and rational state of public opinion, in the non-slaveholding States, which is equally due to the South and to the preservation of the Union. And, for this great purpose, sir, I would cover the whole ground. I would embrace the States, as well as the District of Columbia. I know no reasonable objection to doing so, and it is justified by precedent. It is the very course that was adopted by Congress in the memorable resolution of 1790—a course that was sustained (I believe proposed) by the venerable Madison, and that received the unanimous sanction of the whole southern delegation of that day. I can see no reason why the same course should not receive the unanimous sanction of the whole southern delegation now. In my humble judgment, it is the only course by which we can bring this matter to an advantageous issue. Hitherto we have been fighting about mere abstractions. Hitherto we have been contending about the right of petition, and other minor and unimportant points. We have been wasting our energies, and losing ground upon a false issue—an issue upon which we never can arrive at a practical result—an issue upon which the whole North is united, and the South divided, and the very debate upon which, so far from doing the least good, only increases the spirit of abolition at the North, inflames excitement at the South, and is daily widening the breach between the different members of the Union. Now, sir, I am for overstepping these minor abstract points, and taking higher ground. I am for taking the question upon the whole subject. I would let the right of petition alone, as no way material to the true issue. I would have a broad and comprehensive declaration that Congress possesses no authority over slavery, here or elsewhere, and will not interfere with it in any way whatever. Is not this the true position for the South, sir? I think it is, and my constituents, too, all of whom own slaves, will think upon it, too. Sir, the abolitionists aim at general emancipation. No candid man can doubt it, or deny it. All their writings and publications prove it. You cannot read the proceedings of a single anti-slavery society, or a single production of the incendiary press, without being thoroughly convinced that they contemplate abolition in the States as their grand ultimate object, and that they never will be satisfied with any thing short of it, as long as they have the slightest shadow of a hope. Now, sir, I would meet them, and defeat them, at once and forever, upon that. I consider that we do but little, if we do not crush their hopes in relation to the States. There can be no doubt that all their attempts to procure abolition in the District, are, that it may constitute a foundation for their general scheme. They regard it as an entering wedge by which they may carry on their operations afterwards to an indefinite extent. Give them this District as a lever, and they will never cease until they bring this Government to act upon the States. I would therefore cut off all their hopes at once, as regards the States, by saying to them, plainly and distinctly, that this Government possesses no power whatever by which they could be aided in their views. Satisfy them that they have no hope in relation to the States, and they will soon cease to trouble us in relation to the District. But, “to make assurance doubly sure,” I would also extinguish their hopes as regards this District. I would meet them at every point, and put them down on all. I would say to them, that, so far from ever obtaining the aid of this Government in their designs upon the States, they shall never be permitted even to obtain a foothold here. They shall never be permitted to use this District for the purpose of convulsion and disunion. And surely, Mr. Speaker, if any thing on earth can repress the spirit of incendiary agitation, such proceedings on the part of this House must produce that effect. And not only that, sir; it will not only tend, as I firmly believe, to check and repress the fanatics, but, what is still more important, it will tend, powerfully and irresistibly, to produce a high-toned, generous patriotism, an enlarged, magnanimous, American spirit, in the great body of the non-slaveholding States, eminently favorable to the cause of peace and to the constitutional rights and interests of the southern States. Only let this House adopt the course indicated in the resolutions I have offered, and my life upon it they will be sustained by every honest heart, by every true American patriot, in every non-slaveholding State in this great republic. Now, sir, this is the very result I desire to produce. The battle of abolition is to be fought, not at the South, but in the non-slaveholding States. The people of the non-slaveholding States are divided into two classes--the incendiary fanatics, who are plotting our destruction and the destruction of this Union; and the great body of the people, who respect the rights and feelings of their southern brethren, and are doing all that they can to put the fanatics down. What, then, is our policy? To make a new issue upon abstract points; to change the whole aspect of the question, by contending against the right of petition, and thus increase abolition, and drive our supporters from the field. No, sir. I would strengthen our friends, not weaken them. I would let them fight the abolitionists in their own way, and not hamper or trammel them, by making new contests, or creating new difficulties of any kind whatever. I do firmly and conscientiously believe that, if this course is adopted, they will succeed in putting the fanatics down, and putting an end to this most unnatural war. These, then, are my motives. These are my objects. I go for the suppression of abolition. I go to maintain the just rights of the South without invading the rights of others. I go to obtain a direct vote upon the whole subject of the abolition of slavery, without being involved in constitutional contests upon any other points. In one word, I go for a decisive settlement of this question in the manner that I honestly think will best maintain the rights of the South and the peace and perpetuity of this Union. And as I do sincerely believe that the adoption of my resolutions, accompanied by a firm but temperate report, will produce these blessed results, so I shall esteem myself truly happy if I shall be the humble instrument of giving effectual and permanent repose to the South, (to which I am attached by every tie that can bind the heart of man to his natal soil,) and also accomplish the great object of placing this Union once more upon a firm, and solid, and immovable foundation.

Mr. HAMMOND said it was unpleasant to differ with any gentleman from the South on a question of such importance as this, and peculiarly so to differ from a colleague on a question involving the interests of our constituents so deeply. [Mr. PICKNEY said his colleague had mistaken him; they did not differ on principle.] Mr. H. said: sir, we do differ, differ vitally, on principle. I consider the gentleman's proposition as abandoning the high, true, and only safe ground of our rights, to throw ourselves upon the expediency of this House. With regard to the motives of my colleague, upon which he has so largely descanted, whatever may be my opinion of them, I will not express it here. It would not become the dignity of this House, nor my own. This much I will say, that every member of this House knows that these propositions of the gentleman are such as would have been cordially hailed by every friend of the abolitionists at any period of this session. We might at any time have had peace on these terms, if we had condescended to accept it. As to the newspaper article of which he speaks, I knew nothing of it until I saw it in the paper; but, so far as my recollection of it serves me, it contains nothing calumnious or unjust.

I was not prepared for a renewal of these resolutions to-day. I thought that the exhibition of southern feeling on them the other day, and the entreaties of his colleagues, had induced the gentleman to abandon them; I regret to find myself mistaken. What does he propose? That this House shall say they have no power over the subject of slavery in the States. He promises himself great advantages to result from this. Is he so ignorant as not to know that no man, woman, or child, in these United States, entertains a doubt upon this subject? Not one of the abolitionists themselves, in any portion of the country, has ever attempted to raise the question. On the contrary, they have every where given it up in terms; and are we of the South, of South Carolina, to make this new point, and invite them to attack it? The gentleman promises peace and harmony from such a course. Sir, his constituents, as devoted as they are to peace and harmony, will not sustain him in bringing it to them, at the expense of the sacrifice of their most valuable rights. When this question is made, it can be decided only by arms, and the people of the South will laugh to scorn any decision of this House upon it. I entertain no higher respect for it, and for the gentleman's proposition, myself.

The resolution referring all the matters on this subject heretofore before the House to a select committee is giving up the ground on which we have been contending this whole session. We deny the power of this House to act upon the subject at all, and desire to exclude it entirely and forever from these walls. My colleague calls upon you to legislate upon it, and thereby yields you the power to act upon it. Sir, in the name of those with whom I act, I protest against it. He alluded to what was done in 1790. Circumstances have greatly changed since then; there were not then 100,000 disciplined troops embarked in this incendiary project; there were no societies formed for the express purpose of pressing it to an issue; with large suns and steam-presses at their command. It was then a mere speculative question; it is now a practical one, of fearful import. We must adopt a stronger and more decided remedy. What good, sir, did the reports of 1790 do? Let the present situation of our affairs answer. The report now sought for will be about as effectual. The gentleman, no doubt, has in his possession the materials of a splendid Sunday mail report; for that is the thing which seems to haunt the imaginations of some members of this House.

[Mr. PICKNEY explained, and said that he had no such purpose; and he intended, if the resolution passed, to ask to be excused from serving on the committee, and turn it over to other hands.]

Mr. HAMMOND said he wished his colleague had manifested the same delicacy with regard to the resolutions themselves, and permitted any other person to have brought them in. But, as he had proposed this measure, it would be great injustice to himself and to the country to permit him to refuse to perfect it. I hope he will not repudiate his own offspring. Sir, what magic does the gentleman suppose a report like this is to possess? Does he think that he can paste it on his shield, and that, like the Gorgon's head, it will turn all to stone who look upon it? I can assure him it will be powerless with Tappan, Garrison, and the rest of the gang. They will not regard it in the least. They have tasted blood, and are too keen upon the scent to be deterred by anything that can be put on paper, no matter what rhetorical excellences it may possess.

The gentleman says he wishes by this means to preserve the Union. I should like to know how long it is since that gentleman learned to preach homilies on the Union. [Mr. PICKNEY. All my life.] Yes, sir, we are all for the Union; but if it can only be maintained at the sacrifice of our rights, that gentleman is very much mistaken if he thinks his constituents will aid him in that sacrifice. Sir, those are not the best friends of the Union who are always preaching it up to us; and when I hear, a person here or elsewhere, put the "Union" in the foreground of his argument, I always suspect he means to give it some secret stab. And, sir, I believe the adoption of the gentleman's plan of settling this controversy will give it one of the most fatal blows it has ever yet received. For I can assure this House that a Union based upon the principles of that resolution cannot stand. We cannot give up rights, and consent to hold our property at your will. We cannot give up the constitution, and consent to repose our all upon the tender mercies of this House, to be withdrawn whenever they may deem expedient.

The gentleman says he wishes to avoid discussion. It is very clear that his resolutions will produce a contrary effect. They throw the door wide open for discussion. They do more. By thus entertaining respectfully these incendiary petitions, and acting upon them, we shall encourage the abolitionists to persevere in their efforts. They are not men to be deterred by a defeat of this sort. They will consider it a great point gained, if they can get Congress to take up their petitions, and institute a grave legislative action on them. The fanatics will rejoice, heartily rejoice, to see these resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to impugn the motives of gentlemen from the South, who have voted to introduce these resolutions. I hope they are good. I hope we all desire to effect the same object. But, sir, in the name of those I represent, and with those whom I have the honor to act, I solemnly protest against them. I protest against them as conceding to this House a power to legislate upon this subject, which I deny. I protest against them as weakening our position, by making a new question before the country, which is now considered as settled in our favor. I protest against them as opening a wider range for the discussion of this subject. I protest against them as encouraging abolition; and, finally, I protest against them as abandoning the high and true grounds upon which only it becomes the South to place herself in this great and vital controversy.

Mr. BOYD moved the previous question.

Mr. HUNT appealed to him to withdraw the motion, to allow him to offer an amendment.

Mr. WISE joined in the appeal.

Mr. BOYD was compelled, he said, to persist in the motion, as he thought it better that this discussion should stop.

Mr. MANN moved a call of the House; which was negatived by a vote of 75 to 91.

The motion for the previous question was seconded by a vote of 102 to 86.

Mr. GRANGER asked the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. PATTON moved a call of the House; which was negatived.

Mr. WISE rose to inquire of the Chair what was the meaning and object of the resolution. He had heard it read, but did not yet understand it.

The CHAIR said the gentleman was out of order.

Mr. WISE said he would address his inquiry to the House.

The CHAIR said the gentleman must take his seat.

Mr. WISE appealed from the decision of the Chair to the House, and would state his reasons.

The CHAIR said the gentleman had a right to do that.

Mr. WISE contended that, as gentlemen were compelled to vote upon the resolution, they had a right to know what was its character and purport. If he was called upon to vote for a resolution before he knew what it was, then "order!" "order!" was paramount to reason and law.

Mr. BYNUM would like, he said, to know what was the question before the House.

The CHAIR said he would state it when the gentleman from Virginia had concluded.

Mr. WISE said his point of order was this: he wished to know if the resolution instructed the committee to report whether Congress had the power to legislate on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. If it did not, he was opposed to it, to totò celo, and if it did, he was opposed to it on other grounds. The Chair had decided that he had no right to put the question, and from this decision he had appealed. He submitted whether he had not a right to inquire what was the true meaning of the resolution. True, it had been read; but every resolution was not to be understood by hearing it read. It might contain more than it was understood to mean. Give us light and understanding, he said, before we are dragged up here to vote like mules.

The CHAIR said he would state the point of order.

Mr. WISE withdrew his appeal.

The question being taken on the previous question, it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 118, nays 47. So the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. VINTON called for the division of the resolution into three several parts; so that the question should be taken on the following clauses separately:

1. "Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented, to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to that subject, be referred to a select committee."

2. "With instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy."

3. "And that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union."

The CHAIR stated the division indicated was in order.

Mr. HIESTER called for the yeas and nays on the several questions, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOLSEY called for a further division of the resolution, so as to take the question separately on the reference of Mr. JARVIS's resolution, and on the reference of Mr. WISE's resolution.

The CHAIR decided that this was not in order.

Mr. HOLSEY appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The question on the appeal was discussed by Messrs. HOLSEY, BRIGGS, PATTON, WISE, EVERETT, and BELL.

The decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question being taken on the first member of the proposition, as above divided, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS--Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Boyce, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, William B. YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Denny, Everett, Rice Garland, Glascock, William Jackson, Robertson—7.

So the second clause was agreed to.

Mr. WISE, when his name was called, rose and said: I refuse to vote at all upon such a proposition; because to affirm any proposition by declaratory resolution is to admit it needs affirmation; and because Congress has no constitutional power either to affirm or deny any proposition whatever, in relation to slavery in the States.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved that the gentleman be excused from voting; which was agreed to.

The question being about to be taken on the third branch of the proposition—

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a division of the question on this branch, so as to take the question on the clause declaring that Congress "ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia," and omitting the reasons therefor.

The CHAIR decided that the division was in order.

Mr. BOULDIN appealed from this decision.

After a discussion of the point of order, by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, BOULDIN, MASON of Virginia, BELL, SUTHERLAND, RIPLEY, and HARDIN,

The decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question being taken on the first clause of the third branch indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. So the first member of the third clause, as above stated, was agreed to.

So the remainder of the third clause was agreed to. The question being on the remaining portion of the resolution, it was read as follows:

“Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to repress agitation, to allay excitement, to sustain and preserve the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to re-establish harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of the Union.”

The question was taken on agreeing to this residue of the resolution, and determined it the affirmative, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Evans, William Jackson, Lawrence, Phillips, Sloane—6.

So the whole resolution was carried, and the committee ordered to consist of nine.*

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked the consent of the House to permit him, and also the gentlemen from Georgia and Virginia, [Messrs. GLASCOCK and ROBERTSON,] to enter their reasons on the journal for the vote given by them on the resolution just adopted.

Objection being made, Mr. GLASCOCK moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; which was disagreed to.

UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Government of Great Britain has offered its mediation for the adjustment of the dispute between the United States and France. Carefully guarding that point in the controversy, which, as it involves our honor and independence, admits of no compromise, I have cheerfully accepted the offer. It will be obviously improper to resort even to the mildest measure of a compulsory character, until it is ascertained whether France has declined or accepted the mediation. I therefore

* From the National Intelligencer.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1836.

MESSRS. GALES & SEATON: I perceive in the daily Intelligencer of this morning, a statement of the yeas and nays on the resolution of Mr. Pinckney in relation to the subject of slavery. I was, unavoidably, absent from the House on Monday. Had I been present, I should have voted ay on the first clause of the resolution, fully believing that the whole subject ought to be referred to a committee. On the second clause, which affirms “that Congress possesses no constitutional power to interfere with slavery in the States,” I should have also voted ay. On the third clause, which declares that “Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia,” I should have voted no, for this, among other reasons: that I believe Congress ought to interfere with the slave trade in the District. The last clause, which directs the committee to assign reasons why Congress ought not to interfere with slavery in the States or in the District, would have presented some difficulties, especially as all the other parts of the resolution had been adopted when the vote was taken on it. I should, however, have placed my name among those of the six gentlemen who voted no, on the ground that the appointment of counsel by the House to argue one side of a question submitted to their consideration, without power to investigate the other, is not well sustained by precedent, and but poorly calculated to give weight and character to the argument they might produce.

You will oblige me, gentlemen, by inserting this in your to-morrow's paper.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HILAND HALL.

recommend a suspension of all proceedings on that part of my special message of the 15th of January last, which proposes a partial non-intercourse with France. While we cannot too highly appreciate the elevated and disinterested motives of the offer of Great Britain, and have a just reliance upon the great influence of that Power to restore the relations of ancient friendship between the United States and France, and know, too, that our own pacific policy will be strictly adhered to until the national honor compels us to depart from it, we should be insensible to the exposed condition of our country, and forget the lessons of experience, if we did not efficiently and sedulously prepare for an adverse result. The peace of a nation does not depend exclusively upon its own will, nor upon the beneficent policy of neighboring Powers; and that nation which is found totally unprepared for the exigencies and dangers of war, although it come without having given warning of its approach, is criminally negligent of its honor and its duty. I cannot too strongly repeat the recommendation already made to place the seaboard in a proper state of defence, and promptly to provide the means for amply protecting our commerce.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1836.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The House then, at a quarter after five o'clock, P. M., adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, offered, on the part of himself and Messrs. GLASCOCK, of Georgia, and ROBERTSON, of Virginia, a protest, to be entered on the journal, against the first clause of the instructions contained in the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, adopted yesterday.

The protest was read, as follows:

The undersigned, who voted in the House of Representatives on Monday, the 8th instant, against the first clause of the instructions to the select committee proposed to be raised under the resolution offered by Mr. PINCKNEY, to which "all the memorials which have been offered or may hereafter be presented to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and also the resolution offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to the subject," are to be referred; which clause is as follows: "that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy," did so vote, and now protest against said clause:

1. Because the constitutional power of Congress "to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy" is not brought in question, or in any manner referred to, in any memorial that has been presented, or in the resolution mentioned, or the amendment thereto, and we will not consent to have so vital and important a proposition brought forward gratuitously, referred to a committee of this House, reported on, and reasons given for a conclusion, not open to discussion, thereby, as we conceive, admitting the power of Congress to entertain the question, and asking its opinion upon a subject about which it has no right to express one.

2. Because believing, as we do, that it is undeniable "Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy," it is our intention to prevent any discussion of that question, so far as it is in our power, or even its submission as a proposition to Congress; and being determined now, and at all other times, to resist any such assumption of authority, we will not permit any doubt of such absence of constitutional power to be questioned or inferred by consenting to refer it to the committee of a body having no jurisdiction, and obtaining from it a disclaimer of a want of such authority.

The undersigned having been prevented from stating their objections in the House to the aforesaid clause in the instructions, by the previous question having been called for and sustained, within one hour after this most important resolution was submitted, now, to prevent all misconception or misconstruction as to their motives and opinions, submit this their solemn protest against this House entertaining any such proposition, and respectfully ask that it, and their reasons, as herein briefly stated, may be entered on the journal.

RICE GARLAND,
THOMAS GLASCOCK,
JOHN ROBERTSON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1836.

Objections being made,

Mr. GARLAND moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to offer the paper; and, thereupon, he asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question being taken on suspending the rules for this purpose, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 81, nays 136.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLER in the chair.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836.

The bill had before been under the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, and the pending amendment was Mr. CAMBRELENG's to strike out $950,000 and insert the sum of $2,000,000, for repairs of vessels in ordinary, and the repairs and wear and tear of vessels in commission, and completing those on the stocks.

Mr. CAMBRELENG withdrew the amendment, so as not to embarrass the passage of the present bill, and especially as the subject would come up in a separate bill, to be reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. This being the ordinary appropriation bill, and Mr. C. having withdrawn the only amendment pending, he hoped it would pass without delay.

Mr. BELL moved to reduce the several appropriations for the navy yards one half the amount proposed in the bill. Mr. B. read the various items proposed, and maintained that such large appropriations might not be passed, in the prospect of a contingency that might probably ensue. The items were as follows:

For improvements and necessary repairs of the navy yard—

At Portsmouth, New Hampshire,	- - $67,000
At Charlestown, Massachusetts,	- - 199,000
At Brooklyn, New York,	- - 84,300
At Philadelphia, Pennsylvania,	- - 11,750
At Washington,	- - 37,500
At Gosport, Virginia,	- - 167,000
At Pensacola,	- - 64,000

Mr. JARVIS thought the gentleman should at least examine whether the appropriations were necessary or not, before he made a sweeping motion to reduce the whole of them indiscriminately one half. Mr. J. then read various estimates and details from the officers of the Department, in reference to the proposed items. Mr. J. said, whether there was peace or war, these works should be completed.

Mr. BELL again opposed the items, on the ground that this was not the time to make such an extraordinary outlay of the public money, when the public resources might be wanted for other objects. He then modified his motion, in order to test the question, by confining the amendment at present to the first item, and moved that the appropriation for the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, be reduced to $33,500, being one half the amount proposed in the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he would vote for the proposed appropriations, unless gentlemen could show that they were unnecessary, or incorrect. In the first place, an appropriation was asked, for the purpose of making a timber shed: that he considered necessary for the preservation of the timber. Another was for a mast and boat house: that he also considered necessary, whether there should be war or not. A timber dock was also asked for: that the officers whose duty it was to attend to that business had thought necessary; and he would take their word, unless gentlemen could show that they were incorrect.

Mr. CUSHMAN hoped the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] would not prevail. It was his intention, if the pending amendment was negatived, to ask for an additional sum for the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire. The improvements proposed by the Naval Committee were absolutely necessary in time of peace, and no remark which he should make would be predicated upon the supposition of a war with France. That Power, he was persuaded, would not persist in her refusal to carry into effect the treaty of 1831. The appropriation asked for was not made upon the ground supposed by the gentleman from Tennessee; it had no reference to a war with France. It was a wise saying and a correct principle, which should never be lost sight of, that in peace we should prepare for war. He repeated, that the proposed improvements and repair of the navy yard at Portsmouth were absolutely necessary, under any state of things. He had three weeks ago submitted a resolution, directing an inquiry into the expediency of erecting one or more wharves at this navy yard, and it was for this object he contemplated asking for an additional sum to that contained in the bill.

Mr. PARKER replied to Mr. BELL, and recited the clauses of an act of Congress authorizing the construction of certain navy yards, and the report of the Department made to Congress. Mr. P. maintained at length that the proposed appropriations were necessary, and it was false economy to suppose any thing would be saved by reducing them one half.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said, so far from the reduction of that for the navy yard at Pensacola being possible, he intended to move to double the proposed appropriation as soon as the proper time arrived.

The CHAIR said that point was not then under consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had looked into the appropriations for Portsmouth for the last two years. He found that in 1834 it was $40,700, and in 1835, $39,925, while $67,000 was proposed for the present year, the only explanation of which was, that a large portion of it was required for erecting sheds to preserve the live oak timber. He thought, at least, the appropriation should be reduced to the limit of the last two years, and not contain an excess of between $20,000 and $30,000. He said the House was very economical in small matters, and a trifling proposition, handed in by himself to the Committee on the Rules, to furnish lists of yeas and nays for the people, was returned to him by the chairman of that committee, [Mr. MANN, of New York,] on the ground of the expense. Mr. U. complained of the extravagance of the proposed items in this bill, and hoped they would be amended. The members of the committees in charge of this bill came generally from the large cities, and they were therefore more interested in the proposed appropriations.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said it was argued that they ought to curtail these appropriations, because there was a surplus on hand from last year. All the money on hand, he conceived, was pledged; some portions for the payment of the crews of vessels on long voyages, and for timber and other materials contracted for. There was, at the end of every fiscal year, an unexpended balance, but that balance was pledged, and could not be transferred, for any other purpose whatsoever. He was in favor of making appropriations speedily, to finish the works already commenced; because delaying the completion of the kind of work contemplated in this item generally resulted in a loss of twenty per cent. He would take the estimates and recommendations of the navy board, or the Secretary of the Navy, as correct, unless gentlemen could show that those statements were erroneous.

Mr. PHILLIPS should vote for this appropriation, as he should vote for every other, for a public object, where nothing could be adduced against its propriety and necessity. He was satisfied that, from the increase of materials, and for other reasons, the estimated amount was not too large. Mr. P. entered at length into sundry statements connected with the subject, and the unexpended balances under the acts of 1827 and 1833. Mr. P. should like to know from the chairman of the Naval Committee, what amount remained of the unexpended balance on this navy yard, for the last year.

Mr. JARVIS replied that it was impossible for him to say what amount remained unexpended of a balance of $1,750.

Mr. PHILLIPS admitted the item was very trifling, but he should apply the same principle to all the unexpended balances of the other items, and he should renew the same inquiry upon each of them. He complained that no statements of those balances had been furnished from the Departments. He thought the chairman of the committee should be prepared with them.

Mr. DUNLAP said it could not be expected that those who came from a different section of country than that where these works were situated should vote for them without statements or estimates. He was ever ready to vote for appropriations that were requisite, but he could not conceive that it was necessary to vote a sum of $18,000 to erect a shed to protect timber, at least until his mind was satisfied that it was indispensable: he never should vote to appropriate the people's money for this purpose. He hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. BELL explained that he was not so much opposed to the appropriation itself, as he was to such large appropriations at this time. It was with him a mere question of expediency; for, in case of war, the money would be wanted to equip ships of war, and put the country in a state of defence. He did not want to delay this bill, but he pledged himself at a future day to go into the whole subject, not only of our foreign relations, fortifications, &c., but of the whole civil establishment of the Government.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was happy to hear that it was not the gentleman's [Mr. BELL's] purpose to oppose the passage of the ordinary appropriation bill, for Mr. C. thought he knew that gentleman too well to suppose he would waste his fire upon so small an occasion. The gentleman had told them that, on a proper occasion, he would come forward. Mr. C. hoped the gentleman would then give them his views, and he hoped, when he did so, that he would be more successful in explaining them than he had been on this present occasion, to this House. Mr. C. had been unable to understand what the gentleman had been driving at. The gentleman said, whether war or peace was to ensue, he wished to reserve our funds, in order, if called upon for large appropriations, they might apply them to the proper object. Well, taking this for granted, suppose they should be called upon to make large appropriations during the present session, to defend ourselves from war with France, was this the place the gentleman proposes to save the means to do it? Would he propose to diminish the conveniences of the navy yards in such a crisis? Let any man look to the present condition of our navy yards, and compare them with the most insignificant Power of Europe—Sweden, Denmark, or any other petty Power of the Atlantic—and what were they? They were in as bad a condition as our fortifications. Mr. C. then referred to the acts by which a gradual increase of the navy had been authorized, and compared the proposed items in this bill with those of former years, to show that they varied in some particulars, some more and some less. He had hoped, when he withdrew the amendment of $2,000,000, that the bill would have gone speedily through the committee. He had withdrawn that proposition for the purpose of facilitating the passage of the ordinary appropriation bill, and he did not anticipate the opposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] Mr. C. said that, be the result of our foreign relations what they might, he should vote to put this country in an attitude for war, not only upon the ground of expediency, but upon the ground of policy, not to suffer this nation to be insulted by every Power on earth. He hoped the bill would pass as it stood.

Mr. HARDIN said he could not but admire the largeness of the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] upon the subject of those appropriations. A bill, amounting altogether to the sum of about four hundred thousand dollars, was considered so small a matter in his eyes that he could not perceive how gentlemen could object to it. And a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] had said that they ought to take all the estimates and recommendations of the Departments as correct, until the contrary was shown. He thought if that gentleman would look around he would see that it was almost impossible for members on that floor to show that those estimates were not correct, even if that should be the case; and, according to that doctrine, the House would have to give all that the Departments asked. He thought, however, he saw the object of gentlemen in recommending large appropriations. He thought they were in reality nothing but a trick to get all the surplus revenue expended on the seaboard; and not to give the western country a cent of it.

Mr. PARKER said that a part of the increase of expenditure was on account of the increase in pay of officers of the navy, and the greater number of men required this year over the last; and he hoped the committee was ready to vote on the subject, and that the original appropriation would be sustained.

Mr. PHILLIPS explained. He said he had asked the chairman of the Committee of Naval Affairs, whether he could furnish the committee with a statement of the amount of the unexpended balance of last year, as he could not ascertain from the documents whether it had been expended or not; and he thought the House was getting into a loose way of making appropriations. With regard to the navy, he was in favor of the most liberal expenditure; but he did not wish to expend money, unless it was actually necessary. If they would give him the information, he would probably go as far in favor of appropriations for the defence of the country as any other gentleman.

On motion of Mr. MANN, of New York, the committee then rose, reported progress, and
The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836. The question pending was the proposed amendment of Mr. BELL, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from $67,000 to $33,500.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said that when he made the motion yesterday that the committee rise, it was not with a view to enter into this debate, and he would not trouble the committee with but a very few general remarks. On looking into the estimates for the current year, for the navy, it will be perceived that the whole increase asked for by the navy board, constituted for the express purpose of supervising this important arm of the public service, combining great experience and fidelity, "having seen some service," amounts to the sum of $622,151 75; a sum certainly very moderate, considering the state of the country, and its proud financial condition. This increase, we are informed, is occasioned by the proposed addition to the force to be employed in commission, and in consequence of the increased pay of the officers, under the law of the last session. As to the immediate question before the committee, the improvement and repair of the navy yard at Portsmouth, and the other navy yards of the United States, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that its importance must be apparent to the committee, and to the country, whether we contemplate the contingencies of our foreign relations or not. For this purpose the increase of appropriation asked for is $287,010. The commissioners deem this necessary to meet the immediate wants of the public service. The commissioners remark that, "although much has been done in the different yards since the adoption of approved plans under the law of 3d of March, 1827, much still remains to be done to provide adequate means for the preservation of the materials which a prudent foresight has directed to be collected for future use, or to prepare the necessary conveniences for building, repairing, and equipping ships with proper economy and despatch." This recommendation is clear and explicit, emanating from a source entitled to great respect, and which, I presume, will not be suspected of "Executive dictation to Congress," to use the favorite language of some gentlemen. The importance of these great naval depots, for the construction and repair of the navy, must be apparent, even to gentlemen representing the great West: for they are equally so, in truth, to every part of this wide country. Sir, let me ask those gentlemen to reflect upon their vast interests; their immense commerce floating down the Mississippi, and requiring more protection in the Gulf of Mexico than is now afforded to it, and that too from the navy. That portion of our coast seems to me to require more adequate provision for its defence; and I would vote without scruple an appropriation for a dry dock, to be constructed at the navy yard at Pensacola, to enable our ships cruising there and in the West Indies to repair and refit; to enlarge that navy yard, and supply it with every requisite to be useful and efficient. The true policy of the country requires that these great naval depots should be well prepared and supplied with all the material of naval preparation. Believing this, for myself, sir, (said Mr. M.) I do not see the propriety of agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] to reduce the appropriation for the improvement and repair of the navy yard at Portsmouth.

FEB. 10, 1836.]

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Generally, sir, (said Mr. M.) I believe I have been considered as radical in respect to appropriations of the public money. True, sir, I have always endeavored, as far as my vote would go, to withhold appropriations of a personal character, made for individual and personal objects of aggrandizement to the officers of the Government. So, too, for local and sectional purposes.

In respect to public objects—great purposes of national defence—objects confided to the national Government by the constitution, I have endeavored to distinguish in my action. Believing these distinctions, to exist, and that they are apparent, it will not be necessary for me to defend myself against any charges of seeming inconsistency in voting for this appropriation, and such others of the same character as may appear necessary and proper.

These estimates (said Mr. M.) are made upon the basis of peace, with a prudent foresight, however, to any contingencies which await us. It is not necessary now to consider or debate our relations with other nations. Those relations are in a delicate condition at present, but we have a right to hope they will not be more seriously disturbed. Whether they are so or not, the measure now under consideration seems to be required by all the motives of prudence and patriotism.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the Chair, if it would be in order to move to strike out the whole clause.

The CHAIR replied, not at that stage of the bill. The motion would be in order after the amendment had been acted on.

Mr. EVERETT said he was in favor of putting the navy yards that were necessary for the service in perfect condition. He thought, however, that the present number was more than was necessary. We had now seven, viz: at Portsmouth, Charlestown, New York, (Brooklyn,) Philadelphia, Washington, Gosport, and Pensacola; that, of these, three might, without injury to the service, be discontinued, viz: at Portsmouth, Philadelphia, and Washington; at least, that we ought not to erect any new works at these places, but only keep them in repair for the present, and ultimately discontinue them; and that all the appropriations for additional improvements should be thrown on the four navy yards that were to be continued. The expense of maintaining the yards, independent of the cost of the permanent works, was worth saving. To each yard were attached commandants, navy agents, clerks, guards, &c. &c. If gentlemen, however, would not be willing to go with him in discontinuing the three navy yards, he thought there were strong reasons for discontinuing the one at Portsmouth. It was within sixty miles of that at Charlestown. That yard was sufficient for the coast east of the Cape; the principal materials from the South, live oak, &c., must all pass that depot in their way to Portsmouth. He saw no reason for maintaining two yards so near each other, and which were not required for the use of the naval service. The appropriation now asked for was for the erection of new works, with a view to the permanent continuance of the station. For one, all he was willing to do at present was, to provide for its present preservation; whatever should be necessary for this purpose he would vote for. What the unexpended balance of appropriation was for Portsmouth he was not informed. On the 1st January, 1834, it was over $12,000, and $39,925 was then appropriated; and he wished to know whether this had been expended. When the present motion was decided, he should move to strike out the whole appropriation, with a view to elicit information of what was necessary for repairs, and to have the appropriation limited to that purpose only.

When called upon to vote for appropriations, he was desirous of being informed for what object the money was to be expended, of the character of the works required, as well as of their necessity. A new doctrine, and to him it seemed a dangerous one, had been advanced, to which he could not assent—that we should receive the estimates of the Departments as prima facie evidence of the necessity and propriety of the works proposed. This was a degree of confidence which, as a representative of the people, he was unwilling to repose in any administration. This House was the keeper of the keys of the Treasury, and responsible to the people for the expenditure of its treasure. We could not surrender the keys to the Executive without betraying our trust. The people were entitled to call on their representatives for a reason for every expenditure. Would the people be satisfied with the answer that it was asked for by the Executive? For one, he was desirous in all cases to obtain such information as would enable him to give a more satisfactory answer.

If the estimates are to be taken as prima facie evidence of the propriety and necessity of public works, they must to nineteen twentieths of the House be conclusive. Those few representatives who reside in the vicinity of the place where the works are to be erected only can judge from actual knowledge, and they, too, are not very likely to be prejudiced against them. They will not at least be induced to search for objections. Take the present case as an illustration: The honorable gentleman, [Mr. CUSHMAN,] who represents the section of country around Portsmouth, is not even satisfied with the present estimate, and has given notice he shall move to increase it. A similar notice has been given in relation to the appropriation for Pensacola. He contended that such information should accompany the estimates as would satisfy the committees, and enable them to satisfy the House, of the propriety of the appropriations.

Mr. E. further contended that the House ought to be informed, not only of the necessity of the work proposed, but of the plan on which the money was to be expended. They had a right to know, not only the general object proposed, but the means by which it was to be effected; to see that their money was not wasted by inefficient or extravagant expenditures. All that seemed now required of the representatives was to vote the money for general objects, and let the Executive expend it at its own discretion. In his opinion, in appropriations for all new works, the plan of expenditure should be exhibited to the House, and not only exhibited, but should be sanctioned and prescribed by the act of appropriation. This was, he thought, very properly proposed to be done in a bill now pending, for the erection of buildings for the State and Treasury Departments; the bill prescribed they should be erected according to the plan which is now exhibited on the wall of this House. He could refer to instances of an opposite character, in which the country had suffered, and might yet suffer, for the want of similar provisions.

An appropriation was made for the armament of the navy: the manner was left to the Executive, and by the Executive to experiments of the navy commissioners. Under their experiments, the weight of the guns, in proportion to their caliber, was reduced; and the result is, that you have now seven hundred and fifty guns in your navy more dangerous to the crews than to an enemy.

Another case: In 1833, an act passed appropriating $200,000, on estimates, too, for building a bridge over the Potomac, between this city and Alexandria. The estimates were for a bridge of wood, and sufficient for the purpose; yet the act did not, though the estimates did, say that the bridge should be made of wood. The act merely provided for a bridge, but prescribed no plan on which it was to be built. Under this $200,000 act, a contract was made with a Mr. Dibble to erect a stone bridge, for which he was to receive one million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, ($1,350,000.) And even this, by a very competent judge, was deemed less than one third of what the bridge would have ultimately cost. Mr Baldwin, an eminent practical engineer, estimated that it would cost four millions seven hundred and ninety-one thousand six hundred and twenty dollars. The country owes the defeat of this magnificent expenditure to the vigilance of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, [Mr. MERCER.] On his report the act was repealed by the almost unanimous vote of the House, and a wooden bridge ordered; and which has been completed for something less than $120,000.

He would instance another magnificent project now in progress—the New York custom-house. The House had prescribed no plan for this work, nor fixed any limit to its cost. They had voted ahead half a million, and the work was hardly yet visible above ground; what, with its columns and decorations, it would cost, he could not estimate; probably some millions of dollars. A fourth case: We had now before us a bill appropriating large sums for what might be called floating fortifications, yet to be erected, on sites yet undesignated and unpurchased.

In all cases, he thought the House should not only judge of the general utility of any proposed object of expenditure, but should, as far as practicable, limit the discretion of the Executive in the expenditure.

A new and strong motive for economy is now presented—a motive which would have its influence on him in regard to every expenditure. He looked forward to the passage of a bill now in progress for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, in effect, of the surplus revenue, among the States. He trusted the bill would pass the present session. The principle was one of those on which the present Executive came into power; it had been favorably noticed in the message of 1829; it had been recommended by the Legislatures of many of the States. He would now guard the Treasury with the same vigilance as though it were already a law, with the same vigilance as though the surplus revenue had already been actually divided among the States, and the questions now were on calling it back and reappropriating it to objects of national concern.

Some gentlemen had advocated the appropriation as more necessary in view of our present relations with France, and had taken the occasion to avow their course on war appropriations. He considered this as a bill founded on peace estimates. Other bills reported looked to other prospects. He would not regard this bill as having any relation to war. And he wished to be distinctly understood that he would not be induced to abandon the principle of economy to which he had referred from any imaginary danger of war; that he would vote for no war appropriation, unless he believed there was danger of war; that then he would go as far as the farthest, but that at present he had no such apprehension; that he could not, from any mere imaginary danger, be induced to depart from the principle of economy, and permit irrevocable appropriations to be made, to the peculiar advantage of any section of the country. He thought it not improbable that some who agreed with him on the leading principle might differ from him in its application. The appropriations for the navy and for fortifications would be expended on the seaboard. The money of the Government, like the water of its streams, runs to the ocean. He trusted that those who represented the hill country would not be uncharitably judged by their brethren, if they should not be satisfied so easily as themselves of the necessity of every appropriation. Should the current be reversed—should the money ever run up stream, and beyond the proper constitutional limits of internal improvement—they would expect a similar jealousy on the part of the seaboard. Indeed, they think they have seen something of the kind already.

Two years since it pleased the Committee of Ways and Means to drop from the harbor bill the appropriation of the $30,000 for surveys—this only remnant of the system of internal improvement left to its friends. A motion was made to insert it, but failed, and failed, too, by the opposition of the tide-water votes. What was the consequence? The hill country saw that, while they were voting millions for others, not a cent could be expended above tide water. They united, and laid the harbor bill on the table by a majority over twenty; and there it would have laid till this time, had not the $30,000 been inserted. He would excite no sectional jealousy, but would insist that equal justice should be done to all parts of the country; and it would be the fault of those who united on that occasion if it was not done. He was not willing there should be one constitution for the seaboard and another for the country.

He was willing to vote for every necessary appropriation for fortifications, for the navy, and for navy yards. He would put the four principal navy yards in the best condition, but he could not vote for unnecessary objects, useless objects of expenditure. Such he conceived that of the navy yard at Portsmouth. Though he did not propose now to abandon it, he would not consent to enlarge it. Ultimately, he trusted, it would be discontinued.

Mr. LINCOLN was in favor of the whole bill as it stood, and contended at length for the necessity of keeping the navy yards in a state of complete repair; for, both in time of war and in time of peace, they were indispensable. It was an error to say that no statements had been furnished to the House; for a report had been sent in embracing the very subject under consideration, both from the Secretary of the Navy, in general terms, and from the commissioners of the navy, in detail. Better authority, better evidence, could not be adduced. Would any gentleman in the House, or the gentlemen from Tennessee and Kentucky in particular, [Messrs. BELL and HARRIS,] presume to say they understood the subject better than the head of the Navy Department, or the commissioners of the navy? Mr. L. then referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the statements and recommendations of the board of commissioners, a body of gentlemen selected as being the best qualified in the country, and conversant with the subject from their youth. The works were proved indispensable, and the onus was upon the mover of the amendment to prove that one half the sum proposed in the bill would be sufficient for the completion. Mr. L. did not believe there would be war; and he was mistaken if he did not see the lowering cloud dispelled by the President's recent message. He did not believe war was contemplated or anticipated, and the very appropriations now asked for justified that conclusion. He believed, if war had been apprehended, more direct, specific measures would long ere this have been recommended. This he believed, too, in view of the admonition of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] yesterday, that he would put this country into a state of defence. If war should come, Mr. L. would stand by his country to the last, but he had no anticipations of any thing but peace at present. He hoped the bill would pass without reduction.

Mr. SMITH said there were two features in the remarks of the honorable member from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] which excited his special admiration. I allude now, sir, to his profound love of economy in the expenditure of the public money, and to his frankness in avowing the ultimate purpose which he has in view in opposing the particular appropriation now before the committee, for the navy yard at Portsmouth.

[H. OF R.]

But, sir, it has often fallen under the observation of most men, that those who set up for great economists in the abstract are not always the most economical in fact, when they come to the application or practice of what they call economy. And I believe (said Mr. S.) that this remark will be found particularly true in relation to that class of expenditures of the public money to which the honorable member from Vermont has ever been foremost in giving his most liberal support. But of this by and by.

The gentleman from Vermont avows his object in opposing this item in the bill for the Portsmouth navy yard to be, not simply to defeat this appropriation, but to discontinue and abolish the yard at Portsmouth entirely.

And what, sir, are his reasons for opposing the appropriation itself? Why, the first reason with which he sets out cannot but illustrate to every member of this committee, most satisfactorily, that the gentleman has taken but a one-sided view of the subject—that he looks but one way in relation to it. He says there is no necessity for building up and keeping in repair the yard at Portsmouth, because within sixty miles westwardly, that is, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, the Government has an extensive navy yard and depot. Why, sir, if the gentleman had but looked in the other direction, he would have at once seen a distance of three hundred miles of seacoast, upon the east of Portsmouth, where not a single dollar of naval preparation has been made by Government for the defence of the country against any enemy. If it be an argument against the continued existence of the navy yard at Portsmouth, that another yard is supported within sixty miles on the west of it, is it not a much stronger argument in favor of its continuance at Portsmouth, that no other navy yard or depot has been provided by Government for the wide distance of three hundred miles on the east of it? If it be true, sir, that the absence of all naval preparation by the Government through the whole extent east of Portsmouth is the result of necessity, and from the want of suitable waters for the purpose on that seacoast, or that it is the result of other sufficient causes, it is equally obvious that the nearest point that you can approach to that unprotected coast is the most suitable point for such a provision of Government as is in question. With this understanding of localities, no gentleman, as it seems to me, should think of discontinuing the navy yard at Portsmouth under any circumstances.

But the gentleman from Vermont urges other reasons in opposition to this appropriation, and perhaps they are equally cogent with that to which I have just adverted. He says the appropriation ought not to be made, because the Government has appropriated, or is about appropriating, some million or more of dollars to erect a custom-house in the city of New York; and because, forsooth, the Government appropriated some considerable amount—I know not how much, but probably an extravagant sum—to construct a bridge across the Potomac river. Sir, there is no doubt a very striking connexion between these subjects and the navy yard at Portsmouth, in the mind of the gentleman from Vermont, although I confess I am totally unable to perceive it.

[Mr. EVERETT asked leave to explain. He said the gentleman from Maine had misunderstood his remarks. That he alluded to the expenditures relative to the custom-house at New York, and the Potomac bridge, as cases in which the acts of appropriation prescribed no plan of the works to be constructed. The same objection, said he, applies to the appropriation now proposed at Portsmouth. We want evidence of its necessity.]

Mr. SMITH proceeded. I am happy to take the explanations of the gentleman. But how is his argument relieved by it? Have we not evidence before us of the necessity and propriety of this appropriation? The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] has already adverted to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy upon the subject; and also to that of the board of navy commissioners. Yet another document from the board of navy commissioners pronounces, in so many words, this class of works, at the navy yards mentioned in the document, including the one at Portsmouth, as among the "most important" of the Government's works. Besides these recommendations from the board of navy commissioners, backed by the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, you have also the report of a committee of this House, reiterating the same recommendation. And yet the gentleman says, we have no information, we have not sufficient information to show the propriety of this appropriation! Why, sir, what other information would the gentleman have than this accumulation of it in the printed documents upon this table, and from the appropriate sources? He says it is impossible for all the members of the House to understand the necessity of the work. But, sir, it is not impossible, if he will but make the effort. If he be not negligent of the opportunity given him to understand it, or blinded by prejudice against every recommendation that emanates from the heads of Departments, he can fully understand the propriety of every recommendation made. If he suspects their propriety or expediency, and the recommendations of the appropriate officers, he can, at very little trouble, possess himself of their whole merits; and unless he chooses to do this, with all due respect to the gentleman from Vermont be it said, he cannot, with propriety, complain, or object, that he has not sufficient authority for the appropriation.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that we have all the necessary information to not only justify, but to require, this appropriation. We have all that is usual, and all that ought to be desired, unless we are also actuated by the ulterior purpose avowed by the gentleman from Vermont, of destroying and abolishing entirely the navy yard at Portsmouth—a purpose which I apprehend very few members of this committee are disposed to entertain. Look at the question in point of economy, and how will the case stand? Is it not good economy to construct sheds and docks at our navy yards, to preserve the property of the Government that necessarily accumulates there? The gentleman from Vermont is himself, I believe, an agriculturist, or if not, the region he represents upon this floor is made up of agriculturists. I would ask him, what would be, what must be, his opinion of the individual who is in the management of an extensive farm, requiring an extensive body of implements and materials, and who totally neglects to make preparation of suitable sheds and buildings for the protection and preservation of them from the elements that destroy them—from rain, snow, dampness, and decay? Would you, sir, would that gentleman, pronounce such a man a good husbandman, a prudent agriculturist? Would he say such a man was practising upon principles of economy? It cannot be. Well, sir, apply the same reasoning to your Government. It necessarily engages an extensive navy; it must maintain naval depots at different points. Vast amounts of property, in a wrought and in an unwrought condition, are necessarily accumulated there. And is it not economy in the Government to construct, at such points, the sheds and docks by which alone we can hope to preserve the property thus accumulated from the action of the elements that destroy it, that it may be ready for the service of the Government on any emergency? It would be neglect and waste not to make such preparation.

H. OF R.]

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[FEB. 10, 1836.]

The question that alone remains is, are the appropriations proposed—$18,000 for timber sheds, $25,000 for mast and boat house, $20,000 for a timber dock, and $4,000 for repairs—proportioned to the character of the works needed? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] has well said that, before objection be made to these propositions, regard ought to be had to the nature of the works designed. They are proposed to be permanent and durable works, and not to be constructed of materials and after the fashion of many of that class of works for which the honorable member from Vermont has invariably voted most liberally to support—works of internal improvement, in harbors and rivers, of which the first parts constructed have actually, in numerous instances, fallen into decay and ruin before the other parts were completed. It is not such a kind of economy as the gentleman's favorite works have been conducted upon that is designed to be applied in the construction of the navy buildings at Portsmouth. The works are to be permanent and durable—of lasting materials; and if they should cost more in the outset, they are designed to be cheapest in the result.

But, sir, we hear the cry of war sounded upon this subject, and with what view I can scarcely conceive. War, and war measures, and war appropriations, appear to have, in the estimation of some gentlemen, an intimate connexion with almost every proposition that comes before the House at the present session. No proposition, however trivial, no appropriation, however small, comes up, which does not seem to partake of war in some way. This panic appears to be very much of the character with that which pervaded the British nation subsequent to the French Revolution. Nothing could occur there, nothing could be proposed, at all out of the common course, either in public or private circles, though it were that a letter was discovered to have two seals instead of one, which did not excite alarm at once, as partaking in some way of French influence, or having some connexion with the French Revolution! Sir, I see no war measure in the proposed appropriations for the navy yard at Portsmouth. It is a work of economy, of expediency, and of necessity. The idea of rejecting it, with a view of discontinuing the navy yard at that place, cannot, I trust, influence any considerable portion of this committee. It would be, in my estimation, the extreme of folly in the Government to forego the privileges which that yard combines, the facilities which that harbor furnishes for ship-building. In no place of the Union is ship-building carried on with higher reputation than at Portsmouth. The best, or among the best, vessels that float upon the ocean were constructed at Portsmouth; and the facilities of the Government for the purposes of a navy yard of certain magnitude at Portsmouth are unsurpassed at any other point of our seacoast, from one end to the other of the Union. And I trust that the item of the bill now before the committee will not be stricken out, with a view to delay the construction of the necessary buildings, and much less with a view to discontinue the navy yard at Portsmouth. It would not only be bad economy to do so, but a direct and serious injury to the public service.

Mr. JENIFER thought the estimates of the proper Department, sustained as they were by the Committee of Ways and Means, were sufficient, in the absence of any evidence against their propriety, to justify him to vote for all these appropriations. He was entirely opposed to the proposed reduction, whether with reference to war or peace; though Mr. J. did not consider war to be at all improbable; for the acceptance of the mediation of England was so conditional that no one could say what would be the result, though he, from his heart, hoped such a crisis would be averted.

Mr. WISE wished to make known a fact of which the House was uninformed. A communication had been made from the Navy Department to the Committee on Naval Affairs, some days or a week ago, recommending a large appropriation in reference to our present foreign relations. That committee had ordered this communication to be reported to the House; and it would be done, doubtless, as soon as the chairman had an opportunity. That communication expressly stated, that when the Secretary of the Navy made his recommendation, at the commencement of the session, for an increase of two frigates and three sloops of war, he made it solely with a view to a peace establishment. He now recommended an increase of appropriations to the enormous sum of $6,337,000.

Mr. W. supported the motion of Mr. BELL, and drew a contrast between the sums expended on the east and those on the south coast, and condemned the whole policy of the Government in constructing navy yards near the large cities. There was not a single navy yard in the country but what was defenceless. He was opposed to the item under consideration, and said that, while so large a sum was proposed for Portsmouth navy yard, which was not necessary, Charleston, South Carolina, would require at least $250,000, and Pensacola $500,000, to put them in a fit condition. With regard to war, it was not a war with France, with Louis Philippe, but it was a war on our own public Treasury.

Mr. CUSHMAN said the navy yard at Portsmouth was not only one of the oldest in the country, but one of the most important for its locality. It was approachable at all seasons of the year, which was not the case of any one yard north of the Potomac. Even from four to six weeks, in the winter, Boston harbor was frozen up, while there was not a day in the whole year that ships could not enter Portsmouth.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had made application at the proper Department to ascertain whether the appropriations for the yard at Portsmouth were necessary, and had ascertained that the estimate submitted by the naval officer of that station was one hundred and eleven thousand dollars, which the navy commissioners had reduced to sixty-seven thousand dollars.

Mr. JARVIS said that the navy yard at Portsmouth had been long in existence, and was a very important one. In consequence of its situation, it was to be approached at all seasons of the year. Efforts had heretofore been made to abolish that station, which proved unsuccessful for that very reason. One argument made use of against these appropriations was that gentlemen could not depend on the estimates submitted by the Departments. He thought those estimates were to be relied on, because they came through the hands of persons of long experience. In the first place, the estimates were submitted by the commanders of those stations, who are always old and experienced officers, to the navy commissioners. Then it was the duty of the commissioners to visit those stations yearly, to ascertain whether those estimates were correct; and, if so, to concur in them. They were then laid before the Secretary of the Navy, and had to pass his inspection, and from him they came to the House. Another objection to the appropriation was, that there was an unexpended balance in the Treasury. Mr. J. said there must necessarily be a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of December; otherwise there would have to be a suspension of operations in the navy yards between that time and the time that our appropriations would be available.

Mr. BELL had, in the first instance, risen to propound an inquiry, whether this appropriation was necessary or not, without going into the general question; for on that he would take the very authorities adduced by gentlemen on the other side, which went to demonstrate that the navy yard at Portsmouth ought to be abolished altogether. He had not got a specific answer to his inquiry. But with regard to the general question, the propriety of having seven navy yards, it was generally admitted, by competent officers, that a single station was better. England, with her thousand ships of war, had but two naval stations, by which means she was enabled to concentrate the best talent, and to carry on her works with more vigor. He had made the motion he had to test the sense of the House, and see whether or not, with a view to a probable contingency, they were inclined to dispense with what he believed to be unnecessary buildings. He could not himself conceive them to be necessary. He could not see the necessity of erecting a timber shed to preserve the accumulated timber in the yard. But it was not so much into this inquiry he wished to go, as whether or not some part of these large appropriations might not be wisely and prudently dispensed with during the present year. He intended to apply the same principle to every part of this bill, to an amount of three or four hundred thousand. Mr. B. referred to the unexpended balances, and said it appeared that the estimates of the Navy Department had been made without reference to those unexpended balances made for the same objects last year.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would inform the gentleman from Tennessee that, on the 1st of December, the whole of the unexpended balance remaining on hand was $135,000, the whole of which would probably be expended before this bill passed both Houses. The argument of the gentleman, that only two navy yards existed in England, would, if carried out, create at least thirty on our three thousand miles of coast; Plymouth and Portsmouth, in England, being only one hundred and fifty miles apart. Mr. C. agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, that the southern coast had been neglected, and he would cheerfully go with the gentleman from Florida to increase the appropriation for Pensacola.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, then moved that the committee rise; agreed to: Ayes 83, noes 48.

The committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; and, on motion,

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The following resolution, heretofore submitted by Mr. VINTON, was, by consent, taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House any information in his possession of frauds or fraudulent practices, under the existing pre-emption laws; and that he also inform the House what has been the effect of the pre-emption laws now in force, or heretofore passed, upon the sales of the public lands, and upon that branch of the public revenue."

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, offered the following amendment, which was accepted as a modification by Mr. VINTON:

Also, the quantity of land entered or purchased in the State of Louisiana, under the pre-emption law approved the 19th June, 1834, designating the quantity entered or purchased in each land district, and the quantity entered as floats in each district, under the several sections of the pre-emption law approved May 29, 1830, revised by the pre-emption law of June 19, 1834; together with copies of all documents and papers on file in the Department relating to the official conduct of the late register of the land office and receiver of public moneys at Opelousas, in the aforesaid State, or either of them;

also, copies of all letters written by the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, and Gideon Fitz, Esq., formerly register of the land office at Mount Salus or Clinton, in the State of Mississippi, upon the subject of allowing pre-emption on floats, under the second section of the pre-emption law approved May 29, 1830; together with copies of all the instructions that have been given to the registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys, for their government in executing the pre-emption laws of May, 29, 1830, and the 19th June, 1834.

Mr. VINTON further modified his resolution by adding the following:

Also, that he communicate to the House any information in his possession respecting combinations of persons, by force or otherwise, to prevent or obstruct the sales of the public land, either at public sale or private entry.

Mr. BOON moved to strike out so much of the resolution as called for the "opinion" of the head of the Department. Mr. B. was willing to vote for any requisition for information, but was decidedly opposed to asking the opinion of that officer.

Mr. VINTON had no objection to modify that clause so as to inquire of the Department what had been the "effect" of the pre-emption laws.

Mr. BOON assented; and after a few remarks from Mr. HOWARD, the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

The following resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. MASON, of Virginia, was taken up:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a statement showing the amount of duties received into the Treasury of the United States on wines and silks, of the production of France, since the passage of the act entitled 'An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and His Majesty the King of the French,' concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, approved 13th July, 1832; and the amount of duties which would have been chargeable on the same importations under the revenue laws as they existed at the time of the passage of that act, with the amount of importations of those articles in each year, for five years past; that he be also requested to communicate to this House a statement showing, in analytical form, the awards made by the commissioners who acted under the act aforesaid, in execution of the said convention, their amount, the several classes or categories in which they are arranged, and the amount of the awards belonging to each class, and the persons and companies, and the sums awarded to each."

Mr. ADAMS moved as an amendment the following resolution, heretofore offered by him:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be also requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy and translation of the act of the Legislative Chambers of France, making appropriations for carrying into effect the indemnity stipulated for claims of citizens of the United States by the treaty of 4th of July, 1831; and, also, copies of all the communications from the French Government, and their representatives in the United States, in relation to the execution of that treaty, in the French language.

Mr. EVANS moved, as an amendment to the amendment, the following; which was agreed to:

And, also, to communicate, if it be, in his opinion, compatible with the public interest, so much of the several letters of Mr. Livingston, addressed to the Secretary of State, of October 4, 1833, of November 22, 1834, of December 6, 1834, and of December 22, 1834, as have not been heretofore communicated to Congress; and, also, the enclosure referred to in the letter of October 4, 1833; and, also, so much of the instructions to Mr. Livingston, on his appointment as minister to France, as relates to the execution of the treaty of July 4, 1831.

The amendment as amended was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of War, with copies of so much of the correspondence relating to Indian affairs, called for by the resolution of the House of January 23, 1835, as can be furnished by that Department. I transmit, also, a report on the same subject from the Treasury Department, from which it appears that, without a special appropriation, or the suspension, for a considerable period, of much of the urgent and current business of the General Land Office, it is impracticable to take copies of all the papers described in the resolution. Under these circumstances, the subject is again respectfully submitted to the consideration of the House of Representatives.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1836.

On motion of Mr. McCARTY, the message was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the report ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLER in the chair.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836. The question pending was the proposed amendment of Mr. BELL, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement and necessary repairs of the navy yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from $67,000 to $33,500.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, addressed the House at length on the whole system of our navy yards. He was in favor of the proposed item as it stood, although the whole system required revision, and he believed some of them ought to be abolished entirely, and new sites chosen for others. The sum of $67,000, proposed for the navy yard at Portsmouth, without reference even to its permanency, was by no means extravagant or immoderate. He also replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and contended that, whether the appropriation be proposed with reference to war or peace, it should pass. He then went at large into the whole subject, and detailed various actions and encounters, to prove that New York harbor was not such a place of ingress and egress as justified the establishment originally, or the maintenance now, of a naval depot there. He also read various extracts in reference to the same subject, and cited a large mass of documentary evidence, reports, and papers, for the purpose of showing that Narraganset bay possessed greater natural advantages for such an establishment than any other place in the United States, contrasting it with the disadvantages of Boston and Brooklyn. He likewise went into numerous statements to prove that the money expended on those two places was thrown away, and cited the reports and opinions of various engineers and others, who were competent judges, in support of his argument.

Mr. CUSHING said: It has been my intention to address the committee at a proper time, in behalf of the general merits of this bill; but I am diverted from that object, for the present, by the new turn given to the debate in the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE.] That gentleman rose, professedly, to show the peculiar fitness of some spot in Narraganset bay, to be the site of one of our naval stations. He has submitted no motion, however, to amend the bill in this respect, and his remarks are not strictly applicable to the question pending before the committee. Most of what he has said consisted of objections to the present navy yards, to their numbers and their locality, and especially the naval depots at Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Charlestown. He has presented a plausible case with some force of argument, and I rise to reply to what he has said, at least so far as regards the navy yard at Charlestown.

His whole argument proceeds upon the assumption that the only point to be regarded, in selecting the site for a navy yard, is the nature of the harbor, its depth of water, and accessibility to or from the sea. These, of course, are important considerations; but they are not exclusively important, since there are other things alike essential to the usefulness and value of a naval station and sometimes even of more consequence than mere superiority of harbor.

What, then, are the great leading considerations to be kept in view in the formation of naval depots for such a country as the United States?

In the first place, I admit, of course, that a roadstead of more or less capacity and convenience of access, or, in the language of the navy commissioners, "a safe and commodious harbor, with sufficient depth of water, easy of ingress and egress," is essential, under qualification of the facts which I shall hereafter state.

In the second place, it is desirable, other things being equal, that a naval station should have near at hand a large settled population. This is important in reference to the seamen and laborers needed, who, if they be not drawn from the neighborhood, must be obtained elsewhere at an enhanced cost, and numbers of whom are liable to be required on sudden emergencies and short notice. It is yet more important in another point of view. If you place a naval depot in a spot removed from population, you must construct for it special military defences, and establish in it a garrison of strength proportioned to the consequence of the station and the value of the public property collected there: whereas, if it be located in the centre of a dense population, that population will have military defences on its own account, and may be in part relied upon to repel the attack of invading enemies.

In the third place, it is to be remembered that the construction and repair of ships of war is a species of manufacture. If, indeed, we consider the great variety of materials combined in its construction, the complicated process of art necessary to the perfection and union of those materials, and the stupendous capabilities and powers of the machine itself, we shall find, I think, that a ship of war is the most complete and remarkable of all the fabrics of human ingenuity. The manufacture of it is by means of mechanic art, aided by commerce in the collection of materials; and it will flourish under the same circumstances which promote the success of other mechanic arts associated with maritime trade. Of course it is desirable, in the location of a navy yard, to pay some regard to these circumstances.

Lastly, it is not less important to have attention to the geographical configuration of a country, its extent, the relative situation of the various ports, and the locality of its business and population.

Now, apply these general principles, by way of test, to the arguments of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Doubtless it is true that Narraganset bay affords an excellent roadstead, accessible at all seasons, of great capaciousness, well sheltered, and otherwise fitted by nature to form a naval station. I shall not dispute this.

FEB. 11, 1836.]

Naval Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

And if this had been the only fact proper to be considered, in the location of the seven naval depots upon our maritime frontier, it is possible enough that there would or ought to have been a navy yard in Narraganset bay: still, I utterly deny the conclusion that, because this harbor possesses great natural advantages, there should be no naval station at Charlestown, or that the public works in that place should be abandoned for the sake of transferring its business to Newport.

All the objections which the gentleman urges against the location of a naval depot at Charlestown consist of alleged defects in the harbor of Boston. I shall not go into these objections minutely. That harbor has its advantages and disadvantages. The advantages are such as to afford ample accommodation to the vast and increasing commerce of that flourishing city, and to place it high in the list of the best ports of the country. The gentleman says it is occasionally obstructed by ice; but he knows perfectly well that but few days in the year occur, when there is any such accumulation of ice as to prevent the largest vessels from entering and sailing up to the inner harbor, in front of the very wharves. Instead of being four or six weeks in each winter, as stated the other day by a gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. CUSHMAN,] I doubt whether it averages so many days. Possibly it may have happened, as alleged by the gentleman from Rhode Island, that in some peculiar position, or state of tide or weather, a man-of-war, in warping around, has touched; but it is perfectly notorious to that gentleman, and to all the world, that there is no want of safe and abundant anchorage in Boston harbor for any squadron of ours, which may repair thither for shelter or refitting, in peace or in war.

The gentleman seems to think that the establishment of a navy yard in Massachusetts, as in New York and New Hampshire, is a consequence of the fact that each of those States has had a citizen of its own at the head of the Navy Department. If such effects flow from such causes, there may yet be a navy yard in Narraganset bay; since, for aught I know, the gentleman himself, who seems familiar with these subjects, is destined to be a Secretary of the Navy. However this may be, the gentleman knows full well that, in point of fact, the establishment of a naval station at Charlestown was by no manner of means the effect of mere personal favoritism. It is to be traced to higher and better causes. It was the necessary consequence of the natural fitness of the spot, and of the intelligence, wealth, industry, and wide-spreading commercial enterprise, which have studied Massachusetts bay with populous communities, possessing previously the arts and resources, and drawing together the stores and materials needful to the usefulness of a great naval station; which advantages, natural and acquired, caused it to be designated, by persons of the utmost weight of authority, wholly without local biases in its favor, as the great naval arsenal of the North.

If the United States could be created by us at will: if this continent were a mere tabula rasa, on which to map out States and cities with exclusive reference to considerations of geographical position; if the shores of the Atlantic were, at this day, an unpeopled waste, to be covered at a word by the millions who now dwell here; then indeed there might be pertinency and force in the arguments of the gentleman from Rhode Island. But it is not so. We have, it is true, much power to draw population and business to selected points possessed of great natural advantages; but there are limits to this power. Even we, with all our immense unsettled territory, must, to a certain extent, take the world as we find it, and make the best of existing circumstances. Signal examples will recur to the mind of every gentleman, of great and populous cities, which have grown up in the progress of events, and which it is now seen might have been located more advantageously in some different spot. Still it would be mere madness to attempt to remove such a city to this or that neighboring locality. Population, buildings, business, have become fixed, and upon them it is natural that incidental advantages, of a political character, should attend.

Boston is great, not exclusively because of its local situation, but also because of the principles of liberty and the energy of character which the pilgrim settlers of New England brought with them from Britain; because of the industrious population gathered gradually, along with the general improvement of the country and of its institutions, upon and around the time-honored heights of Tri-mount. I am not a native of Boston; I do not reside in it; but I should be wanting in duty to my State, if I failed to bear witness, here and every where, to the energetic spirit, the moral, religious, and intellectual cultivation, the comprehensive intelligence of enterprise, the munificent liberality of temper, and the inborn love of well-ordered freedom, which distinguish the inhabitants of that city and of its environs. These circumstances, added to the qualities of its harbor, and the particular habits and employments of the people, have given it an aptness for the site of a naval station, far superior to the naked consideration of marine fitness; by reason of which, ships of war have harbored there from the earliest history of the country. And the same circumstances have in reality led to the establishment of the actual navy yard at Charlestown.

Nor am I prepared, at least upon such view of the subject as the gentleman from Rhode Island presents, to agree with him in opinion of the expediency of having only two or three large navy yards. The number of our naval stations should bear some relation to the extent of our seacoast, and the necessity of access from various points of the Atlantic or the Gulf; and, in reference to this fact, if another station be needed in the South, and if there be any fit locality for one, at Charleston or elsewhere, let it be established. For it should be remembered, that this country is of vast interior expansion; that it has a most extensive ocean frontier; that its resources, territorial and financial, are of magnitude almost unexampled in the history of nations; and that, exalted as is its present grandeur, it may look forward with assured certainty to a future of yet higher elevation. Our public defences, and the mechanical means of maintaining them, should keep pace with the national dignity and greatness of the United States.

It is obvious to perceive, at the same time, how it happens that so large a number of our naval stations lie on the waters of the middle and eastern States; owing in part to the natural character of the coast, which, on the one hand, is more open to the sea and affords more accessible ports, while, on the other hand, approach is more obstructed by shoal water and reefs of sand; but owing still more to the respective employments of the people. Nature has given to the southern States a soil and climate, and they possess a class of laborers, which render the prosecution of agriculture, on a great scale, the readiest and most profitable objects of pursuit. We at the North, and in New England especially, with our rock-bound shores, and our hard soil, incapable of affording bread enough for our daily subsistence, are driven to other departments of enterprise, spreading the banner of our country in every distant sea, and tasking our skill in all the arts of mechanic ingenuity and invention. Thus it is that we are merchants and manufacturers, and of consequence possess facilities, in materials, artisanship, and other respects, for the business to be performed at a naval station. But these considerations, as I remarked in the outset, should not be exclusive; and the immense importance to us of the navigation of the Gulf of Mexico, embracing the vast and increasing commerce of the great valley of the Mississippi and its tributary waters, evidently commends to us the policy of fostering in all events the naval depot established at Pensacola.

Naval Appropriation Bill.

Before closing these remarks, I take occasion to say a few words in reply to an observation of a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] who, speaking to the pending question a day or two since, charged upon the members from the Atlantic States the being actuated by sinister motives in the support of the bill. For myself, I repel the charge with the scorn and indignation it merits. It is not true. And that gentleman, however much he may be licensed in this House, shall not, with impunity, tell me that we vote on the narrow ground of exclusive and mercenary sectional inducements, or that we are engaged in a conspiracy to misapply and squander the public funds on the seaboard, to the injury of the West.

The imputation, I repeat, is false, in reference to this particular bill; and it is unjust in the general; for I deny that the Atlantic States are actuated by any such motives or views concerning the West. Whatever the gentleman's purpose may be in this wholesale impeachment of the motives of gentlemen from the seaboard, I am sure it can exert no auspicious influence upon the public service of the country; for it should be the duty and pleasure of all of us to cultivate a mutual good understanding between the different sections of the Union, in the spirit of compromise which pervades the constitution. And, so far as regards Massachusetts at least, I will undertake to go with the gentleman, chapter by chapter, and verse by verse, and to show, by the records of this Government, that she and her representatives, actuated by a just pride in the expanding greatness of the United States, and a patriotic interest in the whole country, and every part of it, have cordially entered into all proper plans for the improvement and public prosperity of the West.

And while I deem the imputation unjust, I think it unkind also, considering the relation which the Atlantic States bear to the West. We are one country, united by the bonds of a common ancestry, and flourishing together by means of a community of national interests, protected by the same constitution. The people of the West sprang from the old thirteen States; its territory was opened to civilization and prosperity by the war of the Revolution, and the independence we purchased with our blood and treasure; and the new States have fully participated with the old in the general advantages to the whole country which have resulted from the Union.

True, our fortifications and naval stations are on the seaboard; and it is the expense of these which the gentleman complains of as injurious to the West. But have we not, in this particular, evils to encounter on the seaboard, compared with which the petty advantage derived from the locality of these expenditures is but as dust in the balance? Let us look at the thing practically. Let us interrogate history on this point. It is from lessons of the past that we are to learn to understand and prepare for the future. If a foreign enemy were to seek to subdue the United States, where would the gentleman from Kentucky have us make a stand? Shall it be in the interior? Would he have the war fought on the soil of his own State, for instance? On its boundary line? Of course not. The foe should be repelled on our very shores. He would not be suffered to penetrate into the heart of the land. The broad Atlantic is the great natural defence of the country, which God himself gave to us, and which it is the part of wise and prudent men to strengthen by the application of human art, for the general protection, not merely of the seaboard itself, but of the entire Union.

Consider the fact in another point of view. Suppose that the storm, which is now lowering upon us from the other side of the ocean, should burst in fury over our heads; suppose—which I do not believe, and which may a good Providence in mercy avert—that we are to be forced into a war with France, either by rashness on our part, or by faithlessness on the part of others; where, in such event, would the thunderbolt strike? Upon us, it is manifest, on the seaboard of the Atlantic or the Gulf. The enemy would seek to gain a foothold on the coast. There his invading forces would be landed. He could not venture into the interior, leaving behind him strong posts, well armed and garrisoned; nor, if he desired it, would he be suffered to do so. Our own military operations would lean upon fortified points of the coast; those of the enemy would be aimed against some great maritime city, or commodious harbor, by means of the possession of which his troops and munitions might at all times find entrance into the country, and where his fleets could obtain assured refuge in emergencies, or prepare themselves for ulterior action; and, as a matter of course, the war must be fought on the high seas, or on the soil of the States and Territory contiguous to the ocean or the gulf. We should be compelled to bear the brunt of the conflict. The brave men of the West would fly to our succor, with the gallantry, generosity, and patriotic love of country, which have always distinguished them in the hour of peril; but they would leave their homes behind them in safety and in peace. They would not be doomed to see their dwellings consigned to the fire-brand, their wives to violation, their children to slaughter, and all they held most dear given up to the unutterable horrors of war.

Should not these considerations be borne in mind when gentlemen are disposed to think that injustice is done to the West, by expenditures for the naval service, or for fortifications on the maritime frontier of the Atlantic States?

Mr. HARDIN rejoined. He intended to address the House at length, he said, when the subject of fortifications came up, and had prepared various statements from the Departments upon the subject. He had complained that the appropriations in the present bill exceeded, by about a million of dollars, the estimates of former years. He said he had made up a table, partially exhibiting the expenditures for fortifications since the war, and they amounted altogether to about fourteen millions of dollars. Some system of defence must be adopted; but to erect fortifications at proper points from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico, would cost from fifteen hundred to twenty hundred millions of dollars, and a standing army, including the western forts, of not less than eighty thousand men; a thing the people of this country would never permit. The time, however, had arrived, when the subject must be investigated; and he pledged himself to go into it fully when the other bill came up. Mr. H. repelled the attack made upon him for speaking to "Buncomb," with disdain, and pronounced it a false calumny.

Mr. CUSHING briefly rejoined.

Some individual in the south gallery of the House having applauded at the close of Mr. C's remarks,

Mr. REED moved that the galleries be cleared, but subsequently withdrew the motion.

The committee then rose, and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. HANNEGAN, the south gallery was ordered to be cleared.

Mr. MERCER, understanding that the officers of the House had recognised the individual who had committed the disorder in the gallery, moved that the individual guilty of the disturbance be taken into custody; and, pending this motion,

The House adjourned.

Pension Laws—Sufferers by Fire in New York.

[H. OF R.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

The motion of Mr. MERCER, pending at the adjournment yesterday, directing the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of the individual who caused the disturbance in the south gallery of the House, was taken up.

Mr. MORGAN moved to lay the motion on the table, which was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, moved the suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up for consideration the following resolution, heretofore offered by him:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of Congress for the benefit of the surviving officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, passed the 7th of June, 1832, so as to embrace those who were engaged in the wars of the United States which occurred between the treaty of peace with Great Britain, in 1783, and the treaty of Greenville with the Indians, in 1795; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

The motion pending was the amendment of Mr. MANN, of New York, to strike out "a select committee," and insert the "Committee on Revolutionary Pensions."

Mr. MANN, of New York, said, while he as highly appreciated the meritorious services of those contemplated under this resolution as any other gentleman, yet, considering the operations of the pension system, its vast extent, and the vast amount of public funds it involved, he was utterly and entirely opposed to any further extension of it at this time. There were evils enough resulting from the system in the section of country he had the honor to represent; and he himself had seen so much of it that he was perfectly satisfied, if the whole case could be properly presented and fully understood, there would be very little difficulty in confining its operations to that class of individuals alone who had sacrificed their all in the revolutionary struggle.

The CHAIR intimated to the gentleman that, on the question of reference, the merits of the resolution were not open for debate.

Mr. MANN said he withdrew his motion. He did not design to debate the merits of the resolution, but to make a few remarks in explanation or justification of the motion he had made at a former day, and which, under the peculiar state of the case, he now saw fit to withdraw.

Mr. VANDERPOEL believed, if he recollected right, this whole subject was before the House some two or three weeks last year, and its whole merits very fully discussed. If Mr. V. were now called upon to vote, he had no hesitation in saying that he should vote against it, without more light than he had upon the subject. The only question now before them was, whether they should appoint a select committee, for which he was perfectly willing to vote, so that the merits and claims of those individuals might be laid before the House. But, in so voting, he was not to be considered as committing himself upon the merits of the case ultimately, when the subject came fully before the House, though he would give to the subject the best consideration in his power.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to amend the resolution by instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act of the 7th of June, 1832, so as to include those in the service of the United States in the revolutionary war for a shorter period than six months.

Mr. WARDWELL informed the gentleman from Kentucky, that if he would refer to the proceedings of the House, he would find that a bill was already reported, embracing the very provision contemplated by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS thereupon withdrew his amendment.

Mr. DEBERRY moved that the committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of so extending the act of the 7th of June, 1832, as to embrace the wagoners, mechanics, &c., during the revolutionary war.

Mr. WARDWELL suggested that the adoption of this amendment would confound the two objects, that of the revolutionary soldiers, and those engaged in the Indian wars, which ought to be kept distinct; besides which, there was a constituted committee of the House appointed to take charge of the former already.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, for the purpose, as he said, of keeping the two subjects distinct, moved the previous question; but the motion was not seconded by the House.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS hoped the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEBERRY] would withdraw his amendment, and allow the resolution to stand on its own merits. The subject was before the last Congress, and was fully discussed; and the more it was discussed the more satisfactory it was to his mind that the bill then reported ought to have passed. He hoped that no gentleman would encumber the present resolution with any amendments, and that the House would now consider and adopt it.

The amendment of Mr. DEBERRY was then negatived, and the resolution was agreed to, without a count; and, on motion of Mr. LANE, the select committee was ordered to consist of nine.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a letter from the collector of the port of New York, and other documents, representing the urgent necessity for some action, by Congress, on the subject of the bill for the relief of sufferers by the late fire in New York; which were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that he was instructed by the committee to solicit the early attention of the House to this subject; and, that the business now before the House might not be interrupted, he moved that the bill be made the special order of the day for Friday next. He hoped that the House would then take up the subject, and decide upon it one way or another.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, suggested Tuesday week as a convenient day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had no objection to any day that the House might decide upon.

Mr. PEYTON asked whether it was in order to assign a reason for not voting in favor of the motion.

The CHAIR replied that the question was not debatable.

Mr. PEYTON said, if it was in order, he would move that the New York relief bill be taken up the day after the final decision on the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] on the last year's fortification bill, and not before. If this was not in order, he would fix a certain day, say the first day of June, or the first day of July, till which time the gentleman from Massachusetts said the decision on his resolution could be deferred. The relief bill was, by an arrangement, made to give way to this resolution. He therefore should move a distant and subsequent day for the consideration of the bill. He moved the first day of June.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved Tuesday week. It was not fair, he said, to encroach on the private bill days.

The motion was rejected.

[FEB. 13, 15, 1836.]

Mr. EVANS moved Tuesday next; which was agreed to, by a vote of two thirds.

So the bill was made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.

Mr. INGERSOLL, with the unanimous consent of the House, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to cause a marble bust of the late Chief Justice Marshall to be prepared by an artist of merit and reputation, and to be placed in the chamber of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a position corresponding with that of the bust of the late Chief Justice Jay.

Mr. INGERSOLL said, I am not about to pronounce an eulogium on the character of John Marshall. His merits are already recorded in the hearts and judgments of his countrymen. A recollection of them will be cherished as long as a just estimate can be formed of brilliant talents and unspotted integrity, as long as gratitude shall continue to be a virtue. Few men since the formation of the Government have served it so well, and none more faithfully. In the administration of the laws, under a Government of laws, he was for nearly five-and-thirty years supreme in station, in abilities, and in usefulness. It has been the peculiar fortune of this republic that it has found on different occasions, when it has called its eminent citizens to posts of public duty, a happy fitness in the individual to his station, a devotion of purpose in the man, and a confidence in his designs on the part of the people; a union and an aptitude from which nothing but lasting benefits can arise. Many shining properties were centered in the eminent person to whom it is the object of this resolution to offer a feeble tribute of respect and gratitude—properties which justify the feeling universally entertained for him as the pride and the boast of his countrymen. When this and much more shall be done by them, the nation and posterity will continue to be immeasurably his debtors. I submit the resolution as a cheerful acknowledgment of the debt we owe, and as the pledge of an effort to repay it in the emulation of his virtues.

Mr. STORER remarked that some weeks ago he had presented a memorial from Hiram Powers, requesting Congress to employ him for the purpose of executing the work proposed in this resolution. The memorial was before the Committee on the Library, who would report upon it in a few days.

Mr. MCKEON suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the expediency of modifying the resolution so as to refer the subject to the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. INGERSOLL modified the resolution accordingly; and,

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to, nem. dis.

JESSE SMITH AND OTHERS.

At one o'clock, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House proceeded to consider the orders of the day, which were private bills.

The consideration of the bill for the relief of Jesse Smith and others was resumed, the question being on the passage of the bill.

After an animated discussion, in which Messrs. MANN of New York, VANDERPOEL, HARDIN, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, WARD, WHITTLESEY, and HAWES, participated,

Mr. OWENS, after three o'clock, moved an adjournment; which was negatived.

The discussion was continued by Mr. OWENS, who yielded the floor to

Mr. HOWARD, who moved to suspend the rule in order to move that, when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked the yeas and nays on this motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House do now adjourn; which was negatived.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rule, in order to receive a motion to adjourn over to Monday, and decided in the negative: Yeas 71, nays 104; (not two thirds, as required on such questions.)

The House then adjourned to to-morrow.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

The whole of this day was spent by the House in the reception and reference of resolutions of inquiry, until the hour of adjournment.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

After the reading of the journal—

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, rose, he said, to ask the indulgence of the House for permission to repel an assault made upon his personal character, and impugning his veracity. Mr. P. stated that he rarely, on any occasion, trespassed on the patience of the House, nor should he have asked the present indulgence, had the assault been confined to the columns of a newspaper. But it had been read in the Senate of the United States. Mr. P. would, however, take that occasion to say that, so far as the Senator who brought that paper forward was concerned, that gentleman [Mr. CALHOUN] had made to Mr. P. all the apology he deemed necessary; and he now asked permission merely to reply to the attack made upon him.

Mr. MERCER rose in his place and objected.

Mr. PIERCE moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the rules were suspended without a count.

Mr. PIERCE then proceeded, and returned his thanks to the House for the kindness manifested towards him personally on that occasion. There were a variety of reasons that should deter him from long trespassing upon the patience of the House: one was that the state of his health that morning was such that he was utterly unable to speak for any considerable length of time. He considered the vote taken on Monday last upon the resolutions of the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] as declaratory of the indisposition of that House to entertain debate upon the unfortunate and deeply exciting question of the abolition of slavery. This was the reason why he had taken the present course, instead of waiting for a more favorable opportunity to express what he thought due to himself as a member of the House, and due to his constituents as their representative.

The article to which Mr. P. referred was contained in an abolition paper, printed at the capital of the State he had the honor, in part, to represent. The paper (said Mr. P.) was too insignificant, and too odious, in the eyes of his constituents, to claim the slightest attention from him, for any statement which might appear in its columns, but for the circumstance that it had been read in another branch of Congress, at the instance of an honorable member of the United States Senate. So far as that gentleman was concerned, he would again take occasion to say that the explanations made by him, both promptly in his place and to Mr. P. subsequently, were perfectly satisfactory. The gentleman had no design of attacking Mr. P., but, in rushing to the particular object, he had swept him along with it. From the course Mr. P. had taken upon this question, not only in that House, but every where else, at all times, and on all occasions, he could not but anticipate the denunciation of the northern abolitionists. But he had a right to expect that at least no southern gentleman would have in any way become instrumental in publishing an incendiary article, which was equally unjust, both to Mr. P. and to his constituents. Whether, as has been said, there be incidentally a conjunction between two parties of this Union, to shake it to its centre, it was not for him to say, but he would express his belief that there was sufficient patriotism and moral firmness in the sunny clime, and patriotism and moral firmness enough among the snow-capped hills of the North, to put down agitators, if they existed in both sections of the country, and to transmit an unbroken Union to posterity, with all the rights and privileges secured by the constitution, and now happily enjoyed under it. That he might be perfectly understood, he would send to the Clerk's table the paper which had been read in the Senate.

[The article was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Hon. FRANKLIN PIERCE.—“An honorable member from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] has said that not one in five hundred of his constituents were in favor of the object of these petitions” (for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia).—Mr. Slade's speech.

“Figures will not lie,” though the representatives of the people sometimes do. “Facts are stubborn things,” even when opposed by the magisterial ipse dixit of lawyers and legislators. The truth of these apothegms “the honorable member from New Hampshire” has undoubtedly learned before now. The present, however, is an occasion when he may be taught another lesson. He asserts “that not one in five hundred of his constituents are in favor” of petitioning Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. We wonder where his constituents reside. Not, certainly, in New Hampshire, if this account of them is correct. Such an assertion is a libel on the views and feelings of the people of this State; facts and figures will prove it so.

The number of inhabitants in New Hampshire, in 1830, over 20 years of age, was 133,313. Now, we have lying before us, from six towns only, petitions to which are affixed, by their own sign manual, the names of more than 700 individuals. Besides these, there have been procured in a single town in Strafford county the signatures of more than 300 legal voters. Another town in the same county will furnish nearly 600, another about 300, and others upwards of 200 each. These signatures have been obtained with comparatively but little exertion. But these are not all, as Mr. Pierce will find before the present session of Congress closes. Large petitions have already been sent on, and others are still in circulation. From these facts we may safely calculate that more than four thousand persons will send in their petitions, not, however, by a dough-face like Mr. Pierce, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Let us, then, test the correctness of the honorable gentleman's assertion by the following calculation: The present population over 20 years of age being 133,313; then  $133,313 : 4,000 = 33$ ; thus showing that, instead of only one in five hundred being in favor of such petitions, one in thirty-three have already signed them, besides numerous others who are ready to do the same. If Mr. Pierce is as grossly ignorant of the general interests of his constituents as he is of their feelings and views in regard to slavery, we advise him to resign his seat immediately, and prepare himself to represent them by spending the ensuing year in travelling among them, and making inquiry into their condition and opinions. If he should do this, and if he should faithfully portray, in the course of his tour, the various scenes he has witnessed at the capital of this republic, and under the very banner of our freedom—the prison-house in which human beings are incarcerated for the crime of color—the auction scene, where men, women, and children, are sold like brutes to the highest bidder; the violent and ruthless breaking up of families, and all the social relations of life—the separation of husband and wife, parent and children—the gloomy coffin—the heart-breaking procession of victims bending their way in chains to the far South—the bloody lash and savage voice of the foul driver—the tear, the groan, and the clanking manacle—if he will portray all this, and then, as a peroration, recount his own conduct in regard to abolishing the accursed system of which the above incidents constitute only a part, we assure him, from our knowledge of human nature, that “his constituents” will never trouble him to represent them again, but will permit him to retire in solium cum dignitate, to private life.]

Mr. P. then proceeded. The text of this article purported to have been taken from the speech of an honorable member of that House, [Mr. SLADE, of Vermont.] It so happened that Mr. P. was not present at the time that declaration was made, and he was first made acquainted with it by an honorable member from South Carolina, but it was then too late to do what he would have done on the occasion, had he been present. If the gentleman who made that remark had any evidence in his possession upon which the conviction of Mr. P's error was made, he should be glad to have that evidence. If not, until that gentleman had associated as freely with Mr. P's constituents as he had done, and consequently had the same opportunity of knowing their opinions and sentiments as he had, he must be permitted to take his own judgment in preference to the gentleman's.

Mr. P. said he was not mistaken. It was difficult in any case to prove a negative; it would be impossible in this. But while the yeomanry of New Hampshire refuse to entertain, refuse to hear, incendiary lectures, and while they refuse to send in petitions for the abolition of slavery in this District or elsewhere, what is the inference? Are they to be charged with a disposition to invade your rights and to wrest from you your property? Sir, (said, Mr. P.,) it would be a strange deduction, and yet it is the only logic by which his constituents could be made to entertain incendiary designs, or their representative be charged with a false statement. No age nor country had ever been free from fanatics; no age nor country had ever been without enthusiasts, and consequently no doctrines, however preposterous, would be without their advocates, and none too visionary to find support; and with equal justice and propriety might the whole people of New York be charged with being followers of Matthias as the people of New Hampshire for favoring the designs of the Knapps, and Garrisons, and Thompsons, because some one or two adherents of those individuals might be found among them. The feelings of his constituents were strong, and had been fully demonstrated.

What were the remarks for which he had been arraigned, not only before the public, but before the Senate of the United States, as having been guilty of untruth in his place on that floor? What he said was, that there was no such disposition among the people of his section of country as that indicated by the gentleman, [Mr. SLADE,] and that not one in a hundred of Mr. P's constituents who did not entertain the most sacred regard for the rights of their southern brethren, and not one in five hundred who would not have those rights protected at any and every hazard. When he made that remark, he did not, of course, intend to include the children, who knew not what they did, nor the ladies, who in their proper sphere had his highest respect and veneration. He meant to speak of the yeomanry of his country, the legal voters. With this qualification, he was prepared to reassert all he said before. He would go farther. Within the last six months, as every one there must know, the subject of abolition had been much agitated in public, and he had never seen yet the first abolitionist, man, woman, or child, within his knowledge, in the district in which he resided.

Mr. P. also understood that, since he had made his statement, a report had gone forth from member to member of the House prejudicial to his character. It was this: that the petitions had been received there, and were there with a large number of names upon them, praying the abolition of slavery in this District, and that his colleagues and himself had held them back. He now had a member in his eye, who, he understood, had heard that statement; and he called upon that gentleman to state how the fact was.

Mr. HESTER explained that the report he had heard was, that there would be petitions sent on from the gentleman's district, with four or five thousand signatures attached to them. Mr. H. had heard nothing of their having come on.

Mr. PIERCE said that was partly what he understood, that petitions had been signed by four or five thousand names, for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia. He should regret exceedingly if any member, or any man living, could suppose him capable of stating in his place in that House, or any where else, what was an untruth. Before, however, he proceeded to the "mathematics" of this article, he would propound a single inquiry. He wanted to know if he was in error, and if any gentleman had in his possession, or had sent to him, any petition from New Hampshire, for the abolition of slavery in this District? If he had, Mr. P. trusted he would do him the justice to state the fact.

Mr. BORDEN said he had a petition of that character.

Mr. PIERCE wished to see it.

Mr. BORDEN said it was on the Clerk's table, having been presented on a former day.

Mr. PIERCE wished to know the number of signatures on it, and whether they were males, females, or children?

Mr. BORDEN replied that he could not tell.

Mr. PIERCE desired the Clerk to send for it. He again called the attention of the House to the article before referred to. The editor said he had already seven hundred signatures, and then went on to add that in all human probability six hundred legal voters would sign it in one township, and in another three hundred, in another two hundred, &c. Then, what does he do? He takes the number of individuals in the State over twenty years of age, and then assumes his presumptive divisor to show that one out of every thirty-three in that State were in favor of abolitionism.

With regard to the petition already presented, he should have supposed that it would have been sent to some member of the delegation. He was not aware that such a petition was here as the one he held in his hand, until since the abusive article was read in the Senate on Friday last. It was from the town of Plymouth, in the county of Grafton, and was sent to his colleague, [Mr. BURNS,] then and now confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. P. then referred to the signers of the petition, about two hundred and thirty in number, all of whom were females and children, not one male signature among them; and, to show how they must have been got up, there were fifteen signatures, all of the name of George; and he learned from his sick colleague that the greater portion of them were children. He would be much surprised if the petition presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts were not of the same character.

Mr. P. took that occasion to state another fact. Since he had the honor to address the House at an early period of the session, primary meetings of the people of New Hampshire had been held in every single county, in which almost every township had been represented, and they had there investigated his statements, and passed upon this subject. Strong resolutions had been adopted at all of them upon this very subject, with, as he believed, but three dissenting voices; and those of his own county had been adopted unanimously.

Mr. P. then read them, as follows:

Resolved, That the regulation of master and slave is a matter exclusively within the regulation of the States in which it exists, and that any interference by the inhabitants of other States in regard to it is not only unauthorized and intrusive, but faithless and dishonorable, as being against the letter and spirit of the sacred compact which binds us together.

Resolved, That those who promote inflammatory discussions, and are guilty of disseminating among the slaves of the South publications the tendency of which is to excite servile insurrection, are regarded by us as persons prompted by the most reckless wickedness, or by an insane fanaticism fully as mischievous in its consequences.

Let him ask, then, whether, after such an expression from his own county, and from the people of his State generally, he was to be held up as having stated what was untrue? After such testimony as this, was the State he had the honor in part to represent to be arraigned upon the authority of a worthless and miserable incendiary editor? Mr. P. then referred to the other petition, presented by Mr. BORDEN, and it was found, with the exception of about thirty, to be all signed by females. Mr. P. said he could adduce many other facts that would show conclusively that there was hardly a difference among the yeomanry of his State. Mr. P. was not only charged in this article with an inaccuracy of statement, but there was applied to him an epithet that had been made notorious in consequence of having been used on a memorable occasion, by one of the ablest debaters of any age; at the North it was understood to designate a "craven-spirited man." Mr. P. said he would not intentionally injure the feelings of any man; he would not provoke an assault, but he would take occasion to say, in his place there, once for all, that if any gentleman chose to take that statement as correct, he might put Mr. P.'s spirit to the test, when, and where, and how, he pleased. Mr. P. said he was too unwell to proceed, and he would conclude by expressing a hope that if ever hereafter his character should be arraigned, intentionally or unintentionally, it would be upon no better authority than that of a worthless editor of an incendiary abolition publication.

Mr. PICKENS said, as to the paper which had been read, he had never seen it. He had only to remark that the reading of it in the Senate had, he understood, been only with a view to show, presumptively, that the abolitionists were more numerous than an honorable Senator [Mr. HILL] declared them to be.

Mr. HAMMOND asked the permission of the House to put a single question to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

It being objected to, Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules, and stated that the point he wished to inquire about concerned himself personally. The motion was agreed to, and the rule was suspended.

Mr. HAMMOND then said he wished to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if he intended, in any part of the remarks he had just made, to charge, directly or indirectly, that there was any connexion between any two parties in this country, of one of which he (Mr. H.) was a member, for the purpose of dissolving the Union?

Mr. PIERCE replied that he had not said so, and had not intended to say so.

FEB. 15, 1836.]

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HAMMOND said he was perfectly satisfied.

The SPEAKER then announced the special order, being the appropriation bills.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of calling the States for petitions; which was agreed to.

Petitions and memorials were then presented.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BRIGGS presented a petition praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WISE demanded the question of reception, and inquired whether it was the understanding of the Chair that all the memorials heretofore presented, and those to be hereafter offered, were, as a matter of course, to be referred to the select committee, under Mr. PINCKNEY'S resolution?

The CHAIR replied that the memorials heretofore received had been referred to the select committee. As it regarded those to be hereafter offered, that question was not now before the House. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia, not to receive the present petition, was in order.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it was competent to debate his motion.

The CHAIR said it was.

Mr. WISE said they could not turn the wheels of time backward; an understanding of the question of the abolition of slavery must be had now or never. He did not consider that the question of abolition was settled, or could be settled, by any evasive measures. Be it remembered, by the people of this country, that it was not the people of the South, or their representatives, who introduced this subject before the Congress of the United States. Be it remembered, that it was the people of the North who got up abolition petitions, and their representatives who presented them, that introduced that subject; and, if there be agitation and agitators, the people and representatives of the South are not concerned in it. They deprecate the agitation of that subject in Congress and elsewhere. The people of the South have protested against it in every form, but still you will receive those petitions, refer and legislate upon them; and it is time that the South were acting. At the beginning of the session, when the States were first called for resolutions, he it remembered by all, that a gentleman from Maine [Mr. JARVIS] offered resolutions upon the subject; and when the whole subject was brought before the House by the northern representatives, were southern men to be silent? If the representatives of the South had remained silent when the subject of legislation upon southern rights was brought up by northern representatives, they would have been recreant to their constituents and to the whole South. Strange, indeed, was it that a southern man should make a charge of agitation against the South, and come forward with an evasive proposition at a time when gentlemen were ready to give the southern people the resolutions they wished. That a southern representative should have done so is astonishing, and he hissed him and spurned him as a deserter from the principles of the South.

The SPEAKER called Mr. WISE to order, and said that the gentleman must take his seat.

Mr. WISE remained standing, and the SPEAKER repeated that he was called to order, and he must be seated.

Mr. WISE still remained on the floor, and the SPEAKER, in reiterating the call to order, appealed to the House to sustain the decorum of the body.

Various members in every part of the House now called to order, and Mr. WISE resumed his seat.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD moved that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Mr. RICE GARLAND called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said he understood the usual course to be that the words of the gentleman must be taken down, and then he must be asked whether he acknowledged those to be his words; and he moved that the words be taken down, and the gentleman so interrogated.

The CHAIR said he had directed the Clerk to take down the words of the gentleman, and they would be read.

The words were then read by the Clerk, as follows: "He hissed him and spurned him as a deserter from the principles of the South."

Mr. WISE denied having used those words.

Mr. GRANGER asked if the House must not then pass upon those words, and say whether they were the words of the gentleman or not?

The CHAIR said yes.

Mr. PATTON said he must hear witnesses before he could decide, as he did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WISE then asked leave to explain; which leave being granted,

Mr. WISE said he thanked the House most kindly for their indulgence. He thanked them, and was gratified to see that there was no power upon the throne, nor beneath the throne, that could tie the tongue of debate. He would not pretend to say what words he did utter; but he would say what he did not; and there were words taken down which he was reminded he had not said. He hoped the House would take the usual course, and that it would not make an example of so humble a person as himself.

Mr. ADAMS said he understood the gentleman to deny the words taken down; but if Mr. A. understood the gentleman correctly, he said he was not able to say what words he had uttered.

Mr. WISE remarked, that although he could not undertake to say, precisely, the words he had used, yet he did undertake to say that he had not used the words taken down.

Mr. PATTON did not deny the right of the House to take the question; but he could not vote on the question, pro nor con.

Mr. BOULDIN asked to be excused from voting, because he was not within hearing when the words were spoken. He did not expect to get by testimony the exact words spoken, with the context, without which the meaning of no words can be sufficiently understood to say, certainly, whether they be in order or out of order.

Mr. ADAMS said he was under the necessity of asking to be excused from voting on the question, because he could not say whether they were the words of the gentleman or not. As the gentleman had denied them, his impression would be that they were not his words; but the rights of two members were involved in the question; the rights of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and the rights of the member injured and insulted if the words were used. If, in denying the words, the gentleman had stated that he meant nothing personal, he would have been satisfied.

Mr. WISE said he did not know that he had a right to explain; as the right had been refused him by the Chair.

The CHAIR said the gentleman had a right to explain if he chose to avail himself of it.

Mr. WISE thanked the Chair most graciously. He meant to make no personal attack upon the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY.] He meant to attack his resolution--to maintain the principles of his own (Mr. W's) resolution, and the principles of the South. He meant to characterize the course of the gentleman as treason to the South. He did not attack his motives; God only knew his motives. If there be in this House a Judas Iscariot, who has received his thirty pieces of silver, he knew it not.

Mr. PINCKNEY here rose and interrupted the remarks of Mr. WISE. Sir, said he, this matter is progressing rather too far. I ask the permission of the House to say a word or two.

The CHAIR called to order. The gentleman from Virginia was in possession of the floor.

Mr. WISE continued. He wished to be distinctly understood that he did not attack the motives of the gentleman from South Carolina, nor to insult him personally; but he had a right to characterize his acts in what terms he pleased. Mr. W. said he did use the words, "hiss him as a deserter from the principles of the South;" and if he could not characterize his measures in such terms, he could not understand what was the freedom of speech. If there was any thing odious in the terms he had used towards the gentleman, he disclaimed it.

The CHAIR then varied the words according to the terms just avowed by the gentleman, viz: "He hissed him as a deserter from the principles of the South."

After some further explanations by the SPEAKER, in answer to inquiries by Messrs. WISE, PATTON, and VINTON,

Mr. PINCKNEY expressed the hope that the gentleman from Virginia would be permitted to proceed.

The CHAIR said that the pending question could not be debated.

Mr. INGERSOLL next attempted to address the House, but he was called to order, and took his seat.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD withdrew his motion to permit the gentleman from Virginia to proceed.

Mr. WISE again repeated, that the words which he had used were, "that, in reference to the course of the member from South Carolina, [Mr. PINCKNEY,] he hissed him as a deserter from the principles of the South, on the abolition question."

The SPEAKER decided these remarks out of order.

Mr. WISE appealed from the decision of the Chair, but subsequently withdrew the appeal.

Mr. BELL moved that Mr. WISE be permitted to proceed in his remarks.

Mr. R. GARLAND called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Beale, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Cushing, Deberry, Denny, Dromgoole, Everett, Forester, French, William K. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, Toucey, Turrill, Wagener, Wardwell, Weeks, Whitteley—92.

So the House decided that Mr. WISE should be permitted to proceed in his remarks.

Mr. WISE rose to address the House, but

Mr. VINTON made a question of order. He contended that, under the resolution of Mr. PINCKNEY, it was incompetent for the gentleman from Virginia to raise the question of the reception of this petition—that resolution having declared that all petitions which should hereafter be presented should be referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

The SPEAKER explained the grounds of his decision. Under the resolution adopted by the House, the Chair considered that all the petitions which had heretofore been received or offered, and their contents stated, were referred to the select committee. The present petition had been proposed to be offered for the first time, and the Chair proceeded to assign the reasons which, under the peculiar state of the case, had induced the decision that it was competent to make the question which had been raised by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] on the presentation of this memorial.

The decision of the Chair was sustained by Messrs. WISE, JENIFER, and PEYTON, and opposed by Messrs. BYNUM, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, BRIGGS, FRENCH, and HAWES.

In the discussion of the point of order, Mr. PINCKNEY was called upon by Mr. BYNUM to state the objects which he had in view in offering his resolution; and in reply, Mr. P. stated that he meant to embrace all the petitions which had been offered, and which should hereafter be presented or proposed to be offered, with the especial object of putting a stop to a discussion which he deemed exceedingly dangerous to the interests of the South, and to the perpetuity of the Union. He intended by his resolution to refer every petition on this subject to a select committee, in order that a report should be made, which would be satisfactory to the South, and acceptable to the North. He hoped the House would act consistently, and send all the petitions which might be offered to the committee. If the decision of the Chair should be sustained, his object in offering the resolution would be frustrated, and the House would be thrown into confusion, and the discussion which he contemplated to arrest would be continued. Had he supposed that this interpretation would have been put upon his resolution, he should never have submitted it.

While on the floor, Mr. P. hoped, he said, that he would be permitted to reply to an unprovoked, wanton, and unjustifiable assault, made upon him by a member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

The CHAIR said the question pending was a point of order on an appeal from a decision of the Speaker. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PINCKNEY] could not be permitted, at this time, to reply to remarks made on another subject.

Mr. PEYTON suggested that the gentleman from South Carolina should be permitted by the House to proceed in his contemplated remarks.

Objection being made,

Mr. PINCKNEY said this was a matter personal to himself. His own self-respect would induce him to refrain from replying to the extreme and violent personalities of the gentleman from Virginia, unless agreeable to the House.

Further objection being made, Mr. PINCKNEY resumed his seat.

Before any question was taken on the appeal from the decision of the Chair,

Mr. GILLET (who had obtained the floor) remarked that he did not desire, nor did his constituents desire, that the question of abolition should be discussed in Congress. He did not, therefore, rise to make a speech; but as the questions of order growing out of the presentation of an abolition petition had occupied the House until the usual hour of adjournment, he moved that the House adjourn; which was agreed to; and

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution, offered by Mr. SMITH, of Maine, proposing to take from the files of the House, and print, the letter of the late honorable William T. Barry, late Postmaster General, presented to the House of Representatives on the last day of the last session of Congress.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, withdrew his motion for the reading of the letter.

Mr. HAWES renewed the motion, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. EVERETT said he regretted the necessity that compelled him to oppose the printing the letter of the Postmaster General; he disclaimed all personal feelings. With that officer he had not the honor of a personal acquaintance, and against him he entertained no unkind feeling. In the portion of the letter read, he called the attention of the House to the following passage: "When an executive Department of the Government is thus assailed by a committee of a branch of the legislative department, it is but an act of justice, due to the Executive, the people, and himself, for the head of that Department to present the facts to the public." The letter is thus, on the face of it, an appeal to the public against a report of a committee of this House, and laid on its table on the last hour of its session; and the motion of the gentleman from Maine is to ask this House to become the organ through which this appeal to the public shall be communicated. The letter asks no action of the House. He appealed to the House to say whether it was proper thus to come to the aid of any one who impugned the acts of the House or of its committee. The press is open to all, and through that all who are injured by acts of the House or its committee can make their appeal to the people. On this ground he should be opposed to give circulation to any complaint of the people made through the House against the acts of its committees.

Mr. E. then read the following from the letter: "But many of the most important subjects of complaint were concealed from the undersigned during the whole investigation, and were first made known to him by the publication of the report. The undersigned was frequently informed by members of the committee that nothing of an unfavorable nature relating to the administration of this Department had been, so far as related to himself, developed in the investigation; and in no single point in which the committee have been so lavish of their animadversion was an opportunity given for explanation or defence."

This passage contains a charge against the committee of concealment—of fraudulent concealment; and also of assertions inconsistent with truth. However intended, it, by its general terms, contains charges against the whole committee. Mr. E. said he would answer for himself. The charges could not with truth be applied to him. He had neither concealed any thing from the head of the Department, nor at any time made the statement referred to. He said he had no personal acquaintance with the Postmaster General: he had no personal communication with him during the examination: that no personal communication from him was expected. There were, however, members of the committee with whom, he had no doubt, the Postmaster General had free intercourse. There was nothing improper in it. No injunction against such communication was required or expected by the committee. He presumed that, in fact, the Department was informed of the character of the examination going on within its walls. Further, the committee, from time to time, sent resolutions to the head of the Department, not only for facts in relation to subjects of investigation, but for explanation, for the reason of his conduct; and that his answers were a part of the report. He appealed to the records of the committee for this fact.

He did not believe that any member of the committee was justly chargeable with the concealment complained of; or that the Postmaster General could justly complain of being uninformed of the proceedings of the committee.

As to the fact stated, that members of the committee frequently informed the Postmaster General that nothing of an unfavorable character was developed, &c., he would say that he gave no such information at any time; and he believed he was enabled to make the same declaration for the others of the minority.

Considering these charges, then, as unfounded, he could not vote for the printing of any paper that contained them. On these grounds, then, that the letter was a mere appeal to the people against the report of a committee of the House, a letter asking no action of the House, and, also, that it contained unfounded imputations against that committee, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. HAWES said this was indeed a singular proceeding on the part of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] and in the discussion of this question Mr. H. should neither spare his feelings, nor the feelings of any member upon that floor, nor any one in that House, or out of it, so long as he could keep himself within the rules of order.

In order that this question might be plainly understood by every member of the House, he should give a brief relation of it, and of the part taken by the gentleman from Maine, during the recess of Congress, in relation to this matter. Nor should he stop here, but he should go on to expose to the world the part that gentleman had acted.

It was generally known that the Post Office Department of this Government was considered mismanaged, and its funds misapplied; and that, by order of that House, a committee had been appointed to investigate its concerns. During the recess of the last Congress, he, together with the gentleman who had just addressed the House, and other members, who had been appointed the committee on that occasion, made a laborious investigation; and two reports, of the majority and minority of the committee, had been made, and scattered through the nation. The people, therefore, were as well informed as to the facts contained in those reports as their representatives. After the committee had made their reports, and a large number of them had been printed by order of the House, and circulated throughout the country, the then Postmaster General of the United States, now no more, whose friend Mr. H. was while living, and whose memory he held dear now dead, upon the last night of the last session of Congress, addressed a communication, not to that House, but to the people of this country, justifying himself against what he was pleased to call an attack made upon him by the committee. A proposition was now made by the gentleman from Maine, that this communication, which had been already printed in nearly all the public journals of the United States, should be printed by order of that House, and that the House should become the organ through which an attack was to be made upon a committee constituted by itself, and appointed by its Speaker. When the gentleman first offered this proposition, amounting to no more nor less than that the House should subscribe to the doctrines therein contained, and thus tear up the bones of the dead, Mr. H. felt it his duty, as an individual member of the House, implicated in the charges, and instrumental in making the report, to ask that gentleman to withdraw it. Mr. H. did so, as the late Postmaster General slept in his grave, and it was not the part of a friend to wish to arraign his bones again before the people of his country. What the gentleman expected to gain by this, and what he expected to gain by an elaborate letter addressed by himself [Mr. SMITH] to the people of the United States, Mr. H. would not pretend to say. If he wished to be considered the defender of the dead, Mr. H. would tell him he would fail of his object. Nothing of that kind could happen, and the gentleman would find, before he got through, that he had subjected not only himself, but his asseverations, to an ordeal in which they would be proclaimed as false.

The CHAIR called the gentleman to order.

Mr. HAWES. I obey, sir; I beg pardon; I was led away by my feelings.

By the requirement of the CHAIR, Mr. H. took his seat.

Mr. PATTON moved that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to proceed. Agreed to.

Mr. HAWES assured the House that he was unwilling, upon any debate, to trespass upon the feelings of House generally, or upon those of any individual member of it. But, God knows, every member of the Post Office committee of investigation could lay their hands upon their hearts and say that, in the report they made, they did justice to the Post Office Department, to the individual head of it, and to the great body of the people of the United States. When every individual member of the committee knew they had done this justice, then to be charged by an individual member of the House with partiality, misunderstanding, with ignorance, and with every thing almost within the human language of a denunciatory character, was more than he could bear. Let him ask, where did the gentleman from Maine obtain the vast body of information he professed to be in possession of in relation to this subject? Was he engaged in the Post Office Department day after day, week after week, and month after month, rummaging for, and wading through, a vast mass of documents from the commencement of the Government to the present time? Had he done all this, that he was to be permitted to put the brand of falsehood upon the report of the committee? He pronounced the gentleman's own report to be false, grossly false.

The CHAIR called the gentleman to order for being personal to a member of the House.

Mr. HAWES explained that he was not then speaking of the gentleman as a member of the House, the pamphlet to which he referred having been published before the present Congress was in esse.

Mr. SMITH hoped the gentleman would be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIR said the rule was imperative, which he read. The gentleman had indulged in a personality towards a member of the House, and the gentleman could not proceed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, appealed from the decision of the Chair, on the ground of its encroaching upon the freedom of debate, as precluding allusion to statements made in publications issued, as the one alluded to had been, during the recess of Congress.

Mr. HAWES briefly explained. After the Committee on the Post Office Department had made their report, the gentleman from Maine had published a paper purporting to be, if Mr. H. recollected correctly, a comment upon that report, as a private individual, and not as a member of that House, attempting to prove that the Department was right and the committee wrong. It was in that way Mr. H. had thrown back the imputation cast upon the report.

The decision of the Chair was briefly opposed by Messrs. EVANS, WISE, MERCER, and PEYTON, and sustained by Mr. SMITH, who, for himself, he said, had no objection that the gentleman from Kentucky should be allowed the utmost latitude, &c.

Mr. BYNUM said he did not come there to settle political quarrels. If the course was to be continued which had been commenced, they should in a short time have to come to the House prepared to protect themselves and their characters, as it would be out of the power of the Chair to protect them. If the position assumed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEYTON] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] be correct, they would have scenes of confusion and violence on that floor, before long, which would be a disgrace to the country and to the American Congress. For his own part, he must say that, feeble as his health was, whenever he found that the Chair could not protect him in the House, he must come prepared to protect himself. He conceived that, whenever a remark was made personal to any member of the House, that remark was out of order. Gentlemen did not come there to settle questions of veracity, but to do the business of the nation. He thought the House had seen enough to be convinced that this state of things must be put an end to; and he conceived it to be the duty of the House to sustain the Chair in his effort to preserve order.

Mr. BELL expressed a wish that the words of the gentleman from Kentucky be taken down, so that the House might know what he was called to order for.

The CHAIR said he was not bound take down the words of the gentleman from Kentucky, but he would state that he understood him in substance to say that he pronounced a certain paper false, and attributed that paper to a member of the House, and stated that that member had been guilty of a falsehood in publishing that paper.

Mr. HAWES said he was as much in favor of supporting the exertions of the Chair to preserve order as any member, and must say that he concurred in every remark made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM.] In alluding to the paper published by the gentleman from Maine, he had said it was "grossly false;" but that paper was neither published at the expense of the Government, nor, by any member of that House, as such; and, on that account only, he conceived the Chair took it to be a personal insult to a member of the House. Mr. H. spoke in allusion to that paper, and pronounced it false. Perhaps the gentleman did not know it to be false; and he might not have written the paper, although his name was signed to it, and Mr. H. had an idea that that paper was not written by the gentleman, but was written in the Post Office Department, by an officer of that Department.

Mr. WISE moved that the House give the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] leave to explain.

Mr. SMITH said he did write the pamphlet alluded to, every word of it, and was responsible for it, and every sentence of it would be found based upon, and supported by, the records of the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER called for order, and Mr. S. thereupon took his seat.

Mr. GILLET objected to the motion being received.

Mr. WISE said, as the gentleman from New York objected, he was satisfied.

Mr. HAWES believed the Speaker was right in calling him to order, as he understood his remarks; but he again repeated that he did not allude to a member of this House, and he must be understood to be out of order in assailing the papers of that member, when he acted as a private individual in publishing that paper.

Mr. MILLER contended that the Chair was perfectly correct, and that it was the duty of every member of the House to sustain him. A false issue was made to the House, and if gentlemen were permitted to refer to written papers with the names of members of Congress attached to them, they might attack and denounce every document published by gentlemen as false, and, if that state of things was to be admitted, you might as well blot out your rules.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON hoped the appeal would be withdrawn.

Mr. WISE understood that the gentleman from Kentucky was called to order, first, for the irrelevance of his remarks to the subject under discussion, and, secondly, for indecorum in debate; and he wished to know whether there could not be a division of the question.

The CHAIR said the question could not be divided.

Mr. WISE then asked if the words of the gentleman were taken down.

The CHAIR said they were not, but that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] could take them down, and send them to the Clerk's table to be read.

After some further remarks by Messrs. EVANS, WISE, HAWES, UNDERWOOD, and BYNUM,

Mr. GRENNELL presented the following, which he believed to be the words of the gentleman from Kentucky:

"A letter published during the recess of Congress, to which the name of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SUMRUP] was signed, contained a statement which in truth and in fact was grossly false."

The question was then put upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and decided in favor of that decision: Yeas 159, nays 42.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. WISE moved that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HAWES, on leave, remarked that the House having decided by a large majority that the words used by him were out of order, he submitted cheerfully to that decision. So far as he was concerned, he would in future endeavor not to infringe those rules of order and proceeding so essential to the transaction of the public business. If it should be the pleasure of the House to permit him to proceed with the discussion to-morrow, he should carefully guard against any infringement of the rules of order.

The House determined that the gentleman from Kentucky should be permitted to proceed when the subject next came up for consideration.

The CHAIR then announced the special order of the day.

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House proceeded to execute the special order of this day, and went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONNOR in the chair, on the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HARRIN to strike out the first proviso in the first section, which is in the following words:

"Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded."

Mr. PHILLIPS, who was entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I have felt it my duty to examine, with care, the provisions of this bill, and to weigh the objections which have been urged against it. From an acquaintance with the state of business, and the general situation of merchants in the city of New York; from personal observation of the immediate effects of the recent calamity; and from inquiry into the probable extent of its wide-spread consequences, I have been convinced of the importance, nay, of the absolute necessity, of some early provision, on the part of this Government, for the relief of its debtors in that city; and, upon reflection, I am satisfied that it is not more the impulse of liberality than the obvious dictate of sound policy to do at least all that is proposed in this bill.

The bill provides for two objects: first, the relief of such debtors of the Government as were immediate sufferers by the fire; and, secondly, the relief of all who were indebted to the Government in the city of New York at the time when the fire occurred. The proposed relief is confined, in both cases, to debtors of the Government, and consists simply of an extension, without interest, of the time of payment of bonds given to secure the duties upon goods recently imported. This relief it is proposed to afford in the largest measure to the immediate sufferers, and in a less degree to the others who are supposed to be liable to temporary embarrassment, if not direct loss, from the necessary consequences of such a calamity.

The extension of payments thus provided for is an indulgence which the Government can grant, in the present state of its finances, without inconvenience, and, under the existing arrangements of the Treasury Department, without any sacrifice. Such is the amount of surplus revenue already collected, that, if these bonds were paid at maturity, the Government would have no use for the money, and it would be suffered to lie in the deposit banks without interest. The effect of the bill will, therefore, be to allow to the debtors of the Government, rather than to the banks, the gratuitous use of the amount of the bonds during the time of extension. So far as the privilege which the banks would otherwise enjoy may be thus curtailed, they can have no right to complain, since the use of the Government balances that will still remain in their hands must be more than an ample remuneration for the services they perform.

All that is proposed, then, is nothing more than an ordinary arrangement, to which, under various circumstances, creditors are often obliged to accede, from considerations of prudence and liberality. In this case, while there may be reason to suppose that, by refusing such temporary accommodation, the Government might fail of securing its debts, it is clear that, by granting it, it will afford direct and effectual relief to its debtors, and, in relieving so many of them, do much to restore confidence and hope to a distressed community.

The relation between the Government, as a creditor, and the citizens whom it requires to become its debtors, by giving bonds for duties upon imports, is, under our revenue system, in several respects, peculiar; and the course of the discussion upon this bill has shown that it is not sufficiently understood. It differs essentially from the usual relation between creditor and debtor, inasmuch as it results not from an ordinary and voluntary contract, as between buyer and seller, but from a legislative exaction, which creates the debt without furnishing to the debtor an immediate, but only a contingent, equivalent. Let me endeavor to illustrate my meaning upon this point, confining the illustration to the case of duties secured by bonds. Immediately upon the arrival of a ship in port, before the cargo can be landed, the importer is required to execute his bond, with sureties, for the amount of duties on the goods consigned to him; and, from that moment, except that he is entitled to an allowance for damage ascertained to have been incurred during the voyage of importation, he is responsible to the Government for the amount of his bond, whatever losses he may incur in landing and storing the goods, or while they remain in store, before he has had an opportunity of disposing of them for consumption or export. Should the goods be exported, he is entitled to a drawback of the duty; if they are sold for consumption, the duty becomes an increment of value, and is received back by the importer in the price which the consumer pays; but while they remain in the warehouse of the importer, even, as in many cases, under the lock and key of the custom-house, the Government holds him responsible for the duties, against all risks; and, should the goods be destroyed or lost, will still exact the payment of his bond. Now, it is obviously of no advantage to the importer that a duty is thus levied upon his goods, and it is as obviously not the design of the revenue laws that he shall be a loser, by reason of his being held subject to the payment of the duty; but the design is, that the payment of the duty shall devolve ultimately upon the consumer, and the Government employs the importer as its agent for collecting the duty from the consumer. When the importer has sold the goods to the consumer, (though he is obliged to take upon himself the risk of bad debts, without any guarantee from the Government,) he has realized a consideration for his bond, and acquired the means of paying it; but, until that contingency has occurred, he remains in the situation of an agent who, upon the receipt of goods on consignment, has made an advance in cash, or given an acceptance to his principal, without being able to avail himself of the legal privilege of the agent in such cases, of recovering from the principal the amount of the advance or acceptance, if the goods should be lost or destroyed, in landing or in store, before they can be sold.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

The disadvantage and injury to which the importer is thus exposed may be attributed to a prominent defect in our revenue laws—the want of a warehousing system. In England, where that system, after many gradual efforts to establish it, has been in full operation since 1826, the evil does not exist. It is there provided that the importer, upon landing his goods, may deposit them, under the inspection of officers of the customs, in a “warehouse of special security,” as it is termed, which may be a private store or quay, duly licensed for the purpose, under prescribed regulations; and the goods are allowed to remain in such warehouse for a term of three years, subject only to the standing bond of the proprietor or occupier of the warehouse, or the special bond of the importer, “for the payment of the full duties of importation, or for the due exportation of the goods. If within three years the goods are exported, the bond is discharged; if they are taken “for home use,” the duties are payable in cash upon delivery from the warehouse. While the goods are warehoused, the duty does not accrue; if they are lost or destroyed by unavoidable accident in the warehouse, the duty is not held to be payable; or if they are lost or destroyed “in landing or shipping,” or “in the receiving into or delivery from the warehouse,” the duty, “payable or paid,” is remitted or returned. While the goods remain in the warehouse, sales may be made by one party to another, (the law prescribing a mode of transfer,) and the purchaser succeeds to all the privileges of the importer; or, rather, the privilege attaches to the goods, so long as they remain in the warehouse, whatever may be the changes of ownership in the meanwhile. It is not until they are about to pass into immediate consumption that the duty is payable; and thus the importer has the opportunity of collecting the duty from the consumer before he is required to pay it to the Government; and it is only after the goods have passed into the consumer's hands that the Government is released from the risk of losing the duty, in consequence of any unavoidable accident (by fire or otherwise) that may befall the goods.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the design of the English warehousing system; and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] will perceive that, in a case like the present, it would save harmless (in respect to liability for duties) most of the importers for whose partial and temporary relief this bill makes provision. Had the English system been in operation at New York, a large proportion of the imported goods destroyed by the fire would have been warehoused; the duty would not have accrued, and would not have been payable; and the Government could not have been a gainer by the calamity, as it now may be, since it has secured the duty upon all goods which, if not burned, would have been exported, and will derive an increase of revenue from the importation of goods required to supply the place of those (also burned) which were intended for consumption.

I regret, sir, that the warehousing system could not, long since, have been introduced here. As perfected in England, it affords innumerable advantages to the commerce of the country, and has not proved liable to abuse. I perceive no sufficient obstacle to its introduction here. The principle was partially recognised in the sixtieth section of the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1799, providing for the landing, storing, and re-lading, of the cargoes of ships arriving from foreign ports in distress, without requiring the consignee, in such cases, to enter the goods and secure the duty. The allowance of drawback upon goods imported is also a partial recognition of the principle; but it is only by adopting the system in its entire extent that we can secure to our citizens the same advantages of foreign trade that are now enjoyed in England, as well also as at most of the principal ports of the continent of Europe. The fire at New York furnishes striking proofs of the injury and injustice to which merchants are exposed, from the want of the system; and I shall consider it as the strongest indication of friendly regard for the mercantile interest, whenever Congress shall see fit to entertain a suitable proposition in reference to this object. I shall cheerfully vote for this bill, because I consider it founded in the most equitable principles, and because it provides for a case of suffering of appalling magnitude; and yet I am not unaware that it furnishes some foundation for the charge of partial legislation, inasmuch as there have been other cases, similar in all important respects to this, in which importers, from unavoidable accident, have been subjected to the loss of goods upon which they had secured the duties, and have received no relief from the Government. It is impossible to refer to any single case which exhibits an amount of loss at all approaching to what has been sustained at New York; but I am safe in saying that the aggregate of losses in such cases as the Government has failed to provide for, if it could be ascertained, would prove that importers have been hitherto great sufferers from the unjust operation of laws which are still in force, and from the want of a system which might easily be established.

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] misapprehending, as I conceive, the relation between the Government and the importer, upon which the provisions of this bill are founded, has illustrated his view by the assertion that the claim upon the Government is the same, or that there is equally no ground for a claim, whether the sufferer by fire is an importer at New York, or a purchaser of imported goods at Cincinnati. The Government is clearly under no obligations to the dealer at Cincinnati. It has subjected him to no legislative exactions; it holds him under no peculiar responsibilities; it sustains towards him no other than the ordinary relation of Government to a citizen. It is, more especially, in no sense his creditor; it has no demand against him as a debtor; and, most of all, it cannot regard him as a debtor of whom it is requiring the payment of a debt for which it has given him no equivalent, and in regard to whom the contingency, upon which alone depended the opportunity of his realizing an equivalent, through unavoidable accident, cannot occur. This, then, is the distinction between the two cases, resulting from the widely different relations which the supposed sufferers sustain towards the Government. When the foreign goods pass from the importer to the consumer, (or to the consumer's agent, the purchaser for consumption,) I agree that the duty becomes an increment of value; that the importer then realizes the equivalent for what he has paid or owes the Government; that from that time the importer can have no claim upon the Government, growing out of the peculiar relation which he had assumed; and that, of course, he cannot transfer to the consumer, or his agent, an equitable right which was peculiar to himself as an importer, and has ceased to exist. The purchaser for consumption buys the foreign goods of the importer, as he would buy any other goods, for a fair consideration, and afterwards holds them, as he would hold any other goods, at his own risk. His contract with the importer does not involve any assumption of responsibility to the Government; he cannot therefore prefer a claim against the Government, as resulting from that contract; and there is no other ground upon which he can rest a claim. Whenever the Government shall return to a system of which its experience has been too unfortunate again to recommend the adoption, and shall levy an excise upon whiskey before it has been removed from the vats, or, at least, from the warehouse of the distiller at Cincinnati; and when that distiller can state the fact to Congress, that, as one of the sufferers by an awful conflagration which has reduced to ashes an extensive section of the thriving emporium of the West, he has been deprived, by the destruction of his property, of the means of recovering from the consumer the amount of the excise which he has paid or owes the Government, there may be a case at Cincinnati resembling, in some of its features, and in its equitable claims to the consideration of Congress, the present case at New York.

I have thus far confined myself to a statement of some of the reasons which induce me to regard it as an act of justice, to make provision for those debtors of the Government who have been immediate sufferers by the fire—the first class designated in this bill. My convictions lead me to the conclusion that the most reasonable objection to the first section of the bill is, that it falls short of its proper object; and that it should have provided, not simply for an extension of the time of payment, but, under suitable regulations, to prevent fraud, for the absolute remission of the duties upon all goods subject to duty which were destroyed by the fire. And, sir, if any argument applicable to this case is to be drawn from that clause of the constitution which requires duties to be "uniform," I submit to the gentleman who has quoted it, [Mr. PICKENS,] whether it is not virtually a palpable disregard of uniformity to require of the importer, whose goods perished in the fire on the day of their landing, or on the day preceding that on which (the outward entry, perhaps, having been lodged at the custom-house) they were to have been exported, or on any intermediate day, so long as they remained in his hands undischarged of for consumption or export, the same duty which has been paid by another importer, who has received the duty from the consumer, and has thereby been enabled to act, as the law intended he should act, merely as the agent of the Government in collecting the duty which is thus actually paid by the consumer? Upon a proper construction of the clause, however, I do not consider it as furnishing any argument applicable to this case; and I suppose it only designed to prescribe that the general revenue laws shall operate equally and alike throughout the country, without restraining the power of Congress to make suitable provisions for extraordinary cases arising under those laws, as necessity, justice, or the public interest, may require. I will barely submit, in this connexion, that, to ensure the most salutary effect to this and every part of the constitution relating to the collection of revenue from imports, and to the regulation of commerce incident thereto, there is no legal provision so practicable, so simple, and certain in its operation, and so well adapted to exclude cases of special legislation, as a warehousing system.

It is my deliberate opinion, for the reasons which I have stated, that the importers of "dutiable" goods destroyed by the fire, and upon which the bonds are in the course of collection, may justly claim a remission of duties. If the bonds have been collected, or if the duties were paid in cash, I hold, for the same reasons, that the amount of duty in such cases should be refunded. But, at this point, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHAMBERS] encounters a difficulty which, it appears to me, may be easily removed. Confining himself to the case of bonds which have been paid, he says, that as soon as they are paid, the relation of creditor and debtor ceases; and that thereupon the claim of the importer upon the Government expires. Allow me to suggest to him, that though the bond has been paid, if good cause shall subsequently appear why it should not have been paid; or if it can be shown that the consideration for which the bond was given has not been and could not be realized; or if, where the duty was paid in cash at the time of entry, the exportation of the goods has entitled the importer to drawback; that, in all these cases, the fact of payment has not settled the account; and that, it may be, the relation of creditor and debtor, instead of having ceased, has in effect been reversed—the Government having become the debtor for the amount paid; and the importer, as a creditor, being entitled to reclaim it. The English law, in the cases to which I have referred, authorizes the commissioners of customs to "remit or return" the duties "payable or paid;" and the gentleman, in justice, must acknowledge that, when he can agree that the duty cannot equitably be claimed by the Government, he should be equally ready to refund the money if it has been paid, or to give up the bond if it has been secured. He surely will not attempt to screen the Government from the obligation to do equal justice to two claimants, similarly situated in respect to the merit of their claims, merely because one claimant had been obliged or had chosen to advance the amount which he claims in cash, and the other had been suffered to substitute his bond; or between two claimants similarly situated in all respects, except that both having given their bonds, the bond of one should happen to fall due the day before, and that of the other the day after, the occurrence of an event which it is admitted annuls the consideration for which both bonds were given.

Instead of providing for the remission of duties on goods destroyed by the fire, and for refunding the money in such cases when the duties have been paid, the bill simply provides (with the single exception of the first proviso in the first section) for an extension of credit to the importers, to allow them time to recover from the necessary embarrassment of their present situation; and to afford them some advantage in the saving of interest upon the amount of their bonds. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] regarding this extension in the nature of a loan, would charge them with the full rate of interest. Had these debtors actually received the principal of their debts from the Government, the charge of interest might not be deemed unreasonable, were it not that their unprecedented misfortunes entitle them to the most liberal indulgence usually or ever granted under extreme circumstances; but I submit to the gentleman that the principal of the debts, that is to say, the amount of the bonds, has not been received by the debtors, when the goods, upon which the duties have accrued, have been destroyed in their hands before they have been enabled to dispose of them. With this understanding of the case, I am sure he will agree with me that, if the Government is not bound in equity to release the debtors altogether, it will have been sufficiently rigorous in prosecuting its legal claims against them if it should allow a short season of delay before insisting upon payment. I have already suggested that, by the existing Treasury arrangements, if the bonds were promptly paid, the Government would suffer the money to lie, without interest, in the deposit banks; and that, therefore, the Government cannot be a loser by allowing the proposed extension. The gentleman says that the arrangements with the deposit banks have not been made, and will not be continued, with his consent; and that he would not permit the use of the Government funds, either to importers or banks, without requiring interest. I agree with the gentleman in all his general views in respect to the management of the public money; but I presume he has as little faith as myself in the practicability of changing the present system; and that he cannot be disposed, (yet such would be the virtual operation of his amendment,) to restrict the demand of interest to such sufferers as this bill provides for.

It is undeniable, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Vermont and others, that the proposed extension of payments to the immediate sufferers will afford relief unequally, and, in some instances, in striking disproportion to the losses actually incurred. Any provision which comes short of remitting the duties upon all dutiable goods destroyed by the fire must operate unequally; and if this consideration should lead the committee to determine that it is more equal as well as more strict justice—in other words, that it is the only mode of doing justice—to authorize such remission, I shall be entirely prepared to acquiesce in the decision. Still I cannot abandon the bill in its present shape, from an apprehension that its beneficial effects will not precisely correspond to its design in all the cases to which it may be applied. We can pass but few laws not liable to this objection; and, in respect to this bill, I content myself with the conviction, that it will produce much general benefit, and can furnish but few causes of complaint. I would prefer, as a substitute for the first section, the provision in favor of which I have argued; but the bill comes to us from the Senate; the committee who have it particularly in their charge do not propose to amend it; and I am willing, under such circumstances, to take it as I find it. I do so the less reluctantly, as we have had an intimation that the provision I desire may yet be proposed in a separate bill.

The second section of the bill proposes to relieve all the debtors of the Government in the city of New York, by allowing an extension of the time of payment of "all bonds given prior to the fire." This section, in my view, is imperfect, in not providing for a similar indulgence in regard to the payment of cash duties; but still, so far as it goes, I am disposed to advocate it upon the ground of public policy, and to regard the measure it proposes as at least an act of wise liberality. To judge of the expediency of this measure, all the peculiar circumstances of the case deserve to be considered.

The fire at New York has been justly represented as a most desolating calamity, unprecedented upon this continent, and with only one or two parallels in the history of the world. This is a just, but, for our purpose, too general a description. It becomes us to consider it in its necessary consequences as a commercial embarrassment, and, by inquiring into the nature and extent of these consequences, to satisfy ourselves how far it has affected the debtors of the Government, who constitute a large portion of the merchants of the city of New York.

What is the city of New York, and who are its merchants? The city of New York is, far more distinctly than any other city, the commercial emporium of the United States. The advantages which it derives from its central position, and from its unrivalled facilities of communication with every section of the country and every quarter of the globe, have made it the grand depot of imports and exports, the principal resort of merchants and traders, and a scene of unparalleled enterprise, industry, and improvement. To use an expression which can hardly be considered as far-fetched here, it is the seat of the commercial congress of the western hemisphere, in which every State of the Union, and all foreign nations, are more or less numerously represented by resident agents, and where negotiations are yearly effected, of sufficient magnitude to constitute a leading item of the business of the world. I speak of the city of New York as a commercial emporium; and, regarding it as such, who can behold its situation, or trace its rise, or contemplate its destiny, without emotions of admiration, astonishment, and pride? It is already called the London of America; and it has ceased to be extravagant to suppose that the time may come when this appellation will insufficiently represent, if not the number of its inhabitants, at least the extent of its commerce and the magnitude of its resources.

And who are the merchants of New York? They are, as I have said, resident agents from every foreign nation, and each State of the Union can number among them the choicest specimens of one of the best classes of its population. So intimately are they connected with every State, that perhaps there is scarcely a gentleman upon this floor who would not recognise among them some of his personal acquaintances, and constant or occasional correspondents, or, at least, many of whose constituents could not fail thus to recognise them. Known, therefore, as they are, personally or by their general reputation, I must presume that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HANNA] does them unintentional injustice, when he alludes to them in terms which, if not conveying a direct reproach, are adapted to excite an unfounded prejudice. But, whatever may be his object, he cannot succeed in combating the public sentiment of the country. The merchants of New York have an established character for intelligence, enterprise, and probity, which, while it has been the brightest ornament of their prosperity, will prove to them the guarantee of universal sympathy and confidence in the season of their adversity. They occupy the front rank of the merchants of the country; and throughout the country they are respected, honored, and will be sustained, as eminent contributors to the national welfare, as indispensable agents in the accumulation and diffusion of the national wealth, and as worthy representatives of the national character in the wide extent of their commercial relations.

The merchants of New York are and always have been the principal debtors of the Government, or its principal agents in the collection of its revenue. At the custom-house in that city, and from the hands of its merchants, there have already been collected between two and three hundred millions of dollars for the use of the country; more than one half of the imposts regularly accrue there; and upon the ability and integrity of the merchants of New York, therefore, the Government must mainly depend for its available resources. The facts which are upon the records of the Treasury Department attest that, while the Government has always been a strict, and sometimes an inexorable, creditor, it has sustained only the most inconsiderable loss from the insolvency or fraud of its debtors in New York. Hitherto, they have rarely as individuals, and never collectively, urged claims to its indulgence, but have promptly and scrupulously fulfilled their engagements; occasionally, too, during periods of serious embarrassments. Even now, when overwhelmed with distress, they adhere strictly to their obligations, and not a bond, except by the voluntary permission of the collector, remains unpaid. Since the fire, the collector, in the use of a sound discretion, although in the exercise of an authority not strictly conferred by law, has permitted bonds to lie over, conformably to a suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury that some seasonable measure of relief might be expected from Congress. The present bill is designed to satisfy that expectation.

Having said thus much in justice to the city of New York, to the character of its merchants, and to their relation to the Government, I will ask the attention of the committee to some of the circumstances of the case which have determined my own judgment in regard to the expediency of the provision contained in the second section.

The fire laid waste a section of the city occupied by the merchants as a place of business. When I visited the scene a few days after the sad event, I beheld an area of fifty acres covered with smoking ruins, and strewn with fragments of damaged goods partially rescued from the flames. I perceived at once that the immense mass of buildings which had been thus laid prostrate consisted almost entirely of warehouses, the occupants of which I recollected to have been chiefly importing merchants, commission houses, or grocers, such as were always the holders of heavy stocks of goods, the aggregate value of which must have usually exceeded the largest estimate of the loss which is supposed to have been sustained. I was told that the work of destruction had been so rapid that, in addition to the loss of buildings and goods, many of the merchants had not been able to save their books, notes, and papers. Now, Mr. Chairman, viewing this fire as a commercial embarrassment, I wish to remark that no ordinary estimate of the value of buildings and goods destroyed can convey a sufficient idea of the actual suffering which has been produced, nor even of the positive pecuniary loss which has been and is yet to be sustained. These sufferers are almost exclusively merchants, who were holding a large amount of property, enjoying an extensive credit, and engaged in profitable business. In consequence of this fire, not only is their property destroyed, but, to a greater or less extent, their credit must be impaired, and their business, for a time at least, is stopped. All their previous engagements, nevertheless, remain to be fulfilled. The fire, while it has destroyed their property, has left the debts which they owe untouched.

While it has burned their books, it has not finally balanced them. Their notes and bonds will still be produced against them, although they have lost the record of their amount. They had used every precaution to guard against such a calamity. Their buildings were properly secured—some supposed to be fire proof. Whatever was the origin of the fire, none of them, at most with but one exception, are chargeable with carelessness; and they had insured their property for its full value. But the insurers were not insured! It is an incident of this case, which distinguishes it above all others in the aggravation of misfortune, that the first names inscribed upon the list of bankruptcies, attributable to the fire, were those of one half of the fire insurance companies, who, perhaps, will not be able to pay upon an average above fifty per cent. of the demands against them, and may be compelled by the state of their affairs to postpone the payment of this meager dividend to a period too late to afford seasonable relief.

Without going into further details, Mr. Chairman, I leave you to judge, from this strictly accurate description, of the actual condition of the merchants who were immediate sufferers by the fire. Estimate if you can the necessary effect of these combined causes of suffering: destruction of property, diminution of credit, suspension of business, overhanging debts, failure of insurance—follow them out in their remote consequences, and contingent results, and tell me what sum of money will sufficiently denote the real extent of the deplorable calamity? Set down the loss of buildings and goods at $25,000,000, and consider this as only the first item in the account. Estimate the value of the credit which such a capital in the hands of merchants in active business would usually command, and make that the second item. Calculate the accruing profits of the business in which all these merchants were engaged, and also determine what the privilege is worth to so many merchants of being well established in business; let this be the third item. Conjecture (for it can only be conjectural) the amount of the sacrifices of property which the pressure of debts, under such circumstances, and the suspension of demands against insurers, must occasion; and stop here: what is the aggregate? Could the figures be cast and the sum stated, I think it would be sufficient to convince the most incredulous that the immediate sufferers are entitled, at least, to the scanty indulgence which the first section of the bill provides for them. I think it would also be a convincing and alarming proof that such an overwhelming calamity cannot be confined to the immediate sufferers, but must, in its consequences, extend far beyond them. I think it would satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky that such an amount of loss may have given "a shock" to the business and credit of the whole city; and I am sure it must compel him, if he will undertake to estimate it, to carry his conceptions far beyond his ordinary standard of magnitude in money matters, and quite as much beyond the range of his previous acquaintance with the nature and extent of commercial transactions.

When the ravages of the fire had ceased, and the inhabitants began to recover from the bewildering sensations of terror and alarm which at the instant overcame them, how did they regard their general situation? They saw, as they were collected on the spot, that though only a section of the city had been destroyed, the whole community was doomed to suffer by the calamity; that, though the wound was local, the stroke of the destroyer had been aimed at the heart; that, though it was an easy matter to complete the list of immediate sufferers, it was difficult to know where to begin or where to end in enumerating the many and many others who could not escape uninjured. The merchants, more especially, instantly perceived that not one of their number was a disinterested spectator of such a scene of ruin; but that, connected as they were by mutual interests, and bound together by reciprocal obligations, the consequences which would result from such a destruction of property, and a corresponding prostration of credit, and consequent suspension of business, must affect them all. The dense cloud of smoke, ascending from the spot to which the fire was confined, had overshadowed the whole city, intercepting for a time the bright beams of the returning sun; and these merchants felt that a heavier cloud of distrust and embarrassment, produced by the misfortunes of the immediate sufferers, was fast gathering over them all, threatening to blast the gilded prospect of the near future, and the precursor of events which might involve them all in temporary distress. They felt at once that it was their common duty to prepare for the worst. The impulse of sympathy with their neighbors was blended with the instinct of self-preservation. In the manifestation of mutual confidence, in the readiness of each to sustain every other, in that spirit of accommodation to circumstances which belongs to the mercantile character, they proceeded to provide for the emergency. To guard against the unavoidable scarcity of money, and the consequent difficulty of meeting such of their debts as were approaching maturity, they appealed to the banks to co-operate in all practicable measures of relief, and they imparted the force of public opinion to the obligation of creditors to grant indulgence to their debtors, by the extension of payments. They called upon the Bank of the United States to apply all the means within its disposal for their accommodation; they called upon the city government to create stock which might be made available capital; they invoked the State Government for its prompt and liberal interposition in various acts of legislation; and they appealed to the General Government to assume its just share of loss, to postpone the collection of its superfluous revenue, and to give such a direction to its finances that they might be rendered more contributory to their immediate benefit.

I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that none who have made due inquiry into all the circumstances of their situation can suppose that the merchants of New York have acted with a greater degree of foresight or vigor than the occasion required. Fortunately for them the fire occurred at a season of the year which affords almost their only respite from the pressure of business, and they were enabled to avail themselves of a brief leisure to concert and attempt to execute their plans. The efforts which they have made are memorable proofs of manly fortitude and dauntless perseverance, which deserve, if they should not achieve, success. They illustrate a public character which is entitled to universal admiration. They indicate a determined purpose, which, if any thing can, will sustain them in their most unequal struggle with adversity, and enable them to start forward with redoubled energy upon a prosperous career.

The crisis of their fate is still impending. The extent of the calamity is not yet developed in its results, and a period is approaching which must put to the severest test their ability to support themselves. Independently of their own fruitful sources of embarrassment, the signs of the times indicate a fearful tendency of events to aggravate and multiply the dangers of their situation. What is the state of things in the country at large? Greatly brightened, I delight to acknowledge, by the cheering intelligence which we have this day received, but still sufficiently perplexed to deserve anxious consideration. A year of unexampled prosperity has closed, and another year has commenced, of which they who survive its termination may be obliged to render a different account. A year has commenced fraught with results which must leave a durable impression upon the political and financial condition of the country. Never were men of business more unprepared for sudden reverses and severe pressure, and yet never, perhaps, has there been more signal occasion to apprehend both. The overtrading of the past year, the rage for wild speculation, the abused spirit of enterprise, have led, as it would seem, to almost every conceivable misapplication of capital, in whatever form it exists, and to an extension of the system of credit to so dangerous an extreme that it is difficult to imagine any mode of rescue from the evils which it must produce. The present state of the money market affords some indication of what may yet be expected; and let any member, who has the means of forming a correct judgment, turn his attention to the general situation, at the present moment, of men of business, and of the many who, in the use of the most unheard-of expedients, and under the impulse of the maddest passion for adventure, have forced their projects and extended their transactions so vastly beyond the views and purposes of men of business, properly so called; let him endeavor to form some idea of the unprecedented financial demands of the coming year, of the engagements to be met, the contracts to be fulfilled, the notes and bonds to be paid; let him consider the strained condition of the State banks, and the necessary effects of the approaching dissolution of the Bank of the United States, unless, indeed, they are to be obviated by a modified resuscitation of that important institution; let him anticipate the various vicissitudes which usually precede and follow a diminution of the value of the leading staples of the country and a general depreciation of real and personal property; let him notice the consequences already experienced at New Orleans of a suspension of the trade with Mexico; let him bear in mind the contingencies to which all branches of our foreign trade are constantly liable; and then let him judge of the influence—the combined influence, as it may prove—of all these causes of commercial embarrassment upon the straitened condition of the merchants of New York. Let him then decide whether the circumstances are not, or may not be, such as to justify this Government in extending to its debtors, and all its debtors, in that distressed city, the same measure of indulgence which, amongst themselves, no creditor is sufficiently regardless of his honor or his interest deliberately to refuse. Let him decide whether, when all their other applications for assistance have been freely granted, their resort to the General Government shall be coldly, and sternly, and harshly repulsed. Let him consider whether, when the stroke which has fallen so heavily upon that city is universally regarded as a national calamity, and when all that can be done for her relief must be alike regarded as a national benefit, he will assume the responsibility of deciding that this Government may safely, and wisely, and honorably, postpone the claims of its debtors, and refuse to listen to the united and urgent appeals of so many of its citizens.

I have already noticed some of the objections that have been urged against this bill: there are others which may be supposed to deserve consideration. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] with his characteristic promptness, commenced an attack upon the bill before, as it proved, he had become acquainted with its provisions; and, in the use of his accustomed weapons of sarcasm and invective, endeavored to array against it the untimely influence of sectional and political prejudice. In glancing at his objections, let me respectfully suggest to him, that, if it be the misfortune of these debtors, it surely is not their fault, that the city in which they reside has become the principal depository of the public revenue; and that the Government does not make the most profitable use of its funds which are there collected. If it be their misfortune, it surely is not their fault, that the State of which they are citizens possesses, under the constitution, a vast share of political influence; and that this influence, here and elsewhere, has been, and is likely to be, applied to purposes which that gentleman does not approve. Upon this occasion, he ought to remember that the claim presented for his consideration is one totally disconnected with political or sectional considerations—the simple, naked, and (as I had hoped all would regard it) indisputable, irresistible claim of the sufferers by an unprecedented calamity, who claim no other service at his hands but such as is due to the circumstances to which this calamity has reduced them. He ought to remember that, if so large a proportion of the revenue is, and must continue to be, collected and deposited in the city of New York, it is of great importance to the interests of the Government to prevent the occurrence of general embarrassment and distress; one consequence of which will be, to endanger the security of the present deposits, and greatly to enhance the risk of bad debts, in respect to the bonds which remain unpaid. He ought to remember that, upon the prosperity of New York, the accruing resources of the Government are immediately dependent; and that, whatever the Government may now do for the temporary accommodation of the merchants of that city will be more than repaid to the national Treasury by the future results of their persevering and successful enterprise. The gentleman also owes it to himself, to his constituents, and to the country, not to forget that all sectional interests are merged in the welfare of the great commercial metropolis of the Union. He should not forget that such are the indissoluble relations of New York to all parts of the country, that they must share in its prosperity and misfortunes. He should not forget that, directly or indirectly, the planters, manufacturers, and traders of Kentucky have always something at stake in New York; and that he fails to consult their interests, and must be presumed to oppose their wishes, when, in a time of the greatest need, he refuses to extend the helping hand of the Government for the relief of those with whom, by all the ties of mutual dependence, his constituents and the people of the whole country are thus intimately connected. I am sure, sir, that I do not give to this consideration an undue importance. I am sure that neither the gentleman from Kentucky, nor any other gentleman who will allow himself to exercise a practical judgment upon this view of the subject, will disagree to the conclusion that the business of New York is, in effect, the business of the whole country; and that a sudden interruption and extensive derangement of the business of that city will prove a check to the prosperity of the whole country.

Sufferers by Fire in New York.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] has tasked his ingenuity to produce popular objections to the object of this bill, and has perhaps been more successful than the gentleman from Kentucky in exciting the prejudices of some members against it. He has proved, I think, that the title of the bill is not sufficiently definite, but has erred in supposing that the object which he considers to be implied in the title is, or ought to be, recognised in our legislation. The provisions of the bill are designed to extend the indulgence of the Government to those who are its debtors in the city of New York, and exclusively to such as are its debtors. It proposes to afford them the same indulgence which other creditors, under similar circumstances—which other creditors in New York, at this moment—have extended to their debtors. If it were proposed, if it were expedient, to attempt to relieve all sufferers by the fire, without reference to the peculiar relation which some of them sustain to the Government, the gentleman would do right to vindicate the claims of such as are not now provided for; and, if the bill were designed to be merely an act of charity, he might properly argue that the merchants of New York are the last who should receive, as he must well know they are the last who would accept, the bounty of the Government. But when the gentleman perceives that the single object of the bill (which I agree ought to be expressed in its title) is to make an equitable provision for the debtors of the Government, as such, he can hardly consider it a justifiable mode of defeating this object, to attempt to asperse, not their character, but their occupation, and to inveigh, not at all against the equity of their claims, in reference to the grounds upon which alone the claims are urged, but in a strain—I will not say of vulgar abuse—but of unmerited censure, against the necessary incidents of the rank in society to which the circumstances of these debtors have entitled them. I have no doubt that the recent fire has furnished many cases of such as are not debtors of the Government, whose claims to sympathy and relief are quite as strong as the gentleman represents them; and I hope and believe that those claims will be cheerfully recognised by all to whom they can be properly addressed. It may be fortunate for such sufferers that the Government is not one of the creditors to whom they must now appeal for indulgence, but that they have only to resort to their neighbors, the merchants, for the ready acquiescence of the facilities they need. Yes, sir, to the abused and denounced merchants, upon whom the tradesmen and mechanics, so warmly and deservedly eulogized by the gentleman, are immediately dependent for credit and employment, and in whose stability (to which the proposed relief may prove essential) the only hopes of these tradesmen and mechanics are directly and deeply involved. Let me advise the gentleman, then, to consider whether he can do a greater injury to the very class of whose interests he aspires to be regarded as the especial advocate, than by acting himself, and endeavoring to persuade the committee to act, upon the supposition that their interests can be otherwise than injuriously affected by whatever is calculated to excite distrust, and to produce ill will, and to direct the force of the most illiberal prejudice against their only patrons and their best friends. Let him consider, further, whether, at this critical moment, when the working classes of New York have their all at stake upon the ability of the merchants to recover from the disaster which threatens to overwhelm them, he will not prove himself the true friend of the working classes, by advocating, upon this occasion, in reference to their proper object, the claims of the merchants.

The gentleman from Rhode Island makes it another cause of complaint against the bill, that it not only provides for the relief of those who are almost exclusively merchants, but that some of them, also, do not happen to be American citizens. My answer to this objection is, very briefly, that they are, nevertheless, debtors of the Government, and, as such, entitled to share, without discrimination, in whatever policy the Government may see fit to adopt towards its debtors. It is the honorable characteristic of our commercial system, that it offers every facility for the introduction of foreign capital; that it invites to our ports the ships and the merchants of all nations, (who do not refuse to reciprocate the privilege,) and that, in the distribution of burdens and benefits, it makes no distinction whatever between citizens and foreigners. New York has been built up by the aid of foreign capital and enterprise; the revenue which has been there collected has been always contributed, in a considerable measure, by foreigners or their agents; and since, as the gentleman represents, the recent calamity has fallen so heavily upon the French and other foreign houses established in the city, the statement of that fact affords a sufficient reason for extending to them whatever benefit they may gain, as debtors of the Government, from the general operation of the bill.

Removal of Creek Indians.

The gentleman from Rhode Island has made an elaborate investigation of precedents, and has shown, very conclusively, that they do not exhibit a uniform practice of the Government; but that, deciding every case upon its own merits, and with more or less consideration, Congress has sometimes granted and sometimes refused applications somewhat similar to this. From the number of such precedents, and from the fact that previous decisions have been thus contradictory, I can readily infer that there is an inherent defect in the existing laws, which, as I believe, and have stated, can only be remedied by the introduction of the warehousing system, under which such cases could not occur; but, as the precedents do not establish a general rule, and as the present case is marked by circumstances in many respects unprecedented, I do not see any thing that should deter us from the exercise of an independent judgment in deciding it.

The gentleman from Rhode Island grounds another objection upon the fact that the relief afforded by this bill is so inconsiderable that it cannot be desirable. It is indeed fortunate for the merchants and for the Government that the fire did not occur a few years sooner, when almost all imported goods were subject to duty, and in many instances a very heavy duty, and when of course the average amount of bonds remaining unpaid must have vastly exceeded the sum which is now payable. If the amount of duties upon goods destroyed by the fire, instead of being, as it is, less than a million of dollars, had not been less than five millions, and if the amount of duties upon other goods, payable at the moment, instead of being between three and four millions, had not been less than fifteen or twenty millions, I agree that the magnitude of the claims of the public debtors would have been such that the Government must have yielded to the necessity, the uncontrollable necessity, of the most liberal and extraordinary measure of relief. Still, the duty of the Government is not to be strictly measured by the magnitude of the claims; and, if it were, I can deduce no other conclusion from the gentleman's premises than that, under the existing circumstances of this case, we ought to do far more than the bill proposes—a conclusion, to say the least, manifestly incompatible with the gentleman's avowed determination to do nothing.

The relief afforded by the bill, I am free to admit, does not correspond to the exigency of the case. I hope that still more may be done, especially that another bill for the remission of duties upon goods burned may be reported and passed, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may give such a direction to the public funds already collected and constantly accruing at New York, as to make them available for the greater accommodation of the mercantile community, from whom these funds have been derived. An enlightened policy seems to me to justify and require such an administration of the finances at the present moment; and its results, I am well persuaded, must be extensively and permanently beneficial. I say, then, let all this be done, and let this bill be passed, in the first instance, as a measure of simple justice and manifest expediency, and as an earnest of the disposition of Congress to sanction the other measures which should succeed it. Let this bill, at least, be judged and decided upon its own merits; and, if there remains no other objection to it than that it does not afford sufficient relief, let that objection be removed, as has been just suggested, by further legislation, and by the arrangements of the Treasury Department.

The gentleman from Rhode Island does not exaggerate the influence and importance of the city of New York. That city sustains a relation to the Government and the country which gives her a right at all times to claim from both the most favorable consideration. At the present moment her call upon the Government, specially warranted by the circumstances of her situation, is enforced by numerous and simultaneous demonstrations of the approbation of the country.

It is not the call of New York alone. Philadelphia has seconded the call with a spirit worthy of the name she bears. Baltimore has instructed her representatives to sustain her honor by supporting any practicable measures of relief. Boston, speaking for Massachusetts, has invoked the members from that State to a like generous co-operation. The memorial of New Orleans is the spontaneous and emphatic utterance of the voice of the West. It is not the call of New York alone; but every where, along the coast and throughout the interior, wherever there has been an expression of public sympathy, it is coupled with an earnest appeal to Congress. Let us answer the appeal by an act that shall be worthy of the constituted guardians of the national interests and the national honor.

When Mr. P. had concluded, on motion of Mr. GRAVES, the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the said bill be made the special order for to-morrow at 1 o'clock; which was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

REMOVAL OF CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. GLASCOCK asked the consent of the House to submit the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting measures for the immediate removal of the Creek Indians to the allotted territory in treaty of the 24th of March, 1832.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, in offering the resolution, he was influenced from circumstances and events which had recently transpired between a portion of the citizens of Georgia and the Creek Indians; and, although there had been a partial adjustment of the difficulties between the commanding officer in that quarter (General McDugald) and some of the principal chiefs, yet he felt assured there were many turbulent and disaffected Indians of the nation who could not be controlled, and would continue to commit their depredations on our citizens, and keep them in a continued state of alarm and excitement. Mr. G. said he had just been apprized, too, that the Executive of the State had found it necessary to organize a battalion of volunteers, for the immediate defence and protection of our citizens in that quarter, the great expense of which might well be conceived; but it is due to that section of the State that it should be done, and he was gratified to find such a measure had been promptly accepted. But, Mr. G. said, he felt satisfied permanent peace and security would never be given to our frontier citizens, until there was a final removal of the whole nation to their allotted territory under the treaty of 1824, and it was with this view he offered the resolution suggesting the inquiry, and felt assured that some measure might be adopted by the present Congress to give satisfaction to our justly excited and exasperated fellow-citizens, and enable them again to pursue, in peace and tranquillity, their usual avocations; he therefore hoped the House would vote for the adoption of the resolution, that some immediate action might be had on the subject.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that the resolution was not before the House, and that the consent of the House to its reception must be first obtained before it could be debated.

Objection being made, Mr. GLASCOCK moved a suspension of the rule, in order to enable him to submit his proposition; which was negatived.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering the bill providing for the payment of the volunteers and military corps in the service of the United States; which was negatived.

Mr. JOHNSON subsequently moved to suspend the rules in order to enable him to submit a motion, making the foregoing bill the special order for one hour to-morrow morning, after the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. ASHLEY moved to amend the motion, so as to include the bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of volunteers; which was negatived.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to: Ayes 112, noes 38.

Mr. JOHNSON then submitted the motion indicated; which was carried.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to suspend the rules until one o'clock, for the purpose of receiving petitions, excepting petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; which was negatived.

CAPTAIN NATHAN HALE.

Mr. JUDSON, from the select committee on that subject, moved to take up the joint resolution in relation to the monument proposed to be erected to the memory of Captain Nathan Hale, for the purpose of reading it a second time by its title, and committing it; which was agreed to.

The resolution was then read a second time; when Mr. JUDSON moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of Union.

Mr. VINTON moved to commit the resolution to a Committee of the Whole House. He deprecated the practice of sending ordinary matters to the Committee on the state of the Union. He was not opposed to the present resolution, but had made the motion to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House, in order, if possible, to arrest the improper practice to which he had referred.

Mr. JUDSON adverted to the patriotic character of the resolution, and urged the propriety of the motion which he had submitted. He regretted that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] should have selected this resolution as the occasion upon which to oppose what that gentleman considered an improper practice which had obtained in reference to the mode of proceeding upon measures before the House.

Mr. EVANS coincided in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. In the present instance, he contended that it was incompetent for the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. JUDSON] to submit this motion, under the authority of the select committee raised on the subject referred to. That committee had reported. Their functions had therefore ceased.

The hour devoted to morning business having expired, the Chair announced the special order, being the bill for the relief of the

SUFFERERS BY FIRE IN NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee on the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the said bill.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HARDIN to strike out the first proviso in the first section, which is in the following words:

"Provided, That those who are within the provisions of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded."

Mr. GRAVES, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Chair to the following effect:

From the latitude allowed those who have preceded me in this debate, I hope it will not be considered out of order in me to speak to the merits of the whole bill. I have entertained the opinion, since the first introduction of this bill, that we could not, in accordance with sound policy and correct principles of legislation, grant the relief proposed by it to the unfortunate victims of this most unprecedented calamity; much less extend the operations of the bill, as proposed in the second section, to all such merchants as are not included in the first, and who, though they had suffered no loss by the late fire, were indebted to the Government for duties at the port of New York, by bonds that fell due prior thereto.

Laboring under the influence of that almost universal sympathy which was pervading the community for the objects of this affliction, I have felt a strong and sincere desire, if I could consistently with my convictions of duty, to give my support to this bill; yet, although I have given a most patient and impartial hearing to all that has been said in support of it, my opinions remain unchanged. The honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who last addressed the committee, in a very elaborate, able, and truly eloquent speech, has occupied all the grounds, in my humble conception, that can be urged in support of this measure, and that, too, in a manner most peculiarly felicitous. The first section of the bill provides: "That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interests of the United States, to cause to be extended (with the assent of the sureties thereon) to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the late conflagration at that place, the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given by them for duties, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal instalments, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled, upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively, payable in equal instalments, in three, four, and five years, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled, as aforesaid; and the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up or cancel all such bonds upon the receipt of others described in this act; which last-mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with in all respects like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties due to the United States: Provided, That those who are designed to be relieved by this section, and who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid."

The second section provides "that the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payment, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months, from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the seventeenth of December last."

I, Mr. Chairman, gave my undivided and most special attention to each and every position taken by that honorable gentleman in the progress of his argument, and propose, as briefly as the nature of the case will admit, to review such of them as bear upon the real merits of this question. Before, however, I proceed to a consideration of the arguments of that gentleman, allow me to remark that we have been required to act upon this subject rather in the dark; that we have had no official information as to the extent of the relief asked. We have to rely on the verbal information of the friends of this measure, who, I suppose, have it from those who are asking relief, and who, it is to be presumed, would feel no interest in magnifying the amount upon which they ask indulgence without interest, and who, because of their interest, would be held in all legal tribunals as incompetent witnesses. Taking, then, the account of the friends of the bill as correct, the first section of it embraces bonds for about $700,000, and the second section about $3,000,000. Predicating my calculation upon this information, I find interest on those bonds, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, renewable annually from the time they respectively fall due up to the period to which it is proposed to extend the credits, amounts to something upwards of $318,740; an amount greater than is required to pay the two hundred and forty three members of this House for one hundred and sixty days, and sufficiently large, especially when taken into consideration in connexion with the importance of the principle involved, to induce this House to examine well into the subject, and weigh well the probable effect and consequence of such a precedent upon the future legislation of this House.

We, Mr. Chairman, I am fully apprized, are most delicately and peculiarly situated in reference to this as well as all other claims that come before us; we occupy the attitudes both of party and judge; and, whilst we should be careful not to let self-interest bias us on the one side, we should not be less careful to see that we are not driven into error on the other hand from too great an apprehension of doing injustice to the applicants. But, sir, let us now proceed to consider, in detail, the arguments of the friends of this measure. The honorable member from Massachusetts, as has been remarked, having covered all the grounds taken in support of this bill, I will confine myself particularly to his remarks.

The first ground taken by him is, that the Government has such an amount of surplus revenue now in its Treasury, that it would have no use for the money if the bonds were collected, and that it would be suffered to lie in the deposit banks without interest. Is it true, Mr. Chairman, that this Government has no use for money at this time? Is it true that the different States in this Union have already done for themselves all that can be done, in the way of promoting the interest and happiness of their citizens, and that they are now reclining at their ease in consequence of having nothing to do calculated to advance the public good? I humbly conceive not. Look abroad in the land, and what do we see? Within the last year or two, the public spirit of our fellow-citizens seems to have received a new impulse in almost every quarter of this vast republic. A new era seems to be bursting on us. The people are aroused to their own best interest. We see the different States, situated on the different extremes of this vast Union, contemplating and moving in the work of connecting themselves with each other by inland communication that literally conquers space. We see the Legislatures of the different States providing for works of internal improvement upon a scale that is truly worthy of a free people. They are not contracting loans of thousands and tens of thousands for the accomplishment of this, that, or the other, little local improvement, but of tens of millions, for objects embracing the improvement of the whole extent of their territory. Never, in the history of this Government, was there such a spirit of enterprise abroad. Never was there a time when there was such a demand for money on the part of the different States, for their respective improvements, as the present; and are we to be told we have no use for the money in the public Treasury?

I readily agree that it is better that these importing merchants, who are engaged actively in enterprising commerce that adds to the wealth of the nation, should hold this money, which belongs in common to them and the rest of their fellow-citizens, without interest, than that the deposit banks, in whose vaults it is to be placed, should be allowed to fatten and grow rich on the interest paid them by the people, for the most gracious privilege of using their own money. But I am not willing to stake the fate of this bill on this issue. It is not the true issue. I, for one, sir, intend to legislate upon this and every other subject calculated to affect our finances, with just as strict an eye to economy as though I knew this Congress intended to obey the voice of the people in their demand for an equal distribution of the surplus revenue among the States. I am not yet prepared to anticipate a failure of this most important measure.

Government is a moral person, possessing, in reference to its property, all the natural, moral, and legal rights of a private individual; every citizen constitutes a component part thereof, and his right in every thing that belongs to the Government, whether it be in the public lands or bonds upon importers, or in whatever the right of property can exist, though small in point of size, yet bears the same proportion to the entire thing which one bears to the number of citizens in this Government, and is just as perfect and unquestionable as though the right to the entire thing was vested in him; and the same policy which is observed in the fiscal concerns of a wise, prudent, humane, and just private individual, should control and regulate the financial operations of every Government, where the interest and happiness of the great mass of the people are the paramount considerations. Hence, we should adopt the same process of analysis, the same rules of investigation, in arriving at the relative rights of the Government, and such of its citizens as are embraced by the provisions of this bill, as though it were a matter between two individuals.

His second ground is, that it is the interest of the Government, acting as a prudent creditor, to extend the proposed credit, in order the better to secure the collection of her debts. The Government holds the bonds of its citizens for duties; and when they fall due it has a right to expect payment, without some sufficient cause against it. The merchant, in the present instance, says to his Government, you hold my bond, due on such a day, for such an amount, for duties; from an unexpected misfortune, I am in some degree crippled in my commercial operations, and it will be your interest to indulge me for four years after my bonds become due, without interest, in order that your debt may be the better secured. Ought not the Government to act as any other prudent creditor, and say to its debtor, you must give me some evidence, in addition to your own suggestion, that it is my interest thus to act? Would not any prudent private creditor require other proof than the statement of his debtor, before he would thus prolong for four years the time of the payment of his debt, and that, too, without interest? Being, then, altogether without proof that it is its interest to extend this credit, I think the Government on this account alone ought not to do it.

I will conclude my remarks upon this branch of the subject by asking whether it is supposed, by any friend of this bill, that one of those importers would agree to extend a credit of four years, without interest, for the price of a quantity of goods purchased of him in New York by a merchant from Louisville or Cincinnati, and lost by the purchaser in descending the river, or by fire
